leave behind all other employment. From that time forward, he would be zōgrōn (participle of zōgreō); this is not the same word used in the passage for catching fish, although it could rarely express that thought. It is the word (as is seen in its LXX usage) for "capturing people alive" in military conquest. Preaching the gospel is like waging warfare against the satanic forces and those allied to them and "capturing" them for the kingdom of God. While this initial invitation was addressed specifically to Peter, Jesus called the other disciples also (cf. Mark 1:16–20), and they left everything and followed Him (Luke 5:11).

5:12–16. Jesus Cleanses a Leper. The setting in (lit.) "one of the cities" (v. 12) continues Christ's purpose of preaching in other cities besides Capernaum (4:43). He was approached by a man completely infected with leprosy (5:12). As in the previous healing episode, the problem was a particularly severe condition. Whether Hansen's disease or some other skin disease is indicated here (Lev. 13–14), exclusion from society was required and the leper had to cry "Unclean! Unclean!" (Lev. 13:45) to warn people against touching him and thus becoming ceremonially defiled. The man apparently approached Jesus on the outskirts of the city since he was prohibited from entering populated areas. He did not ask Jesus to pray for His healing—he recognized that Jesus could cleanse/heal him; the only question was whether He would. There was no thought of bypassing the priestly requirements for cleansing since Jesus commanded him to present himself "to the priest" "as a testimony" for what he had experienced (Luke 5:14; see Lev. 14:1–32).

Luke confirms that Jesus actually healed the man of the disease by indicating that immediately after Jesus touched him and pronounced him healed, the leprosy left him (Luke 5:13). Again the emphasis falls on the power of Jesus's word to heal, but here also His touch was significant. Rather than Jesus being defiled, the man was cleansed. Leprosy was one way God punished sin in the OT (e.g., Num. 12:10; 2 Kin. 5:27; 2 Chr. 26:20), so its cleansing represented an appropriate illustration of Christ's power to cleanse people from sin.

The man's healing also served a larger purpose: it was a testimony to the priests about the nature of Christ's work. This may be one reason why Jesus commanded the man not to tell anyone (Luke 5:14)—to ensure a fair verdict uninfluenced by any possible prejudice the priests might have had toward Jesus's work. Although the good news about Jesus's wonders continued to spread (v. 15), Jesus regularly withdrew from the press of the crowds and the stress of ministering in order to find a solitary place to pray (v. 16). Thus He received the physical and spiritual strength needed to continue His work.

5:17–26. Jesus Heals a Paralyzed Man. This episode begins a series of five controversies with the Pharisees (5:17, 30, 33; 6:2, 7). Although Luke does not say where the healing of this paralyzed man occurred, Mark 2:1 tells us it was in Capernaum. Obviously members of the religious establishment had begun to consider Jesus a serious threat because Pharisees and teachers of the law (or "scribes," Luke 5:21) from as far away as Jerusalem (v. 17) were present. The scribes in general, and the sect of the Pharisees in particular, prided themselves on their knowledge of the Scriptures and the oral traditions or rulings on how the law should be kept, including Sabbath observance and the handling and eating of food in a state of purity (cf. Mark 7:1–5). These legal elaborations continued to accumulate until they were eventually written down and codified in the Mishnah, the Talmud, and other rabbinic writings. Jesus opposed human interpretations being prioritized over Scripture, making it void (Matt. 15:3–6). Consequently, the more significant aspects of the law (justice, mercy, and faith) were being neglected (Matt. 23:23), as this story vividly illustrates.

Jesus, filled with the Holy Spirit (Luke 3:16, 21–22), had "the power of the Lord" to heal (5:17; cf. v. 24). In Luke's writings, "Spirit" and "power" are inseparable; to receive the Holy Spirit is to receive power for ministry (1:35; 4:14; 24:49; Acts 1:8; 10:38). People crowded into the house where Jesus was teaching. A typical house in Capernaum was a single dwelling that could accommodate no more than about fifty people, with a flat roof for use as a second level. A stairway or ladder provided easy access to the roof from the outside. These friends of the paralyzed man, perhaps at his suggestion, carried him up and dug through the roof (Mark 2:4) by removing clay pieces or tiles (the Greek word can mean either) and lowered him into the middle of the assembly (Luke 5:19). Luke has already contrasted the unbelieving Zacharias with the simple faith of Mary, who entrusted her future into God's hands (1:20, 45). Now Jesus affirmed "their faith" (5:20) by granting the man what he needed most—the forgiveness of sins.

While unexpected from what all three Synoptic Gospels describe as a physical problem, Jesus recognized the deeper need of the paralytic, just as He knew the thoughts of the religious onlookers.

To refute the unspoken charge of speaking blasphemies (in this case usurping divine prerogatives by claiming the power to forgive sins), Jesus posed a rhetorical question: Is it easier to pronounce the man forgiven or to enable him to walk? From a human perspective, the easier of the two options was to tell a person that his or her sins are forgiven. But in order to demonstrate that as the Son of Man, He had the right "to forgive sins," Jesus did the harder thing—restoring life to the limbs of the paralytic (v. 24). The title "Son of Man" is almost always found only on the lips of Jesus (except Acts 7:56), apparently as a self-designation, but ambiguous enough to frustrate the religious leaders who were seeking a clear basis for charges against Him (cf. John 12:34). Both the man who was healed and the common people praised and glorified God, recognizing that it was divine power at work.

5:27–32. The Call of Levi. Next Jesus saw a tax collector named Levi collecting customs on goods in transit. Judging from the parallel account in the Gospel of Matthew, the man was also called Matthew (see Matt. 9:9; 10:3). It was not uncommon for individuals to have two names (Acts 12:25; 13:9), even two Jewish names (Acts 1:23; 4:36). Jews who collected taxes for the Romans were considered not just accomplices in the oppression of their fellow countrymen but hopelessly apostate along with other so-called "sinners" (Luke 5:30). Yet Jesus invited him to follow Him (v. 27). Levi Matthew did not need a second invitation. He left everything behind, including his lucrative job, his status with Rome, and his earthly security for an uncertain future as a disciple of Jesus. According to the sociopolitical wisdom of the time, the welcoming of a tax collector into a Jewish teacher's inner circle was unthinkable. But love begets love, as Jesus would remind Simon the Pharisee a little later (7:47). In gratitude, Levi held a grand banquet in Jesus's honor (5:29), inviting his fellow tax collectors so that they too could meet Jesus. To follow Jesus in discipleship means to make disciples in the same way that a genuine tree produces fruit.

The Pharisees, who taught that Jews should not eat with Gentiles or even with religiously questionable Jews for fear of defilement (Acts 10:28), asked the disciples why they kept such company. If they were not being correctly taught, their teacher was obviously to blame. So Jesus answered for them. He had come to call those who recognized their need for healing, these were sinners who knew their need of repentance. Levi, in answering the call, repented—changed his mind and heart (as the Greek word indicates)—which was evidenced by leaving his former life behind and following Jesus.

5:33–39. On Fasting and New Wine. Fasting in various forms occupies a valued place in all the major world religions and was a sign of religious devotion in Israel (Matt. 6:16–18). The Pharisees fasted twice a week (see commentary on Luke 18:9–14). Surprisingly, however, the disciples of Jesus did not fast, except presumably on the Day of Atonement, when all Israel was required to fast (Lev. 16:29–31; cf. Is. 58:3; Acts 27:9). In answering why, Jesus compared His work to that of a wedding celebration; the attendants of the bridegroom should not fast when the bridegroom is with them (Luke 5:34). He and His disciples were proclaiming the good news of the kingdom. It was a new time, a time not to mourn but to be happy. In asserting that the bridegroom would be taken away (v. 35), Jesus adopted similar imagery to that used of Him by John the Baptist (John 3:29) and hinted at His own dark future. After He would be gone, His disciples would fast. The occasional mention of fasting in the NT confirms this (2 Cor. 6:5; 11:27).

The parable about the new and the old present two images: fixing an old garment with a new patch and putting new wine into old wineskins, with neither having good results. In Luke's account, the new patch is torn from a new garment, spoiling both the new and the old. It seems to represent an all or nothing choice. "Accept My whole message and ministry or reject it all." The parable shows an intention not merely to make the old better but to make it new. What better way to describe the "new covenant" (Luke 22:20) than with new wine—fresh, pure, and wholesome. Although this parable appears also in Matthew 9:14–27 and Mark 2:18–22, only here do we find that Jesus added that drinking old or aged wine makes new wine seem unpalatable—apparently a reference to the old Jewish traditions held by the Pharisees and scribes, predisposing them to reject Jesus's message.

6:1–5. Plucking and Eating Grain. Luke next presents two controversies over proper Sabbath observance (6:1–11). No hint is given here of the Sabbath being no longer important. Rather, in both cases Jesus defended the manner in which He and His disciples kept the Sabbath. In the first episode, some Pharisees observed the disciples plucking heads of grain while making their way through a field on the Sabbath. Luke adds the additional detail that they were rubbing them in order to separate the husk from the kernels (6:1). Although the law of Moses provided for gleaning to satisfy one's hunger (Deut. 23:24, 25; cf. Lev. 19:10), the Pharisees taught that such "harvesting" violated the Sabbath (Luke 6:2). Jesus, in defense of His disciples, compared their actions to those of David and his men, who ate the holy showbread that only priests were permitted to eat (vv. 3–4). Both were exceptional cases. The underlying principle of the first episode is that God does not expect us to choose between holiness and human need; they are not in conflict. If the holy bread of the temple could be used to satisfy hunger, the holiness of the Sabbath was no barrier to the disciples satisfying their hunger by plucking grain. Being the Lord of creation (John 1:3; Col. 1:16), Jesus is also Lord of the Sabbath (Luke 6:5) and best able to define how it should be kept.

6:6–11. Healing a Man With a Withered Hand. In this second Sabbath controversy, a similar principle applies: the holiness of the Sabbath did not stand in the way of Jesus relieving human suffering. There seems to have been a Jewish provision for saving life on the Sabbath. Significantly, however, all four Gospels consistently describe Jesus healing chronic conditions on the Sabbath; no life would have been lost if He had waited until the next day (cf. Luke 13:14). Jesus connected the Sabbath with restoration, just as in the beginning it was connected with Creation. Already He had gained a reputation for healing on the Sabbath (4:31–37; cf. John 5:1–9), and so He was watched (Luke 6:7). The Greek word suggests a clandestine surveillance to entrap or to harm (cf. Luke 14:1; 20:20; Acts 9:24). Jesus's enemies kept alert for an opportunity to bring legal measures against Him.

As in the previous episode (cf. Luke 6:2, 4), attention is given here to what is "lawful" to do on the Sabbath (v. 9). The way Jesus framed the question, His opponents were given a stark choice as to what comports with holiness: doing good or doing evil, saving life or destroying it? Tension mounted as Jesus looked around at them all (v. 10), apparently waiting for an answer, but none was forthcoming. The question implied that it is not enough simply to avoid doing evil. Doing nothing when we could do good is also wrong (Prov. 3:27; James 4:17). Failure to do good is to do evil; failure to save life is to kill. Thus Mark 3:5 indicates that Jesus was disturbed by their stubborn, hard hearts. Yet rather than saying "be healed," He simply told the man to stretch out his hand. While Jesus's opponents were raging and furious, there was no basis here for an accusation.

6:12–16. Selection of the Twelve Apostles. After more than a year of ministry, Jesus had attracted many followers and had been able to observe their potential and the extent of their commitment. Before selecting twelve of them for a special work, Jesus prayed to God throughout the night. At crucial points in His ministry, we see Jesus praying (Luke 3:21; 5:16; 9:18, 28; 11:1; 22:41). Such a crucial decision as the appointment of these twelve required divine guidance. Jesus even described them as those whom the Father had "given" Him (John 17:6, 9, 11–12). The number, based on the organization of ancient Israel, was deliberate. They would be the leaders on whom the proclamation of the gospel and the expansion of the church would depend. He called them "apostles," meaning "those sent out." As Jesus was the Apostle sent from the Father (John 20:21; Heb. 3:1), so here the Twelve were set apart for a special ministry. Comparing the four listings of the apostles in the NT (Matt. 10:2–4; Mark 3:16–19; Luke 6:13–16; Acts 1:13), we find them virtually identical (Judas the son of James appears to be another name for Thaddeus). Except for Simon, Philip, and James the son of Alphaeus, who are always listed first, fifth, and ninth respectively, the order of names varies. Luke also indicates here that Jesus gave Simon the name Peter and referred to him that way from then on. Judas Iscariot, by contrast, is called a traitor. Though several suggestions have been made for the meaning of "Iscariot," it probably refers to the place from which Judas came (cf. John 6:71; 13:26)—"man from Kerioth," a town in southern Judah (Josh. 15:25). If so, this would mean he was the only Judean among the Twelve.

6:17–49. Sermon on the Kingdom of God. Several differences in this sermon's setting and content compared with Matthew's similar account (see Matt. 4:24—7:27) have led some to conclude that these are two separate occasions. In both cases, however, Jesus spoke especially to His disciples, though Luke adds that it was in the hearing of the multitude (Luke 6:17, 20;

7:1; Matt. 5:1–2). Also, the sayings are very similar. Nevertheless, the differences are such as to suggest that the two accounts do not stem from a common written source. If the two versions are reporting on the same event, they can be explained as different recollections and retellings of the same sermon. In addition, Matthew includes sayings in the sermon that Luke locates elsewhere, suggesting that Jesus probably repeated some of these teachings on other occasions.

6:20–26. The Beatitudes. Of the eight beatitudes given in Matthew, Luke includes four of them, along with four contrasting woes, all of which Jesus addressed directly to His hearers: "Blessed are you" (poor/rich, hungry/full, weeping/laughing, hated/spoken well of; vv. 21–22). While we might picture Jesus speaking these blessings to some of His listeners and the woes to others there present, it could also be that Jesus deliberately challenged His hearers to evaluate their own lives and consider to which group they belonged. God effected a reversal of fortunes whereby the poor, by responding to Jesus, could actually lay claim to the kingdom of God. The time would come when they would laugh. Even if people would hate, ostracize, insult, or revile them because of their connection with Him, Jesus promised rejoicing and leaping for joy "in that day." His repeated use of the future tense indicates two aspects: future reception of the reward, yet present possession of the reward in heaven (v. 23). Jesus also warned (vv. 24–25) against the seductiveness of wealth (cf. Luke 12:13–21) and the desire to be rich (cf. 1 Tim. 6:9–10)—we cannot serve God and money (cf. Luke 16:13). It is often when people have everything they need that they are tempted to feel no need for God (Deut. 6:10–12; Rev. 3:17), while those whose needs are not met cry out to Him in faith for help. Jesus's warning about the popularity of false prophets (Luke 6:26) harkens back to the persecution of God's messengers, like David running from Saul, Zechariah murdered in the temple court (2 Chr. 24:20–21), and Jeremiah thrown into the mire (Jer. 38:6; cf. Matt. 23:35; Heb. 11:37).

6:27–36. Love Your Enemies. The sign of true disciples of Jesus is their obedience to His commands, including His command to love their enemies (v. 27). How can we love those who deserve it the least? By applying the Golden Rule of acting toward others as we would wish them to act toward us (v. 31). Love is not a feeling but a principle of action. It includes doing good in response to hate, blessing instead of cursing, praying for those who mistreat us, giving more than people ask of us, and lending expecting nothing in return (vv. 33–35). We are to invest not in perishable things but in people. Just as children are like their parents, children of the Most High should desire to be like their heavenly Father, who is kind even to those who are ungrateful and merciful to those who do not deserve the blessings of His kingdom but are given them anyway (cf. Luke 18:13–14).

6:37–42. Do Not Judge. These words are some of the most misunderstood in the entire sermon because the verses that follow are often ignored. Jesus spoke not against law and order (Matt. 5:25–26) but against jumping to conclusions about others when we do not see the whole picture. Rather than trying to remove the speck in my brother's eye, I should first remove the plank in my own eye (Luke 6:41–42). Rather than judging and condemning, we should forgive and then we will be forgiven (v. 37). In giving, we receive. Those who are generous to others will be treated with generosity (Prov. 11:25). The present tense of the command to refrain from judgment indicates that it refers to not just a single instance but to an established practice of not judging or condemning, to forgiving as a way of life. As we bless others, we receive more—far more, like grain pressed down, shaken, and running over (Luke 6:38). The measure we use in evaluating others will be the standard by which others measure us.

The emphasis on what we see and do not see is linked in this passage to a proverb about whether the blind can lead the blind (v. 39; cf. Matt. 15:14, where it refers to the Pharisees). Obviously clear vision is an essential quality for any leader but particularly a spiritual leader because the stakes are so much higher. Leading people astray is the devil's work, which Jesus's disciples are called to counteract by presenting the truth. That is why every disciple must be completely trained to be like his or her teacher.

6:43–45. A Tree Is Known by Its Fruit. The produce reveals the quality of its source (cf. James 3:11–12). Jesus, like John the Baptist (see commentary on Luke 3:7–20), likened people to fruit-bearing trees so that the "fruit," their character, is revealed not by what they say or appear to be but by their actions (cf. Prov. 20:11; 1 John 3:18). Good fruit includes loving one's enemies, being generous without expecting anything in return, and treating others as we wish to be treated. These attitudes springing from the a person's heart—the inner thoughts and motives—are the marks of a true disciple (Luke 6:45; cf. Matt. 12:35; 13:44).

6:46–49. Build on the Rock. In both Matthew and Luke this sermon concludes with an appeal to do what Jesus says (cf. Matt. 7:21–27). Confession of Jesus as Lord is not by itself indicative of a true disciple (Luke 6:46). True discipleship is likened to building a house (v. 48). Digging deep in order to place its foundation on the rock requires more than a mere casual acquaintance with Jesus and a surface knowledge of His teachings. Only putting them into practice will enable a person to endure the difficulties that will ensue when deciding to follow Jesus. Even the house against which the water crashes will not be shaken because it is strongly built on the rock. The rock is a well-known symbol of God in the Hebrew Bible (e.g., Deut. 32:4, 15, 18, 30; Ps. 18:2, 31, 46; Is. 44:8), and here Jesus uses the symbolism in relation to Himself (cf. Matt. 16:18; 1 Cor. 10:4), thus showing that He is God. True faithfulness to Christ is expressed by embracing and living out His teachings.

7:1–10. Jesus Heals a Centurion's Servant. The centurion is so identified because he commanded approximately one hundred soldiers. Being aware of Jewish scruples regarding contact with Gentiles, he sent separate Jewish delegations to implore Jesus's help (vv. 6–7). The "elders of the Jews" (v. 3) were the older, respected leaders of the community (e.g., 20:1; Acts 4:5, 8; cf. Ex. 4:29), indicating that this centurion was widely respected among the Jews in Capernaum, not so surprising in view of his having built them a synagogue (Luke 7:5). That this man had a kind heart is indicated not only by the care toward his servant, whom he held in high esteem, but also by his love for the Jewish nation, surprising because Jews were typically derided by Romans.

While the Jewish leaders exalted the man as axios—"worthy" or "deserving"—because of his love and generosity (v. 4), the centurion had the opposite confession: "I am not hikanos"—"sufficient," "able," "considerable"—not the same word that is used in v. 4, but conveying the idea that he was not significant enough for Jesus to come into his home. His humble request is relayed by friends who form a second delegation to approach Jesus as He nears the house. The centurion, whose life and those of his men depended on respect for authority and the chain of command, was clearly impressed by reports of the authority that Jesus exercised when commanding demons to leave and healing disease (4:36; 6:19). Jesus praised the man's faith. Earlier, people had come to Jesus and desired to touch Him in order to be healed, but for the centurion, Jesus's word is enough—even from a distance (cf. Mark 7:29; John 4:50). The healing apparently resulted from Jesus's commendation of the man's faith. And normally when Jesus healed, it was the people who were awestruck, but here Jesus was the one impressed with and amazed at the rarity of such faith, found not in Israel but among the Gentiles. The only other recorded instance of Jesus marveling—at the people's unbelief (see commentary on Luke 4:14–30)—was at Nazareth, which is suggested as the reason He could not do many miracles there (Mark 6:5–6).

7:11–17. Jesus Raises the Widow of Nain's Son. Jesus's healing from a distance was immediately overshadowed by an even greater miracle: raising the dead. Traveling the day's journey from Capernaum to Nain, located six miles (10 km) southeast of Nazareth, Jesus entered the village with a large crowd in addition to His disciples (v. 11). Coming out of the city was a large funeral procession, carrying on a bier a widow's only son (v. 12). Special concern is shown by God toward society's most vulnerable members—the fatherless, foreign residents, and widows (Deut. 27:19). The fact that this woman had lost her only means of support made her situation especially dire.

The two streams of people, one joyful and happy to be with Jesus, the other weeping and wailing with disconsolation, met near the gate of the city. This location, where people generally congregated to conduct important business, together with two very large crowds, guaranteed maximum impact for what Jesus was about to do. His command, addressed only to the widow (who would have been at the front of the procession), not the mourners, is more accurately translated, "Stop weeping." Depending on the tone of voice, such words could sound cold and harsh. However, since Jesus is described as having heartfelt compassion for her (Luke 7:13), no doubt they were spoken softly and gently, with a tender sympathy and expectancy designed to inspire the widow with faith. Just as astonishing, Jesus touched the stretcher on which the young man's body lay and brought the procession to a halt. Under normal circumstances, such contact would render a person ceremonially unclean for a week. But all that was forgotten once Jesus told the boy to rise up. He sat up and began to speak, which was proof that he was very much alive.

In reacting to the event, the people acknowledged that God episkeptomai—literally "visited," but conveying the idea of "caring for." This was a well-known Jewish way of expressing God's intervention (e.g., Ruth 1:6; 1 Sam. 2:21; see commentary on Luke 1:57–80). Not surprisingly, Luke indicates that word of this miracle spread far and wide, throughout Judea and all the surrounding areas (Luke 7:17). When used by itself, in Luke's writings Judea means the whole of the Holy Land (e.g., Luke 23:5; Acts 10:37).

7:18–35. John the Baptist and Jesus. From Luke's account, it appears that Jesus's raising the widow of Nain's son from the dead was included among Christ's acts that were reported to John the Baptist by his disciples to help curb his doubt. Apparently to show Jesus's healing work as an illustration of the gospel, Luke uses the Greek verb charizomai, from the same root as charis ("grace"), which is used a few verses later in the sense of "forgive" (vv. 42–43). The only other NT writer to use this verb is Paul, who employs it both ways ("graciously or freely give" in Rom. 8:32; 1 Cor. 2:12; Gal. 3:18; and "forgive" in 2 Cor. 2:7, 10; Eph. 4:32; Col. 2:13; 3:13). John's disciples became witnesses of what they had seen and heard about Jesus, just as the shepherds had been at His birth (Luke 2:20) and as the apostles, including Paul, would be after His resurrection (Acts 4:20; 22:15). These disciples had plenty to report in terms of Jesus's work as a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecies (Is. 26:19; 29:18; 35:5–6; 61:1). Jesus added a blessing on the one who would not be skandalizō—"caused to stumble" or "offended"—because of Him. This was another allusion to Isaiah (Is. 8:14–15; cf. John 6:61) and thus reaffirmed John in the conviction that Jesus was the Messiah.

In His short discourse to His hearers about the mission of John the Baptist, Jesus emphasized that John fulfilled the prophecy in Malachi about preparing the way of the Lord, the Messiah (Mal. 3:1; cf. Is. 40:3). Although John performed no miracles (John 10:41), Jesus counted him the greatest of the prophets because he heralded the arrival of the kingdom of God (Luke 7:28). In addition, Luke adds, the Pharisees and lawyers who refused to be baptized by John rejected God's will for their lives, while the lowly tax collectors accepted it (v. 29). Finally, Jesus passed judgment on the people of His generation, who behaved more like children, excusing themselves for rejecting John because he did not have a more positive message and accusing him of having a demon (v. 33; the same charge would also be leveled at Jesus; see John 7:20; 8:48; 10:20). At the same time, they felt Jesus went to the opposite extreme; His message was too positive, welcoming sinners and eating with them (cf. Luke 15:2). But Jesus indicated that wisdom is recognized "by all her children" (7:35; i.e., the truly wise). Those claiming to be waiting for the Second Coming of Christ must be able to discern the true message and signs of His imminent arrival from wherever it may come and not be lulled into dismissively explaining away present truth.

7:36–50. A Sinful Woman Forgiven. The many similarities between this account and that of a woman anointing Jesus's feet just prior to His arrest and crucifixion strongly suggest that the same incident is being described: (1) All four Gospels place it at a feast in a private home and say that a woman anointed Jesus with fragrant oil, and all but Luke place it in Bethany. (2) They all agree that it occurred while the guests were reclining at a table, and the Synoptic Gospels mention Simon as the host. (3) These three also agree that the oil was in an alabaster flask, while John does not mention the container. (4) Mark and John identify the oil as spikenard, and all but Luke remark that it was very expensive. (5) Both Luke and John mention the anointing of Jesus's feet and that the woman used her hair to wipe them.

The other three Gospels, in stressing the symbolism of this act as anointing Jesus for His upcoming burial, identify it as occurring just a few days before the final Passover and focus on Jesus's reply to Judas. Thus, they agree in many other details, including the high quality and cost of the oil, the indignant reaction of some present that it could have been sold and the proceeds given to the poor, and Jesus's defense of the woman in anointing Him for His burial. Luke, on the other hand, seems to have placed this story earlier in the narrative in order to focus on Jesus's interaction with Simon, which serves to illustrate the gospel proclamation mentioned immediately afterward (8:1). This is consistent with Luke. This connection is supported by Luke's reference in that verse to his ordering of the Gospel in a logical sequence, not necessarily a chronological one (see commentary on Luke 1:1–4). The woman, then, should be identified as Mary (John 11:1, 2; cf. 12:1–3).

Luke calls her sinful and identifies her as being from the same town as Simon, who was one of the Pharisees. In the Gospels generally, the Pharisees opposed Jesus, who did not conform to their oral traditions (see commentary on Luke 5:17–26) and labeled their outward piety hypocritical (11:39–44; 12:1). The typical manner for eating meals had the guests reclining on their sides around a low table, which explains how Mary stood at His feet behind Him (7:38). It is an emotional scene. She was weeping and washing Jesus's feet with her tears. She let down her hair, which was scandalous in such a social setting, wiped His feet, and kissed and anointed them with the fragrant oil. Mark and John identify this oil as spikenard (Mark 14:3; John 12:3), which was precious and costly—fitting for storage in an alabaster flask used only for the highest quality perfumes. Simon inwardly began to doubt whether Jesus could really be a prophet because if He were, He surely would have recognized that it was a sinful woman touching Him (Luke 7:39). The Pharisee misinterpreted Mary's actions as sexual, by which he then misjudged Jesus, who gently corrected him by means of a parable about two debtors (vv. 41–42). Turning to the woman but really speaking to Simon, He revealed not only that He understood the woman's character but also that He had prophetic insight into the Pharisee's own unspoken thoughts.

Rather than correct the misconceptions directly, Jesus first told a parable of forgiveness. Although fifty denarii was no trivial sum, five hundred denarii represented a laborer's wages for about a year and five months. Obviously the one freely forgiven the larger sum would love the creditor more. The word "forgive" is from the root word for "grace" (see commentary on Luke 7:18–35). Both the woman and the host were in need of grace. Simon had not extended Jesus even the most elemental courtesies—no water to wash His feet, no kiss of welcome, no oil for anointing His head. Consequently, He understood Mary's actions as flowing out of gratitude for forgiveness she had already experienced. She was not forgiven because she had abundant love; she was forgiven with the result that she had abundant love. Jesus had already likened His ministry of forgiveness to the year of Jubilee's canceling of debt (see commentary on Luke 4:14–30). This woman's experience not only provided for Simon a vivid lesson in forgiveness but also showed him he needed it too, especially if he was responsible for leading her into sin. When Jesus affirmed to the woman that her sins were forgiven, some asked among themselves, "Who is this who even forgives sins?" (7:49). The answer to this crucial question will continue to be unfolded for Luke's readers, who may do well to ponder for themselves what Jesus said to the woman: "Your faith has saved you." The word "save" can also mean "heal" and is used that way by Luke later (e.g., 8:36, 48, 50). But here it unambiguously refers to salvation through faith, paving the way for the reference in the next section to Mary Magdalene's having been healed (using a different word) from seven demons (8:2). Although not explicit in the Gospels, these two Marys were most probably the same person (cf. DA 568). This would provide another reason for Luke's placing this story here.

8:1–3. Women Provide Financially for Jesus's Ministry. With these verses, Luke connects not only the previous story dealing with forgiveness but also the parables that follow to Jesus's proclamation of the glad tidings, good news, or gospel of the kingdom of God (see commentary on Luke 7:36–50). Besides the twelve apostles, there were also some women followers who traveled with Jesus (8:2). Despite the fact that it was unacceptable in the Jewish culture of the time to have women disciples (see John 4:27; cf. Luke 10:39, 42; Acts 1:14), teachers did sometimes receive financial support from women.

The role of women at the crucifixion of Jesus and at the empty tomb is recorded by all four Gospels, but reference to them as disciples at this early stage is unique to Luke. This shows Jesus's willingness to teach them in order for them to be effective witnesses. Two of the three women named here reappear in Luke among the first witnesses to Jesus's resurrection and would be among the first to proclaim His resurrection (Luke 24:1–10). Mary Magdalene's having been delivered from seven demons demonstrates that even worst-case scenarios are not hopeless (cf. 11:24–26). The fact that Joanna (8:3), Herod's steward's wife, provided support for Jesus shows that His gospel message reached the elite as well as the poor.

8:4–18. Parables of the Kingdom. According to Matthew and Mark, these parables of the kingdom were told beside the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 13:1–23; Mark 4:1–25). Luke emphasizes the vast amount of people who came from many towns and cities to see Jesus.

Jesus solemnly concluded the parable of the sower with an urgent call for people to understand. This call concludes the parable of the sower in all three Synoptic Gospels (cf. Matt. 13:9; Mark 4:9), suggesting that these parables were meant to be understood by a larger circle of followers. This call is found elsewhere too, sometimes being spoken just to the Twelve (Matt. 13:43; Mark 4:23), while at other times, as here, extending to the larger multitude (Luke 14:35; Matt. 11:15; Mark 7:16; cf. Rev. 2:7, 11, 17). Through this call, Jesus invited His listeners to understand the deeper spiritual meaning in His teachings. But truly understanding this gospel of the kingdom involves more than a mere intellectual acceptance of the truth. In harmony with the Hebrew understanding that hearing includes the idea of obedience, Jesus was also calling for a personal heart commitment from His listeners (cf. v. 12) to put the principles of God's kingdom into practice. Those who had heard Christ's sermon on the kingdom of God were now challenged to reflect on their own response to His teaching.

According to the interpretation given to the disciples, this first parable explains that sowing the same seed (the word of God; v. 11) may have different outcomes depending on the condition of the soil (i.e., the hearers' receptivity to the word and their willingness to act on what they hear). The acceptance of Jesus's teachings is equated with acceptance of God's word—not too surprising if we consider them as an elaboration on and magnification of truths already latent in the OT. Unfortunately, in the parable some hearers refuse to believe and be saved (v. 12). Others joyfully accept the gospel and "believe for a while," but when tests and temptations come, rather than responding in harmony with their belief, they fall away (v. 13). A third group may act on their beliefs to some extent, but the cares, worries, riches, and pleasures of life are left to grow and, like thorny weeds, strangle their spiritual life and take over their hearts, and so they do not reach maturity (v. 14). In other words, worldly considerations rather than the principles of the kingdom control their life (cf. Matt. 6:33).

The good ground or soil symbolizes those who listen to God's word with an honest and good heart and katechō—"keep," "hold on," "retain" (Luke 8:15; cf. its use in 1 Cor. 11:2; 15:2; Heb. 10:23). Those who firmly believe God's word will also practice it and bear fruit, that is, the kingdom qualities described in Christ's sermon (Luke 6:20–45; cf. Matt. 7:20; Gal. 5:22–25) will be seen in their lives. Although these four types of ground represent different responses, it is not as if some are naturally more receptive than others. The Spirit of God brings the message home to each heart. The hearer may be transformed by believing the word and allowing the Spirit's work to continue (John 3:5–8); however, as the parable indicates, the soil of people's hearts may become so hardened that they neither see nor understand (Luke 8:10; cf. Ezek. 12:2).

The OT quotation (from Is. 6:9–10) refers to the effect that Isaiah's prophetic proclamation would have on people who obstinately refuse to listen. Those who persistently refuse to receive the word deeply into their hearts and lives will, like ancient Israel, fail to patiently endure (unlike those described in Luke 8:15). Such a fruit-bearing life is like a lamp that should be displayed openly for all to see (v. 16), for everything concealed or secret will be manifested in the judgment (v. 17; Eccl. 12:13–14). That is why we must carefully evaluate not only what we listen to but how we listen; otherwise, those who seem to have received the word may find even that taken away (Luke 8:18).

8:19–21. Jesus's Relatives Come to Him. As a further illustration of both the sermon and these parables of the kingdom, Luke includes here the incident of Jesus's mother and brothers coming and being unable to see Him because of the crowd (see "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252). Not unlike His response in the temple as a boy (Luke 2:49), Jesus prioritizes the spiritual relationship over the physical. His true family are His followers, who, as the present tense in Greek indicates, are hearing the word of God and doing it.

8:22–25. Jesus Calms the Storm. Mark 4:35 places this event in the evening, when such a violent storm, not uncommon on the Sea of Galilee, is more likely. Cold winds descending from the surrounding mountains can suddenly generate waves up to seven feet (2 m) high, and so the fear of these experienced fishermen that they might perish in the storm is understandable. The surprise is that Jesus could remain asleep even though water was overwhelming the boat. Nevertheless, to hold all thirteen men, the boat would have to have been fairly large and, indeed, Luke's wording suggests a sailboat rather than a rowboat (Luke 8:23, 26; regarding a first-century boat, see "Archaeology and the Bible," p. 90). Emphatically, the disciples cried out to Jesus twice, "Master, Master" (v. 24). This title, found only in Luke, underscores Jesus's authority, which is vividly displayed in His rebuking of the wind and waves so that all was calm (v. 24). More troubling to Jesus than the storm was His disciples' terror. "Where is your faith?" (v. 25). This, rather than their seamanship, was the vital ingredient. As they asked in wonderment who Jesus is that even nature obeys Him, they also may have profitably pondered their own human weakness and need of divine power essential for their next challenge.

8:26–39. Healing of the Demoniac of Gadara. Having faced the raging sea, Jesus and the disciples, on reaching land, were now confronted by a raging demoniac. All three Synoptic Gospels offer only an approximate location. In any case, the events described happened in the vicinity of the lake (Matt. 8:28; Mark 5:1). The most likely but less notable location, which appears in some early and important manuscripts, Gergesa, is also the only point at which the hills descend steeply to the eastern shore. Nearby the place commonly identified as the location for this story are cavern tombs (the type used for burial) with some evidence of occupation. This fits the description of the demoniac living in the tombs, a place of perpetual ritual impurity.

The man, violent and wearing no clothes, acted like a suppliant by falling at Jesus's feet, but he spoke with a demonic voice (cf. Luke 4:34, 41). As already observed, a true confession coming from demons poses a serious credibility problem (see commentary on Luke 4:31–37). Compared with the demonic speech in the Capernaum synagogue, this man showed more respect and deference to Jesus as he begged Him to leave him alone (Luke 8:28; cf. 4:34). Discerning the man's respectful approach and gesture of obeisance as an unspoken cry for help, Jesus commanded the spirit to come out, but surprisingly it resisted Him. The reason may be that although the text initially suggests that the man was possessed by only one demon (8:28–29), and Jesus commanded only a single unclean spirit to come out (v. 29; cf. the singular form in Mark 5:8), he was possessed by many more. Jesus asked the demon its name (v. 30), and it became evident that the man was possessed by an army of demons named "Legion" (analogous to the largest Roman military unit consisting of four to six thousand troops). A careful reading of Scripture reveals that demons, which are also called unclean, impure, or evil spirits (Luke 4:33, 36; 6:18; 7:21; 8:2), are actually fallen angels (cf. Rev. 12:7–9; "ministering spirits" of Heb. 1:14 refers to angels that have not fallen). The demons' fear of torment anticipates God's future judgment and the fiery punishment prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41; Jude 6) in the abyss (Luke 8:31)—a term that generally refers to the realm of the dead (Rom. 10:7; cf. Ps. 71:20). When used in connection with the final judgment, it refers more specifically to the corpse-covered earth that constitutes Satan's prison during the Millennium (Rev. 20:1; cf. Gen. 1:2; Jer. 4:23–26). Rather than being sent to this prison prematurely (Matt. 8:29), the demons begged Jesus to send them into a herd of swine (numbering about two thousand; Mark 5:13). In permitting them, this time Jesus used a plural form of command—hypagete—"Go" (Matt. 8:32). The demons left the man and entered the swine, which violently rushed down the hill and drowned in the lake (Luke 8:33).

Those tending the pigs recounted to the townspeople how the man had been esōthē—"saved" (sometimes translated as "healed"; see commentary on Luke 7:36–50). There is overlap in Luke between the healing of disease and the expelling of demons; both point to the work of salvation that Jesus came to accomplish (cf. John 6:37). The reason for the fear that prompted the residents' request that Jesus leave is not given, but it likely was due to the enormous loss incurred through the herd of swine being drowned as well as the clear and frightening manifestation of supernatural power in the man's restoration to his right mind. Perhaps their superstitions had been aroused, causing them to worry that more calamities might come, and so they asked Jesus to leave (Luke 8:37). Despite the desire of the man to accompany Jesus and His disciples, he was told to return home. His work was to stay there, where he would tell everyone how much God had done for him (v. 39). The relatively rare Greek word translated "tell" or "proclaim" means to describe in detail, to give a complete account, and it is employed by Luke in reference to sharing one's own religious experience (Luke 9:10; Acts 9:27; 12:17; cf. the noun form in Luke 1:1). Here the man shared it with people throughout the whole region.

8:40–56. Hemorrhaging Woman Healed and Girl Raised to Life. This section contains two miracle stories, one contained inside the other. The main story is about a Jewish official who needed help for his daughter. Inside of this story there is another one about a woman who had been sick for twelve years (the same length of time that Jairus's daughter had been alive), but she had no father to intervene for her. With such an illness, Levitical law relegated her to perpetual uncleanness and seclusion (cf. Lev. 15:25–27), but she ignored this command. She had received no help from physicians. Her hope, and her desperation, was stronger than her fear of violating social norms. Luke does not mention the more negative aspects of the treatment doctors gave the woman (cf. Mark 5:26).

The woman succeeded in touching the border, or edge, of Jesus's clothing, referring to the tassels that hung from the outer garment (Matt.

9:20 uses a plural form; cf. Num. 15:38–39; Deut. 22:12). These served as a reminder to keep God's commandments. Her touching them showed not only a desire to be well but her desire to resume a normal, Torah-observant life, including visits to the temple. In asking "Who touched Me?" (Luke 8:45), Jesus differentiated this touch of faith from the random touches of the people around Him (cf. Mark 5:28). He perceived power going out to heal (Luke 8:46), and lest some magical quality be attributed to His clothing, Jesus was determined that the real explanation be known. Not only was she instantly cured, she also became a witness. Jesus affirmed her in two ways. First, in calling her "daughter," He included her as a member of His spiritual family. Second, and closely connected to the first, He affirmed that it was her faith that healed her. It can also be translated, "Your faith has saved you." Jesus's work of healing is parabolic of His work of salvation (see commentary on Luke 7:36–50).

As in the previous stories (see 8:25, 48), so in the continuing story of the daughter of Jairus, faith was the means by which Jesus could help and heal (cf. Matt. 13:58). Jesus expressed encouragement to keep on believing (as Mark 5:36 indicates by use of the present tense) following the messenger's discouraging tidings. Besides the father and mother, Jesus permitted only Peter, James, and John to enter the house with Him and to approach the place where the girl lay (Luke 8:51; cf. Mark 5:37). These three disciples would be singled out again to accompany Jesus to the Mount of Transfiguration (Luke 9:28) and, according to the other Synoptics, to watch and pray with Him in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33; cf. Gal. 2:9).

For a prominent person like Jairus, there likely were many mourners making a loud commotion (cf. Mark 5:39). But their moaning and weeping suddenly became derisive laughter when Jesus told them to stop, that the girl was not dead but asleep, because they knew she was dead (vv. 53–54). Luke underscores the certainty of the girl's seemingly hopeless condition. Jesus likened death to sleep also in connection with Lazarus (John 11:11–14). Such a description of death is frequent in the OT (e.g., 1 Kin. 2:10; Jer. 51:57; Dan. 12:2) and in the NT (e.g., Matt. 27:52; Acts 7:60; 13:36; 1 Cor. 15:20; 2 Pet. 3:4). Having demonstrated His power over nature (Luke 8:22–25), the demons (vv. 26–37), and disease (vv. 43–48), Jesus proved again His power over death. As with the widow's only son, here too with the father's only daughter, Jesus reached out and touched to make alive.

In all three instances of raising the dead, Jesus addressed the individuals directly and commanded them to arise (Luke 7:14; 8:54; John 11:43), prefiguring the day of His calling people forth from the grave (John 5:28–29; 1 Thess. 4:16). The "spirit" of the girl (Luke 8:55) was not an entity with consciousness separate from the body. The word used here refers to the breath or life of animals as well as people (see, e.g., Luke 23:46; Gen. 6:17; 7:15; Ps. 146:4; Eccl. 3:19–20; Acts 20:9; James 2:26). Always thinking of others' needs, Jesus directed that the girl be given some food and commanded her parents to tell no one what had happened (Luke 8:55–56). This likely would have been difficult, but to spread the news could have complicated and perhaps prematurely ended Jesus's work (cf. John 11:47–53).

9:1–6. The Mission and Sending of the Twelve. Having been called to follow Jesus (5:1–11), appointed as apostles (6:12–16), and instructed extensively as to the nature of the kingdom of God, witnessing its power and presence in Jesus's ministry, the Twelve were now sent out to declare the kingdom of God and to heal the sick (9:2). The apostles were to return to the towns and villages where Jesus had been, not alone but in pairs (Mark 6:7; see commentary on Luke 6:12–16). Furthermore, Jesus gave them "power and authority" (9:1) so that they could relieve suffering as He had done. In Mark they were permitted to take a staff and sandals, while in Luke the former is prohibited, and in Matthew both are. The main point is that the apostles were to take nothing that ordinarily would be needed on an extended journey, not even a staff (which could protect against attack) or a spare outer garment. Instead, they were to seek out those who would receive them into their houses and provide for their needs, thus providing a base for preaching the gospel (the good news) and healing (v. 6) in that locale. To refuse hospitality to a fellow Jew would have been most unusual, but should that happen, those who experienced it were to solemnly shake off the dust from their feet as a testimony (v. 5). This command alludes to the practice of pious Jews, who, on their return from traveling outside Israel, would shake the dust from their feet to avoid defiling the Holy Land with Gentile uncleanness. In other words, those who would reject Jesus's emissaries would be treated like unbelieving Gentiles and have to answer for this rejection on the day of judgment.

9:7–9. Herod Seeks to See Jesus. It seems that the excitement surrounding Jesus's work and that of His disciples reached Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. But he was perplexed (v. 7) and confused by the conflicting reports about Jesus. According to some, John the Baptist or one of the ancient prophets had been resurrected, while others said Elijah had appeared (v. 8). A similar collage of figures were mentioned when Jesus asked His disciples whom people said He was (vv. 18–19). There seems to be a hint of fear and foreboding expressed by Herod as he pondered the meaning of this (v. 9; cf. Mark 6:16). Despite his having had John beheaded, a similar work to John's was being done throughout his territory. It is unlikely that Herod wanted to see Jesus because he wanted to kill him (despite the threat in Luke 13:31; cf. Matt. 2:13); he was probably hoping to question Him and maybe even see a miracle performed (Luke 23:8–9; Mark 6:14). In any case, the setting now shifts to Bethsaida, outside of Herod's jurisdiction.

9:10–17. Feeding the Five Thousand. After the disciples told Jesus all about their work among the people, He took them to a desolate place near Bethsaida (cf. v. 12), the hometown of brothers Peter and Andrew as well as Philip (John 1:44; 12:21). The fishing village itself would not have been a secluded place, so perhaps a grassy place on a nearby hill overlooking the lake (cf. Mark 6:39; John 6:10) would have fit the setting described here. Mark 6:45 adds (when this miracle was finished) that Jesus sent His disciples "to Bethsaida," supporting Luke's assertion that the place where this feeding miracle happened was near Bethsaida but making it clear that it was not in the city of Bethsaida itself (for more on the location of this miracle, see commentary on John 6:16–21). When the crowds found Him, Jesus did not turn them away. He received and welcomed them (Luke 9:11) because they were like wandering sheep (Mark 6:34; cf. Num. 27:17). According to Matthew, He healed the sick among them (Matt. 14:14), and Mark says that He taught them "many things" (Mark 6:34). Luke has both elements, adding that Jesus taught them about the kingdom of God (Luke 9:11; cf. 4:43; 8:1; 9:2). The instruction continued until late in the day because finally the disciples suggested that the people be dismissed to find food and lodging (9:12). Instead, Jesus commanded the disciples to feed them, a seeming impossibility with just five loaves of bread and two fish, even if they were to buy food, because there were about five thousand men. Counting women and children, the total group could easily have numbered nearly fifteen thousand people. But OT precedents for miraculous feedings might have suggested that even with such meager provisions God could provide (Ex. 16; Num. 11; 2 Kin. 4:42–44). Christ's looking up to heaven (Luke 9:16) revealed the miracle's real source; as with the manna in the wilderness, it came from above.

By commanding the people to sit in groups of fifty (v. 14), Jesus facilitated not only the distribution of food by the disciples but also their counting the total number of people and reminded them of their dependence on Him in order to serve. Gathering up the leftovers in twelve baskets (v. 17), one for each disciple, encouraged both economy and opportunity for further service.

Other than Christ's own resurrection, this is the only miracle that is recorded in all four Gospels, which underscores its importance for understanding who Jesus was and the nature of His work. According to John, the miracle led people to think of Him possibly as the prophet like Moses (John 6:14; cf. Deut. 18:15–18). In Luke, Jesus raised with the disciples the question of His identity soon after the feeding (Luke 9:18–21).

9:18–27. Peter's Confession and the Cross. As often preceding significant events (6:12; 11:1; 22:41–46; cf. 3:21; 9:29), Jesus was praying in solitude. When His disciples arrived, Jesus asked them about His identity. Many people thought He was John the Baptist (cf. 9:7; Mark 8:28;). Elijah, a miracle-working prophet, was expected to return (Mal. 4:5; Mark 9:11), making him the next most popular suggestion. But the mention of John or one of the prophets from times long past also shows a widespread belief in resurrection from the dead. The next question to the disciples is the most important in all the Bible: Who is Jesus? Who do you say that He is? (cf. Matt. 27:22). It is a question that all must eventually answer. Peter, as usual, spoke for the group. Rather than the Messiah of Israel, he answered that Jesus was "God's Messiah" or "the Christ of God" (Luke 9:20). Jesus is "the Savior of the world," not just of the Jews (John 4:42; cf. Ps. 72:8), because God desires all to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4).

Yet Jesus ordered and warned them to not tell anyone (Luke 9:21), as with the leper's cleansing and the raising of Jairus's daughter (5:14; 8:56). Jesus disclosed here for the first time why. Refusing the role of a political savior (cf. 4:5–8), He was of divine necessity to suffer and be rejected (9:22; see also 2:49). He mentioned three groups of leaders: the elders, who were widely respected leaders in Israel; the chief or ruling priests; and the scribes, or teachers of the law, who were experts in how it should be kept. These three groups composing the Sanhedrin united against Jesus because He constituted a serious threat to their authority. They would hand Him over to the Romans to be crucified (9:44; 18:32), but His death and His resurrection on the third day would be in accordance with prophecy (18:33; 24:7, 46; Acts 10:40; 1 Cor. 15:4; cf. Ps. 22; Is. 53; Hos. 6:1–2). Only thus could the purpose of His life be fulfilled in bringing salvation (Luke 2:30, 38; cf. John 12:27).

Jesus went on to state that those who follow Him must take up their cross (Luke 9:23). This personal cross is not meritorious but rather the only reasonable response to receiving the atonement provided by Jesus's death (Is. 1:18; Rom. 12:1). It is also a choice to be made daily (cf. 1 Cor. 15:31). Willingness to surrender our lives for Jesus if God wills includes within itself all lesser sacrifices for the gospel. If we live for ourselves, even gaining the whole world, what compensation is that for ultimately forfeiting eternal life—being lost and destroyed in the end (Luke 9:25)? The destiny chosen by each will be revealed at Jesus's coming in glory (v. 26). Yet some would not taste death before glimpsing that glory, that is, of the kingdom of God (v. 27). The placement of this saying in all three Synoptic Gospels immediately before the transfiguration points the reader to that event as its fulfillment.

9:28–36. The Transfiguration. Although the transfiguration is recorded to have occurred about eight days later (using inclusive reckoning; cf. Mark 9:2), its close connection with the previous statement of Jesus shows that it prefigured the coming kingdom. Only those disciples who would witness His agony in Gethsemane (cf. Mark 14:33) joined him on the mountain, traditionally thought to be Mount Tabor, but the actual place is not known with certainty. Only Luke adds that He went up on the mountain to pray (Luke 9:28). It may have been night since the disciples fell into a deep sleep (v. 32). But with Jesus's face now transformed in appearance, shining "like the sun" (Matt. 17:2) and His robe white and glistening like a flash of lightning, they awoke to behold the King in His glory (Luke 9:29; cf. v. 43; 2 Pet. 1:16). They also saw two men, identified as Moses and Elijah (Luke 9:30). These two, representing the kingdom's citizens, were standing for those who would be resurrected and translated respectively. They also personified the witness of the Law and the Prophets to Christ's decease or departure (Gr., exodus) that would be accomplished or fulfilled in Jerusalem (cf. 13:33) with His death, resurrection, and ascension. Luke's word choice depicts Christ's work of salvation not only as a fulfillment of OT hopes but as a kind of "new exodus," by which a "new Israel" composed of believers in Him was brought into existence.

Somewhat lost in this glorious, awe-inspiring moment, Peter suggested that they make three tabernacles or shelters—he was apparently thinking that Moses and Elijah, as heavenly beings, deserved the same honor that Jesus did (cf. John 1:14). But the glory surrounding these two was merely a reflection of the glory of God that shone from Jesus's face. Perhaps Peter thought they had come to install Jesus as king of Israel, but the cross would necessarily come before the crown. As at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19:16; 24:16) and the wilderness tabernacle (Ex. 33:9–10; 40:34–38), the presence of God now came down in a bright cloud (Matt. 17:5; cf. Rev. 1:7). Some interpreters suggest that the cloud covered all six persons, and that the disciples' fear was related to their own entering of the cloud. Others suggest that the cloud only covered Jesus, Moses, and Elijah, and thus that the disciples' fear was related to their observing the cloud cover them. In either case a voice from the cloud proclaimed a message to them. Both interpretations are possible, but the fact that the disciples heard the voice speaking from the cloud seems to suggest that they were not covered by it. At Jesus's baptism, the Father acknowledged Him as His Son (Luke 3:22). Here manuscripts differ. Some read that the Father called Christ His "Chosen One," and others, that He referred to Him as His "beloved" (9:35). The best reading is probably "Chosen One." The command in Greek, akouete (v. 35), not only means to hear but also urges an ongoing willingness to listen and obey (cf. Deut. 18:15).

9:37–43a. Healing of a Demon-Possessed Boy. Luke's reference to "the next day" suggests that Jesus and the three disciples spent the rest of the night on the mountain and went down in the morning. Already many people had gathered to await their return because a serious case of demon possession had been brought to the disciples and they could not cast the demon out (v. 40). The epileptic symptoms (cf. Matt. 17:15)—crying out, being convulsed and falling down, foaming at the mouth—were said to be caused by a spirit or demon (Luke 9:39, 42; see 4:33).

This represents a particularly difficult case because of the prevailing unbelief (cf. Matt. 13:58) of the father (Mark 9:24), of the disciples (Matt. 17:20), and of the crowd as a whole, whom Jesus referred to as a faithless and perverse generation. Jesus repeated His indictment of "this generation" on several occasions (Luke 7:31; 11:29–32, 50–51; 17:25; 21:32; cf. Acts 2:40), attributing Israel's rejection of Him to their unbelief and alluding to it as a fulfillment of Moses's words of warning to Israel (Deut. 32:5, 20). Unfortunately, the disciples' initial failure no doubt made matters worse by confirming the onlookers in their unbelief. The fact that the boy was an only child (v. 38) made the father's situation even more desperate. Furthermore, the demon did not give up without a fight. As soon as Jesus called for the father to bring his son, the demon threw him down into a convulsion. But Jesus rebuked the demon and healed the child. Even the demons had to listen to and obey His command, and the people were led to see in Jesus's work, as the three disciples on the mount saw in Jesus's person, the majesty and greatness of God (cf. 2 Pet. 1:16–18).

9:43b–50. The Coming Passion Illuminates Greatness and Authority. Jesus was intent on making the disciples understand the true nature of His mission as Messiah (cf. 9:21). He repeated even more emphatically the prediction of His suffering by urging His disciples to let His words sink in by listening very carefully. Added to the first prediction of His death and resurrection was that He was about to be betrayed (v. 44). The choice of words suggests this event was rapidly approaching. The disciples' slowness to grasp what lay ahead is emphasized here in four ways: they "did not understand" what He was saying; "it was hidden from them;" they were unable to perceive or grasp its import; and "they were afraid to ask" Jesus what it meant (v. 45).

It may be they did not want to understand, because a dispute ensued over which one of them would be the greatest in the kingdom. Apparently they were also afraid to argue over it in front of Jesus, but He knew their thoughts (the same word used for "dispute" or "argument" in v. 46; cf. 2:35). To correct their thinking, Jesus set a little child next to Him (9:47), illustrating that greatness does not reside in a person but in actions—identifying with, receiving, and caring for the "least" in the kingdom, including the poor, the lowly, and the outcasts. The implication is that we have not really received Jesus if we are unwilling to follow His example and do as He has done (cf. Matt. 25:40, 45). Only those who do, by identifying with the least, will be recognized as truly great in the kingdom (Luke 9:48).

Apparently reflecting on what constitutes sufficient evidence of someone receiving Jesus, John referred to someone they saw exorcising demons in His name, whom they tried to stop. Again Jesus gently corrected them. Jesus said those who are not against us (or "you," according to some manuscripts) are for us (or "you" in some manuscripts). The best textual evidence supports the "you" reading.

9:51—19:27

JESUS'S JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM AND MINISTRY OUTSIDE GALILEE

Luke inserts at this point a large section of material, most of which is not found in the other Gospels. As Jesus began what appears to have been His final journey to Jerusalem, He traveled to Samaria, Perea, and Jericho, among other places. The journey was circuitous and slow, winding in and out of Judea but avoiding Jerusalem itself so as not to bring His ministry to a premature end. Along the way, Jesus sent out the seventy as He did the Twelve, encountered further controversy, and presented some of His most memorable parables and sayings. Also, many of the teachings given in Galilee were likely repeated for these new listeners.

9:51–62. Rejection by a Samaritan Village and the Cost of Discipleship. Jesus knew what awaited Him in Jerusalem, but Luke focuses on the triumphant time when He would ascend to heaven. Jesus resolved (lit. "set His face") to go forward to certain suffering and death. He would go not secretly, as He had earlier (cf. John 7:10), but publicly, sending messengers ahead of Himself to announce His coming so that as many people as possible could be invited to hear Him (Luke 9:52). The refusal of a Samaritan village to receive these emissaries because He was headed to Jerusalem (v. 53) shows the hostility and bigotry that existed between the Jews and the Samaritans (cf. John 4:9, 20). Such tensions meant that journeying from Galilee to Jerusalem through Samaria could be quite dangerous, which is why Jewish pilgrims traveling to Jerusalem for religious feasts generally went the longer way through the Jordan Valley and then up to Jerusalem from Jericho.

Indignant at this rebuff, James and John wanted permission to call fire down from heaven to destroy them (Luke 9:54), recalling a precedent set by Elijah (2 Kin. 1:10, 12). Of course the situation here was quite different, and so Jesus rebuked them. He would not force Himself on anyone. Words of rebuke appear in some manuscripts and versions (Luke 9:55–56). In going to another village, Jesus followed His consistent practice of avoiding conflict wherever possible (cf. 6:29) and seeking out those more open and receptive to His teachings.

Next Jesus was approached by three would-be disciples. One promised to follow Him wherever He went (9:57), but Jesus warned him of the rejection awaiting His followers (which was just encountered in Samaria). This rejection is again illustrated in the response of a man whom He called to follow Him but who wanted to bury his father first (v. 59). Although it was understood that the duty of burying a loved one ordinarily took precedence over all other religious duties, the unique opportunity and summons to herald the kingdom of God was even more important. In saying, "Let the dead bury their own dead" (v. 60), Jesus commanded the man to leave his father and family behind to follow Him. Jesus used familiar images in the physical world to explain the spiritual realm. The spiritually dead can bury their own; Jesus and His followers were doing just the opposite—bringing life to those dead in sin (cf. Luke 19:10; Eph. 2:1). A far weaker excuse was given by a third would-be disciple: saying farewell to his family (Luke 9:61). But looking back, being hindered by earthly ties or familial obligations, actually makes a person unfit to follow Jesus in full-time ministry (v. 62).

10:1–24. The Sent. Contrary to the half-hearted attempts at discipleship above, many others, in addition to the Twelve, had left everything to follow Jesus (cf. 5:11). These also listened to Jesus's teachings, learned, and obeyed them and so were prepared to proclaim His kingdom message. This time seventy (other manuscripts have seventy-two) were sent out; the larger number is evidence of a growing number of totally dedicated disciples. As with the Twelve, the number may be symbolic, in this case of the larger mission beyond Israel (cf. the seventy nations of Gen. 10 descended from Noah). Also like the Twelve, Jesus sent them out two by two (see commentary on Luke 6:12–16) to prepare the way for His arrival at the various towns and villages as well as to prepare His followers for when He would no longer be with them. Jesus instructed them to pray that more people would be sent out into the field to work because the harvest was abundant. In other words, potential members of the kingdom vastly outnumbered those whom Jesus had already gathered.

Not surprisingly, the instructions given to this group were substantively the same as those given to the Twelve (cf. 9:1–5; Matt. 10:1–16). As apparently helpless lambs among wolves (Luke 10:3), they were to rely on their Shepherd for help and protection (cf. John 10:3–5, 12–15). They were to greet no one on the way (Luke 10:4) because that might prevent a timely arrival and thus hinder their mission. They were to pronounce a blessing of peace on homes that received them (v. 5). A person who was a huios eirēnēs (lit. "son of peace") was one who had received and promoted the peace and rest offered by Jesus and His representatives (cf. Matt. 11:28–30). Those who received it would gladly provide the requisite hospitality for these laborers as the material wages for the spiritual blessings they received (Luke 10:7; cf. 1 Cor. 9:11). Furthermore, they were to eat what was offered, that is, they should not question its purity (Luke 10:8; cf. Acts 10:14; 1 Cor. 10:27–28). If a city did not receive them, they should wipe off the dust from their feet as a sign of judgment (Luke 10:11; see also 9:5). Sodom, which was destroyed by fire from heaven for its wickedness, would receive a lighter punishment than that city (10:12).

Having greater light is no advantage if it is rejected. Thus, the Galilean cities of Chorazin and Bethsaida, who witnessed the powerful miracles done by Jesus, bore a greater responsibility for rejecting that light (v. 13; cf. John 9:39–41; 19:11). The fact that almost nothing is known of Jesus's ministry in these two locales is a reminder that Jesus said and did much more than the Gospels record (cf. John 20:30–31). Their negative response to His message left them subject to a harsher judgment even than the proud Phoenician cities of Tyre and Sidon. Located on the coast northwest of Galilee, these cities rejected the warnings sent them through the prophets of Israel (see Is. 23; Jer. 25:17, 22; Ezek. 26–28). Even there, however, a few responded (cf. Luke 4:26) as some did also to Jesus (Mark 7:24–30). Clothing oneself in sackcloth and ashes was a sign of mourning and was indicative of the kind of repentance Jesus's message was meant to produce (cf. 2 Cor. 7:9–11). Even more surprising is the mention of Capernaum (Luke 10:15), which served as Jesus's home city during His ministry (Matt. 4:13). Having been thus exalted to heaven, by rejecting Jesus it would be brought down to Hades, a reference to divine punishment (cf. Is. 5:14). It would be destroyed and abandoned. The response of the cities to the seventy would be indicative of their response to Jesus. To reject His messengers would be to reject Him and the One who sent Him (cf. Luke 9:48).

The return of the seventy is described in a concentric structure in chapter 10, whereby v. 17 is paralleled by v. 20 and vv. 18 and 19 are likewise parallel and mutually interpretative. The seventy returned with joy from their successful mission and addressed Jesus as Lord, indicating the power of the name by which the demons were subject to them (v. 17). While exorcists of the time tried various incantations and foul concoctions to drive demons away, Jesus's name alone was powerful enough to do the job (9:49; but cf. Acts 19:13–16). Jesus attributed their success to Satan's fall (Luke 10:18). The image of lightning from heaven normally stresses visibility, not duration, while the ongoing action underlying the Greek tense of "saw" suggests a process. Satan was cast out of heaven in the original rebellion (Rev. 12:7–9), but at the cross the nature of his evil course would be fully revealed and his influence destroyed (John 12:31). Jesus's followers were given authority to trample on serpents and scorpions—symbolic of Satan's power to harm, exercised through his demonic underlings (Deut. 8:15), having been broken (Matt. 16:18; Rom. 16:20). Therefore, they were promised that nothing would injure them (Luke 10:19). This was the reason for rejoicing—not because they had power over the enemy but because the enemy no longer had power over them. As citizens of the kingdom, their names were written in heaven in the book of life (v. 20; cf. Ex. 32:32–33; Dan. 12:1; Phil. 4:3; Rev. 3:5; 20:12, 15), and the power of the enemy was broken because death was no longer feared (Heb. 2:14–15).

In view of the success and joy of the seventy, Jesus rejoiced in prayer, thanking His Father for keeping hidden the truths of the kingdom from those who were wise in their own eyes (Luke 10:21; Is. 5:21; 29:13–14; Matt. 13:15), while revealing them to those who would listen (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18–31; 2:7–10). God is "Lord of heaven and earth" (Luke 10:21; Gen. 14:19, 22; cf. Acts 17:24) because He made them (e.g., Ex. 20:11; Pss. 115:15; 121:2; Is. 37:16; Acts 4:24). Jesus then identified Himself as having a special relation to the Father, who had given all things into His hands (Luke 10:22; cf. John 3:35; 5:20). Luke's version of the saying emphasizes "who the Son is" and "who the Father is" in their personhood. The word "know" means to know personally and fully, which was why Jesus was able to "reveal" Him (cf. John 1:18) to whomever He willed. The prayer of Jesus was public, but He then spoke privately to the Twelve, who were privileged to hear and see everything Jesus said and did (Luke 10:23–24). The purpose of this revelation was for them to be effective witnesses of all that they had seen and heard (Acts 4:20; 22:15; 1 John 1:3). Prophets and kings had looked forward to the days of the Messiah, but the privilege of seeing Jesus was not granted to them (cf. 1 Pet. 1:10–12).

10:25–37. Parable of the Good Samaritan. A lawyer with expertise in the Scriptures asked Jesus a question and a discussion ensued. Matthew and Mark present a similar but different episode that should not be confused with this one (Matt. 22:34–40; Mark 12:28–34). Here the questions, as well as the answer and parable in reply, are unique to Luke. As an expert in the law of Moses, the lawyer tested Jesus as to how He would answer the vital question of how eternal life is to be obtained (Luke 10:25). The perfect Teacher reversed the situation and tested the lawyer's own knowledge and understanding of the law, and in response he quoted the commands of Moses to love God and one's neighbor (vv. 26–27; Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18). The answer, which Jesus judged to be correct (Luke 10:28), sums up the Ten Commandments, which show specifically how we are to love God (first through fourth) and our fellow human beings (fifth through tenth; cf. Rom. 13:9–10). As the question concerned doing, Jesus affirmed the importance of hearing and doing the law (cf. Luke 6:47, 49; 8:21), not a legalistic obedience but an obedience of love (cf. Gal. 5:14; James 2:8) born out of divine love for us (1 John 4:19). Recognizing something of the breadth and depth of these commandments, that the requirement to love has no limits, the lawyer sought to justify himself. He clearly recognized his lack and desired a clear boundary, if not of love itself, at least in terms of its object. So he asked Jesus, "Who is my neighbor?" (Luke 10:29). Jesus answered his question with a parable, defining "neighbor" in terms of action rather than ethnicity.

The parable of the good Samaritan begins with a man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, which was a distance of about eighteen miles (29 km) and a descent of some 3,300 feet (1,006 m). The road was a common Jewish thoroughfare from Jerusalem all the way to Galilee via the Jordan River valley. According to the law of Moses, priests, because of their holy responsibilities, were prohibited from coming in contact with a dead person and thereby incurring ritual impurity unless it was an immediate family member (Lev. 21:1–4), which probably explains why they did not approach the man. Their error was that they did not even care enough to check to see if the man was dead or alive. The Levite came close enough to look at the man, but he too chose the other side of the road. While the priest, perhaps out of an inflated sense of personal importance, simply ignored the situation (turned a blind eye), the Levite demonstrated a complete lack of compassion in that he investigated, saw that the man was alive, and still walked away. Both of these men were religious leaders and yet lacked the basics of love.

A Samaritan also came and looked, but unlike the religious functionaries, he displayed compassion (Luke 10:33)—just as Jesus did to those in need (e.g., 7:13; Matt. 9:36; 14:14; Mark 1:41). He bandaged his wounds and poured oil and wine on them (Luke 10:34), which were known medicaments. Fermented wine acted as an antiseptic, while the olive oil aided in healing the wound. After transporting him to an inn, the Samaritan stayed the night with him, not departing until the next day (v. 35), and only after he paid the innkeeper two denarii, worth wages for two full days. His compassion went even further in that he promised to repay the innkeeper for whatever other expenses might be incurred in caring for the man. Details of the story suggest a traveling merchant who had perhaps patronized the inn before so that the innkeeper could be confident of the man's return to settle his account.

The contrast between the indifference of the priest and the Levite and the kind and compassionate actions of the Samaritan would have stunned any Jewish audience because they despised Samaritans as worse even than pure pagans (cf. John 4:9; 8:48). It also served as a lesson for James and John, who had only a little earlier hoped to destroy an entire Samaritan village with fire from heaven (Luke 9:51–56). Later, after the resurrection, Jesus would specifically command the apostles to be His witnesses in "all of Judea and Samaria" (Acts 1:8).

Jesus concluded by asking the lawyer which of the men acted as a neighbor to the wounded man. Clearly the lawyer had asked the wrong question! From that time onward he should ask, "Who needs me to be neighbor to them?" Every person in need of help is our neighbor, regardless of whether we know him or her and irrespective of religious affiliation or socioeconomic status. The compassion shown by the Samaritan and by Jesus Himself is left as an example for us to reflect on and then to "go and do likewise" (Luke 10:37).

10:38–42. Mary and Martha. Following this memorable parable, Luke juxtaposes an incident that happened nearby, in Bethany, just east of Jerusalem (Luke 19:29), which may have happened somewhat later, near the end of Christ's ministry (cf. John 11:1; 12:1). Martha, who did all the serving, was gently rebuked by Jesus (Luke 10:41), even though she was concerned to provide Him hospitality (v. 40), a highly respected virtue. Mary, her sister, who chose to receive rather than to serve, was commended (v. 42), even though she seemed completely oblivious to the need of helping prepare food for their special guest. She sat at Jesus's feet (v. 39), listening to His words as a disciple would, despite the fact that in Jewish culture this was not a woman's place. Martha, on the other hand, perfectly fulfilled womanly expectations of the time in her preparations and serving (diakonia).

Martha's desire to serve was not the issue. The concept of service elsewhere in Luke is only positively described (e.g., 4:39; 8:3; 22:26, 27). Later the same word is used to refer to many important functions within the church (see, e.g., Acts 6:1, 4; 2 Tim. 4:5). But Martha is also described as distracted, worried, and troubled. She charged Mary with leaving her to serve alone and even insinuated that Jesus was indifferent to her plight (Luke 10:40). In fact, Martha was missing a golden opportunity to listen to and learn from Jesus. This was the one thing most needful that Mary chose and that Jesus would not allow to be taken away from her (v. 42). In our own context, listening to guests can be as much a part of hospitality as serving. There will always be earthly cares that absorb our attention, but we must put first things first. Time with Jesus teaches us how to spend the rest of our time wisely.

11:1–13. Lessons on Prayer. Jesus was again praying (see commentary on Luke 6:12–16), and one of his disciples asked to be taught how to pray. On another occasion Jesus outlined principles for prayer (Matt. 6:5–8); this time He provided a model prayer, consisting of an address followed by two declarations and three requests. The version in Luke appears to be much shorter, though in many manuscripts the wording appears to have been adjusted to conform to the more familiar version of the prayer (see Matt. 6:9–13).

"Father" (v. 2; Aram. Abba) is both a respectful and intimate form of address to God (as in Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). By instructing His disciples to address God as Father, Jesus exalted believers to the level of sonship (see Gen. 6:2, 4; Ps. 103:13; Is. 63:16; Hos. 1:10). "Hallowed" (v. 2) refers to reverencing God's name, not uttering it in a thoughtless way or in profane oaths (Ex. 20:7), because it sums up the essence of who He is as the eternal, self-existent One with His ineffable character of divine love, mercy, justice, and truth. "Your kingdom come" (Luke 11:2) recognizes that human life is not as God originally intended it and invites God's presence now and in its future fullness—ideas that permeate Jesus's teaching. The three requests concern present physical need and existing and potential spiritual needs. "Give us day by day [or "each day"] our daily bread" (v. 3) is a plea for God to supply what is truly necessary. "Forgive us our sins" (v. 4) is predicated on the fact of our forgiving "everyone who is indebted to us" (or "everyone who sins against us"; v. 4). We do not earn the right to be forgiven by forgiving others, but we cannot ask that we be given that which we are unwilling to give to others. Only those who have been forgiven are truly able to understand forgiveness and extend it to others. The request to not be led "into temptation" (v. 4) is a plea for protection from evil. It also implies a prior commitment to God's will and a determination not to lead oneself into temptation.

Jesus then turned His attention to the subject of persistent and prevailing prayer and God's relationship to it. To illustrate His point, he invited His listeners to consider how their own high sense of obligatory hospitality would respond to a friend who pleaded for some loaves of bread in the middle of the night to serve some unexpected visitors (vv. 5–6). Jesus's listeners would have to admit that in the face of such a friend's persistent pleas, and despite whatever inconvenience it might be to their own household, they would do whatever they could to help. Thus, applying the illustration to the subject of prayer, Jesus's listeners would see how God relates to our willingness to be persistent in our requests of Him. To underscore the parable's main point of being persistent, a series of three present imperative verbs follow, which are more literally translated "keep asking," "keep seeking," "keep knocking" (v. 9); the promise is that everyone who does so receives, finds, and has the door opened (v. 10). Lest the impression be left that persistent prayer is necessary because God is unwilling to give us what we need, Jesus then emphasized the goodness of God as Father and His readiness to give good gifts. Earthly fathers, despite being evil (v. 13), would never give their own children something harmful like a serpent or scorpion when they ask for a fish or an egg (vv. 11–12). How much more then, if we ask, will the heavenly Father give us the Holy Spirit, through whom all of God's other gifts come (v. 13; Matt. 7:11; James 1:17).

11:14–26. A House Divided. Jesus's work of casting out demons engendered amazement in some and skepticism in others. This occasion, which probably happened over a year earlier, was placed here to bring together several stories and sayings of Jesus in response to conflict and rejection. After the freeing of a man from a demon, some questioned the source of the supernatural power by which he was freed, charging Jesus with being in league with Beelzebub (or according to some manuscripts, "Beelzebul"), meaning "lord of the dwelling" (cf. the wordplay in Matt. 10:25), which is another name for Satan (Luke 11:18), the archōn—"ruler" or "prince" of the demons (v. 15; cf. John 12:31; Eph. 2:2). Others demanded even more proof of Jesus's commission from God in the form of a "sign from heaven" (Luke 11:16).

In response to the first objection to His freeing a man from a demon, Jesus stated a universally accepted principle: every "kingdom divided against itself" will be destroyed, and every divided house will fall (v. 17; cf. 21:20). In other words, the objection's premise itself was flawed. If Jesus's power were really from Satan, then Satan's kingdom would be divided and unable to stand. Yet Satan was still very active, and so their objection could not have been right. Otherwise, He asked, by whom do their own kinsmen cast them out? If they claimed it as being by God's power, then there was no reason for supposing that Jesus did it by Beelzebub. And if Jesus cast out demons with "the finger of God" (v. 20), then this divine intervention manifested through the ministry of Jesus showed that the kingdom of God had arrived—the time of redemption from the slavery of sin and domination of demons (cf. Ex. 8:19). Jesus set forth an allegorical parable (based on Is. 49:24–25) in which the demon-possessed are likened to goods belonging to a strong man (Satan) fully armed (the demons) to protect his possessions and Jesus to someone stronger who enters the heavily fortified palace or "house" (lit. "court," meaning this planet) to overcome him by breaking the power of the demons over people and claiming them as possessions of His victory.

In the clash between the kingdom of God and Satan's kingdom, there is no neutral ground. One must choose to be with Jesus and to help gather the lost sheep of Israel back to God (Luke 11:23; cf. Matt. 10:6; 15:24; John 10:16). Not to choose is by default to be against Him—remaining under Satan's kingdom, which aids the devil's efforts to scatter and ultimately to destroy God's flock (cf. John 10:10, 12). Jesus reinforced the point by means of a parable. A person who has been freed of demonic control but who remains uncommitted to Jesus is like a house that has been swept and put in order but, without Jesus, is defenseless and vulnerable to an even more serious possession by seven other spirits that are even more wicked (Luke 11:24–26). Those who have forsaken their former profession of faith in Christ often become the most bitter opponents of Christianity. Nevertheless, though such a person is clearly in a far worse condition, such a case may not be completely hopeless (cf. 8:2).

11:27–32. Keeping the Word or Seeking a Sign? A woman who apparently was still focused on a kingdom based on physical descent pronounced a blessing on Christ's mother, who nursed Him as a baby (v. 27). Jesus, however, insisted that His real family consisted of those who receive and adhere to God's word (v. 28; cf. 6:46–49).

Jesus then returned to the issue of people demanding a sign from heaven (cf. 11:16), that is, clearly coming from God. Jesus rejected proving His heavenly credentials this way. He called the people an evil, wicked generation because they already had plenty of evidence to believe (cf. 9:41; Deut. 32:20). Through such unbelief they were, in reality, placing themselves under Satan's dominion and giving themselves over to demons (cf. Deut. 32:17). By rejecting Jesus, Israel's future would soon become much worse and much more hopeless (cf. Matt. 12:45), though it need not have been that way (cf. Zech. 13:2).

Consequently, Jesus Himself would give no sign to prove His heavenly credentials (Mark 8:12), just as earlier He had refused Satan's demand for such a sign (Luke 4:9–12). The only sign given would be that given by heaven itself: the sign of Jonah (Luke 11:29). The prophet's time in the belly of the fish (Jon. 2:2) and his miraculous resurrection from that watery grave (Jon. 2:6) were signs to the Ninevites of his heavenly credentials. Similarly, the heavenly credentials of the Son of Man, including God's acceptance of His work, would likewise be demonstrated through death and resurrection (cf. Matt. 12:40). Although the inhabitants of Nineveh responded to the preaching of Jonah, Jesus held little hope that a similar repentance would be evidenced by this generation. By referring to Himself as greater than Jonah and greater than Solomon, Jesus identified these individuals as prophetic types. Solomon, as the son of David, typified Jesus as Israel's rightful messianic King who would judge God's people with wisdom and righteousness (cf. Is. 11:1–4; Rev. 19:11; 22:11–12).

11:33–54. Light, Darkness, and Woes. For a lamp to be beneficial, placement is key (v. 33). More prominence provides more illumination. The eye is the way through which light enters the body (v. 34), bringing illumination and understanding. If the eye is healthy and without evil motivation, then what it sees will fill the body with light and wisdom. If the eye is bad, unhealthy, and unsound, then our perception of the world will be distorted and misunderstandings may result. Worse, evil can enter our mind through the eye and fill our whole life with darkness. So we should resolve to set nothing wicked before our eyes (Ps. 101:3)—something increasingly difficult in our sex- and violence-crazed "information" age. If we are full of light, which comes from looking to Jesus and His word (John 8:12; cf. Ps. 119:105, 130), then we will ourselves be a source of light for others (cf. Matt. 5:14; John 5:35).

A Pharisee, apparently impressed by Jesus's teaching, invited Him home to have a meal with him (Luke 11:37). The word used (aristaō) indicates a midmorning meal. Such an invitation would enable his family and friends to hear Jesus's wisdom. It was the practice of the Pharisees, in order to ensure eating with ceremonially pure hands, to dip them in water after returning home (Mark 7:1–5). Some of the well-to-do even had a small indoor miqveh or pool with built-in steps for full-body immersion. That is why the Pharisee was astonished that Jesus did not wash to ensure His hands were ceremonially clean before sitting down to eat (Luke 11:38). It provided an object lesson on what constitutes true purity. No one would clean the outside of a vessel and leave the inside dirty. Similarly, spiritual purity begins on the inside. Giving food or financial assistance to the needy, when given in love and generosity, provides evidence that all of one's possessions are clean and available for God's use because they are not under the control of a heart full of greed and wickedness (vv. 39–41).

Jesus proceeded to condemn the hypocrisy and foolishness of Pharisaic practices with a series of woes, lamenting and solemnly warning of the danger such practices posed to the spiritual life. Pharisees would meticulously measure and tithe the smallest herbs but pass over or ignore issues of justice and love about which God is even more concerned (v. 42). Tithing, giving a tenth of one's increase (see Gen. 14:20; Lev. 27:30; Deut. 14:22), is important, but how we treat others is even more important. The Pharisees loved having the most prominent seats in the synagogue because it fed their egos, as did greetings in public, which were meant to honor them above others. The seductiveness of such privileges often leads people to think they are better or more deserving than others, when in God's eyes we are all needy. According to Pharisaic oral tradition, to walk over a grave was the equivalent of touching a corpse, incurring ceremonial defilement. Like unmarked graves, people were unaware of the spiritual danger inherent in the teaching and hypocritical example of the scribes and Pharisees (Luke 11:44; see also 5:17).

A "lawyer" or "expert in the law," obviously offended by a teaching that could equally apply to them, rebuked Jesus for His perceived insult (11:45). Rather than retreating, Jesus reinforced His message further by rebuking them for loading people with heavy burdens (v. 46), referring to additional religious rules (cf. Acts 15:10), many of which were later codified by the Jews in the Mishnah and considered to be even more important to observe than the law itself. Jesus also rebuked them for outwardly paying homage to the prophets by building elaborate tombs for them while rejecting God's prophetic message (Luke 11:47–48). In short, they were manifesting the same spirit that led their ancestors to kill the prophets and that ultimately led them to seek Jesus's death. His reference to God and His wisdom (v. 49) seems to show a knowledge of divine premeditation that is later expanded into a parable (20:9–17). The inclusion of "apostles" (11:49) may constitute a nontechnical reference to those in the OT who, like the prophets, were sent by God but murdered (cf. 13:34). Use of the term also suggests a further application to the apostles sent by Jesus. Abel, though not a prophet, was the first one in Scripture to suffer persecution and martyrdom (Gen. 4:8). The murder of Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, is recorded in the last book of the Hebrew canon (2 Chr. 24:20–22), which ends with 2 Chronicles rather than Malachi due to a different ordering of the OT books. Jesus's reference to this generation as being guilty of the blood of all previous martyrs was based on their sharing the same spirit in rejecting Jesus and His message (Luke 11:50–51). Finally, He chastised lawyers for taking away the key of knowledge (v. 52), meaning that by making people dependent on them in order to know what the law required, they were effectively hindering people's entrance into the kingdom of God. They were obscuring their understanding of the Scriptures and of the salvation being made available through Jesus's ministry (cf. 1:77). Both scribes and Pharisees, incensed at these rebukes, began to ply Him with many questions—they were hunting for something to use against Him (11:53–54).

12:1–12. An Open Confession of Faith. Jesus's detractors were quickly outnumbered as a myriadōn—"myriads," "thousands" or "tens of thousands," here probably meaning a countless number (greater than in 11:29)—gathered to hear Jesus (12:1). While directing His teaching first or primarily to the disciples, Jesus warned them of the leaven or yeast of the Pharisees. Leaven was yeast usually naturally produced via an old batch of dough kept back to mix with the next batch so that the bread would rise. Like leaven, the hypocrisy of the Pharisees was infectious and would come to permeate the whole life. It is far easier to be doctrinally orthodox (by human measure) than to be sound in both faith and practice (as measured by God). Hypocrisy relies on an element of secrecy, but Jesus affirmed that whatever was then hidden would become known and words spoken in secret would be proclaimed on the housetops so everyone could hear (vv. 2–3). In Matthew this saying refers to the disciples' proclamation (Matt. 10:27) and may have the same significance here, judging from the larger context as Jesus went on to speak of a fearless confession. There was no need to fear those who could kill only the body (Luke 12:4). Fearing God and His judgment (Eccl. 12:13–14) and recognizing His authority to consign us to hell (Luke 12:5)—in short, living with eternity in view—are what matters.

We should not imagine hell as some kind of eternal torture chamber. The word geenna designates a ravine just outside and southwest of Jerusalem. It may be the place where a pyre may have been made to burn the 185,000 corpses of the Assyrian army at the time of Hezekiah (Is. 30:31–33; 37:36). In the time of Ahaz and Manasseh, child sacrifices were offered there, probably to Molech, an underworld deity. Jeremiah said it would become the place of judgment on Israel for their wickedness and that their corpses would lay there as food for the birds and wild animals (Jer. 19:6, 7; cf. Rev. 19:17–21). God promises to judge the wicked with unquenchable fire and a devouring worm that does not die (Is. 66:15–16, 24). Both images represent hell as a place of total destruction. Similarly in the NT, it is the place of darkness and of God's judgment by fire and total destruction (Mark 9:43, 45, 47–48), not a place of unending torment. Thus Jesus could speak in the next breath of God's care for His creation, including the sparrows, and His children as so precious that even their hairs are numbered (Luke 12:6–7).

How we relate to Jesus determines our destiny when the Son of Man will stand in judgment surrounded by clouds of angels (Dan. 7:9–10, 13–14; cf. John 5:22). To confess or acknowledge Him publicly means we identify ourselves with His kingdom (cf. Rom. 10:9–10). But if we deny Him, He will deny us (Luke 12:8–9; cf. 2 Tim. 2:12). The Greek verbal tense compresses the cumulative decisions of our life into a moment of time. Similarly with blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Luke 12:10), the tense indicates one's persistent refusal to recognize the work of the Spirit in the ministry of Jesus. Those who close their mind and heart to the Holy Spirit's work close off the only avenue by which God can save them. By contrast, those who have spoken against Jesus but subsequently respond to the Spirit's plea can be forgiven (see Acts 2:36–38; 6:7). When brought before authorities to answer for their faith, as the apostles were soon after Pentecost (Acts 4:1–22), Jesus promised that we need not worry because the Spirit would teach believers just what to say (Luke 12:11–12).

12:13–21. Parable of the Rich Fool. Suddenly, with mention of being brought into judgment, someone asked Jesus to instruct his brother to divide the inheritance with him (v. 13). The law of Moses assigned a double portion of the inheritance to the eldest son (Deut. 21:17), while the others were to share equally what was left. Refusing to settle such a dispute, Jesus highlighted the core issue—covetousness or greed. To illustrate the point, He told of a rich man who had insufficient space for all his crops (Luke 12:16–17). Clearly very rich because he had many barns already, he decided to tear them down and build even bigger ones and looked forward to many years of celebration and ease (v. 18). His motto was "Eat, drink, and be merry" (v. 19). He was completely self-absorbed. This is indicated not only by the repetition of "I" and "my" (eleven times in just three verses) but by the glimpse given of the man's inner thoughts and heart. He thought only about himself (v. 17), planned only for his future well-being (v. 18), and congratulated himself (v. 19). In the end none of that mattered because he had neglected his eternal future, as the repeated mention (three times in vv. 19–20) of the man's psychē—"soul" or "life" (referring to the totality of one's existence)—reminds us (accordingly, some translations omit the reference to "soul" and read "I'll say to myself"). Jesus drew the lesson: amassing possessions is ultimately worthless unless one is rich toward God, that is, as God defines riches, in terms of heavenly riches (Matt. 6:19–20). Money and wealth are not themselves evil, but allowing them the central place in one's heart and life is a form of idolatry. We cannot serve both God and money (Luke 16:13) because devotion to one's wealth invariably squeezes out devotion to God.

12:22–34. No Need for Worry or Fear. Jesus now explained positively what it means to be rich toward God. It is summarized in Jesus's twin commands to His disciples that head the two subsections of this unit. He told them not to worry (v. 22) and not to be afraid (v. 32). In both cases, the underlying tense assumes the hearer's worries and fears that the hearer should not continue to harbor. The commands are really assurances. The first admonition to not worry about life (v. 22) is concise and yet so comprehensive. It includes not worrying about food and clothing.

Life (lit. "the soul") is more than food (v. 23; cf. v. 15). The soul-body distinction in this verse is apparent. Obviously, food is also important to the body and, according to how it is conventionally understood, the soul has no need for food. The biblical concept of the soul is holistic and, as here, comprises the whole life including the body. Yet life is more even than this for those who know God as their Father. There is no need to worry because He knows what we need. If He cares even for the ravens, unclean birds, how much more does He care for people made in His image (v. 24). Unlike the rich fool, they need neither storehouse nor barn because God feeds them (cf. Pss. 145:15–16; 147:9). Therefore, we need not worry that He will not feed His people (cf. Ps. 37:5), because they are more valuable than birds (cf. Luke 12:7).

There is also no need to worry because there are many things that are out of our control and that we cannot change. Verse 25 can refer to the impossibility of adding either one cubit (about 20 in. or 50 cm) to one's stature or an hour to one's lifespan. The former seems implied by the word "cubit" and the latter by the reference to hēlikia—"age." Perhaps (as in some translations) the cubit and the idea of age can be combined by conveying the idea of adding a cubit to the measure or span of one's life, or on the other hand the idea of hēlikia could be understood in terms of height. The larger context allows for either possibility. The mention of the growth of lilies or wild flowers (v. 27) fits a reference to stature, while a reference to lengthening one's life fits the preceding parable of the rich fool who, despite all his concern to provide for the future, could not prolong his life. In any case, being anxious about this life falls into the category of what is less significant (v. 26). The grass, like human life (Is. 40:6–8), is brief—thrown into the furnace (Luke 12:28), just as the wicked nations will be (Mal. 4:1; Rev. 20:7–9). Believers, however, seek the kingdom of God, which will last forever (Dan. 7:27), and their heavenly Father will ensure that all things needful for this life will be added (Luke 12:31).

The followers of Jesus also should not fear because they constitute Jesus's little flock (v. 32). Such terminology is used in the OT to describe a faithful remnant within Israel (Jer. 23:2–4; Mic. 5:2–4), and that seems to be the meaning here. The remnant that was being gathered by Jesus included not only "lost sheep" within Israel (Matt. 10:6; 15:24) but also "other sheep" (John 10:16), apparently referring to Gentiles (Matt. 28:19; cf. Is. 49:6). Though small and vulnerable as Jesus's flock, He said that their Father delights for them to receive the kingdom as a gift. Thus, far from worrying about food and clothing or being afraid of the future, they could even sell what they have and give to those in need because of their treasure in heaven, where their hearts are and their future lies (Luke 12:33–34; cf. 18:24).

12:35–48. Different Servants, Different Destinies. This unit contains two main parables: the watchful servant (vv. 35–40) and the parable of the faithful and evil stewards (vv. 42–48). At the conclusion of the first parable, Peter asked Jesus whether it was spoken only to them as His disciples or to all others as well (v. 41). Answering a question with a question and another parable, Jesus seems to imply that this second parable applies to the disciples, while the parable about watching applies to all.

12:35–40. The Watchful Servant. Watchful servants are to be clothed for work (v. 35). They should wait for their master's return from the wedding with lamps burning (vv. 35–36). The image of the wedding in the teachings of Jesus functions as the process by which those who will comprise His kingdom are revealed (Matt. 22:1–14; 25:1–12; cf. John 3:29). Here, it is those who are found watching, opening the door as soon as He knocks, who will sit down to eat (Luke 12:36–37). They will be happy and blessed with good things, which are amazingly depicted here by the invitation to eat immediately while the master girds Himself and serves them (v. 37). This role reversal (cf. 17:7–8)—the last (the servants) served first and served by their master—illustrates one of the most dominant kingdom principles: service (22:27; cf. Mark 9:35).

According to the Jewish practice of the time, which divided the twelve hours of night into three watches, the second watch of the night was from approximately 10 p.m. to 2 a.m., and the third watch was from approximately 2 a.m. to 6 a.m. The Romans had four watches instead of three (Mark 13:35). Either way, the disciples were expected to watch for their master's return throughout the night—it could be in the second watch (in the middle of the night), or in the third (toward daybreak; Luke 12:38). Jesus drew a parallel between the vigilance expected to that of a homeowner to whose home a thief might come in the dead of night. If it were known exactly when the thief would come, the owner would prevent the house from being broken into by staying awake that night. Since it is impossible to never sleep and no one knows when the thief will come, the only other way is to always be ready (i.e., by knowing the signs). This was the point Jesus was making when He told His followers to be ready because He will come unexpectedly (vv. 39–40).

12:42–48. The Faithful and Evil Stewards. The second parable contrasts a wise steward, or manager, who was left in charge of a landowner's estate, with a servant who acts irresponsibly in view of a perceived delay in his master's return. The steward was a trusted servant (cf. v. 37) who oversaw the business affairs for the owner. If he faithfully maintained order during the master's absence, including providing food for the household at the appropriate times, he would be rewarded for his service by being placed in charge of everything (v. 44; cf. 16:10). The irresponsible servant would be caught by surprise and punished severely for his unfaithfulness by being chopped in pieces, which suggests a very severe punishment, and grouped with the unbelievers (v. 46; see commentary on Luke 18:1–8). The punishment would be apportioned according to knowledge of the master's will. The one who knew that will and did not prepare by doing it would suffer the greater punishment—many stripes or blows (12:47; cf. Amos 3:2). Even the one who did not know but whose actions deserved punishment would be beaten, but only with few blows or stripes (Luke 12:48). Ignorance of divine truth is no license for wrongdoing because enough has been revealed to leave people without excuse (Rom. 1:20; cf. Rom. 2:14–15), but they will be judged less severely. On the other hand, the better a person knows Jesus and His will and practices it, the more abundant his or her life will be (John 10:10).

12:49–59. Time for Choosing. Sending fire on the earth refers to judgment of the earth by fire (v. 49; see, e.g., Deut. 32:22; Zeph. 3:8; 2 Thess. 1:8; 2 Pet. 3:10). But Jesus came to suffer the equivalent of this punishment as the substitutionary atonement for sinners (cf. John 12:27), and He actually looked forward to it because of the joy in eternity the salvation of multitudes would bring (Heb. 12:2). The baptism refers to His suffering of death and resurrection (Luke 12:50; Mark 10:38), our identification with which is symbolized by water baptism (Rom. 6:3–4). Did Jesus come to usher in an era of peace on earth? Absolutely not (Luke 12:51). He came to remove the enmity between God and human beings (Gen. 3:15). But this creates a division between those who accept Jesus's kingdom proclamation and those who do not. It will even divide the closest family relationships because Jesus was creating a spiritual family with the expectation of supreme allegiance, above even one's honoring of father and mother (Luke 12:52–53; see also 9:59–60; 14:26; Matt. 10:36; cf. Mic. 7:6).

On what seems to be a different occasion with a similar saying in Matthew 16:2–3, Jesus addressed a large group of people about the significance of His ministry (Luke 12:49–59). As usual, He began with the familiar (in this case the weather) to explain His message of the kingdom. People in Israel knew that when they saw a cloud from the west, a storm from the Mediterranean was coming (v. 54), while a south wind would bring burning heat from the desert (v. 55). He called them hypocrites because they could interpret the weather but chose to disregard what should have been just as obvious but was far more consequential—the uniqueness of the present time of fulfillment (v. 56; Mark 1:15). Since a time of final judgment is coming, it is important to always judge what is right on our own (Luke 12:57), just as one might do before going to a human court. In all ages, it was less risky and costly to settle a dispute and reconcile rather than insisting on litigation. Making diligent efforts to resolve matters directly with one's opponent may increase the chances of an amicable resolution of the dispute. Once battle lines are drawn, if the dispute is lost, the punishment of prison and having to pay the assessed penalty down to the very last penny demonstrates the foolishness of pursuing such a course. Before heaven's judgment seat justice will be done, and this parable serves as a warning that all who reject Jesus's invitation to become right with God will face eternal loss.

13:1–9. Need and Urgency of Repentance. Having just spoken of judging what is right (12:57), Jesus was asked about news of an atrocity in the temple that is otherwise unknown from ancient sources but fits what we know of Pilate's character on other occasions. The description fits one of the three large Jewish festival celebrations (Deut. 16:16), when Pilate would certainly have been present. Perhaps there was some provocation by these Galileans (cf. Acts 5:37) that led to their being killed even while offering sacrifices (Luke 13:1). Jesus's question as to whether they were worse sinners (v. 2) addresses the common assumption that such tragedies indicate God's judgment on wrongdoing—an assumption that Jesus denied (cf. John 9:1–3). They were not worse. Likewise with the eighteen people who were killed when the tower in Siloam fell on them (Luke 13:4). This tower may have been a fortification at a strategic point in the wall on the southeastern side of Jerusalem above the pool of Siloam, which was a large, ritual immersion pool and no doubt often crowded. While denying that these calamities were direct judgments of God, Jesus thought of the countless number who would perish by rejecting His message and used these incidents to underscore the necessity of repentance before it would be too late (vv. 3, 5; cf. vv. 34–35).

To reinforce this point, Jesus told a parable about a fig tree planted in a vineyard (v. 6). The vineyard was a familiar symbol for Israel (e.g., Is. 5:7; Mark 12:1), and trees are often used figuratively of people who were to bring forth fruit (see commentary on Luke 3:7–20). But this fig tree had been barren for three years (13:7) and took valuable space that could be better utilized by a productive tree. Nevertheless, the keeper of the vineyard begged to keep the tree another year, promising to dig around it and fertilize it (v. 8). The keeper of the vineyard did not speak questioning the justice of cutting down a tree that fails to bear fruit but spoke in the hope that extra care might produce a better result. A life that bears fruit begins with repentance (cf. 3:8). Time was running out; life is uncertain; and Jesus longed for people to accept His message before it was too late and the ax would necessarily be laid to the root of the tree.

13:10–17. Healing of a Crippled Woman. Jesus is again shown in a synagogue on the Sabbath (13:10), as was His custom (4:16). While teaching, He noticed a woman who had been bent over for eighteen years from a spirit of infirmity and asked her to come forward. Out of compassion for her suffering, He announced her freedom from her infirmity, placed His hands on her, and she was able to straighten up (13:11–13). Hers was not a case of demon possession, as is sometimes suggested, even though her disability was said to have been caused by Satan (v. 16), because Jesus addressed the woman herself rather than a demon, and she was healed (v. 12). The leader of the synagogue was indignant that this happened on the Sabbath (v. 14), as emphasized by the word order in Greek. Sabbath prohibitions in later Jewish traditions that are connected with healing include the use of various medicaments, straightening a child's body, and setting limbs. Interestingly, Jesus proclaimed the woman loosed or free from her infirmity before touching her, making it difficult for the synagogue leader to identify this act definitively as a Sabbath violation. Perhaps that explains why, rather than confronting Jesus directly, the synagogue leader told the crowd to come and be healed during the six working days (v. 14).

In response, Jesus addressed not just the leader of the synagogue but more broadly all who thought like he did. Many were more merciful to their animals, loosing them and leading them to water on the Sabbath (v. 15). In fact, it seems that elaborate arrangements were made to facilitate watering animals at wells on the Sabbath without transgressing Jewish laws. Jesus indicated that, if animals may be treated this way without violating the Sabbath, much more should this woman be set free (v. 16). Jesus's words are even stronger in Greek, emphasizing the length of time she had suffered (eighteen years) and that her being set free was morally necessary. Just as Abraham's son Isaac was loosed from the bonds of death (Gen. 22:9–11) so this "daughter of Abraham" must be released. So effective was Jesus's argument that those opposing Him were ashamed. The Greek word for this shaming (kataischynō) is used here for the only time in Luke's writings. Shame came on all who opposed Jesus, but not on those who trusted in Him (Is. 28:16, LXX). By contrast, all the people were pleased with all the things Jesus was doing (Luke 13:17).

13:18–21. Parables of the Kingdom's Advancement. Jesus's silencing of His opponents and winning of public opinion leads into a pair of parables that describe the rapid spread of the kingdom, repeated from an earlier occasion (cf. Matt. 13:31–33). In the first parable, the kingdom of God is "like a mustard seed" (Luke 13:18–19). It grew into a tree (some manuscripts call it a "large" or "great" tree). Typically the mustard seed becomes only a moderately sized bush, but it may grow to a height of nine or ten feet (about 3 m) and thus more like a tree. It also provides a home for the birds to live in its branches (v. 19), a kingdom image familiar from the OT (Ezek. 17:22–24; 31:6; Dan. 4:10–15; cf. Ps. 84:3). The second parable makes a similar point in terms of the rapidity with which leaven or yeast spreads through three measures or sixty pounds (27 kg) of meal or flour. When baking bread, some leavened dough would be kept back for use with the next batch. This huge amount of flour—about a bushel (40 L), which could feed at least 150 people—illustrates the ambitious scope of spreading the news of the kingdom over a large territory.

13:22–35. The Narrow Way. From the time Jesus set His face to go to Jerusalem (9:51), He had met adoring crowds as well as opposition, yet these extreme reactions never seem to have affected His larger determination to fulfill His mission (cf. John 2:23–25). In traveling toward Jerusalem, Jesus Himself chose the path to this destination. Judging from Luke's occasional geographic notes, Jesus seems to have been intent on covering as many cities and villages of Israel as possible. Along the way a questioner asked whether few are being saved, the present tense implying that a process was in view (Luke 13:23; cf. Acts 2:47; 1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15).

Jesus responded with an exhortation and a parable, similar to instruction given to His disciples on an earlier occasion (cf. Matt. 7:13–14, 21–23), here generalized for a much larger audience. Addressing the entire crowd, Jesus urged them to strive or to exert every effort (agōnizomai) to enter the kingdom (Luke 13:24). The Greek word was used of athletes preparing for competition (1 Cor. 9:25) and is also used in reference to combat (John 18:36; 1 Tim. 6:12; 2 Tim. 4:7). The righteousness required is that of the Father (Luke 6:27–36), which comes through believing in the One He has sent (John 6:29); it cannot be humanly produced or the Pharisees would have succeeded (Matt. 5:20). Thus many who desire to enter will not be able (Luke 13:24), or according to another nuance of the verb ischyō, will not be "strong enough." The same word is used in the sermon for the stream that was not able to shake the house founded on the rock (6:48). Only those who live according to Jesus's teachings will remain firm in their faith, while those who postpone the decision will find a shut door (cf. Matt. 25:10–13).

Claiming Jesus as Lord and eating and drinking in His presence represented only an appearance of intimacy. In reality, profession is worthless. Not knowing Jesus means He does not know us and classes us as workers of unrighteousness (Luke 13:27) because the only righteousness we may have is His and from Him. The patriarchs, who died, and all the prophets as well as those from every direction and every nation (Rev. 7:9) will participate in God's banquet in His kingdom (Luke 13:29; cf. Rev. 19:9). The reversal stated as the last will be first and vice versa is a frequent theme in Jesus's teachings (Luke 13:30; cf., e.g., Matt. 19:30; 20:16) and acted out in His ministry to the poor and the outcast. The wording in Luke makes clear that this is not an exclusive principle. Being poor is no virtue in itself, as shown by the presence of a few rich and powerful among the believers (Luke 8:3; 19:8; 23:50; cf. 1 Cor. 1:26). Some also who are first will be last. This is the great tragedy, epitomized by Israel's religious leaders who rejected Jesus.

The Pharisees were not simply trying to be helpful in warning Jesus that Herod wanted to kill Him (Luke 13:31). They asked Him to go away, as the Gadarenes did (8:37), and were actively plotting His death (11:54; Mark 3:6). Jesus called Herod a "fox" (Luke 13:32) because of the animal's penchant for destruction (Neh. 4:3; Song 2:15) and, more specifically, because of Herod's execution of John the Baptist (Mark 6:17–29) and the role Herod would play in His own approaching death (Luke 23:11).

The "third day" or "after three days" is Jesus's typical formulation for the day of His resurrection (Luke 13:32; e.g., 18:33; 24:46; Matt. 17:23; Mark 9:31), emphasizing it as a fulfillment of prophecy (see commentary on Luke 9:18–27). It was for this very purpose that Jesus was heading to Jerusalem, the center of Jewish leadership, where He would be executed. Luke here ties in a saying of Jesus, uttered near the end of His ministry (Luke 13:34–35; 19:41; cf. Matt. 23:37–39). Jesus ministered in Jerusalem, trying to gather its children as a hen gathers her baby chicks. Similarly, God is described as caring for Israel as an eagle cares for its young (Ex. 19:4; Deut. 32:11), protecting and sheltering it under His wings (e.g., Pss. 17:8; 36:7; 57:1). The desolation of "your house" (Luke 13:35) indicates a divine disowning of the temple but also of the whole city, the subject of this lament, anticipating its desolation by the Romans in A.D. 70 (Luke 19:41–44; 21:20; cf. Dan. 9:26). The ultimate horizon of this passage is the Second Coming, when after a period of not seeing Jesus (John 16:16–20), the words of Psalm 118:26 will be fulfilled: "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord" (cf. Rev. 1:7).

14:1–14. Guest at a the Banquet. Here, as in the previous chapter, a Sabbath healing (14:1–6; cf. 13:10–17) is followed by parables (14:7–24; cf. 13:18–21) and a more personal appeal (14:25–35; cf. 13:22–30). Jesus was a Sabbath guest at the home of a leading Pharisee, and a man was there who had dropsy or edema, which is a swelling in the body due to excess water that can cause severe pain (14:2). The man's presence seems to have been deliberately arranged to entrap Jesus because those in attendance were examining his actions carefully (v. 1). Speaking directly to the lawyers, who were experts in the Mosaic law, as well as to the Pharisees, Jesus invited those present to answer whether it is lawful to heal this man on the Sabbath. According to the Jewish understanding of the time, even prayer for the sick trampled on the holiness of the Sabbath; saving life on the Sabbath may not have incurred condemnation, but none of the illnesses that Jesus healed on the Sabbath appear to have been life threatening. So, as before, they refused to answer His question (cf. 6:9). Jesus then reached out and healed the man (14:4), teaching that human need and Sabbath observance are not antithetical to each other (see 6:3–5; cf. Matt. 12:12). Underscoring the point, He appealed to the common practice of helping an animal (some manuscripts include "a son" or "a child") that fell into a pit or well on the Sabbath by lifting it out.

Showing concern for everyone in the room, Jesus presented two blocks of instruction, the first directed at the guests and the second at the host. Noting how the guests were choosing the seats of honor (Luke 14:7), Jesus advised them against that (cf. Prov. 25:6–7) lest the host ask for their place to be given to someone more prominent (who would generally arrive later than others). Since by then the better seats would have been taken, it would be embarrassing to be moved to a place of low importance (Luke 14:8–9). Called a parable (v. 7), this saying constitutes more than simply good advice. Within the larger context of Luke, it looks toward one's future standing in the judgment, promising that the proud who exalt themselves will be humbled while those who humble themselves will be exalted (18:9–11; cf. James 4:6, 10; 1 Pet. 5:5–6).

Turning now to the host, Jesus advised inviting those who could not reciprocate. Being repaid actually robs a person of the joy of generosity. Rather than always (as the present tense in Greek implies) inviting one's friends, relations, and rich neighbors, the poor should be invited (cf. Deut. 14:29) as well as the disabled, the lame, and the blind (Luke 14:12–13), who were excluded from the strict Jewish sect that lived at Qumran and apparently also from temple worship (2 Sam. 5:8). Despite the fact that religious authorities tended to shut out these people from the kingdom of heaven (Luke 11:52; Matt. 23:13), according to Jesus its doors are open even, and perhaps especially, to such as these (cf. Matt. 18:3–4).

The practice of reciprocation, while not wrong in itself, reflects the values of this world more than those of the kingdom of God because the rewards are immediate (cf. Matt. 6:1–6). Jesus encouraged His hearers to live instead with a view toward ultimate recompense at the resurrection of God's people and the ushering in of His kingdom (1 Cor. 15:50–52; 1 Thess. 4:16).

14:15–24. Parable of the Great Banquet. At the mention of the resurrection, someone spoke of the blessedness of eating in the kingdom of God (Luke 14:15), apparently assuming that he, along with those present, would be there. Jesus challenged this assumption with a parable about a large dinner banquet to which many were invited (v. 16). However, after confirming their attendance, when word went out that everything was ready, those invited made excuses as to why they could not come after all (vv. 17–20).

At that time, such a refusal would have been unthinkable unless some totally unexpected crisis arose. The excuses about the purchases of land and oxen are not credible since both would have been carefully considered before any purchase was made. Even the marriage excuse was not plausible. The stipulation about a man staying home with his wife for the first year was in connection with going to war, lest he be killed and the wife be left a widow (Deut. 20:7; 24:5) without children, and thus would not apply in this case. In short, all were poor excuses and the house owner, having prepared food for them at great expense, was understandably angry.

Rather than throw the food out or give it away, the host invited the very ones Jesus had recommended for inviting in the earlier parable, for which a blessing is given (see commentary on Luke 14:1–14). Interestingly, there were not enough of these outcasts to fill the master's house (vv. 22–23). More from rural areas were invited, using strong wording almost identical in Greek to the strong repulsion of the servant by the man who anagkē—felt the need—to "go out" to inspect the just-purchased land (v. 18). The master's servants were to anagkazō—a word that can mean "force," "urge" or "compel," here probably meaning "urge"—the people to come to the banquet. The anger of the house owner is further illustrated by his declaration that none of the people initially invited to the feast would taste anything from it (v. 24). This final statement of judgment by the master of the house suggests an application of the parable to those Jews who refused Jesus's message of the kingdom of God in contrast to the outcasts who were receiving it. The outreach to Gentiles is also comprehended in light of the earlier reference to the anticipated widespread progress of the gospel (13:28–30), particularly in view of the larger context of Luke through Acts.

14:25–35. Cost of Discipleship. At this juncture, readers are reminded that Jesus was journeying to Jerusalem, because many people were traveling with Him (14:25). These, however, were apparently not at the same level of commitment as previous crowds who followed Him (7:9; 9:11), because they merely accompanied Jesus (cf. 13:26–27). That is why Jesus turned to speak to them about what discipleship involves. That one must "hate" immediate family members and even one's own life indicates that these must not be placed first (14:26). Following Jesus must eclipse all other relationships. Another way of saying it is that one cannot love something or someone more and still be a true disciple of Jesus (Matt. 10:37). Bearing one's cross is required, too, because a pupil is not above his or her teacher (Luke 6:40). Crucifixion, calculated to maximize and prolong suffering, was the most shameful death imaginable (see commentary on Luke 23:13–25). While figuratively referring to the trials, the sufferings, and the stigma attached to following Jesus and His truth (cf. Gal. 6:14–16), it sometimes would include literal crucifixion for proclaiming the gospel (cf. John 21:18–19).

Jesus encouraged all would-be disciples to consider the cost before deciding to follow Him (Luke 14:28). To build a tower it is necessary to make sure there are adequate funds to complete it, which requires careful calculation. Worse than the failure would be the resulting mockery (vv. 29–30). When waging war, a king must assess the probability of success. Besides the obvious comparison of troop numbers, additional factors, both tactical and strategic, are involved in the calculation (v. 31). Unless victory is certain, it is better to make peace (v. 32) before the opposing army gets close enough to recognize their numerical superiority. Only then can a wise decision be made whether to move forward or not. This second parable suggests that doing nothing is not really an option. A decision must be made, and the cost of discipleship is huge: forsaking all one's possessions (v. 33). This is the third requirement of discipleship (cf. vv. 26–27). Following Jesus is not for the fainthearted. Many tests will be met along the way. But the cost of not being a disciple is even greater—eternal loss (9:25).

Jesus's discourse on discipleship concludes with a parable about salt. A similar saying in the context of discipleship notes the presence of salt, an indispensable ingredient for flavor and in sacrificial offerings (Mark 9:49; cf. Lev. 2:13; Num. 18:19), without which they would not be acceptable. But if that capacity were lost (Luke 14:34), then it would not be useful for any purpose, not even to fertilize the land (which suggests a compound, probably from the Dead Sea region, that was more than pure sodium chloride) or to kill weeds in a compost heap used for fertilizing. Jesus's solemn appeal inviting His hearers to hear (v. 35) shows that it was possible for the Jews to respond positively despite His earlier quotation from Isaiah in connection with this saying (8:8–10). It is the Lord who gives ears to hear, eyes to see, and a heart to perceive the truth (Deut. 29:4).

15:1–32. Parables of the Lost and Found. Immediately after Jesus's words encouraging people to listen, tax collectors and sinners came closer to hear Him, prompting the Pharisees and scribes—the teachers of the law—to grumble among themselves about Jesus's receiving such people and eating with them (v. 2). Religiously observant Jews at that time avoided associating with these people. But Jesus displayed a very different attitude (5:29–32; 7:34) and told them three closely related parables about a lost sheep (15:4–7), a lost coin (vv. 8–10), and a lost son (vv. 11–32), all of which climax with rejoicing when the lost is found. From the setting and the interpretation that follows, the first two parables (vv. 7, 10), the lost sheep and the lost coin, represent sinners who need to be found and saved in God's kingdom.

15:4–7. A Lost Sheep. A shepherd with one hundred sheep (v. 4) had a typical-sized flock and played an essential role in the Israelite economy since sheep were among the prescribed sacrifices, most notably at Passover time. In spite of later rabbinic comments that shepherds were unscrupulous and untrustworthy, they embodied qualities that were needed for faithful leadership over Israel (e.g., Num. 27:17; 2 Sam. 5:2; 1 Chr. 17:6) and, later, over the church (Acts 20:28; 1 Pet. 5:2). Indeed, the shepherd symbolizes God's own care for His people (Pss. 23:1–4; 28:9; 80:1; Mic. 7:14), and Jesus refers to Himself as "the good shepherd" (John 10:11, 14, 16; cf. Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 2:25; 5:4). Accordingly, it is normal for a shepherd who loses one sheep to leave the ninety-nine in order to search for the one that was lost until he finds it; each is valuable. So God seeks out those who are lost (Ezek. 34:16; cf. Gen. 3:8–9) as does Jesus (Luke 19:10; Matt. 15:24). Being in the open country of the wilderness (Luke 15:4) underscores both the danger and urgency to locate the lost sheep before it suffers harm or is eaten and the shepherd's relief and joy on finding it (v. 5). His joy is so strong and long-lasting that when the shepherd arrives home, he invites his friends and neighbors to rejoice with him, reflecting the collective joy in heaven over one repentant sinner who will enrich eternity by his or her presence (vv. 6–7).

15:8–10. A Lost Coin. A second illustration of the same reality is of a woman with ten silver coins who loses one (v. 8). The coin, a Greek drachma, in Jesus's time was equivalent to a Roman denarius and represented a day's wage. The coins were probably the woman's entire savings, so losing one represented a significant loss and justified searching thoroughly and carefully for it, which included using a lamp and sweeping the house. The typical Jewish home would have had no windows at all or very small ones and a rough stone floor, making it difficult to find a coin, especially if it fell into a crack. On finding it, she invites her lady friends and neighbors (the words here in v. 9 are feminine unlike in v. 6) to come and rejoice with her.

15:11–32. A Lost Son. While the first two parables clearly emphasize the value of what was lost, the culminating parable of the three is more complex as it contrasts different scales of value—in terms of relationships as well as the relative value of possessions compared to that of human beings. The younger of a man's two sons demanded his share of the land that would normally pass to him only after the father's death (v. 12). It was a highly unusual request, which meant that the father would probably have had to sell one third of his land, reserving the double portion for the firstborn son (cf. Deut. 21:17). The younger son was essentially telling his father that he wished he were already dead, particularly unthinkable in a patriarchal setting. Such rebelliousness by one's son could perhaps be treated as a capital offense (Deut. 21:18–21). Amazingly, though, the father acceded to the younger son's request and divided the land between his sons. While the father retained control of the income from the larger portion of the land, the older son knew that what was left would eventually fall to him. Nevertheless, it meant a reduced income for the family.

The younger son soon took his money, left home, and traveled to a distant place, where he wasted it all (Luke 15:13–14). His reckless, hedonistic lifestyle is not detailed in order to focus on his time of need. A severe famine compounded the problem because even the barest necessities would have been more expensive (v. 14). This dire setting, combined with his being a foreigner, resulted in no one giving him anything (v. 16). His desperation is vividly portrayed by his being hired by a citizen of that country (v. 15). Jews were not to associate or in any way unite their interests with foreigners (cf. Acts 10:28, using the same word), whom many Jews considered unclean (cf. Mark 7:1–4). Worse, the young man had to feed pigs, the epitome of unclean animals. Apparently, due to the famine, his employer took advantage of the boy by providing him with only the barest sustenance, and he was so hungry that he longed to be fed with the bitter, feed-grade carob pods that the pigs ate. Even so, to steal food from the pigs could have resulted in him being fired and possibly starving to death. Seemingly trapped in hopeless financial servitude, he finally came to his senses. Strikingly portrayed is the boy's realization of his own situation compared with that of even the hired servants in his father's house, who had food to spare (Luke 15:17) and his resolve to join them. Having received his inheritance, he must work for his keep.

The young son readied a contrite speech of repentance for when he would face his father. It included confession of his course of action as a sin against heaven and wrong toward his father, as well as his admission that he was no longer worthy to be called his son (vv. 18–19). The text then focuses on his father's response. Even while still at a great distance, the son was noticed (v. 20). It seems his father had been waiting and hoping for him to return. No words were necessary; his cascade of actions says it all: he saw him, had compassion on him, ran toward him, embraced him, and kissed him. The word for having compassion is rare in the NT, used only in the Gospels, and almost always describes the compassion of Jesus for people in need (e.g., Luke 7:13; Matt. 9:36; Mark 1:41; 8:2).

Running would have been not only undignified but disgraceful for a man of the father's age and station. Yet this and more—a huge hug and kiss—shows the father's warm welcome of his wayward son. The son began his rehearsed speech, but his father interrupted it, telling the servants to bring out the best robe (Luke 15:22), which would have been the father's own robe. The Greek word stolē refers to a long, formal garment reserved for a special celebration. The ring was the father's own signet ring, bestowing to the son his own authority. Servants went barefoot, but a son was to have sandals. Taken together, the father's actions paint an amazing picture of love, acceptance, and reinstatement of his once-rebellious son into the family. Killing the fattened calf (v. 23) would have fed the whole village, not just the family. This was no secret or shameful return; it was a village-wide celebration! The father was emphatic—this was his son. He would never be merely a servant. Added to the image of the lost being found of the previous two parables is an even more dramatic picture: resurrection from the dead (v. 24). The text refers to the beginning of the celebration because it would probably have lasted several days.

Almost forgotten was the older son who after faithfully working in the field (v. 25), approached the house and asked a servant the reason for the celebration. He was told of his brother being received "safe and sound" (v. 27). This traditional phrase translates the single Greek word hygiainō, which is related to healing and physical wholeness (cf. 5:31). Instead of being happy, the older brother was angry and refused to go in and celebrate (15:28). Though this was highly disrespectful, the father himself came out and pled with him to join in the festivities. Finally we see the feelings harbored by the older son. He emphasized the years he had worked for his father, not just since his brother left home, and thus he felt more like a slave than a son, hoping for a reward for all his hard work but not being given even a young goat (v. 29), a far less valuable animal than the fattened calf.

The older son emphasized his separation further by expressing his desire to have parties not with his family but with his friends, even refusing to acknowledge his relation to his brother, preferring to describe him to his father as "this son of yours" (v. 30). By implication, he was even disowning himself from the family. But having just received one son back from the dead, the father refused to accept the "death" of his eldest son, addressing him affectionately as "son" (v. 31; cf. 2:48; 16:25) and referring to the younger son as his brother. The necessity of celebrating is underscored because he had died and was alive again and had been lost and was found (15:32). Perhaps most surprisingly, the story ends here. Whether the older brother accepted his father's invitation is unknown, as if each hearer is left to make up his or her own mind how to relate to the unfathomable love and forgiveness of the Father in heaven, the real hero of this story.

16:1–13. Parable of the Unjust Steward. From a parable about the most valuable treasure of all—people—chapter sixteen turns to what people overvalue: money. This parable is troubling because it seems to commend the actions of an unrighteous oikonomos—"steward," "manager," or "house administrator" (v. 8)—who gave his master's money away in order to save himself. An oikonomos in Roman times was a highly respected position. Those who hired them often had to be away on business, and therefore these administrators were able to sign legal documents and do business in their master's name. So the most important qualifications for this position were honesty and trustworthiness. This man, however, was accused of squandering his master's possessions. The charges were believed because the manager was not only asked to give an account but was also told that he could not continue as manager (v. 2). The normal order appears to have been reversed here: the firing should have followed the accounting, assuming the facts confirmed the accusations being made.

The steward seized this unusual opportunity to secure his future. In order to ingratiate himself to his master's debtors, he wrote down their debts. The oil debt was cut by half from a hundred measures to fifty and the wheat debt was cut by 20 percent. Commentators and translations vary in regard to the exact modern equivalents of these amounts, due to varying accounts and local usages. What is clear is that these reductions of debt were huge, representing about three years and eight years of labor respectively. Even more surprising is that the master, on learning about this, commended the administrator because he had acted phronimōs—a word that can be translated as "shrewdly," "prudently," "wisely," or "astutely" (for other occurrences of this Greek word, see Luke 12:42; Matt. 7:24; 10:16; 25:2).

Why was the steward commended? Some suggest that he merely eliminated the interest owed, which explains the different write-off amounts for oil and wheat. Under this assumption, the steward actually made his master look very pious because Jews were not supposed to exact usury on debts owed to them by Israelites (Lev. 25:36–37); thus he not only secured his own future but enhanced his master's reputation in doing so. But if this were the case, the steward could not have been labeled adikias—"unrighteous," "unjust," or (because of the context) "dishonest" (Luke 16:8) because he would have been upholding Jewish law. But if he had been unjust, in what sense was he wise? By thinking of his future prospects and not just his present happiness.

Shockingly, the parable concludes that the people (lit. "children" or "sons") of this world are more shrewd than the people (lit. "children" or "sons") of the light (v. 8). In short, although professed believers should live sensible, just, and godly lives in this present age (Titus 2:12), with their eternal future in view, many manifest even less wisdom than worldly people by chasing worldly wealth, which is fleeting (Prov. 23:5; 1 Tim. 6:7), rather than being serious about living for the world to come. Worldly people at least understand the need to secure their immediate future. Jesus's counsel to all professed children of light is to make friends by means of mamōna tēs adikias—"unrighteous mammon/wealth" or "worldly wealth"—by using it wisely in light of eternity so that they may be counted faithful (Luke 16:11) and welcomed into the everlasting dwellings (v. 9). It is heavenly wealth that constitutes the true riches, so the wealth of this world should not be horded but used to help others, and the "friends" who have responded to Christ because of the kindness shown to them will eventually show their appreciation of this generosity in the everlasting world of the life to come. In addition, our closest "friends" will be the Lord and angels in heaven, where our true treasure is. The means entrusted to us, like in the parable of the talents/bags of gold (Matt. 25:14–30), are lent to us by God for the enrichment of His kingdom (cf. 1 Chr. 29:14). If someone should prove unfaithful in handling what belongs to God, it shows an allegiance to another master, and one can be faithful to only a single master, not two (Luke 16:11–13).

16:14–18. Clashes with Kingdom Values. The topic of wealth continues in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (vv. 19–31), preceded by these intervening verses. The Pharisees were visibly offended at the attack on wealth because they were lovers of money, and they derided Jesus (v. 14; cf. Ps. 22:7; 35:16). But wealth is no certain indicator of God's blessing, as the ensuing parable makes plain. Not what people think, but what God thinks matters, and He knows their hearts (Luke 16:15; cf. 1 Sam. 16:7). Jesus goes further. The trappings of wealth and power admired by most is utterly repulsive to God. In fact, it is a bdelygma—"an abomination" or "detestable," a term reserved for the most revolting practices, such as eating the flesh of unclean animals (Lev. 11:10–13, 41–42), homosexual relations (Lev. 18:22; 20:13), and abominable worship practices (Deut. 7:25–26; 12:31; 17:2–5). The Canaanites were driven out of the land on account of this (Lev. 18:24–25; Deut. 12:29–31).

Up to the time of John the Baptist, God's revelation was limited to the Law and the Prophets—the Hebrew Scriptures. After centuries of prophetic silence, John signaled a new era of God's revelation (Luke 16:16; see also 1:76–79; 7:26–27; cf. Mal. 3:1). The preaching of the kingdom of God by both John and Jesus awakened hope, leading even unlikely candidates for the kingdom to desire earnestly to enter (Luke 15:1). Furthermore, this new time was characterized by believers' fervent efforts to advance the kingdom and the certain triumph over Satan, whose warfare against God's law is futile. Not one tittle of the law, not even the slightest stroke of a letter, would fail (16:17), because it reflects God's unchangeable character.

16:19–31. Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. The opening words, identical to 16:1, signal that this too is a parable, as does the fanciful depiction of life after death. Unlike the dishonest steward, the rich man took no thought of his destiny until it was too late. In this life he seemingly had it all, dressing expensively with purple and fine linen (v. 19; cf. Rev. 18:12), feasting luxuriously every day, and living so securely that poor Lazarus (meaning "God helps") was laid not at the door but at the gate (Luke 16:20). Such an entrance would normally have been separated from a palatial residence by a courtyard. Lazarus was unable to work (as indicated by his being taken to the gate) and was nourished with only the piptontōn—"what was falling"—from the rich man's table (v. 21), since apparently nothing was given to him (cf. 15:16). His only help came from the dogs that licked his sores.

Jews commonly assumed that wealth was a sign of God's blessings (cf. 18:24–26), but the rich man evidenced no religious inclination, refusing even to show mercy to the poor man lying at his gate. Thus, after death, when he piously requested mercy from Father Abraham, none was granted (16:25–26). While poverty in itself is no saving virtue, Lazarus's patient endurance of his sufferings and begging for mercy (vv. 20–21) from the one who seemed divinely blessed shows his reliance on God. The opposite destinies of the two men is hinted at already by the fact that only Lazarus is named. At death, the rich man found himself in torment while Lazarus rested in Abraham's bosom—or "at his side" as some translations render it (v. 23). This depiction of the afterlife reflects popular, nontheological conceptions of the day. It may be similar to the common reference in our time to "St. Peter" guarding the entrance to the "pearly gates" as the foundation of humorous stories. Too frequently this folklore parable about Lazarus is today oversimplified into a literal teaching on heaven and hell. Such an interpretation contradicts the NT teaching that people receive their rewards at the Second Advent (Luke 21:28, 36; Matt. 16:27; 25:31–46; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 22:12; cf. Prov. 24:12).

Furthermore, numerous unrealistic elements (e.g., calm conversation by the rich man while in fiery torment and the idea that a finger dipped in water would adequately cool his tongue) and the description of real body parts rather than a soulish postmortem existence indicate that this parable is not intended to be understood literally. Furthermore, neither man is actually depicted in heaven or hell; both are in Hades (Luke 16:23), the place of the dead (Acts 2:27, 31; Rev. 1:18), which the reference to the rich man's burial underscores (Luke 16:22). The picture reflects a Jewish understanding of the grave (Hades) as having separate places for the righteous and the wicked. Lazarus resting with Abraham fits the OT conception of the dead sleeping (or resting) with their fathers (e.g., Deut. 31:16; 2 Sam. 7:12; 1 Kin. 2:10). It also fits well with the teaching of Jesus (John 11:11–14) and the NT writers (see commentary on Luke 8:40–56) that death is a sleep. The great gulf or chasm fixed between Abraham and the rich man illustrates that one's chosen destiny is forever sealed by death, which is an unconscious state (Job 14:12; Pss. 115:17; 146:4; Eccl. 9:5–6, 10) from which the righteous will be awakened by the voice of Jesus (John 5:28–29; 1 Thess. 4:16; cf. Ps. 17:15).

At the climax of the parable, the rich man begged Abraham to send Lazarus back from the dead in order to diamartyromai to his five brothers (Luke 16:28). This word most often refers to the apostolic preaching of the gospel (e.g., Acts 2:40; 18:5; 20:21, 24; 28:23), but it can also refer to the inspired testimony of the Scriptures (Acts 8:25; Heb. 2:6). Abraham replied that his brothers have Moses and the prophets and should listen to them (Luke 16:29). Like the rich man himself, it seems his brothers did not allow the Scriptures to benefit them. The notion that someone rising from the dead would be a more persuasive witness to them was rejected (vv. 30–31).

The miracles performed by Jesus were not convincing for many Jews. Claiming that Jesus was in league with the devil (Mark 3:22–23) or demon-possessed (John 8:48, 52; 10:20), they wanted a sign from heaven (Luke 11:16). More persuasive than miracles, more certain and sure even than one rising from the dead, is God's prophetic word (2 Pet. 1:19; cf. Rev. 16:14).

17:1–4. Jesus Warns of Offenses. While the preceding remarks were aimed at the Pharisees, the sayings from 17:1 to 18:8 are mostly directed to the disciples (except for 17:20–21). It is inevitable that skandala—a word variously translated as "offenses," "stumbling blocks," or "temptations to sin," incitements to wrong action or belief—will come, but believers should not be the instigators (v. 1; Matt. 13:41; Rom. 14:13) as it advances Satan's work (Matt. 16:23; Rev. 2:14). A millstone was used for grinding grain and weighed hundreds of pounds, so having one hung from a person's neck while being thrown into the sea would mean certain drowning. Nevertheless, that would be preferable to the anticipated punishment for offending one of these little ones, referring to the "little flock" being gathered by Jesus (Luke 17:2; see also 12:32). The absolute admonition to prosechete—"take heed," "be on your guard," or "watch yourselves" (17:3; also in 21:34; Acts 5:35; 20:28)—urges a spiritual self-examination before correcting others (cf. Matt. 7:3–5; Gal. 6:1). When fellow believers sin against us, a rebuke, done in a redemptive way, rather than vengeance is necessary (Lev. 19:17–18). If they repent, they are to be forgiven. Then we have renewed fellowship with them (Matt. 18:15). The aim is to preserve the relationship, even if it is necessary to forgive not just seven times but seven times in a day (Luke 17:4; cf. Matt. 18:21–22). As we have been forgiven, we are to forgive (cf. Matt. 6:12) and thus overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:19–21).

17:5–10. Faith and Duty. The request of the disciples, "Increase our faith" (v. 5), indicates that such a forgiving spirit seemed out of their reach. They had heard Jesus describe inadequate faith as "little" (12:28; Matt. 8:26; 16:8), which suggested that they needed more; now they needed to understand that what counts is the quality of one's faith, not the amount. A mustard seed was among the smallest of seeds, and even faith that tiny could do otherwise impossible things by relying on God, for whom nothing is impossible (Luke 1:37; 18:27; cf. Matt. 19:26).

However, God's servants should not expect God to do their bidding. God's servants must always be ready to do His bidding. Jesus told a parable to clarify this point. The servant (doulos) was a household slave whose obedience was not optional or in any way praiseworthy. Somewhat humorously, Jesus asked his hearers to pretend they were the master and asked whether they would call their servant in from working in the field, have food ready, and invite him to eat (Luke 17:7). Of course not. The master's needs always came first, and only after he had eaten and drunk could the slave enjoy his meal (v. 8). Slaves should consider that they had only done their duty (v. 10), what they were obligated to do, and humbly acknowledge themselves as unprofitable and unworthy servants who deserved no thanks. Likewise, Christian service for the Lord can earn no merit whatsoever: first, because Jesus has already paid our incalculable debt of sin; second, because even works of faith are done through His grace and power; and third, because everything we do is tainted by sin and needs the merits and intercession of Christ to be acceptable to God (Ex. 28:38–40; Is. 64:6; Eph. 2:8–10; Phil. 2:13; 3:9; Heb. 7:25; 13:15).

17:11–19. Ten Lepers Cleansed. Still on the journey to Jerusalem, Jesus passed between Samaria and Galilee. This incident may have occurred just after the raising of Lazarus, when Jesus withdrew to the town of Ephraim (John 11:54), about eighteen miles (29 km) north of Jerusalem. On the outskirts of the town, ten lepers, who because of their unclean state had to stand far away (see commentary on Luke 5:12–16), addressed Jesus as "Master" (17:12–13). This title—elsewhere in Luke used only by the disciples (5:5; 9:24, 45; 9:33, 49)—together with the cry for Jesus to have compassion on them evidences the lepers' faith in Jesus to heal them. Recognizing their desire to be cleansed of leprosy, Jesus tells them to show themselves to the priests (v. 14). Mosaic law specifies that a healed leper must be declared clean by the priest, who would then administer a cleansing ritual (Lev. 14:1–32). Jesus's command tested their faith, and without waiting to be healed, all ten immediately headed to the temple.

After being pronounced clean by the priest, only one leper, a Samaritan, returned, praised God for the miracle, and with his face to the ground, expressed his gratitude to Jesus (Luke 17:15–16). As on other occasions (Luke 7:9; Matt. 8:10–13; 15:28), Jesus underlined by His rhetorical questions the significance of the fact that the one most responsive of the ten was a foreigner (Luke 17:18). The story reminds us that nationality or ethnicity is no impediment to the gospel and that sometimes those who seem unlikely candidates for the kingdom may indeed be the nearest (cf. 10:33). Through a series of insistent questions, Jesus confronted His disciples with the failure of those in Israel who did not appreciate the kingdom blessings being extended to them and hinted at the need for a wider mission. He also confirmed what was already implicit, that faith is decisive for being made well (v. 19)—physically and spiritually. Here again healing becomes a parable of the salvation (and restoration) that Jesus offers (see commentary on Luke 7:36–50). The command to go (17:14, 19) evokes the commission given to every believer to make disciples (Matt. 28:19) by sharing what "God has done" (Luke 8:39).

17:20–37. When and How the Kingdom Comes. More than three years had passed since John the Baptist began preaching a "baptism of repentance" (3:3) and announcing that "the kingdom of heaven" was near (Matt. 3:2). Some Pharisees, seeing no visible indication that Jesus would establish the kingdom anytime soon and perhaps implying failure regarding His mission, asked Him when the kingdom of God would come (Luke 17:20). Jesus's answer is divided by Luke into two parts: a brief and somewhat cryptic answer to the Pharisees and a lengthier answer to His disciples. In reply to the Pharisees, Jesus denied that the coming of the kingdom was something that can be outwardly observed. Nor was it to be established in a particular location on earth that could be identified (v. 21).

The phrase entos hymōn estin has been translated and understood variously. Some render it as "within you," others as "in your midst," and others as "among you." Luke uses certain words to convey the idea of something or someone being "among you" (en; 1:1, 42; 7:16, 28; 9:46, 48; etc.) or "in your midst" (mesos; 2:46; 4:35; 10:3; 21:21; 24:36). While it is true that the Greek word used here (entos) can mean "within" or "inside" (cf. Pss. 39:3; 103:1; 109:22, LXX), Jesus is not necessarily saying that the kingdom of God is within the Pharisees. Luke often uses "you" in a generic sense rather than to the specific people being addressed (Luke 2:11; 6:22; 9:48; 10:9; etc.). Even the Pharisees could become citizens of God's kingdom if they would allow Him to make them clean within (Matt. 23:26 is the only other use of entos in the NT).

To the disciples, Jesus explained that soon they would longingly desire to see the coming kingdom, and people would even claim that it had arrived at a specific time and place. However, when the kingdom comes outwardly in glory, it will be as visible as lightning that covers the sky (Luke 17:24). Every eye will see Him (Rev. 1:7). But the cross comes first. Jesus had to suffer as an offering for sin in fulfillment of prophecy (Luke 17:25; cf. Is. 53:10). The Greek word dei is used to indicate that this is a divine imperative—God must fulfill His promise (see commentary on Luke 2:41–52). By rejecting Jesus, the prophetic testimony of Moses regarding a twisted and faithless generation (Deut. 32:5, 20) was fulfilled in those who would seek His death. Few were saved in the days of Noah and in the days of Lot (Luke 17:26, 28) because they were so absorbed with pleasures and business that they disregarded the warnings of coming destruction. There is nothing wrong with eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, or buying and selling, but these activities can distract people from advancing God's kingdom (12:33–34; 18:22) and preparing for Christ's return (12:35–40). When the Son of Man is revealed (17:30), returning in the same way He ascended (Acts 1:11) and descending from heaven "with power and great glory" (Luke 21:27; cf. 1 Thess. 4:16), the world will be destroyed as fully by fire as it was by water (2 Pet. 3:6–7).

Sodom is the proverbial example of wickedness and of God's destructive judgment (Deut. 29:23–26; Is. 13:19; 2 Pet. 2:6; Jude 7), but the cities of Israel who rejected the greater light that came through the preaching of Jesus and the apostles will receive an even greater punishment in the judgment (Matt. 10:14–15; 11:23–24; see Luke 10:12; 12:47). God's judgment on Sodom illustrates what He will do against the wicked—fire and brimstone will rain down from God out of heaven and destroy them (cf. Rev. 14:10; 20:9). The Son of Man will be revealed at His Second Advent in burning fire against those who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess. 1:7–8; cf. Matt. 26:64; Rev. 1:7).

Although Jesus will give similar instructions to flee and not turn back in the Olivet Discourse (Luke 17:31; cf. 21:20–22), here the focus is on the time just before His return. At that time, as in the time of Lot, Jesus's followers must forget their possessions and flee for their lives (cf. Gen. 19:17). "Remember Lot's wife" (Luke 17:32) is a succinct warning not to love earthly things or even close family members more than Jesus (see Gen. 19:24–26). Everyone who loses his life by living for heaven, rather than for this world, will preserve it (v. 33; cf. Luke 9:24). These two different destinies chosen are vividly illustrated by only one of two people being taken to heaven when Jesus comes (17:34–35; Matt. 24:31; John 14:3). The picture of two people in one bed uses a masculine form for both in order to leave indefinite whether the man or his wife are left behind (cf. Matt. 10:36) as food for the aetoi—rendered as "eagles" or "vultures" (see Rev. 19:17–18). This image, along with women grinding together (Luke 17:35), illustrates that everyone is responsible for their own salvation. The context indicates that this "rapture" or being "caught up" to be with the Lord at His coming (1 Thess. 4:16–17) is not secret but visible to all (Luke 17:24).

18:1–8. Parable of the Unjust Judge. With special reference to the end time, Jesus tells a parable to encourage His followers not to become worn out by discouragement but to persist in prayer. The judge is called unjust or unrighteous (v. 6) because he did not fear God or care whether people regarded him as a fair judge (v. 4). In short, he ignored the Scriptures about what constituted righteous judgment (Ex. 23:6–8; Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:16–17; 16:18–20)—including the responsibility to defend the just cause of the widow and the fatherless (Deut. 24:17; 27:19). The unjust judge ultimately decided to vindicate the cause of the widow, not out of a sense of duty or compassion for her plight but in order to avoid the hypōpiazō—the "strike," "attack," or "torment"—of the widow (Luke 18:5). Jesus then emphasizes how different God is—first by calling attention to the judge's character as revealed by his verbalized thoughts and second by using the form of the question in Greek that expects a strong, affirmative answer regarding God's response to those who cry out day and night: God will vindicate His chosen people (cf. John 18:11).

While the last phrase of v. 7 is often translated as a question—Will God put off or delay His response to His people?—with v. 8 providing the answer, the theme of delay that appears in Luke 17:22 and 18:1 suggests that God's bearing long with His people is a better translation. God allows time for the true intents of people's hearts to be revealed: on the one hand, a patient looking for and hastening that day by God's faithful people (Heb. 10:35–39; 2 Pet. 3:12) and, on the other hand, an unfaithful impatience by the wicked servant who considers that the Lord is delaying His coming (Luke 12:45). The uncertainty is heightened by Jesus's question as to whether when He comes He will find faith on the earth (18:8). A strikingly similar note of uncertainty is struck in the letter to Laodicea (Rev. 3:20). This question seems to be reassuringly answered. There will be those who overcome (Rev. 3:21; 14:12).

18:9–14. Parable of the Pharisee and the Tax Collector. The qualities of those who will enter the kingdom of God emerges as a unifying theme of Luke 18:9–30. The parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector is addressed to people who trusted in themselves and were certain of their own righteousness and accordingly despised and looked down on everyone else (v. 9). It contrasts two pray-ers and their prayers: the Pharisee who stood and prayed by himself, whose focus was on his own works, and the tax collector who simply confessed his need and pled for mercy. The Pharisee's prayer was of thanksgiving, not for what God had done but for himself and his works

His "righteousness" led him to view himself as morally superior to others. His list of villains culminates with this tax collector (v. 11; see commentary on Luke 15:1–32), who becomes a mere prop to highlight the Pharisee's outward righteousness: fasting twice a week, which later traditions identify as Mondays and Thursdays; and tithing (see 11:42), instituted by God to remind us that everything we have comes from and really belongs to Him (cf. 1 Chr. 29:14), but which also becomes a point of self-satisfying pride.

The tax collector, on the other hand, reveals humility (he stood far away, not looking up) and exhibits true repentance for his sin (beating his breast). His prayer is short (six words in Greek compared to the Pharisee's twenty-nine); his request simple (a plea for mercy); his confession clear (he is a sinner). It is a plea for propitiation (hilaskomai; cf. Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17) and forgiveness. Jesus affirms that this man left justified, having received God's gift of righteousness (cf. Is. 54:17); the Pharisee left the same as he came, empty. Both outcomes anticipate the final judgment, when one will be humbled and the other will be exalted.

18:15–17. Receiving the Kingdom As a Little Child. Even brephē—"infants" or "babies"—were brought to Jesus by their mothers so He could place His hands on them in blessing. Knowing how disruptive very small children could be, the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus, looking at the children, saw in these powerless little people (unlike the proud Pharisee) prospective citizens for the kingdom of God. The later wording (paidion; v. 16) suggests that children of various ages were brought or encouraged by Jesus to come (cf. John 6:37). Their implicit trust and total dependence vividly illustrate how to receive the kingdom. In fact, through the faith of praying parents, the Holy Spirit may mold children (cf. 1 Cor. 7:14).

18:18–30. Leaving All for the Sake of the Kingdom. From powerless children blessed by Jesus, the focus shifts to a rich and powerful ruler who called Him not just "Teacher," a sign of respect equivalent to "Rabbi," but "Good Teacher." His earnest question reflects the Pharisaic conviction that doing good is the way to inherit eternal life. Jesus immediately pointed the man to the only source of goodness—God alone—and to the only definition of goodness—God's law (vv. 19–20; cf. James 4:17). Nearly the whole second table of the Decalogue is recited (though not in order), which the man claims to have kept (Luke 18:21). The Greek form of this verb suggests he viewed the law as a list that could be checked off when completed (contrast use of the present tense form in Luke 11:28; Acts 16:4; 21:24; Rom. 2:28; cf. Phil. 3:5–7). Jesus did not challenge this claim directly, but He indicated that one thing was still lacking and commanded the man to sell all of his possessions and distribute the proceeds to the poor, promising that he would then have treasure in heaven (Luke 18:22). He concluded with the same invitation given to the Twelve, asking that he come and follow Him (v. 22; cf. Luke 5:27 // Mark 1:17). It is the call to faith, to rely on Jesus rather than on his wealth for his future. The ruler's heart stands revealed (cf. Luke 2:35; 12:34). Not mentioned earlier is the tenth commandment, "you shall not covet." Jesus's call brought to his awareness the depth of the law's requirement, just as it did to Paul (Rom. 7:7). Unfortunately, the man went away dejected and sorrowful (Luke 18:23; cf. Mark 10:22). His riches were his idol, and to forgo the seen for hope of the unseen seemed too much to sacrifice.

Some may think this command of Jesus was too hard and wonder whether He calls every would-be disciple to sell all. First of all, Scripture frequently warns of wealth's seductive power (Deut. 8:12–18; Matt. 6:19–24; 1 Tim. 6:7–12), which is why Jesus indicated that it is hard for the rich to enter the kingdom of God and even compares it hyperbolically to a camel passing through the eye of a needle (Luke 18:24–25; cf. 6:24). Clearly it is not impossible, though, because Jesus added that what is impossible with people is possible with God (18:27), and some rich individuals did become followers of Jesus (e.g., 8:3; 19:2; Matt. 27:57). These, however, were comparatively few (cf. Luke 1:53; 6:24).

Second, it is important to recognize that only those who followed Jesus as full-time disciples were called to sacrifice all their worldly possessions so they could be with Him and be engaged in itinerant preaching (Mark 3:14). Others who wanted to follow Jesus were directed otherwise (Luke 8:38–39; 9:59–60). Later, Zacchaeus exhibited his repentance by making restitution and a somewhat lesser sacrifice (19:8–9). The sin of Ananias and Sapphira was not in refusing to sell all but in pretending to do so and lying to God about it (Acts 5:1–11). Apart from the holy tithe that belongs to God, all are to give according to what they have decided in their hearts, "for God loves a cheerful giver" (2 Cor. 9:7). In fact, Peter reminded Jesus at this point in the narrative that the disciples had indeed left all to follow Him

(Luke 18:28). Jesus reassured them, and all who have sacrificed possessions or relationships for the sake of the kingdom of God (v. 29), that they will receive many times more in this time and "in the age to come eternal life" (v. 30). Keeping in mind the hope of immortality complete with homes and thrones (John 14:1–3; Matt. 19:28) renders any this-worldly or ironic interpretation of this promise unlikely and unnecessary.

18:31–34. Detailed Passion Prediction. Following the glorious promises of the preceding verses, this stark, private portrayal to the Twelve failed to register. Its meaning was also hidden from them (v. 34; cf. 9:45) because Jews expected the Messiah to come as a triumphant king (e.g., Is. 11:1–4; Ps. 89:19–29), deliver Israel from Rome's power, and reestablish Davidic rule. Although this is often referred to as Jesus's third passion prediction based on the outline of events in Mark (Mark 8:31–33; 9:30–32; 10:32–34), in Luke it is actually the seventh and most detailed one (cf. Luke 5:35; 9:22, 43–45; 12:50; 13:32–33; 17:25). Jesus's prediction made it clear that the events that would take place in Jerusalem would be a fulfillment not only of His words but of what the prophets already had written about (e.g., Is. 50:4–9; 53:3–5), an important theme in Luke (Luke: Introduction). Jesus mentioned for the first time being delivered to the Gentiles (Luke 18:32)—the same verb that is used of Judas's betrayal of Jesus to the Jewish authorities (e.g., 22:4, 6). Once Jesus was in their hands, they would treat Him shamefully, flog or scourge Him, and kill Him, but He would rise again. Reference to His resurrection on the third day also emphasizes it as a fulfillment of prophecy (cf. 9:22).

18:35–43. A Blind Man Receives His Sight. Nearing Jericho on the way to Jerusalem suggests that this incident occurred before Jesus entered the city, whereas Matthew and Mark suggest that it happened on leaving it (Matt. 20:29; Mark 10:46). This slight change enabled Luke to include the story of Zacchaeus, which takes place in Jericho (Luke 19:1), to connect it to the parable that follows and to provide a seamless transition for narrating the triumphal entry (19:27). While Matthew mentions there were two blind men healed (Matt. 20:30), Luke (with Mark) focuses on the one named Bartimaeus (Mark 10:46). He knew that Jesus of Nazareth was able to heal him, and he even called Him Son of David (Luke 18:37–38), the only such address in Luke (cf. 20:41). It is a messianic title based on the promise made to David (2 Sam. 7:12–16) and repeated by the prophets (e.g., Is. 9:6–7; Jer. 23:5–6; 33:15–16; Ezek. 37:24–25). Significantly, giving sight to the blind is listed among the works of the Messiah (Luke 4:18; 7:21–22; cf. Is. 35:5; 42:7), and, apart from healing the man with the severed ear (Luke 22:50–51), it is the last healing miracle recorded by Luke.

Both the man's cry and the crowd silencing him are described in very strong terms. People may have thought his blindness was divine punishment for some particular sin (cf. John 9:2). Being a beggar was a shameful occupation (Luke 16:3), and Bartimaeus was determined to be healed. The attempt to silence him led him only to shout and cry out all the more. Jesus's question (cf. John 5:6) lead the man to verbalize his faith by calling Jesus "Lord" (Luke 18:41). It also opened the way for immediate healing (cf. Luke 7:50; 8:48; 17:19). Juxtaposed with this receiving of sight is the mention, only in Luke, of Jesus's approaching death being "hidden" from the disciples (18:34), which underscores their need for a spiritual eye-opening. But this would occur only after His resurrection, when Jesus "opened" the Scriptures to them (24:31–32, 45).

19:1–10. Jesus Comes to Zacchaeus's House. As Jesus passed through Jericho on the final leg of His journey to Jerusalem, a rich man named Zacchaeus was determined to see Him. As a chief tax collector (v. 2), he probably had jurisdiction over a wide area with subordinates working under him. Collecting taxes for Rome could be quite lucrative anywhere, but Jericho was particularly attractive: being situated in a highly fertile area made it among the wealthiest cities of Israel; one of Herod's palaces was nearby; bordering Perea also meant that customs duties were collected along the trade route to and from Jerusalem. Thus Zacchaeus was a wealthy person. However, unlike the preceding rich man stories in Luke (12:16–21; 16:19–24; 18:18–27), this final one is positive. Zacchaeus, impressed with John the Baptist's instructions (3:12–13), was convicted of his wrong and was determined to see Jesus and begin making restitution for the wrong. Because he was short (probably less than five feet [1.5 m] tall) and could not see over the crowd (Luke 19:3), nor was anyone inclined to make room for someone like him, he abandoned decorum and climbed into a sycamore or fig tree ahead of the procession in order to see Jesus (v. 4). The Palestinian sycamore is easy to climb and often found by the roadside.

Jesus commanded Zacchaeus to hurry down from the tree because He had to ("must") stay at his house (v. 5). The word translated "must" (dei) indicates that Jesus's visit was a divine necessity in fulfillment of His messianic mission (see commentary on Luke 2:41–52). Zacchaeus instantly obeyed the command and received Jesus with joy (19:6). By contrast, all the people muttered complaints about this. The Greek word used here (diagongyzō) means to "grumble" or "murmur" and is used of those opposing Jesus's ministry (Luke 5:30; 15:2; John 6:41, 43, 61). Due to his occupation, many saw Zacchaeus as a sinner (Luke 19:7) and certainly not someone a respectable teacher would eat with (see 5:30). So for Jesus to stay overnight as a guest in his house (19:5, 7) was shocking indeed.

Zacchaeus publicly announced his changed course, reflecting repentance and deep gratitude to Jesus for accepting him (v. 8). Zacchaeus gave fully half of his net worth as charity, which was more than double the amount that even the most pious Jew would give; for restitution, the law required repayment with an additional 20 percent (Lev. 6:1–5; Num. 5:7) and four or five times for stealing an animal (Ex. 22:1; 2 Sam. 12:6). Zacchaeus choose the more severe penalty, which shows his genuine change as a result of meeting Jesus. Onlookers needed reminding that he was a son of Abraham (Luke 19:9); from this point he was so based on faith (Gal. 3:7). Jesus's mission to seek and to save the lost (Luke 19:10; cf. Ezek. 34:1–12) is illustrated frequently in His reaching out to sinners and healing the helpless and hopelessly ill.

19:11–27. Parable of the Minas. Now that Jesus was near Jerusalem and had proclaimed the arrival of "salvation" (19:9), expectations began to soar that the kingdom of God would be ushered in parachrēma—"immediately" or "at once" (v. 11). In the minds of many Jews these were equivalent ideas. While the kingdom was present already in some sense, Jesus had also indicated that it was not visible (see 17:21). In order to distinguish God's reign from His own imminent arrival to Jerusalem, Jesus told a parable similar to the parable of the talents but with too many differences for them to have arisen from a single story. Some of these differences include ten servants instead of three; everyone starting with the same amount rather than each servant being given talents according to his ability (Matt. 25:15); the amount given being far less, one mina, worth just one sixtieth of a talent—about a hundred days' wages. Even more significant differences will be noted shortly. It should also be kept in mind that, as with many Gospel parables, some elements appear deliberately ambiguous. For example, the servants address their master as "Lord" (kyrios). This may be taken simply as a title of respect ("master") but may also be designed to reinforce the disciples' faith in Jesus as Lord and coming King while avoiding any overt claim to kingship that would enable His enemies to accuse Him of treason against Rome.

Unlike the parable of the talents, here a nobleman goes to be inaugurated as king and afterward return (Luke 19:12), showing that the kingdom would not be established as soon as many were hoping (cf. v. 11). The people hate the nobleman and even send a delegation to announce their rejection of his authority over them (v. 14). Thus, Jesus seeks to prepare His disciples for the rejection that He will soon face. But the nobleman returns as king with full authority.

According to Roman law, appropriate documentation was required to act legally on behalf of another; therefore each servant must have been deemed trustworthy (cf. 1 Cor. 4:2), and the first two who were examined proved to be and were given authority over ten and five cities respectively, in accordance with the number of minas they had earned (Luke 19:17, 19). While this and other passages (e.g., Matt. 19:28; 2 Cor. 5:10) suggest differing rewards in God's kingdom, we should avoid speculating about what has not been revealed. Interestingly, the good servants (Luke 19:17) recognized that their gain was possible only because of what their master had initially given them (cf. 1 Chr. 29:14).

From what Jesus has already said about the dangers of wealth, He was not encouraging His followers to amass riches by making great investments. Multiplication of the mina illustrates how ministering to people's needs, winning their confidence, and inviting them to follow Jesus results in the multiplication of Christ's followers. Investing one's time and energy in the bank of heaven will prove to be the only lasting investment (Luke 12:33–34), secure from the end-time financial ruin that strikes all who have chosen to advance their own "kingdoms" rather than God's kingdom (James 5:1–6; Rev. 18:11–13).

Although we do not hear reports from all ten servants, the pattern of reward is clear. One servant appears who not only failed to use his master's mina profitably but kept it hidden in a cloth (Luke 19:20; cf. Matt. 25:25). This was recognized as a highly irresponsible and insecure place to keep money. That this judgment is just is shown by the fact that, since he knew what his master expected, at a minimum he should have deposited the mina safely in the bank so that it could be returned with interest (Luke 19:23).

The servant's accusation that his master collected what he did not deposit, while patently false, overlooks the fact that money well invested creates employment. Likewise, those standing nearby apparently did not consider the master fair in commanding them to take the mina away from the wicked servant and give it to the one with ten minas (vv. 24–25). But it makes good financial sense to entrust more to the one who used means the most wisely. The parable concludes with the judgment of two groups (cf. John 5:24, 28–29): those who used their lives profitably for God's kingdom and will be given more (i.e., eternal life), and those who refused the master's service or reign and will receive death—that is, even what they had was taken away (Luke 19:26–27).

JESUS'S JERUSALEM MINISTRY

Expectations had been building as Jesus traveled far and wide through the countryside equipping disciples, sending out the seventy, and teaching the people. In Jerusalem He confronted human authority (19:28—20:19), He was questioned by the authorities (20:20–38), and He finally challenged the people (20:39—21:38).

19:28–40. Royal Approach to Jerusalem. Jesus neared Bethphage and Bethany (v. 29)—two villages situated about two miles (3 km) east of Jerusalem. While Matthew and Mark also describe Jesus entering the city and the temple, Luke focuses on reactions to Jesus during His approach to Jerusalem as King. It seems that Jesus deliberately set out to fulfill prophecy in arranging to ride into Jerusalem on a colt and to announce His role as the messianic King coming in humility to bring salvation and peace (Zech. 9:9–10; cf. Matt. 21:4, 5). The specific directions He gave to two of His disciples constitutes a prophecy of how and where to find the colt as well as what would be said to them and how to respond. Luke reminds us of the disciples' apostolic role by describing the two as "sent" by Jesus. Like Mark, he also added that they found it just as He had described (Luke 19:32). Both Matthew (Matt. 21:7) and John (John 12:14) make clear, in accordance with the OT prophecy, that it was a donkey's (not a horse's) colt, the kind of animal that had been ridden by Israel's kings.

The additional detail that the colt had never been ridden (also in Mark) suggests its fitness for this holy purpose (cf. Num. 19:2; 1 Sam. 6:7) as well as why in Matthew 21:7 it had not been separated from its mother. Although the owners questioned the disciples' actions (Luke 19:33), showing that this was not prearranged, the disciples responded as instructed—that the Lord needed it (vv. 31, 34).

The disciples prepared a kind of saddle for Jesus by throwing their own clothing over the back of the colt and then, fittingly for a king, they set Him on it (Luke 19:35; cf. Matt. 21:7). The crowds caught the spirit and spread their clothing on the road as a recognition of the approaching King and as an expression of homage (Luke 19:36; cf. 2 Kin. 9:13). These events took place at the crest of the mountain. Then all the disciples began to rejoice and praise God. As the procession progressed, the crowd became larger and larger. Recounted were the great miraculous acts Jesus had done (Luke 19:37). Such acclamation and praise dispelled the disciples' fears that had been raised by Jesus's sayings about His rejection and death. The multitude recited Psalm 118:26 (Luke 19:38), which was commonly sung at major Jewish festivals and may have celebrated the return of the king to Jerusalem and his entrance to the temple for worship. Unlike Matthew and Mark, both Luke and John (John 12:13) include the acclamation of Jesus as King in connection with this psalm, which Jesus had quoted before in connection with His future role as Messiah (Luke 13:35). So troubling was this widespread acclamation to some of the Pharisees (cf. John 12:19) that they pressed through the crowd and called on Jesus to rebuke His disciples (Luke 19:39). Perhaps they feared that such a demonstration would attract the ire of Rome and result in further repression. But prophecy must be fulfilled (cf. 24:44), even if the stones must speak (19:40; cf. Hab. 2:11).

19:41–44. Jesus Weeps over Jerusalem. Jesus wept over the city that would soon reject Him (v. 41; cf. 2 Sam. 15:30). Prophets sometimes used symbolic actions and vivid representations to dramatically portray Israel's rebellion against God and the impending doom of the city (e.g., Jer. 19:10–13; Ezek. 4:1–3). Similarly, Jesus's weeping and mournful lament were prophetic.

Addressing the city as a person (with "you" or "your" twelve times in two verses), Jesus gave two reasons for His sadness. First, the people of Jerusalem did not know what they needed to enjoy peace, despite the fact that its name means "city of peace" or "foundation of peace." The "peace in heaven" (Luke 19:38) that has come with the advent of the Messiah (2:14) can be realized only through accepting Him. Instead, Jerusalem rejected the light and blindness has come (cf. 8:10). The Messiah was hidden from them (19:42). Therefore, Jesus prophesied that days would come when enemies would lay siege to the city (cf. Is. 39:6; Jer. 7:32–34), building barricades all around it, and crush it to the ground, along with its children (referring to its inhabitants; cf. Is. 54:3). So complete will be the destruction that not one stone would be left on another (Luke 19:44). A little later, in almost the same words, Jesus would refer to the destruction of the temple (21:6).

The second reason for Jesus's sadness was that Jerusalem did not recognize the time of God's coming to them in mercy or judgment. This Greek word episkopē, and its verbal form episkeptomai, can refer to God's activity both positively and negatively (e.g., Luke 1:68, 78; Gen. 50:24–25; Ex. 3:16; 32:34; 1 Sam. 2:21; Ps. 58:6; Is. 10:3, LXX). Here it could mean either the fact that Jerusalem had not recognized God's gracious visitation of mercy in Christ (cf. Luke 1:68, 78) or that they did not recognize God's impending judgment because of their rejection of Him. The context suggests that the idea is of God coming to His people in judgment. The prophets had portrayed glorious possibilities for Jerusalem, but these hopes would be dashed with the rejection of the Messiah and the razing of the city and temple.

19:45–48. Jesus Cleanses the Temple. The symbolic weeping is followed immediately in Luke by another symbolic action. Jesus went to the temple (cf. Mal. 3:1) and proceeded to drive out the buyers and sellers (Luke 19:45; cf. Mark 11:15). The same word is used for driving out demons (e.g., Luke 9:40, 49; 11:14–15; 13:32). Animals certified to be without blemish and birds, along with other goods for sacrifice (e.g., wine, oil, flour), were made available for convenient purchase, especially for Jewish pilgrims coming from long distances. The temple complex had several well-defined areas, the largest of which was the court of the Gentiles, where all this commerce was taking place. It was also the place where non-Jews could assemble for worship. Luke's account is the most concise, focusing on the purpose of the temple as a place for prayer and teaching (19:46–47). Jesus's act accomplished two purposes: it restored the temple to its original purpose, as a house of prayer (v. 46; Is. 56:7; cf. Jer. 7:11), and it demonstrated His authority over the temple, which would soon be questioned. Despite the religious leaders conspiring to put Him to death (cf. Luke 9:22; 20:1), they could not prevent Jesus from teaching daily in the temple because all the people were captivated by what they heard (19:48)—literally "were hanging on to what they were hearing from Him."

20:1–8. Jesus's Authority Questioned. According to Mark, Jesus's time in the temple spans three days (Mark 11:11—14:1). The question of authority arose on one of those days while Jesus was teaching—probably in the court of the Gentiles, which He had just restored as a place for prayer. He preached the gospel, the good news (cf. Is. 40:9; 52:7; 61:1; Heb. 4:2), to both Jews and Gentiles. The chief priests, scribes (or teachers of the law), and elders (v. 1) were the dominant groups of the Sanhedrin and wielded considerable religious authority. Clearly disturbed by His cleansing of the temple, which was an implied rebuke and an encroachment on their authority (Luke 19:47), they began to assail Jesus with questions, just as a similar group had done with John the Baptist (cf. John 1:19–27). Jesus did not simply comply with their command to answer but commanded them to answer Him first with regard to the baptism of John, that is, whether John's authority to baptize was from heaven (using a circumlocution for God) or from men (of human origin; Luke 20:4).

Since John had testified that Jesus was the Messiah (John 1:29–34), by correctly answering this question they would also answer their own question. The dilemma it posed them is clear from the discussion that ensued among themselves (Luke 20:5–6). Unfortunately, they acted as self-important and craven leaders often do—to preserve their own position and authority at all costs, rather than to understand the truth and then do what is right. Thus, they refused to acknowledge that John's authority was from heaven because the anticipated reply asking why they did not believe would establish the divine authority of Jesus and diminish theirs. Worse, if they asserted that John's authority was merely human, they would lose not just their authority but possibly their lives because the people believed that John was a prophet (Luke 20:6) and would not tolerate leaders who claimed to represent God but rejected His prophet. They chose what appeared to be the safer course (but which eventually issued in Israel's destruction) by claiming ignorance—that they did not know where John's authority came from. (v. 7). Their feckless reply underscored Jesus's authority. He would not answer or speak the truth to those who had just refused to accept it.

20:9–19. Parable of the Wicked Vinedressers. Jesus told a parable that answered the question posed by the representatives of the Sanhedrin. Using the image of Israel as the vineyard of the Lord (see Is. 5:1–7), Jesus sketched Israel's history—not its past history but its future history. Just as Moses, shortly before his death, gave Israel a preview of their future (Deut. 32:1–43), so Jesus did the same.

Planting a vineyard represented an enormous investment possible only for a very wealthy person. With such a large investment, it was common to lease it out to geōrgois—tenant farmers, (sometimes translated as "vinedressers" or "husbandmen"). They would take good care of the vineyard in order to meet the terms of the contract and make the agreed payment to the owner at harvest time. The landowner in the parable, like the nobleman in the previous parable (cf. Luke 19:12), journeyed to a far country. Here, however, the owner would be gone for a long time (Luke 20:9; cf. 8:27; 23:8). It was not unusual for wealthy landowners to simply send a servant to collect the fruit of the vineyard for them (20:10). What was unusual was the way the farmers treated the servants and ultimately the son.

While some of the details of this parable in Matthew and Mark vary, its essential features are the same. In Mark, as in Luke, Jesus Himself answers the question and the owner's response takes the form of three successive actions: the owner will come, he will put the treacherous farmers to death, and he will give the vineyard to others. But only in Luke is there a protest by the audience (the laos, i.e., the common people), saying, mē genoito—"Certainly not!" or "God forbid!" (v. 16; an expression occurring elsewhere only in Paul, e.g., Rom. 3:4, 6, 31; 1 Cor. 6:15). They understood immediately its import: God had sent servant after servant, prophet after prophet, to Israel, and they had been mistreated, physically abused, and sometimes killed by its leaders. Now that He had sent His Son (cf. Luke 1:32, 35; 3:22; 10:22), they would cast Him out and kill Him (alluding to Jesus's death outside Jerusalem; John 19:17; Heb. 13:12–13). The inheritance that the "farmers" (leaders) desired was control of the "vineyard" (Israel), but the parable indicates that they would be destroyed and others would take their place.

In answer to the people's objection, Jesus looked intently at them and quoted Psalm 118:22, equating the "son" (Heb., ben) of the parable with the "stone" (Heb., 'eben) rejected by the builders (Luke 20:17). The cornerstone (lit. "head of the corner") was not a capstone but the most important of the four corners of the foundation as it was the largest and thus provided the most support for the entire structure. One's response to Jesus as this "living Stone" (cf. 1 Pet. 2:4–10) is decisive in the judgment: "falling" on Him, coming to Him with a "broken" heart (cf. Ps. 51:17), and relying on Him make the difference between final salvation rather than final destruction (Luke 20:18). The leaders realized that the parable was directed against them (v. 19), but in view of the people's reaction, they first had to undermine Him. In the process, they hoped to find a basis for legal accusations against Him.

20:20–26. Jesus on Paying Taxes to Caesar. The authorities in Jerusalem (cf. v. 19) watched Jesus closely, sending spies to catch Him making unguarded statements (cf. Is. 29:21) in order to have Him handed over to Pilate, the Roman governor (Luke 20:20). They pretended to be faithful Jews asking sincere questions, flattering Him as One who speaks and teaches the truth and does not show personal favoritism (vv. 20–21). While what they said about Jesus was true, flattery is dangerous and frequently condemned in the Bible (e.g., Ps. 12:2–3; Prov. 26:28; 29:5). The question about paying taxes to Caesar concerns whether it is acceptable for Israelites, whose first loyalty is to God, to pay the required poll (census) tax (Luke 20:22). If Jesus had said it was not lawful, then they would have reported His statements to the authorities as seditious; but if He said it was lawful, then they could accuse Him of opposing the law of God.

Jesus recognized their duplicitousness immediately. His first question, although omitted from some important manuscripts, is apropos (v. 23; cf. Mark 12:15). Recognizing their hidden intent, He proceeded to test them by asking for a denarius—a small silver coin worth about a day's wage (cf. Matt. 20:2). On it was the image of Tiberius (cf. Luke 3:1) and the inscription (in Latin): "Tiberius Caesar, Augustus, son of the deified Augustus." Both the image and the inscription, while offensive to Jewish sensibilities, were Caesar's. Since the coin bears Caesar's name, he was its owner. Therefore no hesitancy should have existed in returning to Caesar what belonged to him. Jesus's statement, however, went further by referring to what belongs to the things that were Caesar's, meaning any civic obligations citizens would owe. Consistently, Scripture calls on believers to honor the authorities whom God has established (Eccl. 8:2; Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Pet. 2:13–17) so long as it does not conflict with their allegiance to God (cf. Acts 5:29). Jesus's enemies were amazed at his answer, and they were silenced.

20:27–38. Jesus on the Resurrection. The Sadducees, mentioned only here in Luke, were members of a priestly aristocracy who were in charge of the temple, and their leader served as the high priest. Having charge of the temple and being largely in control of the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:17), they were dominated by the family of Annas (Luke 3:2; cf. John 18:13) and allied with the rich and powerful to maintain their comfortable status quo. They worked closely with the Romans, who gave them a measure of political autonomy. Excavations near the Temple Mount are suggestive of their lavish homes, a picture that fits well the description of priestly homes in the Gospels (Mark 14:53–54; John 18:15–18). The Sadducees apparently considered only the books of Moses as fully authoritative. They believed the soul perished with the body at death, that there was no resurrection (Luke 20:27), and that there were no such thing as spirits or angels (Acts 23:8). Consequently, they held that all rewards and punishments are meted out in this life.

Some representatives of this group presented Jesus with a hypothetical situation of seven brothers, the first of whom married and died without children. According to the Levirate law (Deut. 25:5), the man's brother should have married his widow to preserve the deceased's name and lineage. In the case presented to Jesus, each of the brothers successively took her as wife and died childless. Since all seven brothers had performed their duty according to the law of Moses, presumably they would all come up in the resurrection of life (cf. John 5:29), but whose wife was she to be then (Luke 20:33)? Polyandry (having more than one husband) was unknown in Jewish and Roman circles, and so the circumstance presented a seemingly impossible dilemma in the life to come. In reply, Jesus contrasted "this age" (v. 34), in which people marry, with the coming age (v. 35). "The resurrection from the dead" marks entrance to a life in which people cannot die (v. 36), already referred to several times as "eternal life" (Luke 10:25; 18:18, 30). Therefore, marriage and childbearing are not needed to preserve humanity. It would appear that in the life to come, marriage as we know it will be superseded by something far better. That life will also be different from what exists in this present world in that the resurrected will be like (Mark 12:25) and even equal to the angels; they are God's children—members of His family. We cannot speculate beyond what God has revealed about the life to come (Deut. 29:29).

On the resurrection, Jesus quoted not only from the books of Scripture that were the most authoritative for the Sadducees but from the story of the burning bush (Luke 20:37). This well-known account deals with (among other things) the revelation of God's name. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ex. 3:6) would not describe Himself in terms of the dead but of the living (Luke 20:38) because, as the Creator, He is the source of all life. Luke includes Jesus's words that in one sense all are living from God's perspective. Although the patriarchs are not now living, their resurrection is as certain to God as if they were. Even Abraham himself could by faith look forward to entering the city built and designed by God (Heb. 11:10).

20:39–44. Jesus and Popular Messianic Conceptions. Such thoughtful answers led some of the scribes to recognize that Jesus had answered accurately. Though obviously unconvinced, they dared not question Him anymore (v. 40). Scribes were experts in the law (see commentary on Luke 5:17–26). Most of them were probably Pharisees, but not all (cf. 5:30; Acts 23:9); some no doubt belonged to other sects, such as the Sadducees and the Essenes. Next Jesus directed a question to them regarding the widespread assumption that the Christ—that is, the Messiah—would be the son of David. While not denying lineage from David (Luke 1:27, 32, 69; 2:4; 18:38–39), the point seems to be that, according to David himself, the Christ would be "greater than" a mere son of his (i.e., descendant). This language suggests that David would function as a type of the Messiah. The messianic psalms prophetically foreshadow the sufferings of Jesus and, as here, His exaltation as Lord, which would take place at His ascension to heaven (1 Pet. 3:21–22) and His inauguration in the heavenly sanctuary as our High Priest at God's right hand (Acts 7:56; Heb. 8:1, 2; Rev. 1:12–13). The NT writers' application of such passages to Jesus (e.g., John 19:23–24, 36–37; Acts 2:27–32) was based in this messianic interpretation of the OT by Jesus (cf. Luke 4:21; 24:44; John 13:18).

20:45–47. Jesus Warns People to Beware of the Scribes. Jesus warned His disciples not to be like the scribes, who sought to distinguish themselves above others (v. 46). Only priests were required to wear specific garments (Ex. 28); the scribes' long robes amounted to an expensive and ostentatious attempt to exhibit their elite status in Israel. The love of respectful greetings in the marketplaces and the best seats of prominence (located in the front near the leading elders) in the synagogues was a criticism earlier leveled against the Pharisees (Luke 11:43). Jesus's followers are to resist such temptations to prestige and power. Feasts and banquets were other opportunities to be publicly recognized as among the elite. All such status symbols engender pride. Spoken to the listening crowd (20:45), the warning was also intended to warn people of the scribes' hypocrisy. Their long prayers were selfishly motivated to garner more respect, whereas Jesus's disciples were to encourage not adulation (cf. John 2:23–25) but humility, giving glory to God rather than taking it to themselves. The widows (Luke 20:47) were one of the most vulnerable groups in Israel (cf. Deut. 24:17). Perhaps the scribes taught them to sell their houses in order to pay tithe on the increase in value or hinted that it was meritorious to give large donations to them. As experts in the law, the scribes would be more severely condemned for wrongdoing (cf. John 9:41; James 3:1).

21:1–4. Jesus Reverses the Evaluation of Offerings. Having just condemned the scribes for financially oppressing widows, Jesus noted a difference between the gifts to the temple brought by the rich and the two small coins of a poor widow (vv. 1–2). Heavy silver or gold coins dropped into trumpet-shaped money chests (cf. Matt. 6:2) would sound impressive. The widow's two small copper coins might hardly be heard but represented the greater gift. It cost her more than those who gave out of their abundance. The size of their offering was outweighed by the sacrificial love of God that prompted the widow's gift.

21:5–28. Jesus Forecasts Israel's Future. The instruction given about Israel's future was directed to some of the disciples (v. 5; cf. 20:45), whom Mark 13:3 identifies as Peter, James, John, and Andrew. The beautiful stones of the temple built by Herod the Great and the lavish donated gifts for its adornment (21:5) were impressive and beautiful. Yet not one stone of this temple would be left on another (v. 6).

Jesus's prediction of the temple's destruction elicited two further questions about when these things would occur and what sign would accompany them (v. 7). Since these two questions in Luke (cf. Matt. 24:3; Mark 13:4) ask about the events and signs leading up to the destruction of the temple, the passage focuses on Israel's immediate future (Luke 21:8–24), with only a very brief description of the events preceding the coming of the Son of Man (vv. 25–28). Likewise, the parable of the fig tree (vv. 29–33) concerns the certainty of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (cf. vv. 20–24). The closing admonition is applicable to everyone at all times—being on watch so that the coming of the Son of Man does not take anyone by surprise (vv. 34–36).

First the disciples were warned against being deceived (v. 8) by those who purported to be Jesus, repeated His words "I am" (see John 4:26; 8:58; cf. Ex. 3:14), and claimed that the predicted time had almost arrived (Luke 21:8). In fact, messianic pretenders appeared both before and after the destruction of Jerusalem. In addition, believers were not to be alarmed when they heard of wars and disturbances (v. 9). Although the prophets depicted both natural disasters and judgments on nations just before the end (see, e.g., Jer. 4:20, 23–26; Joel 3:9–14), Jesus indicated that these would be ongoing and that the end would not take place right away. In addition to wars between nations and kingdoms, great earthquakes, famines, and pestilences would occur, as would other terrifying occurrences and even great signs from heaven.

Before all these things that would lead up to the destruction of Jerusalem, the disciples would be persecuted and given over to the synagogues and put in prison, betrayed by close relatives and friends, and some would even be put to death (Luke 21:12, 16). The same language is used of Jesus, who would be betrayed by Judas into the hands of the Jewish leaders (22:4, 6, 21–22). Nevertheless, it would be an opportunity for the disciples to give a testimony (21:13). They were not to worry and meditate beforehand about what to say. Although previously it was promised that the Holy Spirit would teach them what to say (12:12), Jesus Himself (the "I" is emphatic in 21:15) would give them wise words. This promise began to be fulfilled fairly soon for some of the apostles (see, e.g., Acts 4:5–22; 24:10–26; 26). One might wonder how they could be martyred (Luke 21:16) and yet not a hair of their head be destroyed (v. 18). The apparent inconsistency points to the importance of hypomonē—"patience" or "perseverance"—referring to quietly enduring persecution, keeping our psychas—"souls" or "lives" (i.e., our whole being)—in holiness and honor (1 Thess. 4:4) in anticipation of an eternal possession (Heb. 11:25–26).

The prediction of Jerusalem surrounded by armies (Luke 21:20) was fulfilled in the aborted siege of A.D. 66 by Cestius Gallus, which gave opportunity for Christians, not only in Jerusalem but throughout Judea, to flee to the mountains. They fled not to the nearby hills but to Pella, in the more distant mountains of Transjordan. The city's desolation meant its utter destruction (cf. Jesus's allusion to Dan. 9:26 in Mark 13:14). This occurred when Titus returned with Roman troops during the Passover of A.D. 70, besieged the city, progressively broke through its fortifications, and destroyed it. The days of vengeance, the time of punishment (Luke 21:22), refers to God's wrath on Israel ("this people"; v. 23) for their rejection of the Messiah (cf. Zech. 13:7—14:2), who would be killed (Dan. 9:26). As with the city's first destruction by Babylon, there would be another dispersion into all nations (Luke 21:24).

Despite the clear application of these verses to what befell Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the second reference to the city in Luke 21:24 looks beyond this event. Both Daniel and Jesus blended descriptions of Jerusalem's destruction with more distant events that were to be revealed as His people would need the instruction (cf. Dan. 12:9–10). Those who fell by the sword and were taken captive may be compared with the remnant of Israel who would "instruct many" but must endure sword, fire, captivity, and plundering (Dan. 11:33). Thus "Jerusalem" being trampled by Gentiles (Luke 21:24) refers to the persecution of Christians through the ages (called "great tribulation" or "great distress" in Matt. 24:21). This trampling of God's people (cf. Dan. 8:10) would continue a total of forty-two prophetic months or 1,260 years (Rev. 11:2; 13:5–7; cf. see Dan. 7:25) from A.D. 538 to 1798.

Around the close of this period, signs in the sun, moon, and stars would appear. Whenever these heavenly signs are mentioned in the NT, the sun-moon-stars sequence is the same (Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:12–13). This fact suggests a very specific fulfillment, namely, the "Dark Day" of May 19, 1780, when candles were needed at noon and a smoky haze reddened the moon; and the Leonid meteor shower of November 13, 1833. These events, one coming shortly before and the other shortly after the end of the 1,260-year period (see "The 1,260 Days/Years," p. 1037), remain unequalled in terms of their intensity, visibility, and religious impact. They signaled the raising up by God of an end time remnant to proclaim the three angels' messages and to bring the gospel work to a close (Matt. 24:14; Rev. 12:14–17; 14:6–12). Three further signs are listed (Luke 21:25–26): (1) perplexed and troubled nations, which may refer to the hopelessness that characterizes the world today; (2) the turbulence and "roaring" of the sea, which may refer to the increasing intensity of the destruction brought by sea-based natural disasters; and (3) people fainting from fear and foreboding, which may refer to the psychological disorientation of humanity. The shaking of celestial powers marks the Day of the Lord in the OT (e.g., Is. 13:13; 34:4) and the Second Advent in the NT (Heb. 12:26–29; Rev. 6:14–17). Here too they coincide with the Son of Man coming (Luke 21:27). When these signs begin to be fulfilled, God's people may know that their redemption is near (v. 28), a thought further developed by the ensuing parable of the fig tree and Jesus's closing admonition.

21:29–33. Parable of the Fig Tree. Jesus used the fig tree as an illustration of the certainty of the approach of divine judgment in connection with both the First Advent (Luke 14:6–9 // Matt. 21:19) and the Second Advent (Rev. 6:13). Just as its budding appearance of leaves (as with all the trees) signals the soon arrival of summer (Luke 21:30), so the signs Jesus foretold indicate the kingdom of God is near (v. 31). The immediately preceding verses (vv. 25–28) suggest that reference is to the kingdom of glory that will arrive at the Second Advent. However, there may also be a preliminary application to the destruction of Jerusalem mentioned just before that (vv. 20–24), since Jesus used this earlier event as a type of the more complete destruction that will occur at the Second Advent. The parable reminded the disciples to recognize the signal for fleeing the city. It also indicated that "this generation" (v. 32) refers to the generation in which the disciples themselves lived, who would see the destruction of Jerusalem, which seems to be a type of the destruction of the world at the end of time. The disciples mistakenly assumed that these two events would occur at the same time (Matt. 24:3). In answering the disciples' questions, Jesus went back and forth between these two events (see Matt. 24:34; Mark 13:28–29).

21:34–38. Importance of Watching. Jesus concluded this discourse with an appeal to put His teaching into practice (see Luke 6:46–49). Believers are not to allow their hearts to become hard (cf. Ex. 7:14) or weighed down by living like the world and worrying about the burdens of daily life. The Greek word often translated as "carousing" (kraipalē) refers to the loss of orientation and staggering that results from drunkenness (Luke 21:34; cf. Is. 29:9). That day when the Son of Man comes will arrive abruptly for all who do not watch (Luke 21:36) for the fulfillment of these things. The admonition to pray always echoes a similar admonition in connection with the Second Advent (18:1, 6–8). By watching and praying, believers will be enabled to escape the coming destruction and stand victorious before the Son of Man (cf. Eph. 6:13; Rev. 6:17). Luke closes this section with a summary statement about Jesus teaching in the temple during the day and spending the night on the Mount of Olives (Luke 21:37).

SUFFERINGS AND DEATH OF JESUS

Although Jesus was teaching day after day in the temple, with His betrayal by Judas, events started moving rapidly to their shocking conclusion (22:1–13). After the celebration of the Passover by Jesus and His disciples and the institution of the Lord's Supper (22:14–38), Jesus prayed all night in Gethsemane, where He was arrested (22:39–62). Then He was hurriedly tried before the Sanhedrin and condemned (22:63–71), handed over to the Romans (23:1–25), and finally crucified (23:26–56).

22:1–13. Betrayal of Jesus during Passover. Through His temple activities and teachings, Jesus threatened the authority of both the chief priests and the scribes (or teachers of the law). So as Passover approached, they were looking for a way to put Him to death (vv. 1–2; cf. John 11:45–57). That way was provided by Judas (Luke 22:3), who was Simon's son (John 12:4). Luke distinguishes this Judas from the son of James (cf. John 14:22), who was also one of the twelve apostles (cf. John 6:70), by mentioning his surname—Iscariot (see Luke 6:16). In contemplating the betrayal of Jesus, Judas opened himself up to Satan, who seized the opportunity (22:3; cf. 4:13; John 13:27). Judas consulted with the chief priests of the temple, who were seeking a legal charge against Jesus, as well as with the commanders in charge of the temple guard, who would organize the arrest. Complicating their task considerably was Jesus's popularity, so they determined to seize Him when and where the crowds were not present, at one of the usual places He retreated for prayer.

The Passover, observed on Nisan 15, was the first religious festival of the Jewish calendar. The Feast of Unleavened Bread (which began on Passover) lasted for seven days, from Nisan 15 to 21 (Num. 28:16–17; see commentary on Luke 2:41–52). Jewish pilgrims would stay through this second feast to commemorate both their deliverance from Egypt and the hasty departure with "the bread of affliction" (Deut. 16:3). Due to this close connection between the two feasts, either name could be used to refer to both. Although John mentions three and possibly four separate Passovers during Jesus's ministry (John 2:23; 6:4; 19:14; cf. 5:1), only this final one is mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels.

Passover could also refer to the paschal lamb (usually one per family) that was killed on the afternoon of Nisan 14 and eaten after sundown (i.e., on Nisan 15). According to John, Jesus died at the time of the Passover sacrifice (Nisan 14) as the true paschal Lamb (see John 18:28; 19:14; cf. 1 Cor. 5:7) so that the Passover meal was eaten before Passover (Nisan 15). Luke seems to indicate that the Passover meal was eaten by Jesus and the disciples at the regular time, which would have been after the Passover lamb had been sacrificed (for more, see "The Year of the Crucifixion," p. 1460). As with the triumphal entry (cf. Luke 19:29–35), Jesus gave detailed instructions to two disciples, in this case, Peter and John (22:8), as to where they were to prepare the meal. They were shown to a house with a large room upstairs that was already furnished for the event (vv. 10–12). Because the Passover had to be sacrificed at the temple and eaten in Jerusalem (Deut. 16:5–7) and accommodations would have been scarce, Jesus may have prearranged to use a guest room (Luke 22:11) in a private home for the supper (cf. Matt. 26:18).

22:14–23. Jesus Institutes the Lord's Supper. The upper room where the Lord's Supper took place apparently included cushions and low tables around which Jesus and the twelve disciples sat down or reclined to eat the meal (v. 14). Such a posture also facilitated Jesus's washing of the disciples' feet (John 13:12).

Jesus expressed His earnest desire to eat the Passover with His disciples before His suffering (Luke 22:15). They had no understanding that the prophetic symbolism of that first Passover, when the blood applied to the entrances of the Israelite homes saved the firstborn, was soon to be fulfilled. Twice already Jesus had referred to His suffering and final rejection by the leaders and "this generation" (9:22; 17:25). Despite the somber tone of the Last Supper, Jesus anticipated the joyful results of His sacrifice when He would be glorified (24:26) and they would sit around the banquet table in the "kingdom of God" (22:16; cf. Heb. 12:2).

Luke, unlike Matthew and Mark, describes two cups, one before the unleavened bread and one after. The Jewish traditions about celebration of the Passover included four cups, so it may be that Jesus abbreviated the typical Jewish practice in order to shift the application away from the Exodus and onto His approaching death. The first cup mentioned in Luke was apparently one of the first two cups of the Passover celebration. The feast of Unleavened Bread was held simultaneously with Passover, during which all leaven was removed from the house (which included that used to ferment drinks). Since yeast was associated with sin during this festival and the wine represented the blood of Jesus, it is certain that it was not fermented. The contents of the cup are nowhere in Scripture called wine but only the fruit of the vine, that is, unfermented grape juice. At a later point, thanks would be given for the unleavened bread, which would then be broken and served to the participants as a symbol of Jesus's body.

An important part of the Passover was an explanation of the meaning of each element of the ritual. In replacing it, the Last Supper was essentially an acted parable. Jesus attributed new significance to the bread, calling it His body (Luke 22:19). In Luke, Jesus added that this body was given for them, meaning that the bread symbolized the giving of Himself as the real Passover sacrifice (Mark 10:45; cf. Is. 53:7–8, 10) "for the life of the world" (John 6:51). The third cup of the Passover ritual was called one of blessing or thanksgiving (cf. 1 Cor. 10:16), and this seems to have been the second cup mentioned here because it was drunk after supper (Luke 22:20). Jesus called this cup "the new covenant" in His blood (cf. 1 Cor. 11:25). Just as the first (or old) covenant was inaugurated with blood (Ex. 24:8), so Jesus's shed blood on the cross (represented by the "blood" of the grape) ratified the new covenant (Heb. 9:15).

Both the unleavened bread and the unfermented juice of the Lord's Supper—which Jesus commanded His followers to partake of in remembrance of Him (Luke 22:19)—symbolized His pure, sinless sacrifice for the forgiveness of sin. During this unusual supper, Jesus surprised the disciples by saying that His betrayer was among them (v. 21; cf. Ps. 41:9). The sufferings of Christ had been divinely preordained, so Christ could be strengthened by knowing God's plan (John 13:18–19), but it would be terrible for the one who would betray Him (Luke 22:22). The Passover meal normally ended with a hymn (Pss. 113–118) and a final cup that pointed to the future victory of Israel, but the Last Supper concluded without the additional cup (Mark 14:26) because final victory would come only at the Second Advent, to which this remembrance of Christ's death pointed (1 Cor. 11:26; Rev. 19:6–9).

22:24–30. The Disciples Argue about Greatness. Luke contrasts the Last Supper and Jesus's willingness to be delivered to death with a dispute the disciples had about greatness (v. 24). The exact time of this dispute is left unclear. Evidently, as the cross drew closer, the disciples believed the kingdom would soon be established. Jesus seized the opportunity to explain true greatness. Among the Gentiles, rivalry for honor and power was widespread (v. 25). Surviving plaques and monuments testify to the lavish donations for public works projects made by wealthy benefactors to enhance their status and influence with the political class. But the desire for position, prestige, and power, like the desire for wealth, is never satisfied (Prov. 27:20). Among believers, the greatest should be as the youngest, taking the lowest place, and the leader should be as the one who serves (Luke 22:26). Thus Jesus affirmed that organization would exist in His church but that it would be based not on thirst for power over others but on His example as servant (cf. John 13:1–17). The community of believers is a community of servants. Although Jesus had many disciples, the Twelve stayed with Him wherever He went and shared His trials (Luke 22:28; e.g., 5:30; Mark 7:5). Consequently, they, as representatives of God's people, were promised that in the coming kingdom they would eat and drink at the same table and would also sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Luke 22:30). During the Millennium, God's people will judge the world and even angels (1 Cor. 6:2–3; Rev. 20:4).

22:31–38. Jesus Foretells Peter's Denial and His Own Suffering as the Servant. Before leaving the upper room (cf. v. 39), Jesus revealed a glimpse of His controversy with Satan, who asked (exētēsato) to sift or shake not just Peter but all of the disciples (v. 31), as the plural form of "you" indicates. The Greek suggests that Satan, the accuser of God's people, demanded the right to test them (cf. Job 1:6–12; 2:1–6). Jesus's repetition of Peter's given name, Simon, like His frequent repetition of amēn ("truly"; e.g., John 1:51; 3:3), introduced a solemn declaration or appeal (cf. Matt. 7:22; 25:11; Luke 6:46; 8:24; 13:34; Acts 9:4). As one of the leading disciples, his example would have a larger influence. Jesus prayed to the Father on Peter's behalf that he would exhibit a faith that would not fail under the temptation Satan was about to bring (Luke 22:32). Having foreseen Peter's impending denial and abandonment of Him, Jesus encouraged him with the hope of his return to a covenant relationship with the Lord (e.g., 2 Chr. 30:9; Pss. 19:7; 51:3; 80:19; Is. 55:7; Hos. 6:1). Only someone strong in faith can strengthen others. In John, Jesus referred to His going away to where others could not come (John 8:21; 13:33, 36), and Peter affirmed his willingness to lay down his life for Jesus. Here in Luke he intended to go with Jesus to prison and to death (Luke 22:33). Unfortunately, Peter did not know himself or His Lord, or else he would not have answered so self-assuredly. Jesus predicted that before the rooster crowed (several hours before sunrise), Peter would three times deny knowing Jesus (v. 34).

Jesus contrasted the time of peril at that time with earlier times. Then, although He had sent the disciples on missions without any visible means of support (see commentary on Luke 9:1–6; cf. 10:4), they could say they lacked nothing (22:35). But when Jesus spoke, the times were drastically different. The disciples would need not only a money bag and traveling bag for provisions but also a sword, and if necessary, one's garment was to be sold to buy a sword (v. 36). Jesus often spoke in parables and metaphors, though His listeners, as here, frequently took these sayings literally (e.g., Matt. 15:10–20; Mark 8:15–16; John 2:19–21). The sword points to strife and persecution (Luke 21:24; Matt. 10:34–36), beginning with Jesus Himself, who would be "numbered with the transgressors" (Luke 22:37). This quotation from Isaiah 53:12 shows that Jesus understood His mission in terms of being struck for the sins of the people (Is. 53:8; cf. Mark 14:27), which was the purpose of His coming. It was also fulfilled quite literally in His crucifixion (Luke 23:32–33). The disciples, pointing to two swords, failed to grasp the connection between the metaphorical admonition to buy a sword (to get ready for the approaching spiritual conflict) and the imminent fulfillment of prophecy just announced. Since all His warnings up to this point seemed to have fallen on deaf ears, Jesus acquiesced to their continued incomprehension by saying this was enough.

22:39–46. Jesus's Prayer and Agony in Gethsemane. The place on the Mount of Olives where Jesus was accustomed to go for solitude and prayer was a garden called Gethsemane, which means oil press—a fitting name since Jesus would feel the weight of sin pressing on Him there (Matt. 26:36; John 18:1). After urging the disciples to pray for strength to withstand temptation so that their faith might not fail (Luke 22:40; cf. v. 32), Jesus withdrew further into the garden to be alone and knelt down to pray (v. 41). In Luke's abbreviated account, Jesus prays only once, prefacing His plea to the Father to take away the cup with a recognition of and submission to the divine will (cf. Matt. 26:39; Mark 14:36). Although Jesus's human will in not wanting to go to the cross disagreed with the divine will, in the end He prayed that His Father's will be done.

So draining was the agony (agōnia, Luke 22:44) of separation from His Father that an angel came to strengthen Him for the excruciating path that lay ahead. Praying more earnestly, Jesus's sweat appeared to be like great drops of blood ("like," hōsei, means appearance; e.g., Luke 24:11; Matt. 3:16; Acts 2:3; 6:15). This may suggest hematidrosis, an acute medical condition of sweating blood that is caused by extreme fear or stress, sometimes observed among prisoners awaiting execution. Jesus, when returning to the disciples, found them sleeping because they were exhausted by their sorrow (Luke 22:45). The uncertainty was deeply perplexing and filled their hearts with sorrow (cf. John 16:5). Again Jesus urged them to pray for strength to face temptation (Luke 22:46). As with Jesus Himself, their primary line of defense would be prayer and a firm reliance on God's word (cf. 4:4).

22:47–53. Betrayal and Arrest of Jesus. Even before Jesus finished speaking, a large mob approached, led by Judas. Luke indicates Judas's intention was to kiss Jesus (v. 47). The kiss was a sign of affection and respect between family members and close friends, perhaps also between disciple and rabbi (Matt. 26:49). However, its purpose here was to clearly identify Jesus in the darkness for the arrest. The word order of Jesus's question in Greek emphasizes the incongruity of using a kiss for evil.

The disciples, by this time wide awake, asked whether it was time to wield the sword (Luke 22:49; see also v. 38). Amazingly, they did not yet understand the otherworldly nature of God's kingdom—it is based on love (6:27, 35; 10:27), with citizens who do not fight, not even in defense (John 18:36; cf. Matt. 26:52–53). One of the disciples, Peter (John 18:10), did not wait for Jesus to answer the question but cut off the right ear of the high priest's servant (Luke 22:50). Always in control of the situation, Jesus vividly demonstrated the nonviolent character of God's kingdom. He touched the man's ear and healed him (v. 51). Then, speaking to the religious leaders who had come with swords and clubs to arrest Him at night, He reminded them of His peacefully teaching daily in the temple (vv. 52–53). Identifying their work with the power and reign of darkness (i.e., Satan; vv. 3, 31), Jesus showed which kingdom these religious functionaries had chosen.

22:54–62. Peter's Denial and Bitter Repentance. It was not the Romans but the Jewish leaders who took the lead and arrested Jesus. According to John, Jesus was first taken from Gethsemane to the house of Annas, who was recognized by the people as the rightful high priest (John 18:13). But the Romans reserved the power of annual appointment to this office, making it essentially a political post. After several interim high priests, Annas's son-in-law Caiaphas was appointed to the position by the Roman prefect, Valerius Gratus, in A.D. 18, and it was to Caiaphas's house that Jesus was taken next (Luke 22:54; cf. Matt. 26:57). As Luke implies, such a trial was necessarily preliminary because it was still night (see Luke 22:66).

Peter mixed with those in the courtyard and sat among them rather than entering the house proper, which surrounded the open-air courtyard and was where the trial took place. Being springtime, it would have still been cold at night, so the servants and guards kindled a fire to keep warm (v. 55). As Peter sat near the fire, his face was recognized. All four Gospels note that a servant girl was the first to recognize him (v. 56). John 18:16 identifies her as the doorkeeper. Staring at him, she confidently asserted that Peter had been with Jesus, to which he responded that he did not know Him, just as Jesus had predicted (Luke 22:57; cf. v. 34). Peter, having already distanced himself from Jesus by mingling with the crowd so as not to be recognized as His disciple, prepared the way for his open denial. The battle with temptation is lost first in the heart before open transgression occurs. Once this barrier had been crossed, the second and third denials were virtually impossible to avoid (vv. 58–60). One sin paves the way for further moves downward. The third accuser was the most confident and definitive, having seen Peter in the garden (John 18:26) and observing his unrefined Galilean accent (Luke 22:59; cf. Matt. 26:73; Mark 14:70). Peter tried to reflect the same certainty, even cursing and swearing in order to disassociate himself completely from Jesus and His purity. He was ready to fight for Jesus but unprepared to suffer ridicule for His sake. At this third denial, the rooster crowed and Jesus turned and looked at Peter, apparently through an open door or window onto the courtyard. That sad, pitying look reminded Peter of the word of the Lord that predicted his threefold denial. God's word cannot be broken (John 10:35). It possesses a self-authenticating power and calls sinners to repentance (Luke 5:32). Realizing with horror how Satan had used him to inflict the heaviest blow, Peter went out and wept bitterly (22:62).

22:63–71. Jesus Is Mocked, Beaten, and Tried before the Sanhedrin. Jesus was left in the hands of the temple guard until daybreak, when the full Sanhedrin would meet. In fulfillment of His prediction (18:32), they began to mock Him. Since they had heard that Jesus was a prophet, after blindfolding Him, they commanded, "Prophesy!" and challenged Him to tell them who struck Him. The other Synoptics add that they spat on Him and hit Him with the palms of their hands (Matt. 26:67; Mark 14:65). Luke summarizes their mistreatment by indicating that they were blasphēmountes—"blaspheming" or "insulting"—Him with many other things as well (Luke 22:65). This could include mocking some of His sayings (e.g., Luke 23:39; Mark 15:29) or presumptuously demanding a miracle (Matt. 27:39–40).

Several procedural details, including the preceding night trial, would not have been legal according to the Sanhedrin's own jurisprudence. A verdict of conviction in capital offenses had to be arrived at during the day, thus the need for a formal session of the council, which met in the Hall of Hewn Stones within the temple complex. It included the elders as lay representatives in addition to chief priests and scribes, or teachers of the law. The preceding trials sought grounds for Jesus's condemnation and attempted to build the momentum for it. Both questions put to Jesus concerned His identity. First they asked Him to declare to the whole council whether He was the Christ (i.e., the Messiah). Jesus refused to answer their question directly, pointing out that they would not believe (cf. Jer. 38:15). He appealed to the future, when the Son of Man would come to execute righteous judgment (Luke 22:69). The "right hand" of God indicates a position of divine authority (cf. Ps. 110:1–2). Since this reply was insufficiently clear for condemnation, a follow-up question addressed whether Jesus was claiming to be the Son of God. He answered positively in an idiomatic manner of affirming the words just spoken in the question.

23:1–12. Jesus Is Tried by Pilate, Then by Herod. Since Roman law did not permit the Sanhedrin to convict on capital offenses (John 18:31), Jesus was brought to Pilate (see Luke 3:1). Although Pilate's headquarters was in Caesarea, he resided in Jerusalem during major festivals to maintain order. To make the greatest possible impression on Pilate as to the seriousness of the case, the whole council came (Luke 23:1), bringing three charges: misleading the nation (cf. 23:14; Acts 13:8, 10; 20:30), hindering the payment of taxes to Caesar, and claiming to be the Messiah, a king. The first charge was purely a religious matter in which Pilate would have had no interest, but it provided grounds for discrediting Jesus to the populace. The second charge was purely false as Jesus had maintained the opposite (Luke 20:25). The third charge was the most serious because it could have directly threatened Roman authority and control over Israel. Not surprisingly, then, this was the charge Pilate focused on, asking Jesus whether He was the King of the Jews.

Jesus was not a king in the sense that Pilate was thinking of, but to deny it would have been unthinkable because Jesus was fulfilling the prophetic hopes of a messianic king from the line of David (see 2:4, 11). All four Gospel accounts agree exactly on Pilate's question, which could be taken pejoratively, "You are the King of the Jews?" Jesus's reply, "It is as you say," or "You have said so" is affirmative (23:3), as John's account (John 18:33–38) also indicates. Pilate did not consider Jesus's kingdom to be a threat because He defined His kingdom as not of this world, and consequently, Pilate said that he found no legal basis for action against Jesus (John 18:33–38; 19:8–11). Not getting the result they wanted, the Jewish leaders pressed Pilate by accusing Jesus of inciting religious enthusiasm against Roman rule throughout all Judea, even as far as Galilee (Luke 23:5). It is true that Jesus's teaching created a stir everywhere He went, but not in order to foment rebellion against Roman rule. The Jewish establishment consistently twisted the truth. On hearing that Jesus was a Galilean, Pilate sent Him to Herod, who was in Jerusalem for the Passover (vv. 6–7).

Jesus's renown as a miracle worker had spread far and wide, which led Herod to want to see Him for a long time. Earlier, Herod had feared that John the Baptist, whom he had beheaded, had risen from the dead in the person of Jesus (Mark 6:16). Reminding Jesus of his power to condemn or release, he urged Jesus to perform some spectacular sēmeion ("miracle" or "sign"; cf. Luke 11:16) to save Himself. Herod peppered Him with questions, but Jesus did not answer (23:9). Having already silenced the greatest of prophets with the execution of John, Herod would receive no further opportunity to engage with divinity for his trifling purposes. Offended by the silence, Herod and his soldiers ridiculed Jesus by clothing Him in an elaborate robe, mocking the idea of His being a king (cf. Mark 15:17–20). Pilate had hoped that Herod would deal with Jesus, since He belonged to his jurisdiction, but Herod returned Him to Pilate (Luke 23:11). Nevertheless, Pilate's expedient gesture was interpreted as a show of respect, and they became friends (v. 12).

23:13–25. Jesus Takes the Place of Barabbas. Pilate summoned representatives from the three main strata of Jewish society: religious leaders (chief priests), civic leaders (rulers), which probably included the leading elders and scribes (cf. 22:66), and the general populace (the people). Of the three charges brought against Jesus, Pilate mentioned only the first, the most serious from his point of view, that Jesus was misleading the people (23:14), diverting their allegiance from Rome. From the Jewish perspective, this was also the most serious charge (see Deut. 13; 18:15–22). Also noted is that Pilate had examined Jesus, which suggests that Luke has summarized a lengthier process such as that recorded by John (see commentary on Luke 23:1–12).

Pilate, announcing that he found no legal basis for convicting Jesus, nor did Herod, and that Jesus did nothing deserving of death, determined to release Him (vv. 15–16). But he also promised to chastise or punish Jesus, apparently hoping that this would satisfy His accusers. It was the mildest form of punishment, as opposed to scourging (cf. Matt. 27:26; Mark 15:15; John 19:1); the latter was reserved for more serious crimes, including capital offenses. On the other hand, with not just two trials but two verdicts of Jesus's innocence (cf. Deut. 19:15), any punishment at all would have seemed to have been unjust. (Some manuscripts add v. 17, which indicates that there was an anagkē—a "necessary"—custom of releasing a prisoner to the Jews during the Passover. It was unlike dei, which refers to something needed from God's perspective and according to the divine plan; e.g., Luke 24:26.) The custom of releasing a prisoner in honor of Passover was a practice the Jews prized. Although some early manuscripts omit this verse (cf. Matt. 27:15), such a tradition is implied in the context.

In response, all, including the common people, shouted and demanded that Jesus be taken away, meaning killed (Luke 23:18; cf. John 19:15; Acts 8:33; 21:36). They demanded that Barabbas be released instead, despite his being guilty of murder and of having led a revolt (Luke 23:19; cf. Mark 15:7; John 18:40). The name Barabbas means "son of the Father" in Aramaic, suggesting he may have been a messianic pretender. The chief priests were said to be responsible for the people's change of heart (Matt. 27:20; Mark 15:11). Those who had charged Jesus with rebellion against Rome now asked for a real insurrectionist to be released, demonstrating that their professed loyalty to Rome was duplicitous (cf. John 19:12, 15). Only Luke mentions that this rebellion took place "in the city" (i.e., Jerusalem), which also helps explain the unanimous sentiment in favor of Barabbas's release. Although Pilate tried repeatedly to release Jesus (Luke 23:13–22), the people shouted emphatically (twice) for Him to be crucified (v. 21; cf. John 19:6, 15).

Crucifixion was a particularly horrific form of slow execution in which the offender carried the crossbeam to the place of crucifixion and was fastened to it by rope or nails before being raised and secured to an upright post. Death would have occurred hours or days later by suffocation, loss of blood and bodily fluids, cardiac arrest, or a similar reason.

While Pilate did not want a riot to ensue, neither did he want to condemn an innocent man to death. In his third attempt to release Jesus, he twice underscored Jesus's innocence (Luke 23:22). But the crowds were insistent, crying out loudly (as the demon-possessed had done; Luke 4:33; 8:28). So, when forced to choose between upholding justice or preserving his own position, Pilate chose self-interest: he ordered that Jesus be crucified, released Barabbas, and gave Jesus over to their will (23:24–25). The word for release, used five times in this passage (vv. 16, 18, 20, 22, 25), refers not only to physical deliverance (13:12) but also to forgiveness (6:37; Matt. 18:27), hinting at Jesus's substitutionary sacrifice in taking the place of not only Barabbas on the cross but of the world (cf. Rom. 8:32; 2 Cor. 5:14–15; 1 John 2:2).

23:26–43. The King Is Crucified. All three Synoptic Gospels indicate that a Cyrenian named Simon carried Jesus's cross (v. 26). Normally, persons being crucified were expected to carry their own cross (or crossbeam), so Jesus must have been unable to carry it due to the physical and emotional suffering He had already undergone, which included two separate scourgings (Mark 15:15; John 19:1). Simon, the Cyrenian (cf. Acts 2:10), was coming from the country. Carrying the cross following Jesus, he modeled in a literal sense what Christians are to do figuratively in taking up their cross daily to follow Jesus (Luke 9:23).

Luke notes that a large crowd of people also trailed behind and also that women were weeping and lamenting for Jesus (23:27). Jesus, in addressing the latter as "daughters of Jerusalem" (v. 28), may have alluded to OT descriptions of the city being surrounded by enemy forces and ultimately destroyed (e.g., Is. 1:8; 3:16–17; Jer. 4:31; 6:2–6; Lam. 1:6; 2:10). The women were to weep for themselves and for their children because of the coming destruction of the city by Rome (Luke 23:28; cf. 21:20). Just as Jesus had previously pronounced a woe on women with children in those days (21:23), the barren and childless women would be blessed because of the horrific events coming on the city. As Jesus indicated, the death wish of those calling to the mountains "Fall on us!" prior to Israel's destruction by Assyria (Hos. 10:8) would be repeated during the fiery destruction of Jerusalem by Rome, representing in microcosm the global destruction that will occur at the Second Advent (Rev. 6:16). Since the green wood or tree (representing Jesus) is less susceptible to destruction by fire, the dry tree (representing the unbelieving Jerusalemites) would be even more readily consumed. Jesus alluded to an OT judgment oracle (Ezek. 17:24), employing a biblical metaphor whereby trees symbolize people (see commentary on Luke 3:7–20; cf. Matt. 7:16–20).

Placing Jesus between the two criminals who were crucified with Him (Luke 23:33; cf. 22:37), as all four Gospels indicate, identifies Him as the most prominent "transgressor." The crucifixion site was known as "the Skull"—"Golgotha" in Aramaic (cf. Mark 15:22) and Calvary (from Latin), used to translate the Greek form employed by Luke (Kranion). The prayer of Jesus for His persecutors, "Father, forgive them" (Luke 23:34), was not only for them but also for all people in all times. They (which is general enough to include all) do not know the full significance of their actions (Acts 3:17). The past tense verb in Greek that introduces the prayer in Luke suggests that Jesus spoke this before His cross was lifted up, making it the first of seven utterances from the cross (cf. Luke 23:43, 46; Mark 15:34; John 19:26, 28, 30). Dividing His clothing and casting lots for His well-made tunic (Luke 23:34; John 19:23–24; cf. Matt. 27:35) also fulfilled a messianic prediction (Ps. 22:18). Both through the rulers and the soldiers (Luke 23:35–36) Satan's initial temptation for Jesus to question His messianic identity was repeated. Even their mockery, calling on Him to save Himself, fulfilled prophecy (23:35; Ps. 22:7–8). But Jesus could not save Himself and still be the elect or chosen Savior (cf. Is. 42:1; 1 Pet. 2:4–6). The soldiers also mocked him and offered him sour wine vinegar (Luke 23:36). Jesus refused it because, although it would have deadened the pain, it would also have impaired His mental faculties and enabled temptation to have more readily overcome Him (see Prov. 23:29–35).

Minor variations among the four Gospels as to the posted sign written by Pilate specifying the offense (Luke 23:38) attest to the independence of their separate accounts (cf. Matt. 27:37; John 19:19) and to the part of the full inscription ("This is Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews") that each author chose to emphasize. Luke chose to emphasize the kingship (Messiah) aspect of the message. It was written in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew and hung above His head for all to see. It simultaneously witnessed to Jesus as the messianic King and to the hypocrisy of the Jewish leaders in affirming Roman rule over Israel in order to reject Him (Luke 23:2–3). Although one of the criminals echoed the taunts of the rulers and soldiers (v. 39), the other one rebuked him and affirmed that their punishment was just but that Jesus had done nothing wrong (v. 41). He expressed faith in Jesus as Israel's messianic King by asking to be remembered in His kingdom and (according to the best manuscripts) addressing Him as "Lord" (v. 42).

Jesus replied emphatically to the thief's request and told him that he would be with Him in paradise (v. 43). The Greek word translated "paradise" (paradeisos) generally means "garden," but it can refer to Eden as well as to heaven as the future dwelling place of God's people (2 Cor. 12:2–4; Rev. 2:7), and the latter is clearly the meaning here. Although modern versions place the comma before the word "today" (sēmeron), as if Jesus promised that He and the penitent thief would be in heaven later that day, such punctuation ignores Luke's predominant tendency of placing sēmeron after the verb it modifies (e.g., Luke 2:11; 5:26; 13:32–33; etc.; cf. Deut. 4:1; 11:26; 30:18, LXX). Interestingly, while the earliest manuscripts do not regularly include traditional punctuation marks (punctuation did not become common until the sixth and seventh centuries), an early version (the Curetonian Syriac, ca. second century), translates it: "I say today to you . . ." This agrees with John's record that Jesus did not ascend to heaven until sometime after His appearance to Mary Magdalene on Sunday (John 20:17). Thus Jesus, on this day, assured the man that, even though all seemed hopeless, he would be with Him in paradise.

23:44–49. The Uniqueness of Jesus's Death. All three Synoptic Gospels describe three hours of darkness (v. 44) from the sixth hour (noon) until the ninth hour (3:00 p.m.). This long period of darkness cannot be explained from natural causes, such as a solar eclipse; it signified God's involvement in Christ's death as the substitute for sinners (cf. 2 Cor. 5:19, 21). Similarly, the tearing of the temple's veil into two pieces "from top to bottom" (Mark 15:38) signified that type had met antitype in the death of Christ, thus bringing "an end to sacrifice and offering" (Dan. 9:27). Based on Luke's dating of the beginning of Jesus's ministry to A.D. 27 (see commentary on Luke 3:1–6) and a length of three and a half years as suggested by John, Christ's death occurred at the appropriate time (Rom. 5:6), in the middle of the seventieth week (Dan. 9:27) in the spring of A.D. 31. His final words, spoken from the cross just before His death, were words of faith and submission: He committed His spirit into His Father's hands (Luke 23:46; cf. Ps. 31:5).

Luke's account records diverse reactions to Jesus's death. The centurion, who was overseeing the crucifixion and had thus watched everything, glorified God and expressed faith in Jesus as a righteous man (Luke 23:47). The large crowd who had come to watch the spectacle and recognized the darkness and the earthquake as signs of divine displeasure "beat their breasts" (v. 48), a sign of mourning and repentance over their role in condemning to death an innocent man (cf. 18:13; Zech. 12:10). But His friends and acquaintances watched and remained at a distance from these dying men (Luke 23:49).

23:50–56. Jesus Is Buried in Joseph's Tomb. All four Gospels mention that a man named Joseph requested permission from Pilate to take the body of Jesus (vv. 50, 52). Like Simeon, he was a devout man and was waiting for the kingdom of God (vv. 50–51; see commentary on Luke 2:21–40); he was also a member of the Sanhedrin that examined Jesus. Luke adds, though, that he had not consented to their decision, which may mean that not all were invited to be present at the trials (cf. John 7:50–53). Joseph was a secret disciple (John 19:38), as was Nicodemus (John 19:39). Both men probably hoped that they could help Jesus more by remaining on the Sanhedrin than risking exclusion from it by confessing Him openly. Now, unlike the apostles, who were in hiding (John 20:19), they boldly came forward (cf. John 19:38–42). Later, as a result of the apostles' Spirit-filled witness to Jesus's resurrection and fulfillment of Israel's messianic hopes, many priests and Pharisees would do the same (Acts 6:7; 15:5).

Burial in first-century Israel involved placing the body into a small cavity cut into a natural rock outcropping. Once the body decomposed, the bones would be gathered and reburied in a pile with other deceased family members or placed in a limestone box called an ossuary. The burial place of Jesus is most probably the traditional site, known as the Holy Sepulcher, because its two-chamber design was typical of that period and it is necessary to stoop down to enter (cf. John 20:5, 11). Archeological findings (regarding the location of the tomb, see in "Archaeology and the Bible," p. 91) have also indicated that the Holy Sepulcher was located just outside the first-century city wall, as the Bible suggests (John 19:20, 42; Heb. 13:12). It was a first-century burial site, as evidenced by tombs cut into the rock nearby. Certain women (cf. Mark 15:47), unable to honorably prepare Jesus's body for burial as they wished because it was the Preparation Day (Friday) and the Sabbath was approaching (Luke 23:54), took note of the tomb's location and then prepared spices and fragrant oils or perfumes (v. 56) for later use. Luke's comment that they rested on the Sabbath according to the commandment suggests that many years later the early Christians were still observing the Sabbath on the seventh day (Saturday).

THE RESURRECTION AND ASCENSION OF JESUS

The sadness and unbelief of the disciples turned to joy as they witnessed Jesus risen from the dead and were taught by Him from the Scriptures that His sufferings, death, and resurrection fulfilled prophecy. Jesus appeared to the women at the tomb (vv. 1–12), two disciples on the way to Emmaus (vv. 13–35), and the eleven in Jerusalem (vv. 36–49). After witnessing His ascension (vv. 50–53), they returned to Jerusalem with new hope, worshiping and blessing God in the temple.

24:1–12. "He Is Risen." All four Gospels conclude with an affirmation of Jesus's resurrection. The four accounts underscore their value as independent witnesses to the resurrection, which took place on the first day of the week (v. 1), that is, Sunday. In Greek the word translated "week" is sabbaton. Among Jews, the days of the week were counted in relation to the seventh-day Sabbath. The only other day of the week given a name was the Preparation Day (Luke 23:54; Mark 15:42; John 19:14, 31, 42). The Roman practice of naming days after their gods, corresponding to the sun, moon, and the five known planets, entered the church centuries later.

Although the women left for the tomb very early in the morning (while it was still dark; John 20:1) to anoint the body of Jesus, when they arrived it was already becoming light (Matt. 28:1). The stone had been rolled away (Luke 24:2; cf. Matt. 28:2) and the tomb was empty—there was no body (Luke 24:3)—and they were at a loss to understand this (v. 4). The empty tomb did not suggest to them the resurrection. Seeing two men in glowing, bright clothing, later identified as angels (v. 23; cf. Acts 1:10), the women were afraid and bowed their faces to the ground in awe (Luke 24:5). The angels' question to the women and their affirmation that He was living, having risen from the dead, was reinforced by their use of Jesus's own words predicting His betrayal and crucifixion and that He would rise again on the third day (vv. 6–7). Reference to "the third day" emphasizes the fulfillment of prophecy (see commentary on Luke 9:18–27; cf. 11:30; Jon. 1:17).

The women told all these things, first to the eleven remaining apostles and then to all the rest of Christ's followers in Jerusalem (Luke 24:9). They became the first ones to proclaim to others the resurrection of Christ. Mary Magdalene (v. 10) is named as a witness of the resurrection in all four Gospels. According to John, Jesus appeared first to her and then she went separately to tell the disciples (John 20:14–18). Apparently, the women came to the tomb from different directions and so did not arrive at the same time. Joanna (see Luke 8:3) and Mary, the mother of James (cf. Mark 15:40), were among the women who told the apostles of the resurrection. However, the disciples did not believe them (Luke 24:11). Some attribute their skepticism to the prevailing attitude that women were unreliable witnesses, but the fog of their deep depression likely also contributed to it. The story seemed to be nonsense. Luke's account often summarizes, as apparently here: it does not mention Mary Magdalene's separate witness to the disciples. Further along in his account, he would mention Jesus's separate appearance to Peter (v. 34; cf. 1 Cor. 15:5), who had gone to the tomb, finding only the linen cloths lying by themselves (cf. John 20:3–7). He went away wondering what all this could mean (Luke 24:12).

24:13–35. On the Road to Emmaus. That same afternoon two disciples, returning from the feast celebration, traveled the seven miles (11 km) to their home village of Emmaus (v. 13), a location that has not yet been confidently identified. As they discussed the tragic turn of events, Jesus joined them on the way, but they were prevented from recognizing Him (v. 16; cf. John 20:14; 21:4). The deeper divine purpose was that their faith should rest not on a miracle of resurrection but on the Scriptures (cf. Luke 16:31). As Jesus questioned them about their conversation, according to some manuscripts, they stopped walking and stood there looking downcast and discouraged (24:17). They seemed shocked that this stranger was oblivious to what had happened, and Cleopas voiced their surprise (v. 18). Awareness of Jesus's death, it seems, was widespread. They recited many facts: about Jesus's prophetic work, His mighty deeds, and crucifixion (vv. 19–20); of the women finding the tomb empty and seeing a vision of angels who said He was alive (v. 23); and even that some had gone to the tomb and confirmed that it was empty (vv. 19–24). But these facts led only to doubt with no hint of faith: they said that they had hoped that Jesus was the One who was going to redeem Israel (implying that this hope had been dashed; v. 21). They even mentioned the third day (see commentary on Luke 9:18–27). Their hopes were disappointed because they expected a messiah who would liberate them from Rome. But Jesus appeared to be just another failed messianic pretender (cf. Acts 5:36–37).

Jesus pinpointed the reason for their doubts, calling them anoētoi (lit. "thoughtless" or "foolish"; cf. Gal. 3:1, 3) for being "slow" to believe (Luke 24:25). They may have wanted proof of the claims made by the women, but the problem was their unwillingness to believe "all that the prophets have spoken" (v. 25). A suffering and dying messiah was unthinkable to them because they failed to believe all that had been revealed. Therefore, beginning with the books of Moses, Jesus explained to them in all the Scriptures passages pointing to Himself (v. 27). Numerous passages concerning His suffering might have been mentioned (e.g., Gen. 3:15; Ps. 22:1–18; Is. 53:1–10; Dan. 9:26; Zech. 13:7). The glory or exaltation of the Messiah is also found throughout the OT (e.g., Num. 24:17; Is. 52:13; 53:11–12; Dan. 7:13–14). Significantly, when they neared Emmaus, Jesus seemed to indicate that He would be going on further. The two disciples strongly entreated Him to stay (cf. Heb. 13:2; the Greek word used here is from the verb parabiazomai—"to strongly urge"—some translations have "constrained," but this does not mean "to force" in this context). Had they not done so, they might not have been witnesses of the resurrection. As they recognized how their Guest took bread, blessed (or gave thanks for) it, and broke the bread, while apparently seeing the scars in His hands as He did so, their eyes were opened. Suddenly they recognized the risen Jesus; but then He vanished from their sight (Luke 24:30–31).

Unable to restrain their excitement, they left their meal untouched and immediately returned to Jerusalem, where they found the eleven apostles and others with them (v. 33). Luke refers to the twelve apostles even though Thomas was not present (John 20:24). Apparently this temporarily replaced "the Twelve" as a technical term for the group until a twelfth apostle was appointed (Acts 1:26). The others present probably included the women who reported on the empty tomb as well as Jesus's mother, Mary (cf. Acts 1:14). By this time, those in the upper room could confess that the Lord had risen (Luke 24:34) and give the further report that Jesus had appeared to Simon Peter. Peter was eager to see the risen Jesus, having raced to the tomb after hearing the report of the women. Being that his last interaction with Him immediately followed his threefold denial (22:61–62), Peter may have recalled the hopeful words that Jesus had spoken to him at the Last Supper (22:32) and longed for forgiveness from and reconciliation with His Lord, and Jesus honored that desire by appearing specially to him.

24:36–49. Jesus Appears to His Disciples. Accompanying the two disciples from Emmaus and entering the upper room with them was Jesus Himself, unseen until He gave them a greeting of peace (v. 36), a typical Jewish greeting (10:5) but also a reminder of the peace that He promised to give them (John 14:27; 20:19). Nevertheless, they were shocked and frightened and thought they were seeing a spirit or ghost (Luke 24:37; cf. Mark 6:49). Jesus proceeded to prove by means of the senses (sight, sound, touch) that He not only was alive but, unlike Greek conceptions of the afterlife, had flesh and bones (Luke 24:39). He also showed them His hands and His feet (v. 40) with the scars where the nails of crucifixion had been (cf. John 20:25–27). Still, it was hard to believe their eyes, and they disbelieved (interestingly) because of their joy (Luke 24:41). So Jesus gave them another piece of evidence by eating a piece of broiled fish (vv. 42–43; honeycomb is not mentioned in the earliest manuscripts, and does not appear in some translations). Although Jerusalem, as the Jewish capital, was not near a fishing community, many goods flowed to it (Neh. 13:16), particularly during festivals like Passover.

Having relieved their fears and doubts, Jesus next reminded them of His prior predictions regarding His suffering and death (see Luke 18:31). He was quite emphatic that the Scriptures must be fulfilled (see 24:44–46). The Greek word used here (dei) refers to a divine necessity (see 2:49). The reference to the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms (24:44) appears to designate the three divisions of the Hebrew canon, the Psalms representing the first and largest portion of the Writings, with which the canon ends. Just as the eyes of Cleopas and his fellow disciple were opened to the meaning of the OT (24:32), so now these disciples had the same privilege. A clear, correct understanding of the Scriptures and how Christ is revealed in them is indispensable to sharing the gospel with others.

Next Jesus summarized the disciples' message and mission, first by repeating the essence of the gospel in terms of Christ's suffering (including His death) and His resurrection on the third day (v. 46; see 9:22). Through Christ's death, repentance and remission/forgiveness of sins had been made available to all and were to be preached "to all nations" in His name (24:47)—a mission faithfully carried forward in Acts (e.g., 2:38; 3:6, 16; 4:10–12). This mission included all nations (cf. Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:15). This first instance of the giving of the Great Commission was no doubt repeated to various groups of disciples, including at His meeting in Galilee with more than five hundred disciples (1 Cor. 15:6). The work was to begin at Jerusalem, with those who had witnessed the startling events of the recent Passover. Later, the plan for the mission's progress would be given in more detail (Acts 1:8). Most importantly, the disciples were witnesses (Luke 24:48). They were to share the things they had seen and heard (see 1:2 and 10:23–24). Their effectiveness in preaching the gospel could come only through "power from on high" (24:49), that is, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father had promised (cf. 1:35; Gal. 3:14; Eph. 1:13) and whom Jesus would send (John 15:26; 16:7; cf. 14:26).

24:50–51. The Ascension. For the site of His ascension, Jesus chose the Mount of Olives, where God's presence had lingered before abandoning Jerusalem and the first temple to Babylonian destruction (Ezek. 11:23) and where the shouts of the multitude had proclaimed Him King. He led His eleven disciples (cf. Luke 24:33) across the summit toward Bethany and lifted up His hands to give them a parting blessing (v. 50). Then He began ascending and was lifted up into heaven (v. 51). Luke would begin the book of Acts by connecting it with this final scene of his Gospel narrative (cf. Acts 1:9–11).

EPILOGUE

As they saw Jesus ascending to heaven, the disciples worshiped Him as Lord (v. 52). They knew that He would fulfill His promises and that His divine presence would be with them always (Matt. 28:20). Deep in their hearts the hope of the return of the Lord renewed, oriented, and filled their existence with meaning. Possessed by this hope and free from fear, they returned to Jerusalem and were continually in the temple (where this Gospel began; Luke 1:8). In their praising of God (24:53), the disciples reflected something of the joy in heaven as angels welcomed Jesus to the heavenly temple, where He now intercedes for His people on earth, who are eagerly waiting for Him (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 4:14–16; 9:28).

JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The title of the book, "The Gospel According to John," is consistently found in the earliest Greek manuscripts, in the writings of the second- and third-century church fathers, and in the earliest translations, although in some cases it is shortened to simply "According to John." Many later copies also add an epithet: "The Holy Gospel According to John." And in at least one twelfth-century manuscript, the title is expanded at the end of the manuscript to include a Christian tradition regarding the Gospel's origin, "The Gospel According to John, which he wrote in Greek in Ephesus." Although the title of the Gospel varies a little in some manuscripts, there is no evidence that this Gospel ever circulated without John's name attached to it. This indicates that a title naming John as the author must have been attached to it as soon as it was written.

According to Christian tradition, the "John" mentioned in the title of the Fourth Gospel has always been identified as the Apostle John, the son of Zebedee (see Mark 1:19–20; 3:17; 10:35) and the brother of James (Acts 12:2). This identification, however, is not explicitly stated in the text of the Gospel itself (cf. Rev. 1:1, 4, 9; 22:8). The Gospel says only that the author was "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (John 21:20; cf. 19:35; 21:24), indicating he was a well-known figure within the apostolic and post-apostolic church. He is presented as an eyewitness of the things he wrote, and his testimony was confirmed to be true by those who knew him (21:24).

Was he indeed John the son of Zebedee? Since he was Jesus's most beloved disciple, he must have been one of the Twelve. According to the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) Jesus had an inner group of three disciples: Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, James and John (Matt. 17:1; 26:37; Mark 5:37; 13:3; Luke 22:8). It seems natural, then, to conclude that the Beloved Disciple was one of them. Peter could not have been the author because he is clearly distinguished from John (John 13:23–25; 18:15; 20:2–3; 21:7, 20). James is excluded because he was put to death a few years after Pentecost by Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:1–2). Certainly, the rumor that spread at a later time among the brethren that the Beloved Disciple would not die (John 21:23) could not refer to James. Only John is left, and there is nothing to preclude him from being "the disciple whom Jesus loved" and the author of the Fourth Gospel.

It is frequently observed that John the son of Zebedee is not mentioned by name in the Fourth Gospel. The same happens with his brother James. Since John played such an important role within the apostolic church (Gal. 2:9; cf. Acts 3:1—4:23; 8:15–25), it seems strange, however, that he would not have been mentioned at all—unless the omission was intentional, having been replaced by a title ("the disciple whom Jesus loved") only for literary reasons. An indication of this intentionality may be evident in the fact that in contrast to the Synoptic Gospels, it is only in this Gospel that John the Baptist is simply called "John" (e.g., John 1:6, 15, 19, 26; 3:23–27); something that does not occur, for instance, in relation to the two disciples called Judas (14:22; cf. 6:71; 12:4; 13:2). Also, some of the most important individuals are given full names (6:68; 11:16; 20:24). The most likely explanation for this difference is that the Apostle John felt no need to distinguish himself from the only other John he mentions.

Date. Determining when the Fourth Gospel was written is difficult because there is little information from which a definitive conclusion can be drawn. The Gospel seems to suggest that John was already advanced in years when he wrote it. According to church tradition, John left Judea shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. He is said to have settled in Ephesus, where he ministered to the churches and eventually wrote his Gospel. Evidence that John wrote after the temple was destroyed in A.D. 70 seems to be implied in the way Jesus is presented in the Fourth Gospel as fulfilling some of the temple's functions (2:18–22; cf. 1:14; 4:21–24) and as the one to whom the Jewish festivals connected to the temple pointed (6:4, 53–58; 7:1, 37–39; 10:22, 34–36). Additional evidence for a late date also agrees with the concern appearing in John's Gospel: encouraging the faith of a second generation of Christians, who had not seen the resurrected Jesus themselves (20:29–30; cf. 17:20). Most scholars are, therefore, of the opinion that John was written between A.D. 80 and 100, the latter date being around the time of John's death.

Besides church tradition, there is some other evidence indicating that John could not have been written after, or long after, the turn of the first century: (1) the fact that in their writings early church writers, such as Ignatius (ca. A.D. 110) and Justin Martyr (ca. A.D. 150), seem to have used it and (2) several second-century papyri texts of this Gospel (especially Papyrus Rylands 457, or simply P52, a small codex fragment containing John 18:31–33 on one side and vv. 37–38 on the other, found in Egypt in 1920 and dated to ca. A.D. 125). The importance of P52 is that it shows that this Gospel was already circulating in Egypt at the beginning of the second century. This information requires a date no later than A.D. 100 for the composition of John.

Backgrounds. Determining the specific situation that prompted John to write his Gospel is no less difficult than attempting to figure out when it was written. Broadly speaking, John's Gospel was written to encourage faith in Jesus. He said that he wrote about the signs that Jesus performed so that readers might believe that Jesus is "the Son of God," and that by believing they "may have life" (20:31). The challenge is that the passage can be understood in two significantly different ways—and the Greek manuscripts are divided on the issue. In some Greek manuscripts the verb in the phrase "that you may believe" is in the aorist tense, which indicates the purpose was to lead unbelievers to make a decision to follow Jesus. In other manuscripts, and probably the most accurate ones, the verb is in the present tense, meaning John was writing to encourage believers to continue in their faith ("that you might go on believing"). If the latter is correct, why would John specifically want to encourage believers to continue in their faith? While we do not know for sure, two of the most common suggestions are set forth below.

1. An Internal Crisis of Faith. Around the end of the last decade of the first century, the Christian church was facing a challenging time of transition. The generation of believers who had personally witnessed the resurrected Jesus was being replaced by a second generation of believers, who knew Him only through the testimony of others. John was himself the last living apostle, and his death was likely not far off. At this difficult time, John wrote to encourage the next generation of believers that the lack of living witnesses of the resurrection was no barrier to their Christian experience.

As noted earlier, the Fourth Gospel seems to take a particular interest in the faith of the second generation of Christians. Jesus pronounced a blessing on those who, unlike Thomas, believe without seeing (20:8–9). During Jesus's intercessory prayer, John recounts how Jesus prayed not only for Himself and His disciples but also for the faith of a generation who would believe in Him through the testimony of His disciples (17:20). These individuals are some of the "other sheep" (10:16) who would believe in Jesus, even though they had not seen Him personally (20:29).

This concern to encourage the faith of a new generation of Christians is also evident in the nature of the miracles John recorded in his Gospel. Unlike the Synoptic Gospels, which record Jesus repeatedly healing people through physical touch (e.g., Matt. 8:3–4; 14:29–31; Mark 1:29–31; 5:21–43; Luke 4:40; 7:14–15; 8:40–56), John's Gospel recounts many miracles of healing as the result of the spoken word of Jesus alone (John 2:1–11; 4:46–54; 5:1–15; 11:39–44). In choosing to tell these specific stories, John wanted to demonstrate that the absence of the physical presence of Jesus was not a disadvantage for later Christians. Jesus's words were just as powerful as His physical touch.

2. External Conflicts. At the same time, it is possible that the church was also facing an external crisis, in which faith in Jesus was being fiercely threatened. After the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Pharisees tried to rebuild Judaism. They were the ones defining orthodoxy and expected other groups, including Christians, to comply or face disciplinary actions. The tension escalated when a curse on heretics (birkat haminim) was added to the synagogue liturgy. According to the Babylonian Talmud, the birkat haminim, which refers to Christians as "Nazarenes," was introduced at the time of Gamaliel II (ca. A.D. 85); apparently, its purpose was to drive Jewish Christians out of the synagogue, though it could also result in other kinds of punishments similar to the ones imposed by unconverted Paul (Acts 9:1–2; 22:4–5; 26:9–12). Later evidence for this development is found in Justin Martyr's disputation with a Jew named Trypho (ca. A.D. 135). He mentioned at least three times a curse that the Jews pronounced on Christians during their synagogue prayers.

We should be careful in using the birkat haminim as a background for the interpretation of the Gospel of John. One could perhaps suggest that in his Gospel, John decided to emphasize the fierce hostility between the Jews and Jesus based on the hostility between the Jews and his audience at the time he wrote the Gospel. Out of the seventy-one occurrences of the term "Jews" (translated as "Jewish leaders" in some versions) in John, thirty-eight involve some measure of hostility (e.g., John 5:16, 18; 7:1; 8:48, 52; 18:36; 19:7, 12; 20:19), which is all the more surprising given the fact that Jesus Himself was a Jew. John and apparently most of his readers were also Jews. In this case, "Jews" may have carried not an ethnic connotation but a religious one and would imply that at the time John was writing, Judaism and Christianity were parting ways. This might explain the emphasis John places on the identity of Jesus, His messiahship and divinity (e.g., 1:1–3, 15, 30, 41, 45, 49; 4:25–26, 29; 5:17–18; 8:53–59), which has always been the major point of contention between Jews and Christians. If this scenario is correct, John's Gospel was written not so much to retell the story of Jesus as to present Him as the divine Son of God and not so much to generate faith in Him as to strengthen the faith of those who had already believed (see 20:30–31).

John and the Synoptics. John is different from the other Gospels in many respects. Though sharing the basic outline of Jesus's ministry, as well as some sayings and incidents, the Gospel of John emphasizes Jesus's ministry in Judea, not in Galilee, reports at least three Passovers (2:13; 6:4; 11:55; cf. 5:1), instead of only one, and omits several important episodes of Jesus's life, including His birth, baptism, transfiguration, casting out of demons, and agony in Gethsemane. The Last Supper and the prophetic discourse (Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21) are also missing. Another difference is the portrait of Jesus Himself. Central emphases in John, such as Jesus's full divinity and preexistence, are virtually absent from Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and the miracles performed by Jesus are more extraordinary than those reported by the other Evangelists. Those concentrated mostly on healings and casting out demons, while in John the predominance is of miracles that are contrary to nature (e.g., turning water into wine, feeding the five thousand, walking on the water, healing the man born blind). In the Gospel of John, the Evangelist does not record Jesus's parables or short sayings but instead emphasizes His long and thoughtful discourses. John also constantly uses words that are scarcely used in the other Gospels (e.g., love, truth, know, world, abide, judge, send, witness), and he records Jesus speaking of Himself metaphorically as the Bread of Heaven, the True Vine, the Good Shepherd, the Door, and the Light of the World.

How do we account for such differences? On one hand, there is no question that Jesus was too great of a teacher to limit Himself to only one teaching style or vocabulary. Possibly, when addressing the crowds in Galilee, He used a more dynamic and parabolic style than when talking to the more educated people of Jerusalem or to His own disciples. On the other hand, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that John offers a larger amount of theological insights than do the Synoptics. This is why, comparatively speaking, John has much less biographical material than the other Gospels—roughly, 40 percent less than Mark, 50 percent less than Matthew, and 60 percent less than Luke—despite being much longer than Mark, and almost as long as Matthew and Luke. In other words, John does contain biographical information as he tells the story of Jesus. He even seems to follow a stricter chronological framework in his account of that story. What concerns John the most, however, is not the story per se, but its significance for the life and faith of the church. This also means that, differently from the Synoptics, John's writing is not from the perspective of Jesus's time but from the perspective of his own contemporary situation. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit (John 14:26; 15:26; 16:13–14), he both remembers and retells the gospel episodes that were more congenial to the situation in which he found himself at the time of his writing.

Theology. In a sense, all of the four Gospels are theological, but in John's Gospel theology plays a more central role than in the others, so much so that while the Synoptics could be defined as theological biographies, John is perhaps best viewed as biographical theology. John's Gospel manifests his awareness of the greatness of Jesus's ministry (20:30–31; cf. 21:25), but he was not there just to recount the gospel story; he applied that story to the needs of the church. And he did so with great skill and authority. His Gospel is a masterpiece of early Christian theology. Behind its simplicity of language and style, there lies a profound, well-crafted, and stimulating theological presentation of Jesus (and other issues) that has proven to be vital for the Christian understanding of the person and work of Jesus. Some of John's main theological emphases are the following:

1. Jesus Christ. John's Christology is the highest one in the NT in the sense that it stresses the divinity of Jesus more clearly and consistently than does any other apostolic writing. In writing his Gospel, John does not deny or downplay Jesus's humanity (1:14; 4:6; 11:33–35; 12:27; 13:21; 19:28; 20:20, 27; cf. 1 John 4:2; 2 John 7), but it is His divine nature and origin that he wants to demonstrate. In the statement of purpose he says, "These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ [or Messiah], the Son [huios] of God" (John 20:31). "Christ" is the Greek word for the Hebrew "Messiah" (cf. 1:41; 4:25), and "Son of God" in John means that Jesus is "equal with God" (5:17–18) or as divine as is God (the Father; cf. 10:29–33, 36). Perhaps this is why, when talking of the childhood of the believer, John uses teknon ("child") rather than huios ("son/descendant"; 1:12; 11:52; cf. 1 John 3:1, 2, 10; 5:2). While Jesus is "Son" in the sense of possessing the same nature of God, the believer is "child" as a result of his or her faith in Jesus and through the action of the Holy Spirit (John 1:12–13; 3:3–7).

John also explicitly refers to Jesus as God—something that does not happen in any of the Synoptics—and this reference appears already in the opening verses of his Gospel (1:1–3). There we find three important affirmations concerning the divine nature of Jesus. The first is His preexistence, which is clearly stated in the very first sentence of the Gospel: "In the beginning was the Word" (v. 1a). This "beginning" is certainly the "beginning" of Genesis 1:1, that is, the point at which God created the heavens and the earth. At that point, Jesus, who is here referred to as "Word" (logos), already existed. He did not become; He "was." Other statements of Jesus's preexistence in John include 1:15; 8:58; 17:5, 24. The second affirmation is that Jesus is fully divine, which is the natural implication of the fact that He preexisted everything that was created. The "beginning" of 1:1 is the dividing line between the realm of God and the realm of creation. Jesus belongs in the realm of God. Before Creation "the Word was with God" (v. 1b), and if the Word was with God, it was because "the Word was God" (v. 1c). Attempts have been made to see in this statement a lesser God or a "god," but none of them has gained any credibility. From both the syntactical and the contextual standpoint, the statement cannot be read differently other than the Word was what God was. If the Word was with God, He was distinct from God, but as far as His attributes are concerned, He was fully God (cf. 20:28). This is why Jesus could say that He and His Father were one (10:30; cf. vv. 31–33).

The third affirmation relating to Jesus's divine nature in 1:1–3 is that He is the Creator God of the Genesis account, who created all things (v. 3; cf. Col. 1:15–16; Heb. 1:1–2). In John's Gospel, most of the miracles performed by Jesus are actions contrary to nature, and so they required creative power to be performed (cf. John 2:7–11; 5:5–9; 6:5–13; 9:1–7; 11:17–44). Since such miracles cannot be explained through natural processes, they testify of Jesus's creative power (cf. 10:25). After all, only someone who has life in Himself (5:26; 10:17–18) can create or impart life. John, however, goes a little further. Jesus is not only the Creator God of Genesis but also the God of the OT. No person has ever seen God (1:18; cf. 5:37; 6:46; Col. 1:15; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16; 1 John 4:12). But since the OT reports many people seeing God (Gen. 18:1–15; 32:30; Ex. 33:20–23; 34:6; Num. 12:8 [cf. Heb. 11:27]; Josh. 5:13–15; 1 Kin. 19:11–18; Is. 6:1), the only possibility is that it was Jesus who was seen, not God the Father. This is exactly what John says: Jesus, who is closely connected with the Father, has made Him known (John 1:18b; cf. 8:56; 12:41). In other words, God has always revealed Himself through the Son. Hence Jesus said that the Scriptures (i.e., the OT) testify of Him (5:39, 46; cf. 1:45). The issue here is not simply messianic prophecies but the real presence of Jesus in the writing of Moses and the prophets. So to the question, how divine is Jesus? John's answer is, He is Yahweh Himself, or the great I Am (cf. 8:58). This is the highest point of NT Christology.

2. Holy Spirit. Another important theme in the Fourth Gospel is the Holy Spirit. In fact, no other Gospel or NT writing has individually contributed more to the Christian understanding on the nature of the Spirit than John. While Paul and Luke provide passages that evince the personality and deity of the Spirit (e.g., Acts 5:3–4; Rom. 8; 2 Cor. 3:17; Eph. 4:30), John's Gospel makes an important contribution. In the Fourth Gospel, especially in the so-called Farewell Discourse (John 14–17), a group of five passages that refer to the Holy Spirit as Paraclete (paraklētos) are presented (14:16–17, 25–26; 15:26–27; 16:7–11, 13–15). This can be translated as "Spirit of truth." These are unique to John, all of them have to do with the coming of the Spirit, and they describe additional functions besides the ones found in the Gospel's narrative sections (chaps. 1–13, 18–21). While in those sections the Holy Spirit is mostly presented as a life-giving agent through whom God regenerates and transforms (3:3–6; 6:63) or an enabler for the fulfillment of the Christian mission (3:34), the predominant idea in the Farewell Discourse is that of an instructor, a witness, and a guide, concepts that provide evidence for conceiving the Spirit as a distinct person or agent who is closely related to both the Father and the Son.

Among the functions ascribed to the Spirit in the Paraclete passages are the following: teaching (14:26), reminding of everything that Jesus said (v. 26), guiding into all truth, and announcing the things that are to come (16:13). The Spirit speaks, hears (v. 13), glorifies (v. 14), testifies (15:26), and convinces of sin, righteousness, and judgment (16:8). He is also described as another Paraclete (14:16) who comes to take Jesus's place after His departure (16:7), suggesting not only that Jesus Himself was a Paraclete to the disciples but also that the Spirit would perform a role at least in some sense similar to that of Jesus. The company of the Spirit, however, would be more valuable to the disciples than that of Jesus Himself (14:26–28; 16:7), probably because He would be free of Jesus's self-imposed human limitations (14:16–17; cf. 16:8). In addition, the Spirit would come from God (15:26; cf. 16:7), that is, He would be sent by God (14:26), as John the Baptist (1:6; 3:28) and Jesus Himself were (e.g., 3:34; 6:29, 57; 7:29). The Spirit could also be known and received (14:17; cf. 7:39) as Jesus could (1:12; 6:69; 10:14; 13:20).

An essential aspect of John's theology of the Spirit has to do with the time of His coming. For John, the Spirit could not be given—in His fullness, of course (cf. 14:17)—before the ascension and glorification of Jesus (7:39; cf. Acts 2:32–34; Eph. 4:7–10), which would represent the Father's approval of the achievements of the Son (John 17:1, 4–5), including His triumph over Satan (12:31; 16:11). This is why it was convenient for Jesus to go, because if He did not go, the Spirit could not come (16:7, 28). The disciples, therefore, were expected to rejoice with Jesus's departure (14:28; cf. 17:13), as this would inaugurate a new phase in redemptive history (14:28). And the Spirit did come (7:39). For John, the coming of the Spirit was already a past event, which means that the remark in 21:24 about him testifying of "these things" makes him a witness to Jesus as much as to the Spirit and His powerful ministry in the life and mission of the apostolic church.

3. Eternal Life. The word zōē ("life") occurs thirty-six times in the Fourth Gospel, more than twice as much as in the Synoptics combined. This by itself shows the importance given to this theme by John. Out of the thirty-six occurrences, seventeen come with the adjective "eternal" (aiōnios), though without changing the essential meaning of the noun alone. That is to say, "life" in John, whether with or without the adjective "eternal," means the same: it is God's gift through faith in Jesus Christ (3:16). God is the ultimate source of life, but He gave the Son authority to impart it to those who believe in Him (5:21, 26). In fact, Jesus came into the world with the purpose of imparting life (10:10), and John wrote to announce it (20:31). This life, however, is not simply an eschatological gift but primarily a present reality, and here resides John's unique contribution on this matter. In the Synoptics, while the "kingdom of God" or "kingdom of heaven" is said to be both "already" (e.g., Matt. 4:17; 5:3; Mark 1:15; Luke 6:20; 16:16; 17:21) and "not yet" (e.g., Matt. 8:11; Mark 14:25; Luke 19:11; 21:31), the phrase "eternal life" is a future, eschatological blessing—something to be experienced in the age to come (Matt. 25:46; Mark 10:17; Luke 10:25). This was also what first-century Judaism believed, as the Fourth Gospel itself demonstrates (John 5:29; 11:23–24; cf. Is. 26:19; Dan. 12:1–2). But in John this future blessing is already made available through the ministry of Jesus (John 4:13–14; 6:33–35; 10:10). The eschatological dimension of life has not been entirely set aside (cf. 3:36; 5:28–29; 12:25), but the emphasis lies on its present reality. Those who believe in Jesus can have eternal life—or the assurance of eternal life—here and now (3:36; 6:53; cf. 1 John 5:11–12), even in the face of death (John 6:40; 8:51; 11:25–26).

4. Sabbath. In John's Gospel, the Sabbath is and remains the day of rest. There is no attempt to replace its observance or to bring this divine institution to an end. The controversies between Jesus and the Jewish leaders in the Gospel about the Sabbath have to do with whether it is lawful to perform healings on this day (5:16, 18; 7:22–23; 9:14, 16) and not with whether the fourth commandment of the Decalogue is still valid. According to the rabbis, a person could be healed on the Sabbath only if life was in danger. Jesus, however, was not bound by rabbinic traditions (cf. Mark 3:1–6; Luke 13:10–17; 14:1–6). The healings He performed were not secular work. They were an integral part of His redemptive mission (John 5:14, 17, 19–21; 10:25, 32, 37–38; cf. Matt. 9:2; Luke 17:19; 18:42), and as such they did not contradict the divine purpose of the Sabbath.

When it comes to the death and resurrection of Jesus, no change of paradigm can be found concerning the day of rest: Friday was still the day of preparation, which means that the Sabbath commandment still preserved its full force (John 19:14, 42). Had the believers of John's time been exempt from keeping this commandment, it would have been natural to expect the apostle to refer to this (cf. Luke 23:56) considering that the book was written at the end of the first century. It is often said that it was the resurrection that determined the change from Sabbath to Sunday as the day of worship, but no biblical evidence can be adduced in support of such a claim. Despite the importance the NT writers ascribe to Jesus's resurrection (cf. 1 Cor. 15:13–18, 20–23), none of them calls for a celebration of this event on Sunday or any other day in particular. As for the appearances of Jesus on the day He resurrected, neither in John nor in the Synoptics (John 20:11–18, 19–23; cf. Luke 24:13–35, 36–43), no pattern can be established to justify a new worship theology. For John, the Sabbath continued to be the memorial of Creation (cf. Rev. 14:6–7), and—because Jesus rested in the grave on this day—also the memorial of God's redemptive work for fallen humanity.

5. Sanctuary. In John, most of the times that the temple is mentioned, the reference is to the temple of Jerusalem in connection to Jesus's ministry (John 2:13–21; 7:14, 28; 8:2, 20, 59; 10:23; 11:56; 18:20). There is also a reference to Jesus Himself as the temple (2:19–21), thus suggesting a christological fulfillment of the tabernacle/temple typology for God's presence on earth, the place through which He dwelt among His people (Ex. 25:8) and manifested His glory (Ex. 40:34–35; cf. 1 Kin. 8:10–11; 2 Chr. 7:1–3). The book of Revelation contains the eschatological fulfillment of such typology (Rev. 21:3, 22). The christological understanding of the temple in John 2:19–21 echoes the more subtle reference in 1:14. The verb skēnoō ("to dwell") in the context of Christ's incarnation and the manifestation of His glory points back to the wilderness tabernacle (skēnē), the portable sanctuary prototype of the temple in Jerusalem and the ancient dwelling place of God in Israel. It is interesting that as the presence of a holy God among a sinful people required a means of atonement (Ex. 29:42–46; cf. Lev. 26:9–13), so Jesus is presented in John's Gospel not only as the tabernacle of God's presence among us but also as "the Lamb of God" who atones for the sin of the world (John 1:29, 36). It was such provision of grace that allowed sinners to be in His presence and behold His divine glory (vv. 14, 16).

John also has at least one reference to the heavenly sanctuary. When trying to comfort the disciples the night before His death, Jesus said that He was going to "prepare a place" for them in His Father's house and then would come back to gather believers and take them to heaven (14:2–3). There seems to be no question that the "Father's house" refers to the eternal dwelling place of God in heaven, the heavenly sanctuary (Pss. 11:4; 102:19; Mic. 1:2–3; cf. Ex. 25:9, 40; Heb. 9:23–24; Rev. 11:19; 15:5), which is also the final dwelling place of the redeemed (John 17:24; Rev. 21:3; cf. Pss. 23:6; 27:4). The passage includes a pictorial description of the abundance of space in the Father's house. And since the immediate context has to do with access to God (cf. John 14:4–6), the passage in fact is about the intercessory ministry of Jesus in the heavenly sanctuary (cf. Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1), at the end of which He will come again to take those who are His to be with Him forever (cf. John 17:24).

6. God's People. Terms such as "God's people" and "Israel" are rare in John's Gospel, while "church" is completely absent. Nevertheless, the concept of God's people is an integral part of John's theology. It assumes the covenant between God and the Jewish people but transcends it to make it universal, according to its original purpose (Gen. 12:1–3). John 1:11 says that Jesus came to "what was His" (ta idia), but "His own" (hoi idioi) did not receive Him. While ta idia may refer to God's creation, contextually it is better to find here a reference to Israel as God's holy people. In that case, and based on the Gospel of John, "His own" would designate those from Israel who rejected Him (cf. John 8:33, 39, 42–43; 12:37). In John the privilege of being God's children is defined on the basis of one's decision in relation to Jesus Christ (1:12–13; cf. Eph. 2:11–22). But not all Jews rejected Jesus. The disciples accepted Him and became the nucleus of the Israel of faith—those who believed in Him—or His "own" (John 13:1). In chapter 17, Jesus prayed not only for the disciples but also for those who would come to believe in Him through their testimony (17:20). This seems to anticipate the ingathering of Gentile believers, the universalization of the faith of Israel (cf. 10:16; 11:51–52), as already foreseen in the OT (Is. 2:3; 56:6–7; 60:6; Mic. 4:2; Zech. 14:16–17). The concept of God's people in John's Gospel, therefore, has an inclusive character (John 17:20–23; cf. 3:14–16; 4:42; 12:32).

7. Two Worlds. The theological structure of the Synoptics is dualistic in the sense that it entails a contrast between two ages—this age and the age to come. It is, therefore, what can be called a horizontal dualism. John's theology is also strongly dualistic, but his dualism is essentially vertical, not horizontal. The contrast is not between two ages but between two worlds—the world above and the world below, which is this world. Jesus told the Jews that they were from below and contrasted them with Himself: "I am from above. You are of this world; I am not of this world" (8:23). The world above is where the Father is (16:28), while this world is the realm of sin and darkness (1:29; 12:46), whose ruler is Satan himself (12:31; 14:30). Nevertheless, this world is the object of God's infinite love (3:16), and so He sent His own Son to save it, not to condemn it (3:17; 12:47; cf. 4:42; 6:33; 1 John 4:14), though the ruler of this world has already been condemned (John 12:31; 16:11).

Jesus came as light to expel the darkness of sin (8:12; 9:5; 12:46), enlighten humankind (1:9; 8:12), bear witness to the truth (18:37), and rescue those who live in darkness (12:46). He expected them to believe in the light so that they could become children of light (12:36, 46). The world at large, however, did not believe in the light and because of their sinfulness preferred darkness (3:19–20). But those who did believe experienced a new, spiritual birth, a birth from God (1:12–13; cf. 1 John 5:1). Consequently, their status changed and they were no longer counted as part of this world (John 15:19; 17:6, 14; cf. 13:1). They were in the world but did not belong to it anymore (17:16; cf. 1 John 5:19). Jesus, who does not belong to the world, would go back to the place where He came from (John 6:62; 16:28), but they were to stay behind (17:11); they had a mission to fulfill in the world (v. 18). The world would hate them as it hated Jesus (15:18–19; 17:14; cf. 1 John 3:13). They would even face tribulations, but Jesus's victory was to bring them comfort and encouragement (John 16:33). Jesus also prayed for them (17:15) and gave them His peace (14:27). There was no reason, therefore, for fear or anxiety, all the more so because of the hope of His coming to take them to Himself to be with Him forever (14:1–3; 17:24).

8. Last Events. Despite the predominance of vertical dualism, horizontal dualism is also found in John's Gospel, though it is not as evident as it is in the Synoptics. The kingdom of God, for example, which is the central theme of Jesus's teaching in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, is mentioned only twice in John as an eschatological reality (3:3, 5). Even eternal life, as already noted, can be eschatological (3:36; 12:25), particularly in connection with the resurrection of the body (5:28–29; 6:39–40, 44, 54). What is now a spiritual reality will become an accomplished fact on the "last day," as John says—that is, when this age comes to an end and the age to come fully breaks in (6:39–40, 44, 54; 11:24; 12:48). The event that signals this transition is the Second Coming of Jesus, though Jesus simply said that He would come again to take His disciples to Himself (14:1–3). In other words, the Parousia (Jesus's Second Coming) is not as prominent in the Fourth Gospel as it is in other parts of the NT, but it is unequivocally affirmed as the object of hope (cf. 21:22). The judgment will also take place on the "last day" (12:48), but its result depends on one's response to Jesus here and now. He did not come to condemn (3:17; 12:47), but His self-revelation is so decisive that those who do not believe in Him are already condemned (3:18). In fact, what really matters regarding the judgment is not so much that we are sinners but what we do with Jesus (cf. 3:17–20; 5:22–24; 12:46–48).

9. Hope. The noun elpis (hope) does not occur in the Fourth Gospel, while its verbal form, elpizō, occurs only once (5:45). Nevertheless, the concept is there, and it is connected with both the resurrection of Jesus and His Second Coming, both mentioned in the Farewell Discourse (chaps. 14–17). In view of His impending death, Jesus tried to bring the disciples comfort and peace by promising that He would come back to them (14:18–20, 27–29; 16:16–24). This would be His return by means of the resurrection, which would fill their hearts with joy and assurance (14:20, 29; 16:20–24, 32–33). As for the Second Coming, the hope John sought to impart is bidirectional: it is our hope in relation to Jesus, and Jesus's hope in relation to us. The former results from the assurance Jesus gave the disciples—and all His followers—that at the end of His intercessory work in the heavenly sanctuary, the "Father's house" (14:2), He would come back to take them to Himself so that they could be with Him forever (v. 3). No other promise was as dear to the apostolic church as this one (cf. Titus 2:13), and most believers even thought that Jesus would come back in their own lifetime (cf. John 21:22–23). But in John's Gospel, and only there in the whole NT, the Second Coming is also presented as the supreme hope of Jesus's own heart; the hope of reunification. Jesus had expressed already (in 14:3) His desire to always be with the disciples, and in 17:24 this was in fact His last wish to the Father. Perhaps this is why Jesus's agonizing prayer at Gethsemane does not appear in this Gospel (cf. Mark 14:32–42). John did not want any other wish to overshadow Jesus's burning desire to live forever with those whom He created (John 1:3) and for whom He gave His own life (3:16; 10:11, 15; 15:13). The (eternal) reunion of creature and Creator at Jesus's Second Coming, therefore, will be the point at which human hope and Christ's hope will converge. This is the supreme goal of salvation.

COMMENTARY

THE PROLOGUE

John's prologue has been one of the most influential passages in the NT with regard to the church's understanding of the deity of Jesus Christ. From the literary standpoint, it introduces some of the major themes that are later explored in the narrative (e.g., life, light, darkness, witness, belief, world, knowledge) and at the same time summarizes the experience of Jesus (cf. 1:11–12).

1:1–5

Preexistent Christ

John introduces his Gospel with the same statement that opens the Creation story—"In the beginning" (Gen. 1:1)—in order to establish Jesus's divine preexistence and active role in creation. As in Genesis, "the beginning" is the point where everything starts, and as such it represents the dividing line between the realm of God and the realm of creation. By saying that in the beginning Jesus (the Word) already was, John clearly located Him in the realm of God; He preexists everything that was created.

Four times in the prologue, and nowhere else in the Gospel, John refers to Jesus as the Word (logos) (John 1:1[3x], 14; cf. 1 John 1:1; Rev. 19:13). Since Logos was such an important concept in Greek philosophy—in their speculations about their gods and their gods' relationship to the material world—it has been suggested that John used a term that was familiar to his contemporaries simply as a linguistic artifice to introduce Jesus, the true Logos. Others have argued that John's Logos points to the creative and dynamic word of the Lord of the OT (Ps. 33:9; Is. 55:10–11), which sometimes comes very close to being personified (Pss. 33:6; 107:20). A more plausible explanation, however, may be found in the Jewish Targums, that is, the Aramaic paraphrases of the Hebrew Scriptures that were customarily recited in the synagogues for the benefit of the worshipers who had come to speak Aramaic after the Babylonian Exile (cf. Neh. 8:8).

In hundreds of cases in which the Hebrew text speaks of God (Yahweh), the corresponding passage in the Targums speaks of the divine Word (memra). That is to say, in the Targums "the Memra [Word] of Yahweh" is a standard surrogate for Yahweh Himself when a direct allusion to the sacred name is avoided out of reverence. Considered against this background, John's references to Jesus as the Word are simply a way of identifying Him with the God of Israel. Thus, the God of Israel (Yahweh) was Jesus Christ (cf. John 5:39, 46). It is not that Jesus was first God, but then He was not. The point is that He is and will always be the self-expression of God—the Word of God. This will become even clearer in the third part of the prologue (1:14–18).

From the start, therefore, John made it clear that there is (at least) a duality within the Godhead. The Synoptics say the same thing in their own way (Matt. 22:43–45; Mark 12:36–37; Luke 20:42–44; cf. Ps. 110:1). Jesus, the God of Israel, was not alone in the beginning. He was with God (John 1:1b–2), and this is the God that the Fourth Gospel repeatedly (120 times) identifies either directly or indirectly as the Father; the first two occurrences are in the prologue itself (vv. 14, 18). Since He was with the Father in the beginning, before anything was created (17:5, 24), Jesus has to be as divine as the Father. This is the meaning of v. 1c. Neither the context nor the Greek grammar allow for a different meaning. The claim that the Greek text calls for the translation "the Word was a god" is completely unfounded. It is true that in Greek "God" (theos) does not have the article, but the conclusion that its absence always requires the indefinite article in the translation is not true. For instance, see in the prologue itself the following examples:

"beginning" (1:1), "light" (v. 4), "God," "John" (v. 6), "blood [natural descent]," "God" (v. 13), and "God" (v. 18). In addition, the translation "a god" would have polytheistic connotations, implying that the Word was but a secondary god in a pantheon of gods. The text, however, is rather clear: there is God (the Father), and there is the Word (Jesus), and everything that God is, the Word is (cf. 5:17–18; 10:29–33).

Everything that exists was brought into existence through Jesus (1:3). Nothing exists apart from His creative activity (cf. Col. 1:15–16; Heb. 1:1–2). He Himself has to be uncreated. He belongs to the realm of God, not to creation. He was the light that allowed life to come into existence (John 1:4–5; cf. Gen. 1:11–12). The present tense verb in John 1:5 indicates that the shine (phainei) of His light has never ceased. Darkness has never prevailed in His presence except when the light was rejected (John 3:19–20). Not even the Creator can change the fate of those who shut themselves out of the divine light. So the appeal is to "believe in the light" and walk in it (12:35–36).

Incarnate Christ

In common with the Synoptics, John starts the earthly ministry of Jesus with the account of John the Baptist. While in the other Gospels John the Baptist is the precursor of the Messiah (Matt. 3:1–12; Mark 1:2–8; Luke 3:1–18; cf. Mal. 3:1; 4:5–6), in this Gospel he is mainly a witness for Jesus (John 1:6–8, 15, 19–27, 29–31, 32–34), though his role as a precursor has not been entirely forgotten (3:28; cf. 1:22–23, 26–27, 31). John did not want simply to retell the gospel story; He examines its significance. Thus, in addition to John the Baptist, he lists several other witnesses who were able to testify on behalf of Jesus: the Father (5:37; 8:18); the Holy Spirit (15:26); Jesus Himself (8:14, 18); His works (5:36; 10:25; 14:11; 15:24); those with whom Jesus came into contact (4:39; 9:25, 38; 12:17); John himself, as Jesus's most beloved disciple (19:35; 21:24); and the Scripture as a whole (1:45; 5:39, 46; 12:41). When John wrote his Gospel, Christianity was on trial so to speak (see John: Introduction), and the main charges centered on Jesus's messianic and divine claims. This Gospel is a powerful defense of those claims (cf. 20:30–31).

Despite being spoken of in a highly favored manner (1:6–7, 31, 33–34; 3:29; 5:35; 10:41), John the Baptist was not the light referenced (1:8). He was a light (5:35) but not the "true" Light (1:9). The adjective "true" (alēthinos) implies not that the Baptist was a false light but that he was only an imperfect or temporary light. Only Jesus can say, "I am the light of the world" (8:12; 9:5; cf. 12:46) in an absolute sense. Obviously, every believer can in his or her own sphere of influence be a light to illuminate others' lives (Matt. 5:14–16). The OT describes the coming of the Messiah in terms of light (Num. 24:17; Is. 9:2; 42:6–7; Mal. 4:2). By saying that Jesus is the "true" Light (John 1:9) as well as "the true bread from heaven" (6:32) and "the true vine" (15:1), John probably wanted to present Jesus as the fulfillment of OT expectations and hopes. In all these passages, alēthinos underscores the climactic nature of the Christ event.

In v. 9, the Greek text is ambiguous. The verb "coming" could refer to "everyone" ("every person") or to the Light. If we translate it "gives light to everyone ('every person') coming into the world," it would mean that every human being is in one way or another reached by the light of Jesus. If we render it "the true light coming into the world," the emphasis would be on Jesus coming as light to give humans abundance of life (3:19; 10:10; 12:46; cf. 9:5; 12:35). In John, "light" is a symbol for "life" (1:4; 8:12). Both options are possible. The argument in 1:10 is highly rhetorical and destined to emphasize the irony of Jesus's fate. The world He Himself created did not know Him.

Verse 11 specifies even more the tragedy of Jesus's life and clarifies that knowing means receiving, which in turn is equated in v. 12 with believing. "His own" (ta idia/hoi idioi) in v. 11 is like a small circle within a broader circle. That is, what v. 10 says in general terms ("the world") is here narrowed down in a very specific way. The reference is to Israel as God's people, the people of the covenant. What John describes here, therefore, is the rejection of the Messiah by most Jews (cf. 12:27), but not the rejection of the Israelites by the Messiah. He came to them as the fulfillment of the messianic prophecies to transform them and the whole world into "children of God" (1:12). All the nations of the earth were being blessed, as was promised Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3; cf. John 1:12–13).

1:14–18
Incarnation and Covenant

The last part of the prologue explores the significance of the incarnation and brings the discussion on the divine identity of Jesus to an even higher level. Verse 14 is the high point of the entire prologue. The God of Israel and Creator of all things took on human flesh, entered history like a human being, and dwelt among us. In John, "flesh" means only human nature in general (3:6; 6:51–56, 63), without determining whether it is sinful or not, as it does in Paul (e.g., Rom. 7:18, 25; Gal. 5:16–21). By saying that the Word skēnoō (translated variously as "dwelt," "made His dwelling," "took up residence," "made His home") among us, John makes an explicit allusion to the tabernacle in the wilderness (skēnē), the portable prototype of the temple and the ancient dwelling place of God in Israel. As in the past when God took up residence among His people in the tabernacle (Ex. 25:8), which was filled with His glory (Ex. 40:34–35; cf. 1 Kin. 8:10–11; 2 Chr. 7:1–3), now Jesus Himself became the very reality of God's presence among us, and His glory was visible for all to see (John 1:14) through the miracles Jesus performed that testified to the presence and power of God on earth.

Jesus came as the monogenēs (v. 14—see below, "Only [Begotten]"). This term is used in this context qualitatively to express the unique relationship that Jesus has with the Father (cf. 10:30, 38) and does not imply that Jesus had a beginning.

Besides representing the ancient tabernacle/temple as the medium of God's presence on earth, Jesus was "full of grace and truth" (1:14) when He lived among us. This is the same expression God used to reveal Himself to Moses at Sinai (Ex. 34:6). It refers to His covenantal faithfulness, which is now made available through Jesus Christ (John 1:16). Then John makes the surprising statement that the One who appeared to Moses and revealed Himself as "full of grace and truth" was also Jesus (v. 17). This verse does not oppose Jesus to Moses, the gospel to the law, or the NT to the OT as some think. In the original Greek, there is no "but" between the two clauses. It describes only what happened at Sinai. As Moses was the instrument through whom the law was given, Jesus was the One who revealed God's grace and truth. In v. 18 the Evangelist completes the argument explaining that no one has ever seen God (cf. 5:37; 6:46; Col. 1:15; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16; 1 John 4:12). It is Jesus who has always revealed Him. John's point was that throughout the entire OT history, when many people are reported as having seen God (Gen. 18:1–15; 32:30; Ex. 33:20–23; 34:6; Josh. 5:13–15; Judg. 13:21–22; 1 Kin. 19:11–18; 22:19; Is. 6:1), it was Jesus Christ all along (cf. John 8:56; 12:41). In the Fourth Gospel, it is certainly in this sense that the Scripture—that is, the OT—testifies on behalf of Jesus (cf. 1:45; 5:39, 46). John was thinking not only about messianic prophecies but also about the real presence of Jesus in the OT.

Only [Begotten]

The traditional designation of Jesus as the only begotten son does not accurately represent the underlying Greek text of John's Gospel. If it did, John would have used the Greek word monogennētos instead of monogenēs. But monogennētos is not used either by John or by any other NT writer. This expression seems to have arisen at the end of the fourth century in Jerome's Latin Vulgate, and from there it passed to the KJV and other Western translations. Jerome used unigenitus ("only begotten") to replace unicus ("only"), which was the customary translation up to his time. Jerome used this particular expression to refute the Arians, who claimed that Jesus was not begotten but made. Monogenēs appears nine times in the NT, and Jerome rendered it by unigenitus mostly when referring to Jesus (John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9; cf. Heb. 11:17), while in the other passages he used the traditional unicus (Luke 7:12; 8:42; 9:38).

The Greek word monogenēs, however, appears to draw on its use in the Septuagint (LXX), where it is one of the terms used for the Hebrew yakhid, which means "only" (Judg. 11:34; Amos 8:10) or "precious" (Pss. 22:20; 35:17); yakhid is also translated in the LXX by agapētos, "beloved" (Gen. 22:2). This means that monogenēs and agapētos are to some extent equivalent, and this equivalence is also found in the NT: while John described Jesus's relation to the Father using monogenēs, the Synoptics use agapētos (Matt. 3:17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22). In both cases, the two expressions point to the unique relationship that Jesus has with the Father. Most modern translations reflect this and do not use "begotten." In referring to Jesus's glory in conjunction with that relationship, John wanted to emphasize not only the factuality of the incarnation—Jesus's glory was visible to all, particularly through His miracles—but also Jesus's divine origin and power. It is unfortunate that many of those who saw His divine glory did not respond with faith (John 2:11; 4:48; 6:30, 36; 9:35–41; 10:25–26, 37–38; 12:37).

1:19—2:12

THE BEGINNING OF JESUS'S MINISTRY

The material in this section, which leads into John's account of Jesus's public ministry, can be divided into three main parts: John the Baptist's testimony (1:19–34), the first disciples (1:35–51), and Jesus's first miracle (2:1–12). The episodes happened on seven consecutive days (cf. 1:29, 35, 39, 43; 2:1).

1:19–34

John's Testimony

In the prologue, the Baptist is identified as a witness, and here the Evangelist shared the testimony he gave on behalf of Jesus. There is one week of real time between John 1:19 and 2:1.

1:19–21. Who John Was Not. On the first day of that week some Jewish religious authorities, identified in v. 24 as Pharisees, sent priests and Levites to probe John the Baptist's person and activity. John's more combative and charismatic personality, combined with his powerful preaching, filled the people with expectation concerning their messianic hopes (cf. Luke 3:15). When interrogated, however, he did not hesitate to say, "I am not the Christ [Messiah]" (John 1:20). "Christ" (christos) is the Greek word for the Hebrew term "Messiah," which means "the anointed one" (1:41; 4:25). Questions regarding two other possible prophetic figures—Elijah, of Malachi's prophecy (Mal. 4:5–6), and the prophet like Moses (Deut. 18:15, 18)—also met with negative answers.

1:22–28. The Voice in the Wilderness. The emissaries, however, did not want to come back empty-handed, so when they insisted on knowing his identity, the Baptist shifted their attention from himself to his mission and explained it in the prophetic terms of Isaiah 40:3. He was the voice in the wilderness calling for people to "make straight . . . a highway for our God." The Synoptics report the same statement (Matt. 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4), with minor differences. John claimed to be a mere "voice." He was only God's spokesperson, the last one of the prophetic line (cf. Matt. 11:13–14), preparing the way for the real "Word."

Then the emissaries demanded to know why John baptized. The real issue was John's authority. The Synoptics inform us that he was performing a new kind of baptism, a baptism of repentance and forgiveness (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3; cf. Acts 13:24; 19:4), which was unknown at that time, and the Jews wanted to know under what authority. In his answer, as was typical of him, John again pointed to Jesus. In what follows, the reader would expect a remark saying that the Messiah would perform a different kind of baptism, such as a baptism with the Holy Spirit, as found in the Synoptics (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16). The fourth Evangelist stated that in a different context (cf. John 1:33). At this point, he wanted only to highlight John's testimony that he was not the Christ—nor Elijah, nor the prophet. He also revealed John's humility. Untying the straps of someone's sandal was the task of a slave; something that not even a disciple was expected to do.

The manuscripts are divided concerning where the episode took place (1:28), whether "Bethabara" or "Bethany." The latter is the earliest and most widely attested reading. In the third century A.D., Origen suggested an updating of the place name to Bethabara (on the west side of the Jordan), since there was not a Bethany known in his time on the east side of the Jordan. That this Bethany was beyond the Jordan means it was distinct from Judean Bethany (11:1, 18; 12:1), the hometown of Lazarus, Martha, and Mary, which is just east of Jerusalem (on the west side of the Jordan). Archaeologists working in Jordan in the early 1990s claimed to have discovered Bethany beyond the Jordan. While this may be the case, some scholars feel the site they have identified is not close enough to Galilee for Jesus to have returned there on a day's journey (1:43).

1:29–34. Lamb of God. On the second day of this week, John saw Jesus coming to him and then pronounced the famous words identifying Him as "the Lamb of God," who "takes away the sin of the world!" (v. 29). This saying, which is partially repeated the next day (v. 36), finds no parallel in the NT, though the book of Revelation frequently speaks of Jesus as "the Lamb" (e.g., Rev. 5:6, 8, 12, 13; 6:1, 7, 16). Although the two words are different in Greek (amnos in John; arnion in Revelation), they probably have the same meaning. When in his Gospel John combines the image of a lamb with the removal of sins, he was speaking in sacrificial or expiatory terms. He may have had in mind the Passover sacrifice (Ex. 12:3–11; cf. 1 Cor. 5:7), the daily sacrifice (Ex. 29:38–42), the sin offering (Lev. 5:5–7), or most probably the lamb of Isaiah 53.

The phrase "of God" could mean "provided by God" (cf. Gen. 22:8), but in John it is better to take it simply in the sense of "sent [or given] by God" (John 3:16–17, 34; 6:29; 8:42; 17:3; cf. 5:23, 36–37; 6:44, 57; 8:18; 10:36; 12:49; 14:24; 17:21, 25). The verb "takes away" (airō) implies the idea of substitution. The only way the Lamb can remove sin is by vicariously taking it on Himself (cf. Is. 53:5–6, 10, 12; Gal. 3:13).

In the next five verses (John 1:30–34), the Evangelist recorded further testimonies of the Baptist on behalf of Jesus, including the fact that he came to know who Jesus really was when the Spirit descended and remained on Him like a dove. This was a sign from heaven that Jesus was God's Son (v. 34). There is no question that this is an allusion to Jesus's baptism (Matt. 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–11; Luke 3:21–22), which is not recorded in this Gospel. In fact, it is highly probable that the events of the second day took place after Jesus's forty days in the wilderness, not mentioned in this Gospel (cf. Matt. 4:1–11; Mark 1:12–13; Luke 4:1–12).

The First Disciples

This section marks a transition from John's ministry to that of Jesus.

1:35–42. Andrew and Peter. On the third day of the week, John again testified that Jesus was the Lamb of God, and two of his disciples decided to follow Jesus. One of them was Andrew, Peter's brother; he was from Bethsaida (cf. v. 44). Andrew's companion, however, is unnamed. As noted earlier, this anonymous disciple was likely the Evangelist himself, the disciple whom Jesus loved, since he never refers to himself by name anywhere else in the Gospel. The quickness with which these two disciples transferred their allegiance to Jesus presupposes further instructions received from John the Baptist that are not recorded in the Gospel. The role of a true witness is to raise disciples for Jesus, not for himself or herself.

This happened at about four o'clock in the afternoon (the tenth hour; 1:39), which is implied by the custom of counting hours from sunrise to sunset. The time of day here specified was when the events of the day began to wind down and preparations began for the main meal of the day. The fact that they remained with Jesus the rest of that day suggests that they probably shared a meal together and may have even spent the night with Him.

What comes next belongs to the fourth day. On that day, one more person joined Jesus as His disciple: Simon Peter. This happened under the direct influence of his brother, Andrew (vv. 41–42). Each mention of Andrew in this Gospel has him bringing someone to Jesus (cf. 6:8; 12:22)—a mark of true discipleship.

1:43–51. Philip and Nathanael. On the fifth day of the week, before leaving the Jordan Valley to Galilee, Jesus invited Philip and Nathanael to follow Him. In the Synoptic Gospels, little is said about Philip. His name merely occurs in the list of the apostles of Jesus. In John's Gospel, however, Philip plays a more prominent role (6:5–8; 12:21–22; 14:8–9). Although he is Jewish, Philip's name is Greek (meaning "lover of horses"). He may have been chosen because he spoke Greek and because he was from Bethsaida (12:21), a city located in the predominantly Greek district of Gaulanitis. Bethsaida is also identified as the hometown of Andrew and Peter (1:44). Since the two brothers resided in Capernaum during Jesus's ministry (Mark 1:21, 29), the reference here is probably to the place where they grew up before leaving later in life, similar to Jesus being identified as from Nazareth, though he also moved to Capernaum (e.g., John 1:45; Matt. 2:23; 4:13; Mark 1:9; Luke 1:26; 2:4, 39).

Like Andrew, Philip found Nathanael and announced to him that he had found the Messiah (cf. John 1:41, 45). Since Nathanael is not mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels, he is thought to be identified as Bartholomew, who is always coupled with Philip in the list of the apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14). Since Bartholomew actually means "son of Tholomaios," Nathanael might be his personal name. Despite being praised as a sincere and honest person, Nathanael was at first highly skeptical about the messiahship of Jesus because he could not conceive of the Messiah as coming from Nazareth (John 1:46), a town with little or no significance at all in Galilean political or religious geography (cf. 7:52). Rather than enter into a dispute, Philip simply encouraged his friend to "come and see" for himself (1:46). This invitation to evaluate the claims of Jesus was not just for Nathanael. It is also a recurring theme in John's Gospel, recording calls for individuals like Nicodemus, the Samaritan woman, and Thomas to consider Jesus for themselves. Placed here at the beginning of the Gospel, it also serves as an invitation to the readers to also consider the testimony John set forth and to make a decision about Jesus for themselves.

What finally convinced Nathanael that Jesus was the One about whom Moses and the prophets wrote was Jesus's allusion to something that recently happened to him while he was under the fig tree. What exactly happened? The text does not say. If Nathanael was one of the followers of John the Baptist, perhaps he was considering the Baptist's declaration about Jesus (DA 140). Whatever it was, the realization of Jesus's supernatural knowledge along with the testimony of Philip removed Nathanael's doubts. He declared Jesus to be the Son of God and the King of Israel. While the reader will recognize the deeper meaning associated with calling Jesus the "Son of God," Nathanael used both titles in a messianic sense, as was common in Jesus's day. He acknowledged Jesus as the Messiah, the promised Davidic King (Ps. 2:7).

As impressed as Nathanael was, however, Jesus assured him that he would see far greater things. He would see "heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending" around Jesus (John 1:51). The promise, however, was not to Nathanael alone. The "you" in v. 51 is plural, implying that the vision is for all followers of Jesus. While the imagery is drawn from the vision Jacob witnessed while fleeing Beersheba, there is a significant difference. In Jacob's vision, Yahweh stood at the top of the heavenly ladder (Gen. 28:12–13, 17), while in the vision described to Nathanael, Jesus was the ladder linking heaven to earth (cf. John 1:51; cf. 3:13). The message is clear. Jesus is the one who unites heaven and earth. He is the one who had come to reveal the Father, and through Him God now had come down to earth to dwell among His people. It is not by chance that Jesus's first miracle appears as the next incident recorded in the Gospel.

2:1–12

The First Sign

This next incident appears as still part of the preparatory phase of Jesus's ministry insofar as it concerns more specifically the disciples rather than the public in general.

2:1–11. Wedding in Cana. The journey to Galilee must have occurred on the sixth day of the week, which is passed over in silence in the narrative. According to the inclusive mode of reckoning then current, "on the third day" (v. 1) brings us to day seven, that is, two days after Philip's and Nathanael's call. On that day, there was a wedding in Cana, the town where Nathanael lived (21:2). Although the identity of the couple being married is not stated, it was likely a relative of either Mary or Joseph since Jesus, His mother, and His disciples were all invited (DA 144). Learning that the wine had run out, Mary informed Jesus of the situation (2:3)—apparently expecting Him to intervene in some earthly manner and solve the problem. Jesus's reply is somewhat surprising: ti emoi kai soi (lit. "What to me and to you?"). This has been translated variously. Jesus also added, "My hour has not yet come" (v. 4). Although His words were not disrespectful, they contained a polite corrective. Why? As His ministry was beginning, Jesus reminded His mother that He had come to do the will of His heavenly Father (5:30; 8:29). His ministry would not be subject to the influence or agenda of anyone else—not even that of His own mother (cf. 7:6, 8). In this case, Jesus had already determined to act, but in a manner that was in accordance with His Father's will for His life—and in a way Mary would never have imagined.

In response to the situation at the wedding at Cana, Jesus performed His first miracle—or sign, as John says (2:11)—turning water into wine and saving the party from a premature and embarrassing end, and more significantly, demonstrating God's ability to turn what is ordinary in our lives into something extraordinary (see "The Seven Signs in the Fourth Gospel," p. 1417). The miracle is highly impressive; first because it required creative power and second because the six stone jars together held roughly between 120 and 180 gallons (450 and 680 L) of wine. There have been many attempts to find the meaning of the miracle, in which the stone jars, the number six, the water, and the wine are taken symbolically or even allegorically. According to v. 11, since Jesus revealed His glory in the miracle and His disciples believed in Him, the implication is that all the elements in the narrative must be taken at face value. In both the OT (Gen. 49:10–12; Is. 25:6; Joel 3:18; Amos 9:11–13) and other Jewish traditions, the coming of the Messiah was associated with the lavish outpouring of wine.

As for the nature of the wine produced by Jesus, whether fermented or unfermented, the following considerations strongly suggest the latter: (1) the Greek word for wine (oinos) by itself is inconclusive, as it may refer to both alcoholic wine and fresh grape juice; (2) there were already in the NT times several methods for preserving grape juice, so even if the miracle took place in springtime, about six months after vintage, there is no need to think that the wine that ran out was alcoholic; (3) the comment made by the master of the feast about inferior wine in John 2:10 was in reference to the general practice of the day—wine was mixed with water; (4) the good or best wine (v. 10) Jesus produced does not refer to high-quality alcoholic wine, but to the excellent quality of pure grape juice; (5) It is highly doubtful that Jesus would produce such a vast amount of intoxicating wine for the use of the guests—men, women, and even children—who were present at the feast; this would have made Him morally responsible for causing, extending, or perhaps even strengthening their intoxication (cf. Prov. 20:1; 23:29–32; 31:4–5; Hab. 2:5; Eph. 5:18).

2:12. Capernaum. After the wedding, Jesus and those with Him—His mother, brothers, and disciples—headed to Capernaum for a short visit. This is the first time this town is mentioned in the gospel story. According to the Synoptics, Jesus later moved from Nazareth to Capernaum (Matt. 4:13; Mark 2:1; cf. Matt. 9:1) and made it the center of most of His ministry. His mother is not mentioned again until the passion narrative, and His brothers (Matt. 13:55) were either younger sons of Joseph and Mary (cf. Matt. 1:25; Luke 2:7) or sons of Joseph's first marriage (see "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252). In the latter case, Joseph would have been a widower when he took Mary for his wife.

Coming back to John's chronological sequence, according to the Mishnah, a second-century compilation of rabbinic laws, the wedding of a virgin should take place on a Wednesday. If this particular regulation was already in force in Jesus's time—as some regulations were—and was followed in this occasion, Jesus's journey to Galilee would have started on Monday, after Philip's and Nathanael's call (John 1:43–51), and He effectively would have begun His ministry on a Sabbath with the call of Andrew and (supposedly) John, the first disciples (1:35–39). Peter would have joined Him on Sunday (1:41–42).

2:13—4:54

JESUS REVEALS HIMSELF TO ISRAEL

This whole section, together with the previous one (1:29—2:12), is entirely omitted in the Synoptics, which begin their account of Jesus's ministry only after the imprisonment of John the Baptist (Matt. 4:12; Mark 1:14–15; Luke 3:19–20). It covers approximately the first year of

The Seven Signs in the Fourth Gospel

Although Jesus performed countless miracles during His earthly ministry (John 20:30; 21:25), John chose to recount only seven specific miracles or, as he calls them, "signs" (sēmeia).

1. The Seven Miracles. (1) Water turned to wine at Cana (2:1–11); (2) healing the royal official's son in Cana (4:46–54); (3) healing the invalid at the pool in Bethesda (5:1–15); (4) feeding of the five thousand in Galilee (6:1–14); (5) walking on the water in Galilee (6:16–21); (6) curing the man born blind in Jerusalem (9:1–12); and (7) raising Lazarus from the dead (11:1–44). Why only these seven?

2. Significance of Seven. We do not know for sure why only seven, but the number seven seems to have been important since John also recounts seven "I am" sayings (6:35; 8:12; 10:7, 11–14; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1–5). He may have chosen seven since it is the symbolic number of perfection in Judaism, or it may indicate that Jesus is the Perfect One, the One to whom everything in the OT points. John refers to these miracles as signs because of their revelatory function. It was through signs that Jesus manifested His glory (2:11; 11:40; cf. 1:14) and made known His mission as Son of God and Israel's Messiah (6:14; 7:31; 12:18; 20:30–31). They were intended to validate His divine claims (3:2; 6:14, 29–30; 9:16; 10:25) and generate faith in Him as they reveal the nature of His kingdom (2:11, 23; 4:53; 9:35; 11:47–48; 14:11; 20:30–31; cf. 12:37).

The Cleansing of the Temple

The scene shifts first to Jerusalem and the temple, where Jesus celebrated the Passover, one of the main festivals of Jewish religious calendar.

2:13–17. The Father's House. The Passover was instituted at the Exodus to commemorate Israel's deliverance from Egypt (Ex. 12:1–28). It was celebrated in the spring and was immediately followed by the seven-day Festival of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:4–8). The first night of the Festival of Unleavened Bread was combined with the Passover (Ex. 12:6–11, 17–19); but by the first century A.D., the entire Feast of Unleavened Bread was commonly called "Passover" (cf. John 2:23; Luke 2:41–43; 22:1; Acts 12:3–4). John's Gospel makes reference to three Passovers (John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55), though another one seems to be required between the first and the second, which implies for Jesus's ministry a duration of approximately three and a half years.

All four Gospels have an account of the cleansing of the temple. The cleansing in the Synoptics occurs just before the crucifixion (Matt. 21:12–13; Mark 11:15–17; Luke 19:45–46), and in fact is the event that raises the fury of the Jewish leaders and leads to Jesus's execution (Matt. 26:61; 27:40; Mark 14:58; 15:29). John describes the cleansing at the beginning of Jesus's public ministry. Some scholars have been inclined to think that there was only one cleansing—the one reported by the Synoptics. If that were the case, they have argued, John's movement of this event to the beginning of his account of Jesus's ministry would be for theological rather than historical purposes. But major differences in wording, setting, and time suggest there were indeed two different and yet similar episodes.

The precise reasons behind Jesus's strong reaction in the temple court are not spelled out in the text. Sacrifices required animals, and not all who came to worship from far away could bring their offerings with them. Also, the payment of the temple tax was expected to be made only in the temple currency (Ex. 30:13–16). The people were expected to exchange their Roman coins for those of the temple. The selling of animals and the exchanging of money, therefore, could be considered quite normal in Jerusalem's life, especially during the main festivals. For Jesus, however, these things were incompatible with the nature of the temple and its worship, even if no dishonest gain was involved, as recounted in the Synoptics (e.g., Mark 11:17). The location in the temple where the incident took place was the outer court, also known as the court of the Gentiles, the largest section within the temple complex, which was accessible to almost everyone. That section, which was intended to be a place of meditation and prayer for all peoples (cf. Is. 56:7), had become a noisy marketplace. The lesson is clear: the ends do not justify the means, even if we are dealing with religious matters.

Jesus's attitude, however, also has an intense messianic connotation. The disciples saw His actions as the immediate fulfillment of Psalm 69:9 (John 2:17), but it may also relate to the prophecy of Zechariah 14:20–21, which indicates that the Messiah would make holy the temple and all in it, and there would no longer be traders in the house of the Lord. By His action, therefore, Jesus was not only seeking to reform the temple but also giving Israel clear signs of His messianic credentials and the new order He was inaugurating.

2:18–22. Raising the Temple in Three Days. The Synoptics have nothing equivalent to this section. After casting out those who were defiling the temple, Jesus was asked to validate His actions with a sign, implying that the Jews had also been able to discern in it some measure of messianic implication. Asking for signs was typical of Jews, as seeking out wisdom was among the Greeks (1 Cor. 1:22; cf. John 6:30–31; 7:31; Matt. 12:38–41; 16:4; Mark 8:11–12). Jesus enigmatically responded that they could "destroy this temple" and He would raise it up in three days (John 2:19). The temple had been under construction for forty-six years, since the time of Herod the Great, hence the "three days" sounded ridiculous (see "Herod's Temple," p. 1419). That must have been the end of the conversation, but the Evangelist explains that Jesus was referring to His own body (v. 21) and that after He rose from the dead the disciples remembered His words and were strengthened in their faith (v. 22).

2:23–25. Jesus's Knowledge of People. Every miracle Jesus performed was a display of His glory and a sign of His messianic claims (2:11; 3:2; 5:36; 20:30–31). The resurrection would be the confirmative proof, so to speak, of His messiahship (cf. Matt. 27:64) and would become the main pillar of the Christian faith (1 Cor. 15:12–19). However, nobody had to wait until the resurrection to believe in Him, and during that Passover week the Evangelist says that many believed in His name on account of the signs He performed (John 2:23). Jesus, who knew human nature very well, was not impressed by their sudden excitement (cf. 6:64). Throughout Jesus's ministry many are said to have believed in Him (7:31; 8:30; 10:42; 11:45; 12:42), but only a few remained in their faith (5:38, 46–47; 6:36, 66; 7:5; 8:45–46; 10:24–26; 12:37–41). Perhaps this is why we find in John's Gospel an implicit appeal for a faith that transcends the transitory and selfish effect of signs (4:48–50; 20:29). Those in the gospel story who focused only on Jesus's signs, instead of looking through them to what they really revealed, were the same ones who tried to make Him a King (6:14–15). Jesus invites people to have faith in Him for who He is, not only because He can meet their needs or expectations (6:26–27).

Jesus and Nicodemus

The conversation with Nicodemus explains what was lacking in most people's faith and why Jesus did not entrust Himself to them (cf. 2:23–25).

3:1–10. The New Birth. Nicodemus is introduced as a Pharisee. Further, he was a leader of the Jews, meaning that he was a member of the Sanhedrin, the supreme court of Israel, which at the time of Jesus consisted of both priests (who were mostly Sadducees) and Pharisees (cf. 7:45–52; 11:47; Acts 23:6). Impressed by Jesus's signs, Nicodemus wanted to become better acquainted with Him, but Jesus went straight to the point, telling him that one must be born again [anōthen] to see the kingdom of God (John 3:3). It has long been observed that the word Jesus uses (anōthen) has a double meaning ("again" and "from above"), and that both meanings may be intended here. Nicodemus, however, took it in a literal way ("again"), probably because he found it difficult to apply Jesus's message of a new, spiritual ("from above") birth.

The Pharisees were indeed very religious people who adopted a strict observance of the law—both written and oral, the so-called

Herod's Temple

When Herod the Great became king of Judea, he undertook a number of massive building projects. His most ambitious and best-known project was the reconstruction of the Jewish temple complex—a project that took more than eighty years to complete. The project began in 19 B.C. Before work began on the temple and its surrounding structures, Herod first expanded the platform or foundation on which the temple complex stood. Since the temple was not originally built on a flat surface, huge retaining walls had to be built to support the dirt needed to expand the foundation.

The construction of the temple itself was even more complicated. Since the sacrificial services could not cease, the new temple had to be built while the older structure was still in use. Since the temple was holy, Herod could not hire local craftsman for the work. He had to train one thousand priests to do the work. The temple itself was completed in a year and a half, though work on the other buildings continued for decades. Designed to host more than 100,000 visitors during the Jewish festivals, the entire temple complex covered an area of roughly thirty-five acres (.14 sq. km)—making it the largest religious structure in the Roman world at the time.

According to the Jewish historian Josephus, when the temple was finally finished in A.D. 63, just three years before the outbreak of the Jewish War with Rome that would end with its destruction in A.D. 70, eighteen thousand workers were left unemployed.

The Jews at the temple who questioned Jesus after He had cleansed it at the beginning of His ministry claimed that it had taken forty-six years to construct what had been built by that time (John 2:20). If the Jews' statement is accurate and the forty-six years are reckoned from the time when the work on the temple commenced, then the date connected to this event in John's Gospel would be A.D. 28—about six months after Jesus was baptized. This incidental remark would therefore testify to the historical accuracy of placing the cleansing of the temple in the Gospel of John at this point in Jesus's ministry.

"tradition of the elders" (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:3, 5)—and of purification rituals (cf. Mark 7:1–5). They separated themselves from common people (cf. John 7:49) and even thought that God was well pleased with their exclusive religious behavior (cf. Luke 18:10–12). Nicodemus's evasive question led Jesus to make clear that He was talking about a birth from "water and the Spirit" (John 3:5), which could mean only moral purification and inner transformation by the power of the Spirit (cf. 1:12–13). The church has always seen here a reference to Christian baptism, which symbolizes both (cf. Acts 2:38; Rom. 6:3–14; Titus 3:5). The point Jesus demonstrated was that those who are born only of the flesh cannot escape the limitations imposed by the flesh; this can happen only through the Spirit.

Driven into a corner, Nicodemus tried to defend himself with a question that served only to embarrass him even more (John 3:9). The teaching about the new birth, or the renewal by the Spirit, should not have been strange to Nicodemus (e.g., Ps. 51:10; Ezek. 18:31; 36:26–27). His problem was not lack of understanding but reluctance to apply Jesus's words to himself. To some extent, it seems easier for God to change a bad person into a good person than a good person into a new creature (cf. Mark 2:17).

3:11–15. Serpent in the Wilderness. Jesus was not talking about theoretical things but factual information. This only served to increase Nicodemus's embarrassment, for up to that moment he was not showing any willingness to receive Jesus's testimony. The new birth is elementary ("earthly things"), and by stumbling over such a basic point, Nicodemus indicated that he was not ready for further instruction about God's kingdom ("heavenly things"), which was available only through Jesus (John 18:37; cf. 8:14; 9:39; 12:46–47), not through Abraham, Moses, or other bygone saints who were believed in contemporary Judaism to have ascended into heaven and to have received special revelations on divine mysteries (3:11–13).

Jesus turned back to the new birth (vv. 14–15) and explained it by means of an object lesson, a story with which Nicodemus was certainly familiar since childhood: as Moses lifted up the bronze serpent in the wilderness to cure the Israelites (Num. 21:4–9), so would Jesus be lifted up (cf. John 12:32) to cure fallen humanity. In the final analysis, it is Jesus's death on the cross that makes the new birth possible (1:12–13). All that is necessary is to look at Him in faith.

3:16–18. Mission of the Son. What follows from v. 16 through v. 21 is a reflection on the meaning of Jesus's final words to Nicodemus. This passage probably records the words of the Evangelist himself rather than Jesus, as the cross and Jesus's mission as a whole appear here as in the past. There are also terms and expressions that are distinctly Johannine as they are found in the writings of John but not on the lips of Jesus: "only" (vv. 16, 18; cf. 1:14, 18; 1 John 4:9), "believes" in Him (His name) (John 3:18; cf. 1:12; 2:23; 1 John 3:23; 5:13), and to act according to "the truth" (John 3:21; cf. 1 John 1:6).

John opens his comments on the significance of what Jesus had just said (John 3:14–15) with a statement that sums up better than any other in this Gospel the purpose of Jesus's coming into the world. God's love is so wondrous that He gave the best He could: His only and beloved Son (cf. Mark 1:11; 9:7). It is also so immense that it embraces all humanity; nobody is excluded (cf. John 1:29; 4:39–42; 6:33, 51). And it is so powerful that its effects will last forever; the life it engenders will never end (cf. 4:14; 6:40; 10:28). God's love is not compulsory, that is, it can be enjoyed only when we respond with faith in Jesus (3:16; cf. 6:40; 7:38; 8:24; 11:40). Eternal life is a gift from God, but we can accept or reject it. In case of rejection, the inexorable result is to "perish" (3:16; cf. 3:36; 8:24). There is no other possibility.

Since Jesus came to save the world, not to condemn it (cf. 12:47), those who believe in Him are not condemned. On the other hand, those who do not believe in Him are already condemned (3:18). This verse does not teach that we cannot lose salvation (or condemnation). It only highlights the fact that the verdict on the final judgment depends on our present decision concerning Jesus Christ (cf. 5:22–29). In matters of salvation, the only time we can really count on is the present (cf. Acts 22:16; Heb. 3:7–8, 13, 15; 4:6–7). The past is gone and the future may never come.

3:19–21. Coming to the Light. In John's Gospel, the contrast between light and darkness advances the topic of condemnation. Christ is the true Light who came into the world to enlighten everyone (cf. John 1:9; 8:12; 12:46). If light is life (1:4), then darkness means death, not biological death per se but death as a result of God's judgment (cf. 3:36; 6:53; 1 John 5:12). Biological death is not a problem for God. Darkness in John is a synonym for eternal death. The only prospect for those who reject the gift of God's love, which is eternal life, is to perish (eternally). And those who perish will in fact reap only what they have sown because in practical terms they loved darkness rather than light (John 3:19). Eternal death is only the result of their own choice, and therein lies their condemnation.

People hate light and love darkness because of the evil deeds of the human heart. They reject light because they do not want to have their evil deeds exposed. The process may be painful, yet they are inexcusable because exposing the bad deeds is part of the healing process (cf. 3:14–16). On the other hand, those who live by the truth simply come to the light (v. 21). They do not fear being reproved because their deeds are done in God and this is what the light will reveal. Nicodemus is an example of someone who dwelt in spiritual darkness but did the right thing in coming to Jesus. In doing so, he moved from darkness to light (1:4, 5; 3:19–21; 8:12; cf. 9:5). Further along, the Gospel presents the opposite in the case of Judas, for he moved from light to darkness (13:30).

John's Final Witness

John the Baptist's final words recorded in this Gospel provide further evidence on behalf of Jesus.

3:22–26. Issue of Purification. After the Passover, Jesus and His disciples left Jerusalem for the country districts of Judea, where they baptized (v. 22). The Evangelist will make it clear that Jesus Himself did not baptize but His disciples did (4:2). This is the only reference in the Gospels to the disciples performing baptisms, a practice that was certainly inherited from John the Baptist. John's baptism was a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3; cf. Acts 13:24; 19:4), and so was (and still is) Christian baptism (Acts 2:38; 22:16; Eph. 5:25–27; Titus 3:5–7). In other words, John's baptism was a spiritual and moral baptism, not a ceremonial one. It was related to sins, not to cultic impurity, and was radically different from all other first-century Jewish washings, including proselyte baptism, the baptism of Gentiles converted to Judaism.

By this time, several months had elapsed since Jesus's baptism by John. John himself continued his baptismal ministry, though he had now moved from Bethany on the other side of the Jordan (cf. John 1:28) to Aenon near Salim (3:23). This overlapping between John's and Jesus's ministries is known only through John's Gospel, as the fourth Evangelist was careful in pointing out that these events occurred before John was imprisoned (3:24; cf. Matt. 4:12; Mark 1:14; Luke 3:19–20).

What prompted John's statement about Jesus was a discussion about purification between a certain Jew (according to some manuscripts, a group of Jews) and the disciples of John. Since several Jewish groups bathed every day in cold water for cultic reasons, John's moral baptism was open to misunderstandings by Jewish observers. When his disciples came to John, the conversation took a curious twist and ended up being about Jesus, whose baptismal ministry had already become more popular than John's. The reaction on the part of John's disciples seems to have involved some measure of envy and disappointment, but instead of stirring up rivalry, John maintained his resolute support for Jesus.

3:27–30. Friend of the Bridegroom. John's answer was an attempt to justify Jesus's success. It is not clear whether he was referring to Jesus or to himself when he told his disciples that a person can receive only what has been provided from heaven (John 3:27). If fewer people were coming to him—or if more people were coming to Jesus—it was because God willed it so (cf. 19:11) and that was exactly what God intended in relation to both. To demonstrate his argument, John the Baptist reminded his disciples of what he had already said to the Jews (1:19–28): he was not the Messiah, implying that Jesus was, and he had been sent as His forerunner. Then he uses an illustration taken from the wedding context to make his point: Jesus is the bridegroom, whereas he is only the bridegroom's friend. By describing himself as the friend of the bridegroom, John emphasized his subordinate position as well as the role he performed in the beginnings of Jesus's ministry. In a Jewish wedding, the bridegroom's friend was the equivalent of what we would call today the best man. He assisted the bridegroom before and during the wedding in everything and even acted as a kind of master of ceremonies. Having fulfilled that role, it was time to leave the scene, for the bridegroom must increase whereas the friend must decrease (3:30). This is an enduring example of humility and sense of mission. The faithful messengers of God will never seek honor for themselves.

3:31–36. Primacy of the Son. Since the tone of vv. 31–36 is similar to that of vv. 16–21, it is reasonable to assume that the voice here is also the Evangelist's, not John the Baptist's, though it was John the Baptist's testimony that triggered this new reflection on Jesus and His mission. Even if John the Baptist was divinely commissioned to be the precursor of the Messiah, he had an earthly origin and so could speak only of earthly things. He had received divine revelations (1:33–34), but he did not have the same firsthand knowledge of heavenly things that Jesus did. Jesus was above all, including John. The words spoken by the One whom God had sent are the words of God, for it is not by measure that God gives Him the Spirit (3:34). The receiver of the Spirit is not identified, but the context, including the next verse, identifies the receiver as Jesus.

The love the Father has for the Son lies at the heart of the Son's mission in the world (10:17; cf. 5:20; 15:9; 17:23–24, 26). It is because of God's love that the Son has come. Consequently, the fact that the Father loves the Son makes clear that the mission of the Son is also that of the Father (5:43; 7:28; 8:42; 14:10). Therefore, those who believe in the Son can already enjoy the gift of eternal life from the Father (3:16; 6:27, 33, 40). Those who resist the gospel message engage in an act of insolence (cf. Acts 14:1–2; Rom. 15:31). Therefore, those who maintain an insolent attitude toward the Son cut themselves off from the atoning benefits of His mission and remain fully exposed to God's wrath (cf. Rom. 2:2–11). This is the notion of retribution, which is integral to God's moral universe.

4:1–42
Jesus's Visit to Samaria

Having finished His journey to Judea, Jesus returned to Galilee through Samaria, where He spent two days, and many people believed in Him.

4:1–6. Jacob's Well. The scene next changes from the Judean countryside to the region of Samaria. The reason is that the Pharisees, who had serious reservations about John (John 1:19, 24), were beginning to show opposition to Jesus. Wishing to avoid an early escalation of opposition, Jesus decided to leave Judea and return to Galilee. The shortest route available was through the semihostile Samaritan territory, though most Jews took the longer route through the Jordan Valley. On His way north, Jesus stopped at the village of Sychar, near the field that Jacob gave to his son Joseph (cf. Gen. 33:19; 48:22; Josh. 24:32); Jacob's Well, which still exists, was located there (John 4:6). Tired from the long journey, Jesus sat beside the well about noontime. His tiredness and thirst (cf. v. 7) are indicators of His genuine humanity (cf. 1:14; 1 John 4:2; 2 John 7).

4:7–19. Samaritan Woman. While Jesus's disciples were in town obtaining food, a local woman came to draw water from the well where Jesus was resting. Jesus asked her to draw some water for Him so He could quench His thirst (John 4:7). Women usually would not come to draw water alone and especially not at that time of the day (the sixth hour, which was noon; v. 6). This suggests that she was deliberately trying to avoid running into anyone, likely due to a sense of public shame for her immoral life (4:16–29). Jesus's request surprised her. Not only was it not customary for a man to talk to a woman he did not know in public, but Jews did not associate with Samaritans for fear of ritual defilement. This mentality can be seen in claims from later rabbis who taught that all the daughters of the Samaritans menstruate from birth and are therefore in a perpetual state of ceremonial uncleanness.

The Samaritan people were part Israelite, descended from a mix of foreign peoples brought in by the Assyrians after the fall of Samaria (see 2 Kin. 17:24–34). They adopted the religion of Israel, which was a corrupted version because of Jeroboam's golden calves (1 Kin. 12:26–33; 2 Kin. 17:7–23); however, they were monotheists and accepted the Pentateuch (the first five books of the Hebrew Bible) with the expectation of the coming Messiah (John 4:25), whom they called taheb (the "restorer" or "returning one"). The religion of the Samaritans was corrupt (based, in part, on the religion of the Northern Kingdom, for corruption was the reason they went into exile; 2 Kin. 17:34–41), which meant that the Samaritans had to be avoided and thus had no share whatsoever in the covenantal mercies of Israel.

Jesus directed the woman's attention to Himself. Had she known who He was, she would have asked Him for "living water" (John 4:10). She assumed that by living water Jesus was referring to spring water or running water as distinct from water in a well or cistern (cf. Jer. 2:13). Jacob's Well, to be sure, was fed by a fresh spring, but that could not be the source of water about which Jesus was talking. Even today the well is over one hundred feet (30 meters) deep, and Jesus had no bucket to draw water from it. She saw Jesus as just another Jew, so her question about whether He was greater than the patriarch Jacob expected a negative response.

Later in the Gospel, living water is explained in terms of the Holy Spirit (John 7:38–39), and the meaning here has additional nuances. In the OT water is a symbol of God's salvation (Pss. 36:9; 42:1; Is. 12:3; 44:3), and people were summoned to come to the waters and drink freely (Is. 55:1). More importantly, by offering water that would quench thirst forever, Jesus was clearly making a messianic claim. It was in the messianic era that salvation would be extended to all and nobody would be thirsty or hungry again (Is. 49:8, 10; cf. 35:7; Ezek. 47:1–12; Zech. 13:1; 14:8). The woman, however, still failed to understand Jesus. Taking His words literally, she exclaimed that she would gladly welcome an unending supply of water because she would no longer need to come to the well (John 4:15). While Jesus was talking about spiritual realities, she was thinking about material things—the same mistake Nicodemus had made (3:4–8).

In order to open her eyes to the spiritual truths He wanted to share with her, Jesus took the conversation to a different level by delving into her personal life. Her life was a relational mess. She immediately realized that the One before her was not an ordinary person. At this stage of the conversation she concluded Jesus must be a prophet (with an indefinite article)—one favored with supernatural knowledge (v. 19; e.g., 1 Sam. 9:19; 2 Kin. 4:27; Luke 7:39; Eph. 3:5).

4:20–26. True Worship. Uncomfortable with the direction of the conversation, the woman attempted to change the subject to a less personal topic—religion. The Samaritans worshiped on Mount Gerizim, not far from Jacob's Well. In order for the Samaritans to justify their claim biblically, they expanded (in their version of the Pentateuch) the tenth commandment of the Decalogue (after Ex. 20:17 and Deut. 5:21) with a directive to build an altar on Mount Gerizim and reworded Deut. 12:5 to read "has chosen" instead of "chooses" or "will choose." They also developed a tradition that both Abraham's offering of Isaac and his meeting with Melchizedek took place on that mountain. In fact, at about 400 B.C., the Samaritans, who refused to worship in Jerusalem, built their own temple on Mount Gerizim. This temple was destroyed by the Jews in 128 B.C. Yet even today, Samaritans continue to have religious services (and even sacrifices) on their holy mountain.

Jesus transformed the topic that the woman believed would be a safe diversion into an issue of personal and spiritual relevance. The issue of geography, Jesus said, would soon be irrelevant, for more important than where people worship is how they do it. True worship is governed not by human preferences or traditions but by God's own nature. The reference to the Spirit harkens back to Jesus's dialogue with Nicodemus (John 3:5–6): only those who are born from the Spirit and live no longer under the constraints of the flesh can worship God in spirit. The term "truth" in turn points to the Evangelist's first reflection on the meaning of Jesus's mission (3:21): only those who live according to the truth can worship God in truth. Jesus was in principle announcing the end of the sacrificial system.

Though agreeing with Jesus, the woman tried to avoid the personal challenge that He placed before her by expressing the conviction that when the Messiah came, he would clarify all these issues. According to some translations, Jesus made the most explicit admission of His messiahship before His trial by applying the divine epithet "I AM" (Ex. 3:14; cf. John 8:24, 28, 58; 13:19) to Himself, as in His words later in this Gospel (see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430). The Greek here is egō eimi, ho lalōn soi (lit. "I am—the one speaking to you"); it is similar to the words of God in Isaiah 52:6 (John 4:26; cf. Mark 14:61–62). On the other hand, Jesus could simply have been indicating that He, the One speaking to her, was the Messiah. In either case, Jesus was affirming His divine identity as the Christ. It is significant that this admission occur ed not in Judea or Galilee but in Samaria. For many Jews the term "Messiah" carried so much political and military connotations that it could not be used without the risk of being misunderstood (cf. John 6:14–15, 26; Mark 8:29–30).

4:27–30. The Woman's Witness. The disciples' astonishment at finding Jesus talking to a woman reflects the conventions of the day. Because of a strict interpretation of Deuteronomy 23:9 that required God's followers to keep themselves from evil, some Pharisees would close their eyes whenever they passed by a woman in the street. They believed that whoever looked at a woman would eventually fall into transgression. According to some rabbis, men should not talk much with a woman, even if it was with his own wife at home. The rationale was that it would be a misuse of time that could otherwise be used to study the law. Jesus, however, was not controlled by such an ideology. He never shut His eyes to anyone. He never despised anyone (cf. Acts 10:34), no matter what the Jewish religious leaders thought of Him (Mark 2:15–17; Luke 15:2; cf. Mark 6:34). He came "to seek and to save" the lost (Luke 19:10), and nothing would prevent Him from doing that.

Besides standing in sharp contrast with that of Jesus, the disciples' attitude also contrasts with that of the woman herself, who rushed to Sychar to share the good news with the villagers (John 4:28; cf. Luke 19:39–40). The disciples still lacked the apostolic sense of mission, perhaps even the basic missionary spirit expected from every believer. Therefore, Jesus tried to teach them a lesson concerning the fields and the harvest (John 4:35–38). In her enthusiasm, the woman was able to bring many people to Jesus. "Every true disciple is born into the kingdom of God as a missionary" (DA 196).

4:31–38. Samaritan Believers. Jesus took advantage of the disciples' request for Him to teach them about His priorities, which also were to become their priorities (cf. 13:20; 17:18; 20:21). They not only lacked a sense of mission but also had a shallow understanding of Jesus's own mission. The Synoptics (and Acts) inform readers that even after Jesus's death on the cross, the hopes of the disciples concerning Him as the Messiah were politically oriented. They expected Him to reinstate the Davidic dynasty and free the land from Roman occupation (Mark 10:35–37; Luke 24:21; Acts 1:6). Jesus, however, came to save His people and the world, and nothing would distract Him from fulfilling His divine mission. His food, He said to His disciples, was to "do the will" of God, who had sent Him to finish His work (John 4:34; cf. 5:30; 6:38–40; 10:17–18; 17:4). Jesus came with a definite purpose in mind, and it oriented His whole existence (8:50; 9:4–5; 12:49–50; 14:31).

In the Holy Land, four months elapsed between the end of sowing (December) and the beginning of the harvest (April). The statement concerning the four months until the harvest (John 4:35) may have been a common saying indicating that things were to be expected not immediately but in due time. Jesus, nevertheless, asked the disciples to raise their eyes and see that the world was already ripe for harvest. Though the apostolic mission would be officially inaugurated at Pentecost (7:39; cf. Acts 1:8; 2:32–33; Eph. 4:7–10), Jesus was trying to infuse the disciples with the same sense of urgency He had (John 9:4–5; 17:18). There was to be no delay. The sowers had just finished their work—a possible reference to all those who came before them, such as the prophets, including John the Baptist, or perhaps to Jesus Himself, whose life would be sacrificed (the sowing) in order to bear fruit (the reaping; cf. 12:23–24). Now the time was coming for the reapers to do their part. God was allowing the disciples to enter into the labor of others and to reap what they themselves had not sown, yet they should rejoice because the wages for gathering people would be eternal life (4:36).

4:39–42. Savior of the World. The arrival of the Samaritans brings the story to its climax by exemplifying what Jesus had just told the disciples. The fact that many from the village believed in Him demonstrates that the fields were indeed ready for harvest. The woman's witnessing was effective not only because of the many who came with her but particularly because they had their own personal experience with Jesus. She had told them to come and see for themselves (v. 29), knowing that they would not base their religion simply on her conviction. They realized that Jesus was not only a good Man who lived an exemplary life, not only a Teacher with an interesting doctrine, not only a Prophet with a special message. He was the One who came to give His life for the life of the world (3:16; 6:33, 51; 10:11).

4:43–54

Jesus's Return to Galilee

After spending two days in Samaria, Jesus resumed His journey to Galilee, where He was well received by those who had seen Him at the Passover celebration in Jerusalem.

4:43–45. His Own Country. John's comment in v. 44 seems disconnected from both the preceding and the following verses. In order to explain Jesus's journey to Galilee, the Evangelist quoted the familiar saying of Jesus that "a prophet has no honor in his own country." How could this have been a reason for going to Galilee (v. 43) if Jesus was from Galilee and was well received when He arrived there (v. 45)? If the verse is interpreted in light of the Synoptics, the difficulty disappears. It is important to note that the Greek word translated as "country" (patris) can also refer to one's "hometown." In the other Gospels we learn that Jesus used this saying after being rejected in Nazareth, where He was raised (cf. Matt. 13:57; Mark 6:4; Luke 4:24). In this case, what John 4:44 seems to imply is that on arriving in Galilee, Jesus did not want to go to His hometown because He would not have been welcomed there. He chose instead to visit Cana again (cf. John 4:46), which was only nine miles (14 km) north of Nazareth.

4:46–54. The Bureaucrat's Son. While Jesus was in Cana, a bureaucrat came from Capernaum and begged Him to heal his son. Since Capernaum was roughly sixteen miles (26 km) away, the journey to Cana would have taken the man nearly an entire day. The Greek (basilikos) actually suggests that this man was a "royal official"—one who served the king, as most translations indicate. Jesus referenced the need to see signs and wonders before belief (v. 48). At the man's insistence, Jesus healed his son right away from the distance. This is Jesus's second sign recorded in this Gospel (v. 54; cf. 2:11; see "The Seven Signs in the Fourth Gospel," p. 1417). In the Synoptics, we also read of a Roman centurion who came to Jesus because his servant was sick and close to death, and Jesus also healed him from a distance (Matt. 8:5–13). But despite the similarities, these seem to be two distinct episodes. According to the Synoptics, Jesus also performed a third healing from a distance, that of the Syrophoenician woman's daughter (Matt. 15:21–28; Mark 7:24–30).

The most remarkable thing about the Johannine story of the bureaucrat's son is the lesson Jesus taught him. When Jesus spoke about unbelief before sight, He was probably revealing what was inside that man's heart. But instead of going with him, Jesus simply told him to go and that his son would live (John 4:50). This certainly was a difficult test. Jesus was asking him to believe in Him without a sign. Jesus does not always give what we would like to receive, even if we ask in faith, but faith is the necessary condition for us to receive.

5:1—6:71

THE RISING OF JEWISH HOSTILITIES

Chapters 5 and 6 occupy a pivotal place in the development of the Gospel's drama. The self-revelation of Jesus became even more challenging because of the ever-increasing opposition on the part of some of the Jews, particularly their leaders, both in Jerusalem (chap. 5) and in Galilee (chap. 6). The strong note of unbelief and defection at the end of these chapters (6:66) contributes to set a tone persisting through the closing of Jesus's public ministry (chap. 12).

5:1–18

The Third Sign

Jesus was back in Jerusalem, where He performed the third sign recorded in the Gospel of John, namely, the healing of a man at Bethesda on the Sabbath.

5:1–9a. Healing at Bethesda. Jesus went up to Jerusalem once again during one of the feasts; the second time since His baptism (cf. 2:13). The feast is not identified, though it could have been Passover. While walking through Jerusalem, Jesus stopped at the pool of Bethesda, located north of the temple compound, just outside the city walls. There were two large trapezoidal pools of different sizes at Bethesda that were aligned north and south of each other and surrounded on four sides by porticos, with an additional portico across the middle. It was probably in the shade of these porticos that Jesus found a man who had been sick for thirty-eight years. We are not informed about the nature of his sickness, but the way he was healed suggests he was either paralyzed or lame (cf. vv. 6–9). This man and many others accepted the common superstitious belief that the water was invested with miraculous healing properties and that the first person to step into the pool when the waters were supernaturally stirred would be healed. Verses 3b–4 are found in Greek manuscripts only from the fifth century onwards, making it possible that they were not part of John's original text, but were added in order to explain the man's comment in v. 7.

As for the stirring up of the waters, as recent archaeological research has shown, this was probably caused by the movement of water in the channel between the northern and southern pools. At any rate, Jesus healed the man by the power of His word and not by helping him to get into the pool before anyone else. After all, how could Jesus have validated the distorted picture of God implied in such a superstitious healing process? The common belief represented in vv. 3b–4 suggests that the healings at Bethesda rested on the principle of the survival of the fittest; the more selfish and stronger the person, the more probable he or she would get into the pool first, running over those who could not help themselves and actually preventing the most needy from being healed. God does not work that way.

5:9b-18. Conflict over the Sabbath. Jesus performed this miracle on the Sabbath. After seeing the man carrying his sleeping mat, the Jewish leaders immediately reacted. For them, this was a violation of the Sabbath—not of the biblical commandment of the Sabbath, however, as carrying a mat did not involve secular work, much less commercial interest (cf. Neh. 13:15; Jer. 17:21-22). It was a violation of regulations developed by the rabbis. According to Jewish tradition, there were thirty-nine classes of work that were forbidden on the Sabbath. Among them was carrying a sleeping mat or a couch, except in cases when a living person was on it. The Jews interrogated the man first, and soon they targeted Jesus (John 5:16). This is the first open hostility against Jesus recorded in this Gospel.

For the Jews, if the man was guilty of carrying his sleeping mat on the Sabbath, then Jesus was also guilty for healing him. The rabbis taught that healing on the Sabbath was prohibited except when life was in danger, and they were fairly flexible in their interpretation. This, of course, was not the case here; the man could well have waited until the next day. Jesus, however, was not guided by the tradition of the elders (cf. Mark 3:1-6; Luke 13:10-17; 14:1-6). He defended His action saying that both He and His Father had always been working (John 5:17). There are two important points here: God's continuous work and Jesus's divine authority. If God could work on the Sabbath, so could Jesus, on account of His equality with God, a claim the Jews did not miss (cf. v. 18). That God worked on the Sabbath was something that even the Jews admitted. Without God's unceasing care, the whole universe would collapse.

But the words of Jesus in this passage are related not only to God's sustaining activity but also to His redemptive work on behalf of fallen humanity. God is continuously engaged in the work of redemption, and this is what Jesus also came to do (3:16-17; 10:10; 12:27, 46-47). In other words, the Sabbath as a divine institution is not incompatible with Christ's work of redemption (5:19-20; 10:25, 32, 37-38; 14:11). The miracle at Bethesda included more than physical healing. Later on, Jesus said to the man that he should cease his sinful ways lest something worse happen to him (5:14; cf. Matt. 9:2; Luke 17:19; 18:42). More than one year later, when Jesus went back to Jerusalem for a third time (John 7:1-2, 10; cf. 6:4), the healing at Bethesda on the Sabbath was still an issue, and for the first time in John's Gospel it is stated that the Jewish leaders were trying to kill Him (7:9-25; cf. 8:37, 40; 12:10; 18:31).

5:19-47
Jesus Explains His Mission

The strong reaction of the Jewish leaders (v. 18) led Jesus to further elaborate on His relationship with the Father and the meaning of His divine mission.

5:19-24. Jesus's Unity with the Father. Jesus explained the healing at Bethesda in terms of His Father's and His own joint work (v. 17). This is what lies at the foundation of the important discourse that begins with v. 19. The first part of the discourse takes up the charge that Jesus was making Himself equal to God (v. 18). He did not reject the accusation. On the contrary, He continued to put Himself next to God in that He continued to refer to God as Father and to Himself as His Son (cf. 10:29-33, 36). What He did reject, though, and with great emphasis (5:19), was the insinuation that He was assigning to Himself the authority and freedom that belonged only to the Father in the context of Jesus's earthly mission. In other words, making Himself equal to God does not mean denying His submission to the Father during the incarnation. While fulfilling His mission, Jesus always acted in complete dependence and obedience to the Father (4:34; 5:30; 6:38; 10:25, 32, 37; 12:49; 14:10, 24; 17:4). To do otherwise would have meant giving up His unity with the Father and betraying the Father's love. In fact, all Jesus's actions were but an exact reproduction of the Father's actions because of His essential unity with Him (cf. 8:38; 10:38; 14:10-11). So two apparently conflicting ideas are present here: equality and submission—equality in nature (cf. 10:30; 17:21) and subordination at the functional level, the level of mission. As God in human flesh, Jesus voluntarily assumed a subordinate position in relation to the Father (cf. 14:28). Both essential equality and functional subordination are central to Johannine Christology and should be kept together. Neither of them should be underemphasized.

The argument, then, moves on to the issue of judgment (5:21-24), but still against the background of the healing at Bethesda. Giving life is a prerogative of God the Father (cf. Deut. 32:39; 1 Sam. 2:6; 2 Kin. 5:7; Job 33:4; Is. 42:5). No Jew would have questioned this. And it is exactly because Jesus is the Son of God that He is entitled to do whatever the Father does, including imparting life (cf. John 4:14; 6:33, 41, 51, 58, 63). So in John's Gospel the man's healing is put into the context of Jesus's divine prerogatives. And in a sense, this was an act of judgment for two reasons: contemporary Jewish theology saw sickness as a sign of divine retribution for sins—that is, God's judgment against sin (cf. 9:2)—and Jesus's works of healing were redemptive (5:14; cf. Matt. 9:2; Luke 17:19; 18:42). Perhaps this explains why in the Gospel of John, life—which always means eternal life—is mostly a present reality (John 3:36; 5:24-25; 6:40, 47; 10:10; cf. 1 John 5:11-12). In order to impart life, Jesus was both exercising and anticipating the final divine judgment on the basis of His divine prerogative. If life can be bestowed now, the verdict of the final judgment is given now. This does not undermine the reality of a future judgment before God, as is evident from other passages (e.g., Matt. 16:27; Rom. 2:6-11; 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10). It merely means that believers will not experience condemnation in the judgment. Condemnation or salvation depends entirely on our decision with respect to Jesus (John 3:17-20; 5:22-24, 38-40; 12:46-48). What really matters, in God's judgment, is our relationship with Jesus.

5:25-29. The Son Has Life in Himself. Again, with great emphasis, Jesus confirmed His previous statement that it is on account of His essential equality with the Father that He is entitled to carry on His saving ministry and to bring life and judgment to the world. Most first-century Jews believed in resurrection and eternal life, but always in connection with the age to come as a future, eschatological blessing (cf. 11:23-24). For Jesus, however, the new age had already begun. Through Him the future is here. Not that He is blurring the distinction between present and future, transitory life and eternal life, but that through His redemptive activities, death as the everlasting condemnation for sin (cf. 8:24) has been superseded and eternal life can—in principle—be anticipated here and now irrespective of what will happen to our transitory life (cf. 6:40; 8:51-52; 11:25-26).

The same applies to the concept of judgment. The emphasis also falls on its present aspect. This does not mean, however, that John has done away with the concepts of eschatological resurrection and final judgment—not at all. Though his Gospel here manifests more concern with the present than with the future, the present is only an anticipation of the future, which means that those who die before the closing of this age will not be forgotten. They will hear the voice of the Son of Man, and doers of good will resurrect to a never-ending life, and evildoers will receive their final condemnation (kriseōs; 5:28-29; see "Son of Man," p. 1428). These verses do not teach salvation by works but simply that at the final judgment, one's actions will be the indisputable evidence of a decision already made in this life (cf. 3:19-21; 6:39-40, 44, 54).

The title "Son of God" or "God's Son" in this context (5:25) is noteworthy. This is the first of its three occurrences in John's Gospel on the lips of Jesus (the others are 10:36; 11:4), though His use of the term "Son" alone to describe His relationship with the Father occurs thirteen times, most of them in this very chapter (5:19[2x], 20, 21, 22, 23[2x], 26; 6:40; 8:36; 14:13; 17:1[2x]; cf. 1:18; 3:16-17, 35-36). By referring to Himself as "Son of God," Jesus reaffirmed even more explicitly His essential equality with the Father as the basis for His works of redemption (cf. 5:17-18). The healing at Bethesda on the Sabbath was in full accord with His divine prerogatives, as was His entire life-giving ministry. If He can bestow life it is because, like the Father, He has life in Himself (v. 26). That is to say, the Father is self-existent, and so is the Son (cf. 8:24, 28, 58).

5:30-39. Witness of the Father to Jesus. Jesus's saving activities could be contested by human observers. From the perspective of the interpretation of Jewish tradition, He was a blasphemer and transgressor of the Sabbath. Nevertheless, He was fully conscious of the legitimacy of His actions in that He never sought to do His own will but only the will of the One who sent Him. And since He came from the Father Himself, His actions were in full harmony with what He had heard directly from the Father. There were no intermediaries such as Abraham and Moses (cf. John 1:17; 6:31-32; 7:19; 8:56-58). Jesus was greater than them because He had firsthand knowledge of God's eternal mysteries. Notwithstanding, He would not testify on His own behalf, neither would He rely on John the Baptist's testimony only (5:31, 33; cf. 1:19-27). Jesus had in His favor a testimony much greater than John's, and that was the testimony of the Father Himself, which was fully visible through His works (5:36-37). Words could be contested, but the divine works of the Son were tangible evidence that the Father had sent Him (10:25, 32, 37-38; 14:11; cf. 15:24), though the Father Himself had never been heard or seen (1:18; 6:46; 1 John 4:12; cf. Col. 1:15;

1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16). God's own Word (the Scriptures of the OT) had been neglected. The Greek of John 5:39 is ambiguous; it could be read as indicative, "You study the Scriptures," or as imperative, "Search the Scriptures." While the latter emphasis is an important part of Jesus's teachings, including in this passage (John 5:46; Matt. 13:52; Luke 16:29–31; 24:27), the former nuance better fits the context (John 5:45). The Jews were constantly searching the Scriptures, hoping to find in them eternal life, but had the search been more diligent and met with true belief, they would have been able to see Jesus in the sacred pages. The Scriptures, like His works, testify about Him. Jesus was talking not only about messianic prophecies but also about His very presence in the OT as the God of Israel (cf. 1:1–5, 11, 14–18, 45; 5:46; 8:56; 12:41).

5:40–47. Unbelief of the Jewish Leaders. Despite God's witnesses on behalf of Jesus through His own works and the Holy Scriptures, not to mention John the Baptist's witness, the Jewish leaders were unwilling to come to Jesus to have life (v. 40). The problem was the human will. If the heart is not willing, belief is not possible no matter how strong the evidence may be. The Jews were ready to praise Jesus for His mighty works (2:23; 3:1–2; 7:31), but He knew that they did not have the true love of God in their hearts (cf. 2:24–25). Their enthusiasm was superficial and selfish (6:15, 26), and it did not take long for it to be replaced by suspicion and even open incredulity (6:36, 66; 8:45–46; 10:24–25; 12:37–43).

Jesus did not come apart from the Father. He had come in His Father's name (5:43)—under His Father's authority and according to His sovereign plan. His mission was not an ordinary one. The Jewish leaders claimed to follow Moses and were proud of that (9:28–29). They trusted him and had set their hope on him (5:45). They had developed a peculiar system based to some extent on formalities that in some cases led to self-glorification (cf. Matt. 6:1–2, 5; 23:28). But it was Moses himself (i.e., his writings) who would stand at the final judgment as a witness against them. He wrote about Jesus (cf. John 1:45), and yet they did not believe in Him. This thought parallels that of 5:39. By not believing in the written words of Moses, which they constantly examined, the spoken words of Jesus about Himself, His relationship with the Father, and the divine origin of His mission sounded to them as blasphemy.

Son of Man

In John's Gospel, and even more in the Synoptics, Jesus often used the self-designation "Son of Man" (1:51; 3:13–14; 5:27; 6:27, 53, 62; 8:28; 9:35; 12:23; 13:31; cf. 12:34).

1. Background of the Title. Instead of referring to His humanity—as opposed to His divinity, expressed by "Son of God" (cf. 5:17–18; 10:29–33)—"Son of Man" is probably related to Daniel 7:9–14, where the term is linked with the idea of judgment and vindication. This seems to emphasize the decisive role of Jesus's ministry (cf. John 3:17–20; 5:22–24; 12:46–48), especially His death on the cross, in anticipation of God's final victory in redemptive history (12:23; 13:31) and the judgment of the world (5:27; 12:31). It is noteworthy, however, that in Jewish apocalyptic literature, the "Son of Man" became a messianic figure of heavenly origin and is further portrayed as God's Son and the Elect One. All of this constitutes the background for Jesus's use of the title.

2. Jesus's Use of the Title. Due to the political connotation the concept of Messiah evoked in Jewish minds at the time (cf. 6:14–15, 26; Mark 8:29–30), "Son of Man" seems to have become Jesus's favorite way of claiming messianic identity without giving away the notion of His death. There are a number of references, especially in Mark, that combine the "Son of Man" of Daniel 7 and the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 (Mark 9:12; 10:45; 14:24, 61; cf. Matt. 26:67; Luke 23:34; 24:46). Also significant is the fact that when identified as the Messiah, Jesus always responded by speaking of the "Son of Man" (Mark 8:29–31; 13:21–22, 26; 14:61–62; cf. John 9:35–38). The only occasions in which Jesus acknowledged Himself to be the Messiah/Christ using that specific term were when He was in Samaria (John 4:25–26), in Caesarea Philippi (Matt. 16:13–20; Mark 8:29–30; Luke 9:18–21)—both outside the Jewish borders, and in the latter case, to the Twelve only (by implication in John 10:24–25)—and before the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:63–64; Mark 14:60–63; Luke 22:67–70) the very day He died.

The Bread from Heaven

As in chapter 5, chapter 6 begins with a miracle (a double miracle) and continues with a lengthy section about Jesus's confrontation with the Jews because of their unbelief. The Passover was near, apparently the third one since Jesus started His ministry (cf. 2:13; 5:1). There is no indication that He went to Jerusalem this time for the celebrations.

6:1–15. Feeding the Five Thousand. This is the only miracle of Jesus recorded in all four Gospels (cf. Matt. 14:13–21; Mark 6:30–44; Luke 9:10–17) and is one of His most remarkable. It happened on a hillside near Bethsaida (for more on the location, see commentary on Luke 9:10–17; John 6:16–21), which is on the edge of the Sea of Galilee, also known as the Sea of Tiberias (cf. John 21:1). It is actually an oval-shaped lake of fresh water about seven miles wide by thirteen miles long (11 by 21 km), and nearly six hundred feet (182 meters) below sea level. It is fed by the Jordan River, which flows through it from north to south.

The Creator God does not need preexisting material (cf. Matt. 4:3) to create (cf. Gen. 1), but here, perhaps to reward a young boy's generosity, Jesus was willing to multiply the five barley loaves and two fish to feed the multitude (John 6:9–11). The crowds, however, did not recognize Jesus for who He really was. They thought He was a prophet, perhaps the prophet of Deuteronomy 18:15, 18 (John 6:14; cf. 1:21; 7:40). The fact that they wanted to make Him king (6:15) suggests that they also identified Him as a political and military Messiah who would force the Romans out of the country. This was not the recognition Jesus envisaged. He knew they wanted to use Him to pursue their own ends (cf. v. 26); therefore, He decided to slip away into the hills.

6:16–21. Walking on the Water. There are two other accounts of this story (Matt. 14:22–33; Mark 6:45–52). John's is the shortest one. Mark 6:45 suggests, at first glance, that the disciples were headed toward Bethsaida on the lake, which seems contrary to John 6:17. However, when Mark 6:53 and Matthew 14:34 are considered in connection with the location of the feeding of the five thousand (Luke 9:10), it seems that Mark included a small detail of the itinerary that was not included in the other two accounts (which is a common occurrence in the Gospels). The feeding of the five thousand took place near Bethsaida but outside of the city on a hill (perhaps even on the western side of the river that feeds into the Sea of Galilee necessitating a crossing over via boat; for more, see commentary on Luke 9:10–17). Since all accounts (including Mark's) have them ending up near Capernaum in the region of Gennesaret (which is west of Bethsaida, along the northwest shoreline), it may be that Jesus first sent the disciples to Bethsaida (along the northeast shoreline) after the feeding of the five thousand before they set out for Capernaum across the northern tip of the lake.

Because the Sea of Galilee lies about six hundred feet (182 meters) below sea level, it is subject to sudden storms when the cool air from the mountains rushes in against the warm moist air over the lake. The miracle itself is not named by John as a sign (cf. John 2:11; 4:54; 6:14), neither was it a public manifestation of Jesus's divine glory. Its significance lies in the fact that it shows the power of Jesus over nature. His words, "It is I" (egō eimi) (6:20), however, do not at first seem to have the character of a divine designation (as in 8:24, 28, 58). These words may have been a self-identification destined to calm the disciples and encourage them. Nevertheless, the divine designation may not be totally absent from Jesus's meaning because He used the expression as a self-revelation in an extremely unusual circumstance—He was walking on the water (see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430).

That day the disciples experienced two opposing realities: from the mountaintop of excitement and hope, as they also shared the same messianic hope of those who were fed (cf. Matt. 20:20–24; Mark 10:35–41; Luke 24:15–21), to the valley of trials and anxieties. But Jesus was there to alleviate their fears and bring peace to their hearts. No matter how deep and frightful our valley is, Jesus will always be there with us (cf. Ps. 23:1–4).

6:22–29. Food that Endures. Still impressed with the miracle of the bread, the following day the multitude looked for Jesus and found Him in Capernaum, on the northwest side of the lake (John 6:22–24). They were surprised as they recalled that the night before there was only one small boat on the shore and that Jesus had not sailed in it with the disciples. By mentioning these details, John certainly furnishes indirect evidence for the supernatural way in which Jesus crossed the lake. Jesus told them to drastically change their perspectives and priorities, leaving behind their short-sighted and materialistic notions that controlled their existence (cf. v. 15). They were to work for the food that endures forever (cf. 6:33; Matt. 4:4). That food, which in this context stands for life, would not be theirs by a human achievement but was something the Son of Man would freely give to them (John 6:27). In fact, v. 29 clarifies that by using the verb "to work" Jesus means "to believe." In the Gospel of John, the only way to have eternal life is by believing in Jesus as the One who came from God (17:3; cf. 6:40; 20:31; 1 John 5:13).

6:30–40. Bread of Life. By stipulating a sign as a condition to believe in Jesus, the multitude confirmed what Jesus had just said, that is, that they were there for selfish reasons. Thousands of people had been miraculously fed the day before, and in spite of this they asked for a sign (John 6:30). They appeared to be merely looking for an unending supply of food. In fact, by reminding Jesus of the manna, the "bread from heaven" (v. 31; cf. Ps. 78:24), that for forty years their fathers ate in the wilderness (Ex. 16:35), they seemed to suggest that Jesus either repeat His earlier miracle or do something even greater. This gave Jesus the opportunity to affirm two important truths: (1) it was not Moses who gave them the bread from heaven, but God (John 6:32; Ex. 16:15–16;), and (2) the true bread from heaven, the bread that gives life to the world, is the one that the Father gives (John 6:33; cf. 1:14, 45; 5:39–40, 46), and those who receive it will never be hungry or thirsty again (6:35). This is truly a messianic claim (cf. Is. 49:8, 10) that combines two images: the bread of life and the living water (John 4:10–14). The condition of the people seemed to be hopeless. They had already seen the sign they were asking for, and yet they did not believe. Jesus clarified that believing is not a human achievement independent from God. No one can come to Him without divine activity in his or her heart (cf. 6:44–45; 10:27–29; 16:7–9; 17:2, 6–8; 18:9). Yet every person can decide how to respond (3:19–20; 5:40; 8:24; 12:46). These people were not responding favorably, and by not coming to Jesus in faith they are depicted in stark contrast to Jesus's obedience to the Father.

6:41–51. Complaint of the Jews. In most passages in John where Jesus met opposition, the topic is in regard to the origin of Jesus (John 6:41–42, 62; cf. 7:27–29, 41–44; 8:14, 23–27, 56–59; 9:29). As long as His opponents concentrated on His earthly origin (6:42), ignoring the divine, they would both continue to take offense at Him and be unable to enjoy His gift of eternal life (cf. 1:46; Matt. 13:55). The idea of John 6:44 parallels that of v. 37a. These texts teach not unconditional predestination (cf. John 5:40) but only that God takes the initiative in the salvation of believers (cf. 16:9; Phil. 2:13; 1 Thess. 4:8; see "Predestination," p. 1583). Those who come to Jesus are those who allow themselves to be taught by God (Is. 54:13). Being taught by God, however, does not mean having visual, direct access to God (cf. John 1:18; 5:37; 1 John 4:12). Only the One who has come from the Father has in fact seen Him because He is the Father's only Son (John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9). Hence the Son has divine authority to bestow eternal life on whoever believes in Him. The crowd was looking for a permanent resource of bread, like the manna, but all who ate from it had eventually died (cf. John 6:58). Only Jesus is "the bread of life" (v. 48) or "the living bread" (v. 51). Anyone eating from this bread would never die, because the bread that He would give for (hyper) the life of the world was His own flesh, an unequivocal reference to Jesus's substitutionary death on the cross. (For the same use of the preposition hyper in John, see 10:11, 15; 11:50, 51–52; 15:13; 17:19).

The "I Am" Sayings

The Fourth Gospel recounts seven unique "I am" sayings Jesus pronounced during His ministry, each with egō eimi ("I am") and a predicate: (1) I am the Bread of Life (6:35, 41, 48, 51); (2) I am the Light of the World (8:12); (3) I am the Door of the Sheep (10:7, 9); (4) I am the Good Shepherd (10:11, 14); (5) I am the Resurrection and the Life (11:25); (6) I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life (14:6); (7) I am the True Vine (15:1, 5).

1. Significance of the Sayings. These sayings are unique in that they not only emphasize an important aspect of Jesus's ministry but also describe the divine qualities He offers humanity. The salvation God promised in the OT was present in Jesus (cf. Ezek. 34:20–31). Jesus is the Light, the sustaining Bread, the Good Shepherd, etc. In addition to these "I am" statements, Jesus also had others not followed by a predicate (e.g., John 6:20; 8:24, 28, 58; 18:6). In these statements Jesus declared He is the Great I Am, the One who was before Abraham, the God of the OT (e.g., Ex. 3:1–20; cf. Is. 41:4; 43:10–13).

2. Why Only in John? Why are none of these sayings found in the Synoptic Gospels? Since these sayings occur in connection to Jesus's ministry in Judea, they appear to have been a more distinctive element of His ministry there. The principle method of His teaching in Galilee was with parables.

6:52–59. Flesh and Blood. The reference to eating Jesus's flesh and drinking His blood must have shocked the Jews. They knew He could not be taken literally (cf. Gen. 9:4; Deut. 12:16), yet that seems to be the natural sense of His words. The eating and drinking spoken of here are to be understood as a strong and vivid metaphor to denote the believer's complete appropriation of Jesus by faith. In John's Gospel, even in the present context, eternal life is the result of believing in Jesus (John 3:15–16, 36; 5:24; 6:35, 40, 47; 11:25; 20:31; cf. 1 John 5:13). It is only when we come to Him in faith, believing that He came from the Father to give His life for the life of the world, that we will have eternal life (John 6:51). There is also a connection in His words with the Lord's Supper. When we participate in the emblems of the ritual, we are symbolically eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Jesus—appropriating the benefits of His death for us—in order to renew our complete commitment to Him. His sacrificial death continues to nurture our spiritual life (see DA 660). The Jews insisted on physical bread, but it is only Jesus's flesh and blood, given as a sacrifice for us, that is real food that is able to sustain life forever. Those who feed on Him will live forever because He partakes of the Father's life. That these things happened in the synagogue in Capernaum (John 6:59) indicates that the entire episode from v. 22 on may have taken place on the Sabbath (cf. 5:10, 16).

6:60–65. Spirit and Life. Among those who heard Jesus's words at the synagogue, there were many disciples of His. In view of v. 66, it is clear that the reference here is not to the Twelve (cf. v. 70) but to a larger group of disciples (see 4:1). For many of them it became clear that Jesus was not what they anticipated. They were probably expecting a Messiah who would become the head of a revolutionary movement that would eventually defeat the Romans and drive them out of the land. For such a group, the words of Jesus were very hard to akouein (lit. "hear"), but this can also mean "listen to" or "accept" (6:60) What Jesus had said to them caused them to be offended or stumble (v. 61; skandalizō, "to make someone to stumble"). They had no doubts that Jesus was talking about spiritual realities, but He was demanding a degree of commitment they were unwilling to give. Jesus insisted that if they were stumbling at the idea of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, they would stumble much more at the cross (part of the implied meaning of v. 62). The text talks about ascending, which in this Gospel is a reference not primarily to Jesus's ascension but to His departure to the Father (e.g., 7:33–34; 8:14; 14:2–3, 12; 16:5, 7, 16, 28; 17:11), the cross being the first step in the process (3:14; 8:21, 28; 12:32; 13:33; 16:19–20).

Jesus, then, put His finger on the problem: the reason the disciples were taking offense at His words was because they had not been renewed by the Spirit (see chap. 3). They were flesh, and flesh is of no avail. Since Jesus's words are spirit and life (6:63), only those who are transformed or made alive by the Spirit can accept them (cf. 1 Cor. 2:14). John 6:64 returns to the theme of faith, making it clear that such a transformation can occur only in the lives of those who believe. Jesus knew that the interest of the disciples in Him was superficial, materialistic, and selfish (cf. John 2:23–25). When we block God's initiative and try to do things according to our preconceived ideas, God cannot accomplish in us the miracle of His loving grace.

6:66–71. Confession of the Disciples. This passage is placed at a critical juncture in the content of the book. It closes Jesus's ministry in Galilee and results in a shifting of His ministry to Judea, the heart of the Jewish nation. It sets the tone for the remainder of the public ministry of Jesus in the sense that the unbelief and rejection depicted here persist through chapter 12. It marks the end of revelatory discourses in the structure of the Gospel. From this point on we will find a series of encounters, conversations, and confrontations between Jesus and the Jewish leaders, which served only to worsen the opposition. Finally, this passage separates the Twelve from the mass of untrue disciples, and that culminates with the confession of faith by Peter (cf. Matt. 16:16). At the end of this chapter it is clear that the ministry of Jesus will end in betrayal (John 6:71).

This last point deserves further elaboration. When everybody turned away from Jesus, only the Twelve remained. In the end, there would be a few more (cf. 19:25, 38–39), but the disciples represent those receiving Jesus, believing in Him, and becoming God's children through the transforming work of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1:12–13). Peter's confession is noteworthy. In this context, "Lord" (6:68) is not simply a polite way of addressing someone (e.g., 4:11, 15, 49; 5:7; 6:34). It could be an acknowledgment of the divine status of Jesus (cf. 20:28). Peter may have not understood much of the preceding discourse, but by saying that Jesus has the "words of eternal life" (6:68), he seems to have correctly grasped the meaning of Jesus's words recorded in v. 63. In v. 69, some manuscripts read "the Holy One of God" instead of "the Son of the living God." The statement highlights His unique relationship with the Father (cf. 10:36). In a sense, the confession indicates that they had been chosen by Jesus. But Jesus knew that one of them would betray Him, namely, Judas. By referring to him as "a devil" (lit. "the devil"), Jesus expressed the truth that Satan himself would be the source of Judas's betrayal (13:2, 27), yet without canceling out Judas's own responsibility (cf. Mark 14:21).

7:1—8:59

JESUS'S RETURN TO JUDEA

Starting from chapter 7, the story moves to Judea and remains there through the end of Jesus's public ministry (chap. 12). The opposition of the Jewish leaders grew ever stronger. Both chapters 7 and 8 are filled with polemics, with the enemies of Jesus having more to say against Him than in any other section of the Gospel. All the objections, however, had answers.

7:1–52

The Life-Giving Spirit

While in Jerusalem, Jesus explained the significance of the Feast of Tabernacles in terms of the saving experience He was bringing.

7:1–9. Brothers of Jesus. In the first part of chapter 7, Jesus is still in Galilee, but the attention is already focused on His visit to Jerusalem, the third one since the beginning of His ministry (cf. 2:13; 5:1). With the increase of opposition, going to Judea became a dangerous enterprise, so much so that Jesus hesitated about the idea of attending the Feast of Tabernacles, one of the three great pilgrimage festivals of the Jewish year (Ex. 23:14–17; 34:22–23; Deut. 16:16).

The way Jesus's brothers are depicted suggests that they also thought of Him as a political liberator. On one hand, they challenged Jesus to perform signs in Judea, at the very heart of the nation, rather than staying in obscurity forever (John 7:3–4). On the other, we are told that they did not believe in Him. That is, they believed He could perform miracles, but they lacked a correct understanding of His mission (and Person). Their attitude was similar to that of Mary at the wedding in Cana (2:3), as was also Jesus's answer: His "time" had not yet come, but their time is always present (7:6). The word "time" (kairos) carries a qualitative connotation, pointing to the right time, the appropriate moment for something. This might be another instance in the Gospel where words are used with an intended double meaning (cf. anōthen, "again" in 3:3). On the surface, Jesus's statement may refer to the time for going up to Jerusalem. Arriving earlier with His brothers would certainly have given Him much more exposure than arriving later, when the crowds were already there. Besides, the sympathy of the crowds could have protected Him from the hatred of the Jewish leaders (cf. 11:47–48; 12:17–19; Mark 11:18; Luke 22:2). On a deeper level, Jesus may also have been referring to His time in redemptive history. Elsewhere this Gospel records Jesus referring to His "hour" (John 8:20; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1)—the hour of His glorification and return to the Father, including His death (see 6:60–65). Even if the word here is "time," not "hour," the idea is still present, especially in view of 7:7–8. Due to the increase of hostilities, going up to Jerusalem posed a threat to Jesus's life, and Jesus initially preferred to postpone His journey rather than have His mission cut short on account of the intolerance of the Jewish leaders (cf. 12:23, 27; 17:1, 4–5). (On Jesus's brothers, see commentary on John 2:12; "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252.

7:10–18. Jesus's Credentials. Jesus's last visit to the city had been about one and a half years before (cf. John 5:1). The Jews who were looking for Him (7:11) were certainly the leaders of the religious establishment of the day (accordingly some translations consistently render Ioudaioi as "the Jewish leaders" rather than "the Jews") and were differentiated from the people in general (v. 12). The people were divided in their opinion about Jesus. The Jewish leaders had a definite evil purpose in trying to find Him (cf. v. 1). Their antipathy toward Him had reached such a level that even the throng of pilgrims knew about it and feared being arrested for following Him (cf. 9:22; 12:42–43; 16:1–2).

The Feast of Tabernacles was kept for seven days, but Jesus did not appear in Jerusalem until the feast was halfway over. As soon as He arrived, He began to teach in the temple court. The Jewish leaders were amazed, not at the knowledge of Jesus (cf. 7:46; Matt. 7:28–29; 22:22; Luke 4:22) but perhaps at the fact that He was teaching as a rabbi (cf. John 1:37, 49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8) without proper and formal rabbinic instruction (7:15). It was a question of authority. In reply, Jesus identified the One who sent Him, the Father, as the source of His authority (v. 16). His teaching was not based on human knowledge and neither was He speaking on His own. In fact, Jesus argued, any sincere person, a person ready to do the will of God, would have the necessary spiritual acumen to know whether His teaching was from God or from Himself (v. 17). He was implicitly condemning the qualifications of the Jewish leaders and their presumed religiosity. That Jesus was not speaking on His own is demonstrated by the fact that He was not seeking merely His own honor and glory (v. 18; cf. 5:41; 8:50, 54).

7:19–24. Charges and Defense. Jesus undermined the religiosity of the leaders by pointing to their hypocrisy (7:19). These leaders prided themselves on the fact that they were the bearers of the law (9:28–29; cf. Rom. 2:17; 3:1–2). The law, they thought, was one of the three pillars on which the world rests—the other two being the temple and good works. Jesus differentiated between having the law and keeping it (cf. Rom. 2:13). The fact that they were trying to kill Him indicates that they were ready to violate the law they claimed to treasure so much (John 7:19). The people who were there, however, had no evidence of an assault against Jesus. They apparently concluded that He was suffering from demonic paranoid delusions (v. 20). The charge of demonization occasionally refers to insane behavior (8:48–52; 10:20–21; cf. Matt. 11:18; 12:24–27). Thus, their comment could be the equivalent of "You are crazy." Instead of refuting the accusation, Jesus revealed the real issue: the Jewish leaders wanted to kill Him because of His miracle at Bethesda more than a year before (John 7:21; cf. 5:18).

In His defense against the charge of breaking the Sabbath, Jesus resorted next to a well-known rabbinic argumentation technique called qal wahomer ("light to heavy"). There are several examples of this technique in the NT (Matt. 6:26, 30; 7:11; 10:25; 12:5–6; Luke 13:15–16; 18:6–7). It consists of the use of a less important situation (the "light" or "lesser") to justify a more important one (the "heavy" or "greater"). In John 7:22–23, the point Jesus made was that the lawfulness of circumcising someone on the Sabbath implied the much larger lawfulness of restoring the whole person on the Sabbath (cf. Mark 3:4). According to the rabbis, circumcision was so great that it overrode even the rigor of Sabbath observance. Therefore, everything needed for circumcision could be performed on the Sabbath. In rabbinic theology, circumcision took precedence over the Sabbath because it was regarded as the supreme sign of loyalty and adherence to Judaism. Had the Jews seen Jesus's miracle under the correct perspective, as an essential part of His redemptive activity, they would have understood that the bodily healing of a person was not in contradiction with the Sabbath commandment. Jesus was not arguing against the validity of the Sabbath as a divine institution. On the contrary, He was pointing out that His deeds of mercy were in full harmony with the nature of the Sabbath.

7:25–32. Is this the Christ? The arguments with which Jesus seemed to have silenced the dignitaries of the Jewish religion were so dramatic that some people assumed their failure to arrest Him was due to their recognition of His messiahship (John 7:26). But the people were confused with respect to the origin of Jesus. They knew where He came from, whereas in the case of the Messiah (v. 27), they believed, nobody would know where he came from. He would simply appear. Jesus, therefore, did not meet their expectation. His earthly origins were easily traceable. He was associated with Nazareth (cf. vv. 41–42) and His family was widely known (cf. 1:46; 2:12; 6:42; Mark 6:3).

Jesus admitted that some of their information was accurate, but He told them that in fact they knew much less than they thought. He reiterated that He had not come on His own (cf. John 5:43; 8:42) but was sent by the One who is true, the One whom they did not know (7:28; cf. v. 18; 8:19, 26). He knew Him because He came from Him (7:29; cf. 8:55; 10:15; 16:27–28; 17:25). Jesus was reinforcing the argument He used before (cf. 5:19–20, 24, 30, 32, 36–37). It was that argument, with its unmistakable claim to divinity (cf. 5:18), that raised the fury of the Jewish leaders and moved them to action. Their attempt to seize Jesus, however, was unsuccessful. The text does not say how Jesus escaped, but the reason given is that His "hour had not yet come" (7:30; see 7:1–9). As a result of the discussion, many people believed in Him (v. 31). They were ready to think of Jesus in messianic terms because they could not conceive of a Messiah performing more miracles than Jesus did. Jesus's signs were meant to generate faith (2:11; 12:37; 14:11; 20:30–31), but He expected people to go beyond their stereotyped messianic ideas (cf. 4:48–50; 9:41; 10:25, 37–38; 12:37; 20:29) and engage in a saving relationship with Him (3:3, 5–7; 4:10, 13–14; 5:39–40; 20:31), as well as with the Father who sent Him (5:24; 12:44–45; 13:20; 17:3).

The Jewish leaders had wanted to kill Jesus since the time of the healing at Bethesda (5:16, 18), but only at this time did the first real attempt to arrest Him occur. When the religious leaders heard that some of the people were inclined to accept Jesus as the Messiah, they sent guards to arrest Him (7:32). The combined reference to Pharisees and chief priests points to the Sanhedrin (cf. v. 45; 11:47, 57; 18:3), indicating a formal decision. The story resumes in 7:45, and its development suggests that the command was not to arrest Him immediately, or perhaps publicly, but to wait for the best moment.

7:33–36. Jesus's Return to the Father. The decision of the Sanhedrin gave Jesus the opportunity to speak about His soon departure from this world. This is a common theme in John's Gospel (e.g., 8:14; 13:3; 14:2–3; 16:5, 16; 17:11), which matches the emphasis on Jesus coming from the Father (e.g., 3:34; 4:34; 5:22–38; 6:38–40, 57). In John, Jesus comes from above (8:23; cf. 1:14) and must return to the place He came from (6:62; 16:28). This entails an allusion to His death because the cross was the way by which He would return to the Father (3:14; 8:21, 28; 12:32; 16:19–20). Up to this point, we are told that Jesus's hour had not yet come (7:30), but from this point on He knew that His death was near (v. 33; cf. 16:16). Soon His followers would no longer be able to reach Him (7:34). Their eternal destiny was at stake (cf. 8:21). But once again He was misunderstood. The Jews knew about His earthly origins (7:27), and the Holy Land was a small territory. They found it difficult to imagine a place where Jesus could go and not be found, unless He were to go to the Jews living in the Dispersion—that is, the majority of Jews who were scattered throughout the Greco-Roman world (v. 35). During Jesus's time, it is estimated that the Jews represented about ten percent of the entire population of the Roman Empire and that up to sixty percent of them (roughly five million) lived outside the Holy Land.

7:37–44. Springs of Living Water. Jesus saved His most important pronouncement for the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles. During the feast the Israelites were required to dwell in booths made of branches of palm trees (Lev. 23:42). This was a reminder of the wanderings of Israel in the wilderness after the Exodus from Egypt. After the Babylonian Exile, a water-pouring ceremony was added to the celebrations. The words of Jesus in John 7:37–38 are based on this ceremony. On each of the seven days, the high priest was to fill a golden flagon with water from the pool of Siloam and bring it to the temple in a procession accompanied by the joyful blowing of a trumpet. As the pilgrims watched, the temple choir sang the Hallel (Pss. 113–118). When the choir began to sing Psalm 118, the water was poured into a silver bowl beside the altar and flowed through a pipe to the base of the altar. Meanwhile the pilgrims shook palm branches and shouted three times, "Give thanks to the Lord!" The ceremony took place at the time of the morning sacrifice and symbolized God's providential supply of water in the wilderness. It pointed to the waters of salvation and the outpouring of the Spirit in the messianic age (Is. 12:3; 44:3).

It is against this background that Jesus's pronouncement is to be understood. In words reminiscent of John 4:10, He invited the thirsty to come to Him and drink (John 7:37). He used the symbolism of the water and applied it to the living water of salvation that He had come to offer. Then He added that this living water would flow from all who believe in Him, just as the Scriptures had indicated (v. 38; cf. Is. 55:1; 58:11; Ezek. 47:1–12; Joel 3:18; Zech. 13:1; 14:8). According to John 7:39, Jesus was referring to the work of the Spirit. In speaking of living waters that would flow from within, Jesus seems to have represented the refreshment and renewal of the inner person by the power of the Holy Spirit (cf. John 3:3, 5–8; 6:63). It is this redemptive experience that Jesus is calling people to have by truly believing in Him. The reference to His glorification as the condition for the coming of the Spirit is significant (7:39). The glorification would signify the Father's approval of the accomplishments of the Son, including His victory over Satan (17:1, 4–5; 12:31; 16:11). As the people listened to Him, they were divided with respect to the identity of Jesus (7:40–43). Some referred to Him as the prophet (cf. Deut. 18:15–18; see commentary on John 6:1–15), while others identified Him directly as the Messiah. Those who insisted that the Messiah would come from Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2; cf. Matt. 2:1–6), not from Galilee, were probably Judeans.

7:45–52. Meeting of the Sanhedrin. This section resumes the account of the incident reported in John 7:32. The Sanhedrin was upset with the guards for not arresting Jesus (John 7:45). The dialogue indicates that the Sanhedrin believed that Jesus had been deceiving the people (v. 47). Their next question about whether any of the rulers or Pharisees had believed in Jesus implies a negative answer. The contrast between the attitude of the religious authorities and that of the people aimed at shaming the guards in case they had any sympathy toward Jesus. The people are described as being under a curse for not knowing the law (v. 49), that is, for not being educated and zealous in their observance of the law. The Pharisees had a low view of the common people, whom they pejoratively called 'am ha'arets ("the people of the Land;" cf. 9:34; Luke 18:9). Feeling that the discussion was prejudicial, Nicodemus spoke up in defense of Jesus by raising a procedural issue (John 7:50–51). The Sanhedrin, however, did not want to change the focus of the discussion. They argued that no prophet was to be expected from Galilee because no prophet had ever come from there (v. 52). The argument was neither historically true (Jonah was from Galilee; 2 Kin. 14:25) nor relevant because the power of God transcends geographical limitations.

7:53—8:59

The Light of the World

After the feast Jesus was three times confronted by His adversaries (including the episode of the adulterous woman).

7:53—8:11. Adulterous Woman. The account of the woman taken in adultery is one of the best examples of Jesus's redeeming love, yet it comes with a perplexing textual difficulty. The story is entirely missing from all Greek manuscripts of the Gospel of John up to the fifth century, and none of the earliest church fathers mention it as being part of John's Gospel. It is only after the ninth century that its textual attestation becomes more common, but even then it appears in only approximately twenty-five percent of all NT Greek manuscripts. While this reality challenges the canonical record of the account, it does not necessarily undermine its historical reliability. Because of its self-authenticating character and what appear to be references to it in some second- and third-century Christian writings, many scholars are convinced that the story is most probably one of those numerous incidents of Jesus's life that originally were not recorded in our Gospels (cf. John 20:30–31; 21:25). Somehow it remained alive in the memory of the church until it became part of the textual tradition. While it was tacked on to some manuscripts at the end of Luke (after Luke 21:38 or 24:53), or even the end of John (John 21:25), it most frequently follows John 7:52. It seems to have been inserted at this point to illustrate Jesus's statement in 8:15 that they judged according to human understanding but He judged no one.

A group of religious leaders set a trap for Jesus, as the absence of the adulterous man clearly indicates. According to the law, in cases of adultery both the man and woman were to be put to death (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22). The Jewish leaders thought Jesus had two options. He could recommend stoning the woman, but in that case He would be legislating against Roman law, which did not require the death penalty in a situation like this. His other option was to take a clear stand against God's law. In either case, Jesus definitely would lose support from the people, and the Jews would have a reason for accusing Him. What the Jews were not expecting was that Jesus could come up with a third option. Bending down, He began to write in the dust with His finger. We are not told what He wrote. It has been suggested that He was writing the sins of those accusing the woman. Others have argued that the action of Jesus should be explained in light of a Roman forensic practice. It was the common practice of the presiding judge to write down the sentence before pronouncing it. According to some manuscripts, the accusers were "convicted by their conscience"; this would suggest that Jesus was writing about their private lives (John 8:9). Jesus did the unexpected by calling the accusers to examine their own lives (v. 7; cf. DA 461). This changed the grounds for the legal decision without setting the law aside.

In the case of a capital crime, the witnesses were expected to be the first to throw the stones (Deut. 13:9; 17:7). Jesus did not require her accusers and witnesses to be sinless, but He made them aware of their own sinfulness. His words were also meant to reveal the malicious intentions of the religious leaders toward the woman. At the end, He was able to treat her graciously without violating the law or overlooking her sin, providing an eloquent illustration of the fact that He came to save, not to condemn (John 3:17; 12:47). "Men hate the sinner, while they love the sin. Christ hates the sin, but loves the sinner" (DA 462). Jesus's command to "go and sin no more" or "leave your life of sin" is not the condition for grace but the proper response to it (John 8:11; cf. 5:14).

8:12–20. The Father's Witness. While still in the temple, perhaps in the so-called court of women, where the offering chests were supposedly located (8:20; cf. Mark 12:41–43), Jesus made another amazing claim: "I am the light of the world" (John 8:12; cf. 9:5; 12:46; see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430). In the OT, the coming of the Messiah is associated with light (Num. 24:17; Is. 9:2; 42:6–7; Mal. 4:2). Jesus introduced Himself as the fulfillment of messianic prophecies. In John, light is a symbol of God's gift of life through Jesus (John 8:12; cf. 1:4, 9). Against the accusation that witnessing on His own behalf was invalid, Jesus argued the opposite on the basis of His divine origin and His participation in God's redemptive plan (cf. 5:19–20, 36). By accusing Him, the Jewish leaders demonstrated only their own disqualification and complete ignorance concerning His real identity. They were judging Him on the basis of the appearance of things (i.e., according to human standards; 8:15) and not on the basis of the true facts revealed by His works (5:36; 10:25; 14:11; 15:24). But Jesus introduced another witness: His Father. He was doing the work of the Father (5:19–20, 36; 10:25, 32, 37–38; 14:11), evidenced through His own works. The legal requirement of two witnesses had been met (Deut. 19:15). The question of the Jewish leaders in John 8:19 only proves Jesus's point: they do not know anything about Him. That being the case, how then could they know anything about the Father? (cf. John 14:7, 9; 16:3).

8:21–30. "I Am He." Knowing that the situation was deteriorating, Jesus warned the Jewish leaders about His soon departure (to the Father) and their ultimate loss: they would die in their sins (see 6:60–65). They did not know where He would be going because they were from beneath/below, whereas He was from above (8:23), and consequently they could not follow Him to the place He would be going. In their ignorance they concluded that Jesus was considering suicide (cf. 7:35). Their situation was apparently hopeless. The only way they could avoid their fate was by accepting Jesus's claim (8:24; lit. "I am" [egō eimi]). This statement is remarkable because it is used without any predicate (e.g., "I am Peter"; also in 8:28, 58; 13:19), which is not common in Greek. Most interpreters have been convinced that it points to the "I AM" of Exodus 3:14 and Isaiah 40–55 (see Is. 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12), where it refers to the God of Israel. By applying these words to Himself, Jesus was not only claiming divinity but also identifying Himself with the God of the OT.

The lack of understanding of the Jewish leaders led Jesus to wonder whether He was wasting His time with them. John 8:25b is usually translated as Jesus answering their question "Who are you?" by saying that He was who He had been telling them He was from the beginning. But it can also be translated as a rhetorical question: "Why do I speak to you at all?" There were many things Jesus could have said regarding them and with regard to their judgment, but for the moment He refrained from doing so (John 8:26). When they would lift up the Son of Man, they would finally understand His real identity, all the more so because His death would be His way to the Father (v. 28; cf. 3:14; 12:32, 34). This might be another example of a Johannine double meaning: being "lifted up" means both to die and to be exalted (cf. 6:62; 7:33; 14:2–3, 12, 28; 16:5, 10, 28; 17:11; 20:17). Jesus concluded His argument by once again pointing to His essential relationship with the Father. Everything He had spoken or done was in full accord with what the Father taught Him (8:29). He had not done anything on His own (e.g., 4:34; 10:25; 12:49; 14:10). In the end, we are told that many believed in Him (8:30). We just do not know whether these came from the opponents who disputed with Jesus or from the bystanders who were there.

8:31–47. Seed of Abraham. The Jews here (v. 31) may not have been the same people referred to in v. 30, as they seem to have passed too quickly from belief to unbelief (vv. 45–46), and even to a desire to kill Jesus (vv. 37, 44). Jesus may have been addressing those who believed (v. 30) but was being attacked by the religious leaders who did not believe. The harsh dialogue that follows is a strong critique of the Jewish exclusive dependence on their connection to Abraham. Jesus argued that being a descendent of Abraham also means acting the way he acted. Jesus's appeal in v. 31b stands as a call not only to persevere but also to accept Him and His words (cf. v. 37c). Those who abide in Him will know the truth, and the truth will set them free (v. 32). The content of the truth here is the truth about Jesus—His nature, mission in the world, and message (cf. v. 36; 14:6).

The context makes it clear that the freedom Jesus was talking about is soteriological—that is, freedom from sin—for He goes on to speak of the slavery of sin (8:34). Only Jesus can grant the unending privilege of true sonship (cf. 1:12). The Jews, however, did not understand Him, and they resorted to their Abrahamic lineage to argue that they were free. Obviously, they were not referring to political freedom because they had been under Roman occupation for almost a century (since 63 B.C.). Instead, they seemed to be talking about spiritual freedom. It appears that for them, to be Abraham's descendants (8:33, 37) or Abraham's children (v. 39) meant to be God's children (cf. v. 41). Jesus, however, acknowledged that they were children of Abraham but also introduced a new argument. To be children of Abraham means to act as Abraham had done (v. 39). Unfortunately, their works indicated something entirely different. They were seeking to kill Him (vv. 37, 40). They had become instruments of the devil (vv. 44, 47).

After depicting the devil as a murderer, a liar, and the father of lies, Jesus made an astounding claim of sinlessness (v. 46). Both the preceding and following statements refer to Jesus telling the truth, but by using the term "sin," Jesus was claiming complete absence of any moral fault or blemish. This verse is about Jesus's own nature. Anything less than that would invalidate the point He was trying to make.

8:48–59. Existing before Abraham. The bottom line of the preceding discussion could not be clearer: by seeking to kill Jesus the Jewish leaders were not connected with God (v. 47). Without any counter argument to Jesus's logic, all that was left to them was to accuse Him of being a Samaritan and demon-possessed (v. 48; see 7:20), implying that no further meaningful conversation with Him was possible. However, Jesus was only obeying the Father (cf. 3:34; 5:19–20; 17:8, 14) and seeking the glory of the Father (5:41; 7:17–18; 8:54; 13:31–32; 14:13; 17:1, 4–5). His work was not to promote Himself but to save whoever believed in Him so that they would "never see death" (8:51). The Jewish leaders did not understand how Jesus could offer something (eternal life) that not even Abraham or any of the prophets had.

The argument here in John leads up to another astonishing claim of divinity on Jesus's part. To the question whether He was greater than the patriarch, Jesus answered that Abraham rejoiced to see His day: "he saw it and was glad" or rejoiced (echarē; v. 56). Understanding exactly what this means is not easy. Some Jewish traditions claimed that Abraham foresaw the future of Israel and of the Messiah, while others indicated that the description of Abraham as being advanced in age (Gen. 24:1) meant that he went into all the days of the future. Since the text is not about seeing God but about seeing Jesus's day, the emphasis appears to be on the saving work of Jesus. We could then suggest that it was probably in the experience of the sacrifice of Isaac that Abraham saw the saving power of Jesus (Gen. 22). There he gained a true understanding of the work of Christ; he saw and experienced it.

Jesus had existed before Abraham ever lived (John 8:58). Nothing else needed to be added. Jesus was not simply claiming that He existed before Abraham. By saying "I AM" without any predicate (cf. vv. 24, 28; 13:19), He was unquestionably identifying Himself as the God of the Hebrew Scriptures (Ex. 3:14; cf. Is. 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12 LXX). This was much more than a claim to preexistence. This was a claim to divinity in its fullest sense. To the Jews, the words of Jesus were unmistakably blasphemous, requiring stoning as its penalty (John 8:59; cf. Lev. 24:16). But before they could enforce the penalty, Jesus had slipped away. The text does not say whether He simply managed to hide Himself among the people or He escaped with supernatural intervention. In any case, the way the story ends allows the reader to understand that the cross would not be an isolated action but the culmination of a progressive, deliberate hardening process on the part of the Jewish leaders.

9:1—10:42

FINAL MINISTRY IN JERUSALEM

9:1–41

The Healing of a Blind Man

While still in Jerusalem, Jesus performed His sixth sign, the healing of a man born blind (see "The Seven Signs in the Fourth Gospel," p. 1417).

The fact that the miracle also took place on the Sabbath (cf. 5:9) exacerbated the opposition and resulted in the expulsion of the healed man from the synagogue. This prepares the reader for the discourse of the good shepherd in chapter 10. The account of the healing of a blind man, which parallels the healing at Bethesda (chap. 5), shows again the divine origin of the mission and authority of Jesus.

9:1–12. Theological Question. The question that prompted the miracle revealed the traditional belief that suffering is a divine punishment for sin (cf. Job 4:7). In the case of a congenital disease, it was not easy to identify the guilty party (John 9:2). Jesus, however, while acknowledging the possibility that suffering may be the result of sin (5:14), took the discussion away from the issue of punishment (cf. Luke 13:1–3) and saw the man's blindness as an opportunity for a divine revelation (John 9:3).

The "must" (dei) in v. 4a tells us about Jesus's adherence to the divine plan for Him and His willingness to follow it. Doing the Father's work was not an option but a necessity for Jesus (cf. 4:34; 6:38) because the opportunity would not always be available. By saying that "night is coming" "when no one can work" (9:4b), Jesus may have been presenting a cryptic reference to His soon departure from the world (7:33–34; 12:35; 13:1; 16:16). In John, the word "night" by itself could stand for "darkness" (cf. 1:5; 8:12; 12:46). Jesus once more spoke of Himself as "the light of the world" (9:5; cf. 8:12). In this case, the man's blindness took on a symbolic meaning, which makes the miracle doubly significant: it restored sight to the man (9:1, 20), and it illustrated what Jesus meant when He claimed to be the spiritual light of the world.

This was another miracle performed by the power of the word of Jesus. It is true that He spat on the ground, made mud with the saliva, and spreads it over the man's eyes, but the miracle properly speaking happened only when the man responded faithfully to Jesus's command to wash in the pool of Siloam (v. 7). Those who knew the man were so astonished at the miracle that they could not believe that he was the one who had been blind. This provided the opportunity for him to witness on behalf of Jesus (v. 11), though at that very moment he did not know who Jesus was.

9:13–17. Preliminary Discussions. The text does not inform us about who took the healed man to the Pharisees, but it could well have been those mentioned in v. 8. One could assume that since the miracle took place on the Sabbath (9:14; see 5:9b–18), they may have felt offended and decided to take the former blind man to the religious leaders. The fact that Jesus mixed clay with saliva complicated things. According to Jewish tradition, kneading (dough) was one of the thirty-nine classes of work forbidden on the Sabbath, and making clay from spittle could well have been considered as falling under the same prohibition. When the Pharisees asked the man how he received his sight, the answer he provided divided them (9:16). Some had already concluded that since Jesus, according to their traditions, violated the Sabbath, He could not be from God. Others preferred to evaluate the situation on the basis of the miracle itself, reminding us of the words of Nicodemus to Jesus in 3:2 (cf. 7:31). The nature of the miracle did not seem to square with the idea that Jesus was a sinner or a Sabbath-breaker.

The embarrassment of the Pharisees is shown by the fact that, once again, they turned to the man and asked him what he thought of Jesus. In fact, even though it was the healed man who was being interrogated and the name of Jesus was not even mentioned, the real target was Jesus. It is interesting to note how the man progressively changed his assessment of Jesus throughout the story. First, he referred to Him as human (9:11); then, as a prophet (v. 17); later, he would recognize that He must have been "from God" (v. 33); and eventually, he would believe in Him and even worship and adore Him (vv. 35–38). As for the Pharisees, though some were struck by the miracle, they ended up insisting on the thesis that Jesus was a sinner and had nothing to do with God (v. 24). At the end, it was the Pharisees who were blind and sinners (v. 41). The presence of the light always intensifies one's blindness.

9:18–23. Examining the Parents. The Pharisees proceeded to interrogate the parents of the man. Even if the neighbors could have testified that he was blind from birth (cf. v. 8), they could have been mistaken, but not His own parents. And once the Jewish leaders confirmed that the man was blind from birth, they gave their case away by asking the parents how it was that their son could see (v. 19). Their efforts backfired as they realized for themselves that a miracle had taken place. In other words, they had no option but to believe in the miracle (cf. v. 18b). They had come very close to believing in Jesus as the blind man almost intuitively sensed when he asked them if they wanted to become His disciples (v. 27).

The Evangelist makes it clear that the Jews were using intimidation techniques in order to avoid a public confession of Jesus as the Messiah. The parents wanted to avoid being dragged into a situation over which they had no control and that could damage them. In this context the expulsion from the synagogue was probably a temporary deprivation of the community privileges (v. 22; cf. 12:42; 16:2), though permanent excommunication was already known in Judaism at the time of Jesus. Either measure was greatly feared by the Jews. By the end of the first century, when John's Gospel was written, disciplinary actions against followers of Jesus seem to have become a serious threat (see John: Introduction), perhaps even more than before the conversion of Paul (cf. Acts 9:2; 22:19; 26:11). Jesus Himself had indicated that this would happen (Luke 6:22). Faith in Jesus does not exempt us from difficulties (John 16:33; James 1:2–3). No matter the situation, however, nothing can separate us from the Lord of life (cf. Luke 6:23).

9:24–34. Interrogating the Man. Unable to contest the miracle, the Jewish leaders tried to create doubts about the integrity of the spiritual life of Jesus. Concluding that it would be unproductive to continue to interrogate the parents of the former blind man, they called the man for the second time. This time they attempted to convince him that God, and not Jesus, should be praised for the miracle. In their estimation Jesus was a sinner, a transgressor of the law. Their logic was fraught with problems. By accusing Jesus of breaking the Sabbath they were in principle assuming that the miracle took place, whereas by telling the man that the miracle should be ascribed to God, not to Jesus, they were admitting that God worked through Jesus, something the man did not fail to notice (cf. John 9:31). In this case, the fact that it was a Sabbath day would not have been the most important thing. Perhaps this is why, contrary to what happened in relation to the healing at Bethesda (chap. 5), the issue of the Sabbath itself was not that important in the discussion. The more the Jews insisted that Jesus had broken the Sabbath, the more they would have recognized that He performed the miracle.

The man, however, did not want to go into the theoretical discussion of whether Jesus was a sinner or not. The objectivity of his answer is impressive: one thing he knew, that he was blind and now could see (9:25). The miracle could not be disputed, and it was up to the Jews to explain it. The dialogue that follows is delightful, perhaps more than any other in the Gospel. The simplicity of the man's logic was unsurpassed even by those who supposedly were the wisest representatives of contemporary Judaism. The bottom line is that while their unbelief prevented them from acknowledging that Jesus was from God (cf. v. 29), the miracle itself demonstrated exactly the opposite. By accusing the man of being born in sin, they were tacitly recognizing the two points they were trying to challenge, namely, that he was blind from birth and that a notable miracle had been performed. Thus, they lost their case. In their stubbornness, no other option was left but to resort to violence by throwing the man out of the synagogue (cf. v. 22). As often happens, when we lack persuasive arguments to defend a case, we tend to turn to violence in words or actions to settle our differences.

9:35–41. Confession of the Man. After the man's expulsion from the synagogue, Jesus apparently searched for him. The question He asked presupposed a positive answer and is designed to call the attention of the man to the true identity of Jesus (v. 35). There is no indication that the man had yet seen Jesus. All he could remember was His voice, but his experience had prepared him to believe that Jesus was not an ordinary man (cf. v. 33). When Jesus came to him and identified Himself (v. 35; cf. 4:25–26; see "Son of Man," p. 1428), the former blind man did not hesitate to express his belief and to adore Him. This is the only reference in John to someone worshiping Jesus prior to the crucifixion (cf. 20:28). In the dialogue, the man addressed Jesus twice as "Lord," moving, in the Greek, from a polite greeting (9:36) to a full acknowledgment of His authority (v. 38). The title "Son of Man" emphasizes the polarizing character of Jesus's self-revelation (cf. 3:17–20; 5:22–24; for further information see 5:25–29). In John, whenever Jesus reveals Himself through words or actions, He divides people into believers and unbelievers. Judgment, however, was not the purpose of His coming (3:17; 12:47), but it is the inevitable outcome. That is to say, when confronted by Jesus, the people pass judgment on themselves by the way they respond to Him.

In 9:39, and certainly based on the miracle, this idea is worked out in terms of sight and blindness. Jesus justified the miracle by saying that He had come as the light of the world (v. 5; cf. 8:12; 12:46). The paradoxical effect of light—even natural light—is that at the same time that it dispels darkness it dazzles sight. When applied to Jesus, this means that with His coming, those who have been blinded by the darkness of sin could be enlightened, while those who do not feel the need for light move into deeper darkness. The healed man belongs to the first category, the Pharisees to the second. Unbelief is inexcusable (9:41; 15:22). Had the Jewish leaders recognized their spiritual blindness and humbly come to Jesus for healing, they would have found it. But no one, not even Jesus, can help those who deceive themselves and shut their eyes to the divine light (cf. 3:19; 5:40; 8:24).

Jesus, the Good Shepherd

In His last public address in Jerusalem, Jesus illustrated the redemptive nature of His mission using the experience of the shepherd and his sheep. It also serves to reveal the nature of those who use the sheep for their own personal purpose.

10:1–6. Shepherd and Sheep. In John's Gospel, the strong affirmation of truth amēn, amēn (translated variously as "truly, truly," "very truly," "most assuredly") never begins a discourse, implying that this section is a continuation of the events described in chapter 9 and that, therefore, it is not an independent discourse. This means that the target audience, "the Jews" or Jewish leaders (10:19), was essentially the same and that its general context is probably the healing of the man born blind (cf. v. 21). It is a little difficult to identify the literary type of the content of vv. 1–6. Though it is customary to speak of it as a parable, it must be borne in mind that the word "parable" (parabolē) never appears in this Gospel. John himself refers to it as a paroimia (v. 6), which was used to indicate a proverb, a figure of speech, or a metaphorical saying (cf. 16:25, 29).

More important than what we call it is its content, which is plain and easy to follow. It speaks metaphorically of a shepherd, a thief—who is also referred to as a robber and a stranger—and a flock. There is also a reference to a gatekeeper, used only to complete the scene, and a sheepfold and its gate. Such images were rather familiar to those who were listening to Jesus. In His time, the sheepfold would have been a roughly round courtyard surrounded by a stone wall and topped by briers to discourage the incursion of thieves or robbers. The fold would have had only one entrance, which was guarded by a gatekeeper, whose job was to guarantee the safety of the sheep, especially at night. Several small flocks could have shared the same fold. This would not have been a problem because, as a rule, not only did the shepherd know each of his sheep individually, but the sheep also knew the voice of the shepherd and would easily have followed him. Sometimes, due to the personal intimacy between the shepherd and his sheep, an individual sheep would even have recognized its own name and responded to it.

10:7–10. Door of Salvation. Though the images used by Jesus were common features of Jewish life, the Jewish leaders failed to understand their intended meaning (cf. 10:6). There is little if any question, however, that this illustration is to be read against the background of Ezekiel 34, where God, the supreme Shepherd (cf. Pss. 23:1; 80:1; Is. 40:10–11), strongly rebukes the shepherds (i.e., the leaders) of Israel for going after their own interests and failing to care for His people (Ezek. 34:2–8; cf. Is. 56:9–12; Jer. 23:1–4; 25:32–38; Zech. 11:4–17). Such useless and unfaithful shepherds would be removed (Ezek. 34:9–10), and God Himself would take over their responsibilities. He would retrieve His dispersed sheep (John 10:11–12), tend them with utmost care (vv. 13–16), and commit them to His servant, the Davidic Messiah (vv. 23–25).

In light of such a background, the main teaching of the illustration does not seem to be problematic. Perhaps the exception would be that Jesus interestingly applied to Himself two different images: the Door (vv. 7–10) and the Shepherd (vv. 11–18). That He is the Shepherd who calls His sheep and leads them out of the fold is what would be expected, but that He is also the door comes as a surprise. The illustration speaks of a gatekeeper, whose responsibility is to guard the entrance of the fold and keep the sheep safe. By speaking of Himself as the door of the sheep, Jesus said that He is the exclusive way to salvation (see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430); it is available only through Him (cf. 14:6). Whoever comes in through Him will be saved, that is, will be able to enjoy the freedom to come and go and the abundance (pasture) of God's salvation (10:9). The thieves and robbers (v. 8) probably refer to some of the Jewish leaders of the day. Such leaders do not contemplate the well-being of the sheep but think only of their own selfish interests (cf. John 7:49; 12:42–43; Matt. 23:2–7; Mark 7:6–13; Luke 16:30–32; 18:9).

10:11–18. Shepherd and the Hireling. In this passage the statement that Jesus came to impart life (John 10:10) serves as a transition from the metaphor of the door to that of the shepherd. Perhaps no other verse in John better describes the purpose of Jesus's coming than this one (cf. 3:14–16; 6:33, 51; 17:1–3; 20:31). It is because He had come to impart life that He could speak of Himself as the Good Shepherd, for the Good Shepherd gives up His life on behalf of the sheep (10:11). This is another unmistakable reference in this Gospel to Jesus's substitutionary death (cf. 10:15; 11:50, 51–52; 15:13). The contrast now is no longer between Jesus and thieves and robbers but between Himself and the hired man—someone paid to do the work. The hired man is not a shepherd, nor does he act like a shepherd. At the first sign of danger, for example, when a wolf is drawing near, he abandons the sheep and runs away. This person is interested only in money, not the sheep, and is not willing to risk his life for someone else's sheep.

The meaning of the hired man and the wolf is not clear, but there is no doubt that the Good Shepherd is being applied to Jesus. One of the characteristics of a good shepherd is that he knows the sheep. Jesus knows perfectly well those who belong to Him; as perfectly as the Father knows Him and He knows the Father (10:15). Once again, Jesus was claiming a level of relationship with the Father that could be possible only if He were one with the Father, something He actually stated as recorded farther down in the chapter (v. 30). But it is not only the good shepherd who knows his sheep; the sheep also know him (v. 14). This was objectively exemplified in the story of the blind man. After the miracle, all he could remember of the One who had healed him was His voice, and when they met again, he did not hesitate to follow Him. As He did with this man, Jesus will gather His sheep and unite them with His other sheep not of that fold—an obvious allusion to Gentile believers (cf. 11:51–52; 17:20). Then there will be one flock and one Shepherd (10:16). The saving call of Jesus was to reach outside the borders of Judaism, and as the true Messiah, He would universalize the saving faith of Israel, making it available to the Gentile world (cf. Gal. 3:26–29; Eph. 2:11–22; 4:3–6).

This section ends with a comment of Jesus about His sacrificial death for the sheep that further explains the thought of John 10:15. Jesus had already said in the context of the healing at Bethesda that He is life in Himself (John 5:26), but next He added that no one takes His life from Him. The immediate application of this statement was the intention of the Jewish leaders to kill Him (5:16, 18; 7:1, 19, 25; 8:37, 40, 59). It was Jesus who would voluntarily lay down His life (cf. 6:51) and take it up again (cf. 2:19)—an expression of divine love (3:35; 5:20; 10:17; 14:31; 15:9–10; 17:26). No one would take His life from Him, but He was willing to offer it out of His own free will and love as a sacrifice to God (15:13; 1 John 3:16). It is important to note that the passage does not say that after Jesus would lay down His life, He would take it up again independent of the Father. Elsewhere in the NT, the resurrection of Jesus is always referred to as an act of God (cf. Acts 2:24; 3:15; 10:40; 13:30, 33; Rom. 6:4; 10:9; 1 Cor. 6:14; Col. 2:12; Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 1:21). The meaning of this passage is not only that Jesus has authority, in compliance with the plan of the Father, to give His life (John 5:30; 6:38–40; 10:17–18; 14:31; 17:4; cf. Acts 2:23; 3:18; 4:27–28; Rom. 8:32) but that the Father also granted Him "authority" or "power" (exousia) to receive it back again. It is only in obedience to the Father that at the appropriate moment, He would come out of the tomb by the power of the life that was in Him as the Son of God.

10:19–21. Reaction of the Jews. Once again, the Jewish leaders were divided about who Jesus was (cf. John 9:16). While some insisted that He was demon-possessed and raving mad (cf. 7:20; 8:48, 52), others were still trying to make sense of the fact that He restored a blind man's sight. They knew that a miracle had been performed. Some were perhaps inclined to believe in Him, but in the end, with the exception of just a few (19:38–39), they turned away from Him. Jesus's works or signs spoke for themselves—and they still do—confronting every person with a decision of eternal proportions. No other alternative is left: either we believe that He is the Son of God, or we only lay bare the madness of our own heart. The truth is that nothing could have been more divine and wonderful than what Jesus did when He lived among us.

Feast of Dedication

Though still related to the speech of the good shepherd (cf. 10:26–29), the episodes that follow occur a bit later, during the celebration of the Feast of Dedication. This feast—also called Hanukkah or the Feast of Lights—is an eight-day feast that is celebrated in winter (cf. v. 22), in the second half of December. It is a relatively recent institution, not prescribed in the Hebrew Scriptures. The feast remembers the reconsecration of the temple and its altar by Judas Maccabaeus in 165 B.C., three years after Antiochus IV Epiphanes erected a pagan altar in the temple and sacrificed pigs (sacred to Greeks) to Zeus.

10:22–30. Jesus's Interrogation. Jesus had been in Judea for about three months since the Feast of the Tabernacles (chap. 7), which was celebrated in the autumn. This was probably the year A.D. 30. At the temple court, under a two-hundred-yard-long (61 m) roofed structure supported by pillars (the so-called Portico of Solomon; John 10:23; cf. Acts 3:11; 5:12), the Jews gathered around Jesus and asked Him whether or not He was the Messiah (v. 24). The question was framed in a way that gives the impression that Jesus had not been quite fair to them. The answer of Jesus was a denial of the accusation that He had not told them. It is true that because of the political connotations attached to first-century Jewish messianic expectation (cf. 6:15; 11:48), Jesus as a rule avoided referring to Himself as the Messiah. But the works He had openly performed in the Father's name testified loud and clear to His being the Messiah (2:11; 3:2; 5:36; 7:31; 12:37; 14:11; 15:24; 20:30–31). If they were unwilling to believe, it was because they were not part of His flock (cf. 8:47). His sheep know His voice and follow Him (10:3–4) and are known by Him (vv. 14, 16). Jesus was talking about a redemptive experience (vv. 10–11, 15). As the Good Shepherd, He would give His life for the sheep, and consequently, they would never perish (cf. 3:15–16; 6:51, 58; 8:51–52; 11:26). No one would snatch them out of His hand. The text does not say anything about whether, in the course of time, one could stop believing, but it indicates that the ultimate safety of sheep is in the hands of the Good Shepherd (10:28). Even the weakest sheep becomes all-powerful in the hands of an all-powerful God (cf. Phil. 4:13). In the final analysis, to be in Jesus's hands is the same as to be in the Father's hands, for Jesus and the Father are one (John 10:29–30).

10:31–39. Charge of Blasphemy. The Jews immediately recognized the implications of Jesus's words and were again ready to stone Him under the charge of blasphemy (cf. Lev. 24:16); He had claimed to be God (cf. 5:17–18). Once again, Jesus confronted them with the works He had performed from the Father (10:32), but they did not want to consider any evidence concerning the divine origin of Jesus (cf. 9:39–41; 12:37–40). In His answer, Jesus resorted to an exegetical irony—an argument from Scripture. He quoted Psalm 82:6 to show that if Israel's unjust judges, who were infinitely inferior to the supreme God, were called "gods," why would they take offense at Him for claiming to be the Son of God (John 10:34–36)?

Jesus used the OT passage to present two clearly stated arguments. First, it was taken from the Scriptures, which could not be broken or set aside (v. 35), and second, Jesus was far superior to the judges called in the passage "gods" (see commentary on Psalm 82:1–8). He had been sanctified by the Father prior to being sent into the world (John 10:36). In other words, Jesus did not deny that He was putting Himself next to God, but He denied the Jews' assessment of His claims. The point is clear: It does not matter what He would do, the Jewish leaders had decided not to believe. If they were at least willing to consider the evidence of His works (cf. 14:11), there would be a chance for them to recognize and acknowledge (some manuscripts have here gnōte and ginōskēte—"know and continue to know"—while others have gnōte and pisteusēte—"know and believe or have faith") that the Father was in Him and He was in the Father (10:38). But they were not willing. In their stubbornness, they were persuaded that Jesus was a sinner—a transgressor of the law and a blasphemer. They again tried to arrest Him but failed (v. 39; cf. 7:30, 32, 44; 8:20). In other cases, John indicated that they could not arrest Jesus because His hour had not yet come (cf. 7:30; 8:20). We can certainly assume that this was also the case at this time. That "hour," however, was getting closer (cf. 12:23).

10:40–42. Back to the Beginning. Following the attempt of the Jewish leaders to arrest Him, Jesus withdrew to the land on the east side of the Jordan River. The adverb palin suggests that this was not the first time that Jesus had done this. The exact location is not mentioned, but since it was the place where John was first baptizing (10:40), the reader is able to identify it as Bethany or Bethabara (cf. 1:28), the place where Jesus Himself was baptized and called His first disciples. Though far away from Jerusalem, Jesus did not stop His activities. People were still coming to Him as they had come to see John the Baptist. The comparison between the two could not be avoided. That John did not perform any sign was probably intended to mean that Jesus did perform additional signs among them (10:41; cf. 20:30). These and the previous testimony of John on behalf of Jesus caused many to believe in Him (cf. 1:29–34). The adverb ekei in 10:42 implies a contrast between Jerusalem, the center of Jewish life, and that rural location. Despite the threats against His life on the part of the Jewish officials, Jesus still had many true followers among the people.

11:1—12:50

THE CLOSING OF JESUS'S PUBLIC MINISTRY

About three months after His strategic departure to the east side of the Jordan, Jesus was back in Judea, where He resurrected Lazarus, was anointed by Mary, and made His last, triumphal entry into Jerusalem just a few days before the crucifixion. This section, then, occupies a pivotal role in the development of John's drama. It brings this Gospel's account of Jesus's public ministry to its end and prepares the reader for the sufferings and death of Jesus.

11:1–57

The Raising of Lazarus

Instead of eliciting faith, Jesus's seventh and most astonishing sign in this Gospel became the final reason for the Jews to decide to kill Him (see "The Seven Signs in the Fourth Gospel," p. 1417).

11:1–16. Death of Lazarus. These introductory verses are intended to set the stage for the miracle. Outside John's Gospel, Mary and Martha are mentioned by name only in Luke, who tells us that they lived in a village (Luke 10:38–42). John, in turn, not only says that Lazarus was the brother of Mary and Martha but also identifies the village as Bethany. The village was located on the farther side of the Mount of Olives, about two miles (3 km) from Jerusalem on the road to Jericho (cf. John 11:18). According to John, Lazarus, a dear friend of Jesus, was ill. The urgency of the message sent to Jesus implies that Lazarus's condition was critical and that Jesus was expected to come quickly (cf. vv. 21, 32).

From the very beginning of the incident Jesus was aware of the fact that the real issue was going to be not the death of Lazarus but His own glory as the Son of God (cf. vv. 4, 40). His delay of two days in returning to Bethany (v. 6) does not mean that He deliberately waited for Lazarus to die. If by the time He arrived in Bethany Lazarus had already been dead for four days, Lazarus must have died before the message reached Him (cf. v. 15). The surprise of the disciples at the decision of Jesus to go to Judea is to be understood in light of the increasing hostilities on the part of the Jewish authorities toward Him (v. 8). Judea had become a dangerous place for Him, and the disciples themselves were fearful for their lives (cf. v. 16). Jesus's reply indicates that it was still safe to go to Bethany. The idea that he who walks during the day has nothing to fear because they will be able to see from the light of this world (v. 9) may be another example of Jesus using words with a double meaning (cf. 3:3; 7:6; 8:28). As long as the disciples were with Him, the light of the world (cf. 8:12; 9:5; 12:46), they were safe.

Knowing that Lazarus was dead, Jesus referred to his death using the metaphor of death as sleep (11:11). Such a metaphor, which is rather common in Scripture, both in the OT (1 Kin. 1:21; Job 7:21; 14:12; Ps. 13:3; Jer. 51:39, 57; Dan. 12:2) and in the NT (Matt. 27:52; Acts 7:60; 13:36; 1 Cor. 7:39; 11:30; 15:6, 18, 20; 1 Thess. 4:13–15; 5:10; 2 Pet. 3:4), is not to be taken literally, as if death were an intermediate state in which the souls of the dead remain dormant and unconscious in the grave until the resurrection. The biblical concept of death is that it terminates the life of the person in all of its expressions (Ps. 146:4; Eccl. 12:7; cf. Gen. 2:7; Job 7:21; 14:12; 33:4; Eccl. 9:5–6, 10). The metaphor works only at the visual level on account of the fact that death and sleep appear to be similar, that is, the dead person seems to be sleeping and is described as such. The disciples, however, took the words of Jesus at face value, concluding that sleep would be good for Lazarus. They misunderstood Jesus not because they were unfamiliar with the metaphor but because they did not know that Lazarus was already dead (cf. John 11:13–14). In addition, by using the metaphor Jesus was not simply saying that Lazarus was dead but also denying that his death was irrevocable (cf. Mark 5:39). In other words, when Jesus said that He would wake him up (John 11:11), He was in fact preparing the disciples for the miracle.

11:17–27. Jesus and Martha. When Jesus reached Bethany, Lazarus had already been in the tomb for four days (v. 17). This remark called attention to the reality and grandeur of the miracle that was about to take place. One could imagine that there were many people in the house, including flute players (cf. Matt. 9:23) and professional weepers and wailers (cf. Mark 5:38). These were common figures in ancient Jewish funeral practices. As a rule, the Jews buried their dead on the day they died, but the rabbis recommended that the burial be followed by a period of seven days of deep mourning and thirty days of light mourning.

Martha was the first to see Jesus. She took the initiative and went out to meet Him, while Mary remained at home, grieving the loss of her beloved brother (cf. John 11:31). Rather than being an expression of disappointment at Jesus's delay, Martha's words reveal her conviction that Lazarus's fate would have been different had Jesus been there. Yet, contrary to what v. 22 apparently indicates, she was not expecting Jesus to raise him up. Later on in the narrative, when Jesus ordered that the stone be taken away from the tomb's entrance, Martha's objection (v. 39) shows that she was not considering the possibility of an immediate resurrection. Like most first-century Jews, she did believe in the resurrection of the righteous in the last day (v. 24; cf. 5:28–29; Pss. 16:10–11; 49:14–15; Is. 26:19; Dan. 12:1–2; Matt. 22:23–30), but the last day was not yet present. Besides, she was fully aware of the fact that the body of her brother was already in the process of decay (cf. John 11:39).

Then Jesus made the astounding claim that He is "the resurrection and the life" (v. 25a; see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430). In His following comments He explained the meaning and scope of such a claim from the standpoint of both the dead and the living. Even though those believing in Jesus may die, they will live (11:25b). And He added that whoever lives and believes in Him will "never die" (v. 26a). The Greek actually says not that whoever believes in Jesus will "never" die but rather that those who believe shall not die "eternally" (eis ton aiōna). In other words, for believers it does not matter whether they are already dead or are about to die, death does not have the final word. The final word for them is life because Jesus has conquered death (2 Tim. 1:10; cf. Rom. 5:18–19; 1 Cor. 15:54–55; Rev. 20:14), and He imparts life to those who believe in Him (John 6:47; 10:10; 1 John 5:11–12). This great promise lies at the very center of the gospel and fills the human heart with hope (Rom. 6:23). When Jesus asked Martha, "Do you believe this?" (John 11:26b), He was giving her the opportunity to express her faith in spite of the fact that she probably did not fully understand the significance of His words. Yet Martha responded affirmatively by referring to Jesus as the "the Son of God" (v. 27).

11:28–37. Jesus and Mary. Since Martha met Jesus right before He entered the village, it is possible that their dialogue was not witnessed by anybody else except the disciples. Now Mary, as soon as she learned that Jesus was asking for her, quickly came to Him, accompanied by those who were trying to comfort her and who thought that she was going to the tomb to weep. The scene must have been heartbreaking, especially because of the flutes and the wailing. The first words of Mary to Jesus remind us of those of Martha, as she noted that if He had been there her brother "would not have died" (v. 32). Others may have shared the same opinion or perhaps understood His delay as a sign of indifference toward His dear friend (cf. v. 37). When Jesus saw all the grief and pain, He "groaned" or "was deeply moved" (embrimaomai) in His spirit and was troubled (v. 33). The Greek term translated as "deeply moved" or "groaned" has the basic meaning of being "moved with anger," which indicates that Jesus's emotions went way beyond sorrow or sympathy to actual indignation. What is not immediately clear, however, is the precise object of His indignation. It could not have been death itself as part of the human lot, for He was just about to assault the reign of death and bring one of its captive back to life. It is more likely that He was indignant with the pretended sorrow of the mourners, their unbelief, and the willingness of some of them to side with the Pharisees against Him after witnessing the stupendous miracle that He was about to perform (cf. v. 46).

At any rate, His feelings were so intense that He could not hide them. When He asked for the place where Lazarus was laid, He began to weep (vv. 34–35). Again, the text does not say why. It is reasonable to conclude that it was partially because of the long years of past, present, and future human suffering, of which this scene of grief was but a microcosm. In view of the previous verse, His tears also could have been a sign of deep sadness motivated by the stunning unbelief of the people and the fact that some of them were plotting His own death. From this perspective, the weeping of Jesus would be an integral part of the Gospel's drama and not only of the story of Lazarus. He wept because He knew what the final balance of His ministry would be (cf. 1:11; 12:37).

11:38–44. Resurrection of Lazarus. In the first century, typical Jewish tombs consisted basically of a roughly square, rock-hewn burial chamber with several arched niches cut into the surrounding walls, the entrance wall excepted. It was in one such niche that the body was laid. The entrance to the tomb was low and square with a stone lying against it. Based on the description provided by John, the tomb of Lazarus was of this kind (v. 38). It was certainly located outside the village to prevent any risk of ritual impurity through contact with the corpse (cf. Lev. 21:1; Num. 19:11; Lam. 4:14; Hag. 2:13). The order of Jesus to remove the stone (John 11:39) was unexpected, not only because of the matter of contamination but also because by then the corpse would have been in a state of decomposition. The protest of Martha seems appropriate because she had not yet really understood what Jesus said to her. By furnishing such details, John is not simply trying to add drama to the narrative but rather stressing the reality of the miracle. Each of Jesus's miracles was a revelation of God's glory through Him (1:14; 2:11; cf. 5:19–20, 36; 10:25, 32; 14:10). They witnessed to His messianic claims and the divine origin of His mission (3:2; 5:36; 6:14, 29–30; 7:31; 9:16; 20:30–31). He had told the disciples before they came that Lazarus's illness would lead to God's glory (11:4), and the messengers who brought word to Jesus of Lazarus's illness (v. 3) may have told Martha of His words to the disciples. He also may have been referring to His words to her in vv. 23 and 25 concerning His divine, life-giving power and the resurrection. It is also possible that the original dialogue with her recorded in the Gospel was longer than the version recorded by John (as seems to be the case with a number of other narratives).

The narrative provides for us the first invocation of the Father by Jesus in the Gospel of John (v. 41; cf. 12:27–28; 17:1–26). It was loud enough to be heard by those who were with Him. So far, He had spoken of the Father in the third person, claiming to have come from Him (e.g., 4:34; 5:22–38; 8:18, 42; 10:36) and to be one with Him (10:30, 38). Now, in a more defiant way than ever before (as the Jewish leaders might have thought), He addressed the Father directly, using the second person (11:41). But before anyone could even think of accusing Him of blasphemy, He shouted, "Lazarus, come forth [come out]" (v. 43). To the amazement of all, Lazarus heard the creative, life-giving voice of Jesus and came out of the tomb exactly the way he had been buried, that is, his feet and hands bound with linen strips and his face wrapped in a headcloth (v. 44). These incidental details reinforce the historicity of the event. The account ends rather abruptly because what really matters is the miracle itself and what it reveals about the identity of Jesus.

11:45–57. Faith and Unbelief. As expected, the miracle divided the people (cf. 7:12–13, 40–44; 9:16; 10:20–21). While many of those who came to comfort Martha and Mary believed, others apparently did not and went straight to the Pharisees to report what had happened (11:45). The striking news about the resurrection called forth an extraordinary meeting of the Sanhedrin, the supreme court of Israel (cf. 3:1; 7:45; 11:47; 18:3). In the time of Jesus, the Sanhedrin was controlled by the chief priests, who were mostly Sadducees, with Pharisees representing an influential minority.

Having learned from their previous mistakes (cf. 9:18–34), this time the Jews did not contest the miracle (cf. 11:47) but instead tried to find political reasons to get rid of Jesus. The argument was that Jesus represented a threat to both their holy place, known from other Jewish literature as a common expression for the temple, and to the nation as a whole. Obviously, the Romans would not have tolerated any popular uproar fueled by messianic expectations. Caiaphas's intervention could not have been more cynical. What he was really saying was that killing Jesus was the next and easiest solution to the problem. According to John, Caiaphas, who served as high priest from A.D. 18 to 36, was not speaking by himself but was actually prophesying about the meaning of the death of Jesus. In his interpretation of that unintentional prophecy, John explains that Jesus would die not only for Israel but also for the purpose of gathering together into one people the dispersed children of God (v. 52). That is, the death of Jesus would be on behalf of all, Jews and Gentiles, to unite them into one (cf. 10:16; 17:20). Through His death Jesus universalized the true Jewish messianic expectation and its saving power (cf. 1:12–13).

Aware of the Sanhedrin's decision to kill Him, Jesus decided to retreat to a town named Ephraim (11:54) in the Judean hill country about twelve miles (19 km) north of Jerusalem. The third and last Passover mentioned in the Gospel was near (cf. 2:13; 6:4), and many pilgrims were already coming to Jerusalem to participate in rituals of purification (11:55; cf. Lev. 7:21; Num. 9:6). There is a great deal of irony here. While the common people were concerned about purity, the religious leaders themselves were exhibiting the deep, chronic impurity of their own hearts by conspiring to kill the Son of God.

12:1–50
Final Coming to Jerusalem

The last events of Jesus's public ministry took place in Jerusalem, where He came after being anointed in Bethany in preparation for His death and burial.

12:1–8. Anointing at Bethany. All four Gospels have an account of Jesus being anointed by a woman (cf. Matt. 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9; Luke 7:36–50). The accounts in Matthew and Mark are nearly identical, while that of Luke and John provide additional details. Matthew, Mark, and Luke point out that the episode took place at the house of Simon, a Pharisee and former leper. Matthew, Mark, and John point out that Simon's house was in Bethany. Matthew and Mark indicate that Mary anointed Jesus's head, while Luke and John indicate that she anointed His feet. The main difference is chronological. Matthew, Mark, and John place this story shortly before His death, while Luke seems to place it when John the Baptist was still in prison. Since Luke, perhaps for theological emphasis, did not always place events in strict chronological order, it is possible that explains the placement of this story in his Gospel (see commentary on Luke 7:36–50).

According to John, Jesus arrived in Bethany six days before the Passover (John 12:1). The supper likely occurred at the conclusion of the Sabbath, Saturday evening, which was technically the start of the first day of the week. The fact that Martha was serving does not necessarily point to her house as the place where the dinner was offered, otherwise there would have been no need at all to say that Lazarus was there as well (v. 2; cf. Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3; Luke 7:36, 40).

The Greek says that they reclined rather than sat at the table (John 12:2), indicating a Roman-style low table (known as a triclinium) with divans or cushions around it. The guests would lie on their left side facing the inside, leaving their right hand free to eat the meal. This is why Mary could have come from behind and have had easy access to Jesus. The unguent she used amounted to one litra, a measurement of weight equivalent to the Roman pound (327.45 g, or 11.5 oz.), and was made of pure nard (v. 3), also known as spikenard, a fragrant oil derived from the root and spike (hair stem) of the nard plant. It was used by the Romans for anointing the head while water was usually provided for the feet; this would be done by a servant. This implies that Mary's action was a sign of humility as well as devotion.

12:9–11. Plan to Kill Lazarus. The news about the resurrection of Lazarus spread rather quickly, particularly after the Sanhedrin gave express orders to arrest Jesus (11:57). By this time throngs of pilgrims had already come for the Passover celebrations (vv. 55–56). After learning that Jesus was back in Bethany, many wanted to see Him and Lazarus. The text suggests that Lazarus was the main attraction, and after seeing him many believed in Jesus (12:9, 11). Yet just a few verses later, it says that the people did not believe (vv. 37–43), which seems to suggest that their belief was a superficial, fleeting faith, of which there are several examples in the Gospel of John (cf. 2:23–25; 3:2–3; 6:15, 26–27, 34–37, 64, 66; 7:3–5, 12–13; 8:31–33). Nevertheless, the fact of the resurrection of Lazarus posed another problem to the Jewish leaders, especially to the Sadducees, who did not believe in the resurrection of the dead (cf. Mark 12:18; Acts 23:6–8). The idea to kill Lazarus was a desperate attempt to get rid of the physical evidence of the miracle (John 12:10–11; cf. 11:53).

12:12–19. Triumphal Entry. The narrative of the triumphal entry is found in all four Gospels (cf. Matt. 21:1–11; Mark 11:1–11; Luke 19:28–40). It is only at this point that the Synoptic Gospels start their account of Jesus's ministry in Jerusalem. John's account is the shortest of the four, though it has some features of its own. It is the only Gospel to date the episode, the only one to mention the palm branches and the lack of understanding of the disciples, and the only one to connect the episode to the resurrection of Lazarus. The "next day" (John 12:12) refers back to v. 1. The day was probably Sunday, and Jerusalem was packed with visitors who came for the Passover. It has been estimated that on such occasions the population of about one hundred thousand would increase to one million—though many of these pilgrims had to reside outside the city. Moved by the miracle (cf. vv. 17–18), the people received Jesus as a kingly Messiah, waving palm branches, a sort of national symbol. The Synoptics add that they spread their cloaks on the road (Mark 11:8; Luke 19:36) while shouting "Hosanna" (lit. "help" or "save, I pray"; John 12:13). This was a general expression of acclamation or praise. The two biblical citations (Ps. 118:26 and Zech. 9:9) also indicate that Jesus was being received as the messianic King (John 12:13, 15).

Jesus had previously refused to be hailed as King (cf. 1:49; 6:15), but not this time. The fact that He was riding a donkey and not a war horse or a chariot indicated the kind of King He was. In the culture of the day, the donkey was associated with humility and peace (Zech. 9:9–10), not necessarily with a political warrior (1 Kin. 4:26; Is. 31:1–3; cf. Rev. 19:11–16). In His triumphal entry Jesus accepted being welcomed as the King of Israel, but not exactly according to the predominant views of the day and not on the literal throne of David (cf. Matt. 21:5). His real glory would be fully revealed only at the cross (cf. John 12:23). The disciples initially failed to grasp this point because they also shared the same messianic hopes of the people in general (cf. Matt. 20:20–24; Mark 10:35–41; Luke 24:15–21). It was only after Jesus had been glorified, and through the action of the Holy Spirit, that they came to understand the true significance of this act (John 12:16; cf. 2:22; 7:39; 14:26; 20:9). For the Pharisees, however, this indicated that they were losing the battle and that they had to hurry and immediately put into effect their plan to kill Jesus.

12:20–30. His Hour Has Come. The Pharisees were in a state of desperation. John indicates that they could feel the world going after Jesus. This is neatly illustrated by introducing in the narrative the visit of some Greeks asking to see Jesus (12:20–22). At this point in the narrative, Jesus finally announced that the hour had come for the Son of Man to be glorified. The desire of the Greeks matched that of the disciples, who were Jews (1:36–39, 41, 45; 6:67–69), and of the Samaritans (4:29–30, 40), thus affirming the universal scope of His mission (cf. 1:29; 3:14–15, 16–17; 4:42; 6:33, 51; 12:32, 47). Jesus's enigmatic statement (12:24) was about His future and illustrates the paradoxical nature of His death. Jesus's life-giving mission would be accomplished through death, when He would be glorified and life would be given to others (cf. vv. 32–33).

The following verses (vv. 25–26) move from the sacrificial death of Jesus to its significance for the believers. Since Jesus's death was the necessary condition for life, it is only by dying to our sinful life in this world that we receive eternal life. In dying Jesus generated life, making it possible for us to die in order to receive Jesus's gift of life. We enjoy new life by following Jesus as His servants and honoring God.

Jesus was deeply moved by the prospect of death. This is understandable because death was His enemy. He came to the world to die, and when the difficult moment was closing in on Him, the willingness remained (cf. 3:16–17; 10:11, 15; 12:47; 15:13). His actual prayer acknowledged the Father's sovereignty (12:28a). Jesus's death would be the means through which God Himself would be glorified (cf. 13:31–32; 17:1, 4), and nothing could deviate Him from pursuing that end (cf. 4:34; 5:30; 6:38; 14:10, 24). The voice from heaven, which came not so much for Jesus's sake but for the benefit of the crowd (12:30), affirmed the Father's trust in Him. It is true that the people did not understand the voice, but they should have seen in the supernatural event a sign of divine affirmation of Jesus and His ministry. God was with Him.

12:31–36. Judgment of the World. The hour of Jesus's glorification would be the hour of the judgment of the world (v. 31; cf. v. 23). There are two important implications in this statement. The first is that the ruler or prince of this world would be expelled (v. 31; cf. 16:11). To the human eye the cross was shameful, but from the divine perspective it is the triumph of God and the defeat of Satan. The image of the Son of God hanging on the cross could be taken as a symbol of the triumph of evil, but in fact it is the deepest revelation of the love of God for all of His creatures as well as the vindication of His character in the cosmic conflict against all evil powers. The second implication is that by dying on the cross, Jesus would draw all people to Himself (12:32–33; cf. 3:14). The meaning is not that all would come to Him, as if everyone in the whole world would be saved, but that all who would come to Him would do it because of the power and attraction of the cross.

The people found it difficult to understand why Jesus was talking about His death. They believed that according to the Scriptures the Messiah would remain forever (e.g., 12:34; cf. Pss. 89:3–4; 110:4; Is. 9:7; Ezek. 37:25; Dan. 7:13–14). But they missed the Scriptures that also refer to the death of the Messiah (cf. Gen. 22:1–19; Num. 21:8–9 [cf. John 3:14–17]; Is. 52:13—53:12; Dan. 9:26). This has traditionally been understood in terms of two different phases of the work of the Messiah: His atoning death the first time He came (the Suffering Servant) and the establishment of His eternal kingdom the second time He comes (the conquering King). Perhaps as a result of the Roman occupation, first-century Judaism lost sight of the first phase and focused mostly on the second one. Hope was set on a political Messiah who would restore David's dynasty and establish a kingdom that would last forever.

Jesus once again referred to Himself as the Son of Man (John 12:23), His favorite messianic self-designation (see "Son of Man," p. 1428), and the Jews asked who that was (12:34; cf. v. 23). In His answer, Jesus spoke about the light rather than about His title. The metaphor of light, which harkens back to 9:4 and 11:10, stresses the fact that they did not have much time left to believe and to become children or, literally, sons of light (12:36). The light would not remain with them much longer (cf. v. 46). Perhaps in order to illustrate the passing of the light, Jesus literally left and hid Himself. His hour had come, and soon the unbelief of His listeners would leave them in complete darkness (v. 35).

12:37–43. Outcome of the Ministry of Jesus. Despite the appeal of Jesus (vv. 35–36), the Jews were unwilling to believe. Their unbelief was then described as a fulfillment of prophecy. The point is not that unbelief—here described in terms of blinding and hardening—is caused by God Himself but that human decisions are taken seriously by God and that He incorporates them into His plan. The phrase "they could not believe" (v. 39) is not about unilateral, unconditional predestination but about the fact that what Isaiah saw happening will indeed happen. Blinding and hardening are not arbitrarily imposed by God on people. In this case they were the deliberate choices of those listening to Jesus, and they will assume responsibility for their actions (cf. 3:19; 5:40; 8:24; 9:41). God allows such things to happen, thus respecting human freedom. Some of the Jews believed (cf. 2:23; 6:2; 7:31; 8:30; 10:42; 11:45; 12:11), but even among them some turned back to unbelief. It could be that the fear of expulsion from the synagogue by the religious authorities prevented many from openly taking their stand with Jesus (9:34–35; cf. 7:32, 45; 11:47, 57; 20:19). They prioritized the affirmation of people over God's affirmation (12:43).

12:44–50. Message of Jesus. It is at this point in the narrative that the public ministry of Jesus comes to an end. This passage seems to contain a fitting summary of His message by emphasizing four main points: (1) Jesus did not come on His own initiative (cf. 5:24, 30, 43; 6:38; 7:16, 18, 28; 8:42); hence, not believing in Him is the same as not believing in the One who sent Him (12:44; cf. 5:37–38; 8:42, 47; 13:20). (2) He came as light to the world (12:46; cf. 8:12; 9:5), implying that rejecting Him means remaining in the darkness of sin forever (cf. 3:19; 8:12; 9:41). (3) He came to save, not to condemn (12:47; cf. 3:17), and condemnation is the inevitable result of unbelief (3:18) because when the saving word is rejected, it becomes a statement of condemnation (cf. 5:45). (4) Jesus spoke not of His own accord (12:49; cf. 3:34; 7:17; 8:26–28, 38, 40; 12:49–50; 14:10, 24; 17:8) but only as instructed by the Father, and the divine intention is eternal life (12:50; cf. 6:40; 17:3).

IN THE UPPER ROOM

Except for a few statements in the context of His arrest and trial, Jesus would not again directly address the people. For the next five chapters, the Gospel is concerned only with Jesus's final instructions to the Twelve. He spoke to them in the upper room (chaps. 13–14) and then on the way to Gethsemane (chaps. 15–17). John does not explicitly mention the upper room itself (cf. Mark 14:15) or the name of the garden (cf. Mark 14:32).

13:1–30

The Lord's Supper

Jesus's final instructions to the Twelve were proceeded by an evening meal (no details of which are given by John), the ordinance of foot washing, and the announcement of His betrayal.

13:1–11. The Foot Washing. The Lord's Supper was the Passover meal, the time reference which has been the subject of debate (before Passover, John 13:1) notwithstanding (cf. Matt. 26:17; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7–8). Does the time reference refer only to the actions described in John 13:1, in particular to Jesus's foreknowledge of what awaited Him, or does it also include the meal itself (v. 2)? The debate is ongoing.

The Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread commemorated the deliverance of the children of Israel from their bondage in Egypt. In remembrance of how the firstborn of Israel had been "passed over," while the firstborn of Egypt had died, Israelite families sacrificed a lamb on the afternoon of Nisan 14 (before sundown) and prepared it so that after sundown (the beginning of Nisan 15), it could be eaten at the Passover meal (Ex. 12:6; Lev. 23:4–6). The Feast of Unleavened Bread, which lasted an entire week, also began that day at sundown (Ex. 12:8, 15, 17–20). In remembrance of the haste in which their ancestors left Egypt, no leavened bread was to be eaten during the festival or even kept in the house. Although these two events were originally different festivals, they were so closely intertwined that by the time of Jesus they had essentially become a single festival celebrated for a week. It is for this reason that the entire celebration can be referred to in the NT as the Passover (Luke 22:1).

Knowing that His hour had come (John 13:1; cf. 7:30; 8:20; 12:23, 27; 17:1), Jesus directed His attention to the Twelve as the representatives of the new messianic community (cf. 1:11–13; 10:3–4, 16, 26–27; 17:6–9, 20–21). The Greek behind the phrase "to the end" (eis telos) also means "to the utmost"—and both meanings might be present here. The foot washing ceremony should be understood within the context of Jesus's most intense love for the disciples. Foot washing, always done before a meal, was customarily the work of a servant. Surprisingly, the text makes it clear that this had not been done. Thus, it was only after the meal (13:2) that Jesus used this as an opportunity to teach a profound lesson on humility. It summarized the whole life of Jesus as one of service to humanity; a service that would reach unanticipated expression on the cross. As recorded in the Synoptics, there was a dispute among the disciples as to which of them was the greatest. In this context an acted-out parable on the importance of humility and service was appropriate (Luke 22:24). However, in His dialogue with Peter, Jesus clearly demonstrated that foot washing also involved a spiritual cleansing without which no one could sit at the table to have fellowship with Him (John 13:8). From this perspective, the action of Jesus was fully related to His atoning work on the cross (cf. v. 7). The key text is v. 10, which brings out a significant contrast between the verbs "to bathe" (louō) and "to wash" (niptō). On a literal level, "to bathe" may relate to the ritual bathing performed by Jews in preparation for the Passover (cf. 11:55), while "to wash" certainly refers to the custom of the hosts arranging to have the feet of the guests washed on arriving at the house for a meal. But the way Jesus used both verbs implies that those who have surrendered their life to Him in faith and baptism have been cleansed from their sins (cf. 3:5–6; 6:63; 1 John 1:9). Consequently, the foot washing serves as a reminder of such an experience and as a symbolic renewal of the cleansing. That all the disciples were clean except one (John 13:11) shows that no rite by itself, even if performed by Jesus Himself, is enough to guarantee spiritual cleansing.

13:12–20. Object Lesson. Having washed the feet of all the disciples, Jesus resumed His place at the table and invited them to think about the significance of His act. They had referred to Him as "Teacher" and "Lord" (v. 13), which He said was correct. "Teacher," the equivalent to "rabbi," was the respectful way of addressing a religious instructor (e.g., 1:38, 49; 3:2, 10, 26; 6:25). In the present context, "Lord" could be either a title expressing politeness (e.g., 4:11, 15, 49; 5:7; 6:34) or a recognition of divine status (cf. 6:68; 20:28). Using a qal wahomer technique (see commentary on John 7:19–24), Jesus argued that if He, being Lord and Teacher (He changes the word order), was willing to wash their feet, so much more should they wash each other's feet (13:14). Jesus was modeling for the disciples what He expected from them. They were not to cling to their dignity to the point of avoiding any possible humble task performed in service to others (v. 16; cf. 15:20; Matt. 10:24; Luke 6:40). "The only greatness is the greatness of humility. The only distinction is found in devotion to the service of others" (DA 650). The content of "these things" (John 13:17) is not immediately clear, but the use of the verb "to do" indicates that foot washing was not only an example but particularly an ordinance of the Lord to be always performed in preparation for the Lord's Supper.

Then the narrative shifts rather abruptly from the disciples in general to Judas. The language of choosing/election implies not unilateral, unconditional predestination but simply the foreknowledge of Jesus concerning the one who would betray Him (cf. 6:64), which was previously announced through a prophecy that was to be fulfilled at this time (cf. Ps. 41:9). At this moment His words remained enigmatic to the disciples. It was only after Judas carried out the betrayal that they would understand the full meaning of His words and would believe that He was the "I am" (John 13:19). The expression almost certainly refers to Jesus's divinity, as it implies that He was the One He claimed to be (cf. 8:28, 58).

13:21–30. The Betrayal Predicted. After explaining the meaning of foot washing, Jesus moved to the identification of Judas as the betrayer. As Jesus was doing this He was "troubled in spirit" (v. 21). The word "troubled" (tarassō), already used of Jesus in 11:33 and 12:27, offers another glimpse of His human nature, strongly attested in John's Gospel (1:14; 4:6–7; 11:35; 19:1–2, 17–18, 28, 33–34; 20:20, 27). In the present passage, the inner turmoil of Jesus was caused by the awareness of His approaching sacrificial death for the sins of the world. This is not the first time the betrayal is announced in John's Gospel (cf. 6:64, 70–71; 12:4; 13:2, 11, 18–19), but now the moment had come when Judas would sever his relations with Jesus.

The disciples did not understand Jesus and through the end of this section remained in suspense. John, the disciple "whom Jesus loved" (13:23; cf. 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20), would soon come to know. It was Peter who took the initiative by signaling John to ask Jesus to identify the traitor. All would have been reclining on their left sides (in order to use only their right hands to eat with) so their feet would have been away from the table set in semicircle, with Jesus at the center. John was reclining next to Jesus, to His right, so he could lean back with his head and rest on the chest of Jesus to speak to Him (for the description of a Roman-style dining room, see commentary on John 12:1–8). Peter's position is not mentioned, but it was not to the left of Jesus because the one probably reclining there was Judas, who could be easily reached by Jesus (13:26). This put Judas at Jesus's back—the most honored position at the table and thus likely why the disciples did not suspect him. By honoring Judas in this way, Jesus made one last attempt to win him over before he departed on his mission of betrayal. Jesus identified the traitor to John by giving Judas the piece of bread. This would go unnoticed by the other disciples, suggesting that Jesus did not want to expose Judas before he fully carried out his intent. But Jesus knew the disposition of Judas's heart, and when John said that Satan entered into him (v. 27), the Evangelist wanted to reveal the cosmic magnitude of the betrayal. Satan was the real architect of the plan of Judas, though he needed Judas's consent and participation (cf. Mark 14:21).

The command of Jesus (John 13:27b) shows that He was not an ignorant victim but that He was in charge of the whole situation; Jesus was in control. He was fully aware of what was happening, thus accentuating His willingness to die for others (cf. 10:18). The remark "it was night" (13:30) serves to call attention to the tragedy of the life of Judas. By leaving, he had separated himself from the light of the world and moved into deep darkness.

Prelude to the Farewell Discourse

With Judas's departure, the story of Jesus advances to its final chapter. Between the departure of Judas (13:30) and the Farewell Discourse (typically designated as chaps. 14–17), Jesus spoke to the disciples about love and loyalty.

13:31–35. New Commandment. To begin, Jesus referenced His death as an accomplished fact (cf. 12:23). Yet, contrary to normal human expectations, His death was the moment of glory, not of shame, for Himself and for the Father (13:24–28), who was the very Source of His mission (3:16–17; 6:57; 8:42; 12:49; 13:20; 17:18; 20:21). The benefits of Jesus's triumph were reciprocal: since the Father was glorified through Him, He would soon be glorified by the Father (13:31; 17:1, 4–5, 24).

The glorification of Jesus would imply a temporary separation from the disciples, whom Jesus referred to as teknia ("children"; 13:33; cf. 7:33–34; 8:21; 12:35). In order to instruct them on how to live in His absence, He announced a new commandment: they should love one another (13:34). The Greek word for "new" (kainos) does not have a temporal connotation—as does neos, which means "new" in the sense of fresh or recent. This means that the commandment was not a novelty introduced by Jesus (see Lev. 19:18; cf. Matt. 5:43; Luke 10:25–27). What is new is the revelation of it in Jesus and not the commandment itself. The disciples were to love as Jesus loved them (cf. John 13:1; 15:13; 1 John 3:23; 4:7–8, 11–12, 19–21). Love was to be the supreme characteristic of God's new messianic community.

13:36–38. Peter's Denial Foretold. Jesus's prophecy of the denial of Peter appears in all four Gospels, with minor differences (cf. Matt. 26:33–35; Mark 14:29–31; Luke 22:31–34). Peter's question of where Jesus was going (John 13:36) clearly picks up on v. 33. The enigmatic answer of Jesus anticipates the next question of Peter (v. 37). It also suggests that Peter would fully understand His departure only later, when he would be ready again to follow Him (cf. 21:18–19). In keeping with his well-known spontaneity, Peter stated his unwillingness to wait and that, if necessary, he would even die for Jesus. The question of Jesus in v. 38 probes Peter's self-assured enthusiasm. It must be read as an ironic "Really?" He knew that later that same night, when given the opportunity to confess His Lord, Peter would three times deny Him (cf. 18:17, 25–27). A rooster crowing would remind Peter of Jesus's prophecy.

14:1—17:26

FAREWELL DISCOURSE

After discussing love and loyalty, Jesus presented a lengthy Farewell Discourse that has several components referred to here as the first, second, and third parts, and it is closed by a prayer. This was meant to prepare the disciples for His death and the coming of the Spirit.

14:1–31

The First Part of the Farewell Discourse

The first part of the Farewell Discourse began while Jesus was still in the Upper Room with His disciples. In this part, He discussed His Second Coming, the way to the Father, the importance of faith, and the gift of the Holy Spirit.

14:1–3. Second Coming of Jesus. The major concern of Jesus in this part of the discourse was His soon departure, that is, the tragic events that lay just ahead of Him. He began by assuring the disciples that He would come back to take them to be with Him. The verb "believe" (pisteuō—"to have faith or trust in"), used twice in v. 1, can be read in Greek as an imperative or an indicative. Since in John there can be no faith in God apart from faith in Jesus (cf. 5:23, 43, 46–47; 6:40; 8:42, 47), it is possible to take both forms as imperatives. In this case, Jesus urged the disciples not to lose faith and hope in facing His soon departure (death) because there are many monai in His Father's house (14:2). This Greek word is sometimes translated as "mansions," which comes from the Latin mansio (which was used in this passage in the Latin Bible), whose meaning is almost equivalent to monē: "dwelling place." The notion of a large, impressive house attached to the English "mansion" cannot be derived from the Greek or the Latin. The "Father's house" is most probably a reference to the heavenly sanctuary (1 Kin. 8:43; Pss. 11:4; 102:19; Mic. 1:2–3; cf. Ex. 25:9, 40; Heb. 9:23–24; Rev. 11:19; 15:5), where He would prepare a place for them.

If the Father's house is the heavenly sanctuary, which is also the eternal dwelling place of the redeemed (Pss. 23:6; 27:4; Rev. 21:3; cf. John 17:24), we may also detect a reference to the intercessory ministry of Jesus in heaven in 14:2–3 (Rom. 8:33; 1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 4:14–16; 7:25; 8:1–2; 9:24; 1 John 2:1). This would indicate that Jesus's primary emphasis was on access to the Father (John 14:6; cf. Heb. 10:19–21). This promise will find its ultimate fulfillment at the Second Coming of Jesus (cf. John 21:22), when salvation will be brought to completion and we will be permanently reunited with Jesus (cf. 1 Thess. 4:13–17).

14:4–11. The Way to the Father. Jesus told the disciples that they knew where He was going as well as the way there. This triggered a series of questions, first by Thomas (John 14:5), then by Philip (v. 8), and finally by Judas son of James (v. 22; see Luke 6:16). Thomas's question prompted the sixth "I am" saying of John's Gospel (John 14:6; cf. 6:35; 8:12; 10:7, 11; 11:25; 15:1; see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430). Jesus knew that we can approach the Father because He is the Way. By claiming to be "the way" He was also claiming to be the Truth and the Life—the truth about the Father because He is one with the Father (14:9–10; cf. 10:30, 38; 17:21). He is also the expression of the life that the Father is willing to give to the world because the Father granted Him to have life in Himself (5:26; 10:17–18; 11:25). That is, it is only because Jesus is the Truth and the Life that He can be the Way—the only Way—to the Father.

The conditional construction in 14:7 implies that the disciples had not been able to understand that in Jesus the Father had made Himself fully known (1:18). Consequently, they did not yet know the Father. The question of Philip (14:8) only reinforces this point. By now all of them should have known that Jesus is the revealer of the Father and that to see Him is to see the Father, but that did not seem to be the case (cf. 12:45). Jesus insisted that there is a close relationship between Himself (the Son) and the Father, and it was expressed in both His words (teaching) and works (miracles): in His words, because He did not say anything on His own (3:34; 7:17; 8:28, 38; 14:24; 17:8), and in His works because everything He did was in full accord with the Father's will (4:34; 5:19–20; 10:25, 32, 37; 12:49; 14:10). Jesus spoke of the mutual indwelling of Father and Son again in 14:11, accompanied by a call to the disciples to believe it. The miracles of Jesus also revealed this intimate relationship (cf. 5:36; 10:37–38).

14:12–14. Result of Faith. In addition to the more creedal faith mentioned in 14:11, Jesus also spoke of faith in Him. This faith would enable them to do even greater things (v. 12), and they were assured that their prayers would be heard (vv. 13–14). The "greater" things include miracles, but it must be taken more broadly as a reference to all God's redemptive acts for humanity. These greater works are the accomplishments of the church in announcing redemption through Christ, which would exceed the works of Jesus because He was returning to the Father. This is probably an allusion to His glorification and the subsequent outpouring of the Spirit, which would enable the church to fulfill its worldwide mission (cf. 7:39; 14:17; 20:21–22; Acts 2:32–34). The promise that Jesus would answer the prayers of the disciples is repeated several times in the Farewell Discourse (John 15:7, 16; 16:23, 24, 26). The power of prayer is unlimited, as shown by the use of "whatever" (14:13), which refers to the "greater" things of the previous verse. Asking in Jesus's name is not a magic formula but an expression of faith in Jesus and the recognition of His work as our mediator (cf. 5:27; 17:2).

14:15–17. Coming of the Spirit. This new section starts rather abruptly with an emphasis on the words "love" and "keep." The verb "to love" appears eight times among 14:15, 21, 23, and 24. The keeping of the commandments refers to Jesus's commands, inclusive of His summary of the Decalogue (8:47; 12:49–50; 13:34; 15:10–12; cf. Mark 12:29–31). The Greek manuscripts are divided as to whether the form of the verb in 14:15 regarding commandment keeping is an infinitive, "to keep" (tēreō), future, "will keep" (tērēsete), imperative, "you must keep" (tērēsate), or subjunctive, "you would keep" (tērēsēte). The future tense has the strongest textual support and fits well the conditional clause "if you love Me." The conjunction "and" (kai) at the beginning of v. 16 makes it clear that the promise that follows would become a reality only if the disciples would take seriously their commitment to Jesus, that is, if they would love Him and keep His commandments.

The promise (vv. 16–17) refers to the Holy Spirit. In fact, this is the first of a series of five passages where the Holy Spirit is called the paraklētos—translated variously as "Helper," "Advocate," "Comforter," or "Counselor" (see below, "The Meaning of Paraklētos")—and pneuma tēs alētheias—"Spirit of truth" (cf. 14:25–26; 15:26–27; 16:7–11, 13–15). Such passages are unique to John and are among the most important ones in the entire NT for a theology of the Holy Spirit (see John: Introduction). Jesus spoke of His departure to the Father (14:12). He said here that "another" (allos) paraklētos would take His place and be with the disciples forever (v. 16). This suggests that He Himself had been a paraklētos to them, though the term is never applied to Jesus in this Gospel (cf. 1 John 2:1). As for allos, contrary to popular interpretation, this adjective does not say anything about the Holy Spirit other than He is not Jesus Himself, as it only implies numerical distinction (e.g., "another parable," Matt. 13:24, 31, 33; 21:33).

14:18–24. Manifestation of Jesus. Jesus's announcement of His return to the disciples (John 14:18–20) has been interpreted as a promise of the coming of the Spirit, as a reference to the resurrection of Jesus, and as a reference to the Second Coming of Jesus. Though explicitly mentioned in the same chapter (v. 3), the reference may not be to the Second Coming. It is possible that Jesus was referring to His return to them after His resurrection. This is mentioned in vv. 19–20. But the fact that soon after His resurrection Jesus would go to the Father suggests that He would leave them orphans. It is perhaps better to find here a reference to both the resurrection and the coming of the Spirit, through whom Jesus would remain with them to the end (vv. 15–17).

The Meaning of Paraklētos

The exact meaning of paraklētos, whether "advocate," "counselor," or "helper," is highly debated. In the first case, it would be related to the verb parakaleō ("call to one's side"), and in the second, to the noun paraklēsis ("encouragement/comfort"). The third option tries to combine the previous ones. The problem is that neither "advocate" nor "counselor" fits the role ascribed to the Holy Spirit in the Paraclete passages (John 14:15–17, 25–26; 15:26–27; 16:7–11, 13–15). "Helper" lacks precision, though it can be useful. Another possibility is to relate paraklētos to the Aramaic peraqlita—itself a transliteration of the Greek term—which is sometimes used in Jewish literature with notions of instruction. In this case, paraklētos would mean "instructor," and this corresponds very closely to what John says about the Paraclete (14:26; 15:26; 16:7–8, 13–14). But since the Spirit is more than an instructor, it would be better to retain "helper" as expressing the ideas of One who instructs and speaks for humanity. One thing is clear, the title indicates that the Spirit is a person.

Verses 19–20 are most probably dealing with the resurrection of Jesus. What is often translated as "a little while" or "before long" points to the approaching crucifixion (cf. 7:33; 12:35; 13:33), whereas "because I live" points to the resurrected life of Jesus (14:19). It is because of Jesus's imminent death that the world would no longer see Him, but through the resurrection, the disciples would see Him again. Then, on "that day" (v. 20), they would finally understand the intimate relationship that exists between the Son and the Father, which in turn functions as a model for the intimate relationship that Jesus wishes to have with His followers (15:1–7, 10–11; 17:21, 23).

The question of Judas, son of James (14:22), like those of Thomas (v. 5) and Philip (v. 8), helped to advance the discussion. He was intrigued by the distinction Jesus made between the world and the disciples (v. 19). Jesus clarified that only those who love Him and keep His words will have full fellowship with the Father, saying that Jesus and the Father will come to them to make their home with them (v. 23). This experience goes way beyond His post-resurrection appearances to include the permanent indwelling in the hearts of believers.

14:25–31. Jesus's Final Remarks. Verse 25 suggests that Jesus was referring back to His previous statements (cf. 15:11; 16:1, 4, 6, 25, 33). The words that follow bring the first part of the Farewell Discourse to an end. By saying that such words were spoken while He still was with them, Jesus wanted to call the disciples' attention to the dreadful event that was just about to occur. The Spirit, however, would occupy His place and keep them mindful of everything He said. This is the second of the so-called "Paraclete passages" (cf. 14:16–17; 15:26–27; 16:7–11, 13–15). This passage clearly says that the Paraclete is the Holy Spirit, whom the Father would send in the name of Jesus to remind the disciples of everything Jesus told them (14:26). There were issues related to Jesus and His teachings that the disciples had not yet been able to understand, and the Spirit would clarify them. The Gospel of John itself contains a high Christology that is the result of the teaching role of the Spirit within the apostolic church.

In these final remarks, Jesus also bid the disciples farewell, wishing them peace and in fact granting it to them. He granted them the peace surpassing everything the world could offer, grounded on the assurance of His victory on the cross (v. 27; cf. 16:33). This peace, then, had redemptive connotations (cf. Rom. 5:1; Col. 1:19–20). The conditional clause about loving Him (John 14:28) is in fact an invitation to the disciples to express their love by rejoicing at the departure of Jesus, probably because death would not hold Him for too long (cf. 16:22). Jesus's statement about His Father being greater than Him (14:28) does not refer to His essential being or to a supposed hierarchy within the Godhead (cf. 10:30–33). It is simply highlighting the fact that the Father, as the supreme author of His saving mission (5:19–20, 30; 7:16–18, 28–29; 8:28, 42; 12:49–50; 14:24), was more than able to bring glory out of the shame and tragedy of the cross (cf. 12:24–28; 13:31–32).

John 14:30–31 concludes the first discourse. The unmistakable reference to Satan (cf. 12:31) was a warning that he was coming personally and in the actions of Judas (13:27). Judas was just about to finalize the betrayal (cf. 18:2–5). By saying that Satan en emoi ouk echei ouden—variously translated as "has nothing in Me," "has no claim on Me," "has no power over me" or "has no hold over me"—Jesus was actually using a Semitic idiom to establish the fact that Satan has no legal claim or charge against Him (14:30). His death could be seen by some as evidence of guilt, but the resurrection would prove His innocence. Jesus was not afraid to go to the courtroom, so to speak, as the Father commanded Him, for there He would publicly demonstrate His love for the Father. He then confidently told them to rise up and depart (14:31).

15:1—16:4a

The Second Part of the Farewell Discourse

When they left the upper room, Jesus and the disciples walked to a garden on the east side of Jerusalem, right across the Kidron Valley (18:1; the garden of Gethsemane; e.g., Mark 14:32). On the way there, they apparently stopped somewhere in the city, probably the temple, where Jesus continued His Farewell Discourse (John 15–16) and prayed for the disciples (chap. 17). In the second part of the Farewell Discourse, Jesus instructed the disciples concerning their relationship with Him, with one another, and with the world.

15:1–8. True Vine. This part of the discourse opens with another illustration somewhat similar to that of 10:1–6. "I am the true vine" (15:1) is the seventh and last metaphorical "I am" saying of Jesus in John (cf. 6:35; 8:12; 10:7, 11; 11:25; 14:6; see "The 'I Am' Sayings," p. 1430). In the OT, the vine is a recurrent symbol for Israel (cf. Ps. 80:8–16; Is. 5:1–7; Jer. 2:21; Ezek. 15:1–8; Hos. 10:1), but in the second discourse Jesus applied it to Himself. The Father represents the vinedresser. This fits the Johannine presentation of the role of the Father in Jesus's redemptive mission (cf. John 6:37, 44–45; 17:6–8; 18:9). The Father looks over the vitality of the branches, which stands for the disciples, taking away (airō) the unfruitful ones and pruning (kathairō) the others so that they may be more productive (15:2–5). There seems to be an intentional play on the two Greek verbs, which do not often have those meanings. The fruit is not defined, but in light of v. 10, it may refer to the faithful commitment to Jesus and His words (cf. 5:24; 8:47; 12:47; 14:23–24).

The statement in 15:2 sounds like a threat, but Jesus immediately added that the disciples were already "clean" (katharos; v. 3). This is the same word used in 13:10, but the contexts are not related. Jesus explained that the pruning process had been done by the word He had spoken, probably referring to the positive response of the disciples to the challenging nature of His teachings (cf. 6:60, 66–69; 12:46–48). But being clean is not the only requirement for bearing fruit. The disciples were reminded that only the branches that are not taken away can remain productive (15:4). Jesus's call to abide or remain in Him as He does in them (v. 4) in this context is conducive for understanding the mutual indwelling mentioned in 14:20–21, 23. It also makes clear that the strength of the branches depends on their vital union with the vine. Simply put, no branch can bear fruit of itself (15:4–5). This is an apt illustration of two spiritual concepts: the real Christian life exists only when there is an intimate, unbroken relationship with Jesus, and faith and obedience are not the natural results of human effort (6:44, 65; cf. Rom. 10:17; 12:3). Believers must choose to believe and to remain in Jesus (cf. John 5:40) or they will be cut off (15:6), that is, the divine Vinedresser will let them follow the course of their own choosing (cf. 3:19; 8:24).

The promise in 15:7 parallels that of 14:13, which suggests that it should be understood in the context of the mission of the disciples. Abiding in Jesus is also a necessary condition for the church to continue the mission of Jesus in the world in obedience to the Father's sovereign plan (13:20; 17:18; 20:21). When this happens, the Father is glorified (15:8), as He is glorified in the mission of the Son (cf. 13:31–32). Then the goal of discipleship is fulfilled, or, as Jesus indicates, it is demonstrated that they are His disciples (15:8; cf. 8:31; 13:35).

15:9–17. Love One Another. At this point Jesus abandoned the illustration. The correspondence between 15:8 and 13:35 facilitates the transition to the subject of love, which in turn explains the character of the mutual indwelling of 15:4. The relationship Jesus had in mind is based on love and is modeled after the relationship that exists between the Father and the Son (vv. 9–10; cf. 3:35; 5:20; 10:17; 16:27). Genuine love, however, expresses itself in terms of a personal commitment. We remain in the love of Jesus only if we keep His commandments, which in John's Gospel primarily corresponds to the instructions and teachings of Jesus as an expression of the will of God for us (15:10; cf. 5:24; 8:47; 12:47; 14:23–24). The commitment Jesus demands is not different from His commitment to the Father (3:34; 7:17; 12:50; 17:8). Either it is complete or it has no value. A divided heart does not please the Father (cf. Matt. 6:24).

Jesus then introduced the logical implications of the words just stated (John 15:11; cf. 14:25; 16:1, 4, 6, 25, 33). This refers to the disciples' unrestricted commitment to Jesus that allowed them to experience the joy that Christ Himself would feel after finishing His mission—the joy of the resurrection (cf. 14:28; 16:20–22, 33). The singular commandment (15:12) identifies that which certainly was the most important thing Jesus ever told the disciples concerning their mutual relationship (cf. 13:34). By experiencing the love of Jesus, the disciples would have a template to know how to love one another. This completed the chain: the Father loving the Son (15:9; cf. 3:35; 10:17); the Son loving the disciples (15:9; cf. 13:1; 14:21; 15:13); and the disciples loving each other (cf. 13:34, 35; 15:17). The first link of the chain (the Father's love for the Son) was about the inner being of God that the disciples could access. But the second link (Jesus's love for them), which determined the third link (their love for each other), is expressed in a most sublime way (15:13). That a person would die for a friend (v. 13) is an unparalleled description of genuine friendship—the disciples were the friends of Jesus, and He was ready to gives His life for them (cf. Rom. 5:7–8).

It was not the disciples themselves who decided to follow Jesus, as was customary when someone wished to be taught by a Jewish rabbi. They just responded favorably to the call of Jesus (John 15:16; cf. 1:43; 10:4, 14–16). Divine activity always precedes human response (cf. 6:37, 44–45; 16:8), though this response can unfortunately be negative (cf. 3:19–20; 5:40; 8:24). That the disciples were appointed to "go and bear fruit" (15:16) means that discipleship involves a life of faith that goes out to reach the world. Every disciple is called to bear fruit and to glorify God for the benefit of the world (cf. 15:8; 17:18; 20:21). It is in the context of Christian mission that Jesus says that the Father will give us whatever we ask in His name (see commentary on John 14:12–14). John 15:17 is a concluding summary of what Jesus had just said. Love is the essential ingredient in our relationship and in the fulfillment of our mission in the world.

15:18–27. Hated by the World. To some extent the opposite of love is hate, and this is what the disciples would face as they went out to the world to fulfill their mission. So far, the disciples' relationship with Jesus had been explained in terms of His relationship with the Father (15:10; cf. 3:35; 5:20; 10:17; 16:27), but at this time they were told that their experience in the world would be similar to that of Jesus; they would face rebuff and hostility (cf. 7:7; 16:20, 33; 17:11, 14–16, 18). As servants, the disciples should not expect to avoid what even their Master could not (15:20). The context explicitly refers to persecution (see Matt. 10:22–25). The reference to suffering may have been meaningful to John's original audience, whose members were probably facing religious intolerance (see John: Introduction). John 15:21 refers back to the negative reaction of the world (vv. 18–19). The disciples would suffer for the same reasons Jesus did, that is, because of the refusal of the world to recognize the divine origin of their message (cf. 5:37–38; 7:28–29; 8:19, 42)—a refusal that would lead to hostility. Christ's message is so clear that its rejection increases a person's guilt. Since its rejection is willful, there is no excuse for their sin (15:22), the sin of unbelief (cf. 8:21; 9:41). Our reaction to Jesus is equivalent to our reaction to God (15:23; cf. 12:44; 13:20; 16:3), a reality that highlights the absurdity of unbelief. This idea continues through 15:24–25. According to the OT quotation in v. 25 (Ps. 35:19; cf. Pss. 69:4; 109:3), no one can take credit for believing (John 6:37, 44–45), but we are responsible for not believing.

The section closes with another reference to the paraklētos (15:26–27)—the third one in the Farewell Discourse (cf. 14:16–17, 25–26; 16:7–11, 13–15). In the face of hostility and persecution, the disciples were promised the Holy Spirit to assist them. The divine Instructor is once again described as the Spirit of truth (cf. 14:17). The reference to the Spirit proceeding or going out from the Father means that He would be sent "from the Father" (15:26; cf. 14:26). This places the mission of the Spirit in continuity with that of Jesus. He would testify of Jesus by inspiring the disciples to defend their faith and carry out the proclamation of the gospel. The use of the verb "to testify" (martyreō) implies legal testimony as in a court of law. The disciples, however, would also be able to offer their personal testimony of the things they had seen and come to believe during the ministry of Jesus among them.

16:1–4a. More on Persecution. This paragraph resumes the discussion on the relationship between the disciples and the world. Previously the disciples were told why they would face persecution (15:19–21), but at this time Jesus gave them more information as to the nature of that persecution. Informing them about this would prevent the disciples from stumbling or falling away (skandalizō—16:1; cf. 6:61; Mark 14:27–31). It may seem strange to suffer because we believe in Jesus Christ. But there is an enemy (John 12:31; 14:30), and Jesus does not want us to have false expectations. Even if the enemy has already been judged (cf. 16:11), it is only at the Second Coming that we will be finally liberated from his oppressive influence (14:1–3). John specifically refers to excommunication, probably because of the situation in which some Jewish Christians found themselves at the time John wrote his Gospel (see John: Introduction).

Jesus said the time was coming (16:2), emphasizing the certainty of the statement, when the disciples would even be put to death. This crime would be committed as a supposed service to God. Much blood has been spilled in the name of the Lord. Unfortunately, so-called Christians themselves have throughout history been guilty of such a crime. The reason for such persecutions, as in 15:21, has been ignorance of God's revelation through Christ (cf. 5:37–38; 8:19, 42; 16:27). Jesus sought to inspire confidence and serenity in the disciples (16:4). When such times would come, they would remember His words—certainly under the guidance of the paraklētos (cf. 14:26)—and recognize that nothing happens outside His control.

The Third Part of the Farewell Discourse

The third part of this discourse shares some common themes with the other two, though it advances the idea of the disciples' relationship with the paraklētos and the world.

16:4b–6. Disciples' Sorrow. The transition from the second discourse to the third one is not as clear as the transition from the first to the second (cf. 14:31). It has been argued that the change of thought introduced in 16:4 could indicate the end of one discourse and the beginning of the other. We follow this suggestion.

In the third discourse, Jesus turned to emphasize His departure to the Father. He had been with the disciples since the beginning of His ministry, but now He wanted to prepare them for the new situation that would come after His death. Jesus pointed out with an implied rebuke that none of them were asking Him where He would be going (16:5). This seems to contradict 13:36 and 14:5, where Peter and Thomas asked this specific question. The point, however, is that Jesus never gave a direct answer to them, especially not to Peter. He just changed the subject and did not return to it. The sadness mentioned in 16:6, suggests that the disciples had not yet fully understood either the real nature of Jesus's departure or His final destiny.

16:7–15. Work of the Spirit. At this point, Jesus introduced the fourth paraklētos saying (vv. 7–11; cf. 14:16–17, 25–26; 15:26–27; 16:13–15). It has been suggested that by saying that His departure would be beneficial to the disciples, Jesus meant that He and the Spirit could not be with the disciples at one and the same time. This is too simplistic, however. The point is that the coming of the Spirit (at Pentecost) was contingent on Jesus's glorification in heaven (7:39; cf. Acts 2:32–34; Eph. 4:7–10; Rev. 5:1–14). This event would signify the Father's approval on the achievements of the Son (John 17:1, 4–5), His triumph over the forces of evil (12:31; 16:11), and His installation in heaven as our Mediator (14:16). The glorification of Jesus, therefore, would launch the eschatological era in God's plan of salvation—a worldwide mission led by the Spirit and not subject to the spatial limitations of the incarnate Jesus (cf. 14:12).

Jesus provided a detailed description of the threefold work of the Spirit in relation to the world (16:8–11). The translation of elenchō in v. 8 is debated. It is not easy to identify a meaning that would fit well with sin, righteousness, and judgment. Some translations have "convict," others "reprove," and others "prove wrong." If this is the nuance intended, Jesus would have been saying that the Spirit would convict or reprove the world for its conceptions of sin, righteousness, and judgment—that the three things Jesus would go on to mention would show them true conceptions of themselves, and correct their false ideas. Another possible translation is "convince." The Spirit would work directly on the conscience of the world, aiming at convincing it of sin because of its failure to believe in Jesus (v. 9); of Jesus's righteousness, because He was going to the Father (v. 10) and would be recognized as innocent; and of judgment, because in His victory over Satan on the cross, He would reveal Himself as the Judge of the world (v. 11). These things Jesus had already been doing—trying to convince the world of sin (cf. 7:7; 8:21; 9:41; 15:22, 24), of His own innocence (cf. 7:16–24; 8:46–49), and of the reality of judgment (cf. 3:18–19; 5:27, 30; 12:31). After His glorification, this task would be assigned to the Holy Spirit. "It is the Spirit that makes effectual what has been wrought out by the world's Redeemer" (DA 671).

The statement that appears next (16:12) makes the transition from the fourth to the fifth (and last) saying about the Spirit (paraklētos; vv. 13–15). Jesus was not specific about the considerable amount of other information that the disciples could not bear at that time. The impartation of this information would be done by the Spirit as He guided the church into a deeper understanding of Jesus and His saving work. The Spirit will not speak on His own accord (v. 13; cf. 3:34; 7:17; 8:26–28, 38, 40; 12:49–50; 14:10, 24; 17:8). Everything necessary for salvation was revealed to us through the Son of God. The Spirit, although a distinct person, is not an independent force. Rather, He is a divine agent speaking only what He hears and what is yet to come. He would deepen and unfold the significance of the work of Christ and would declare it to the believers. His ministry would in a sense be a continuation of the ministry of Jesus after His departure to the Father. He would constantly glorify Jesus by upholding His teachings and His saving power. In 16:15, Jesus emphasized the role of the Father in redemptive history, that is, the relation of Jesus with the Spirit is not independent of His relationship with the Father. This is another way of expressing the unity that exists between the Father and Jesus (cf. 10:30, 38; 17:21). Jesus said that everything that belongs to the Father also belongs to Him.

16:16–24. Sorrow Turned into Joy. The abrupt change of theme may indicate selectivity on John's part (cf. 20:30; 21:25), that is to say that the Farewell Discourse could have originally included more material than what we have in this Gospel. At any rate, the theme of sorrow is a development of the statement found in 16:6 and in the first discourse (cf. 14:19–20, 28–31). The same expression, "a little while" (16:16), used in 14:19 (also "before long"; cf. 7:33; 12:35; 13:33) in relation to the world, appears here as applied to the disciples. The reference is to Jesus's resurrection that would take place shortly after His death—more precisely, "in three days" (2:19–20). Some translations add "because I go to the Father" at the end of 16:16 (which is also mentioned in v. 17). The whole passage is intended to clarify the exact meaning of the departure of Jesus and particularly the enigmatic "a little while," which intrigued the disciples. They did not understand what He was talking about (v. 18).

Recognizing the interest of the disciples, Jesus started saying in a solemn way that the coming events would make them weep with deep sorrow (v. 20), whereas the world—that is, those who were opposed to Him (cf. 1:10; 14:17; 15:18–19; 17:14–16)—would rejoice. The sorrow/rejoice pattern, however, would also be experienced by the disciples themselves (16:22). The sudden change from extreme distress to lavish joy typical of childbirth is what would characterize the reaction of the disciples to His death and then to His resurrection (v. 21). Their grief would be replaced by a joy that no one could take from them. The wording of v. 22b seems to have been inspired by the beautiful promise of Isaiah 66:14. "In that day" (John 16:23) certainly points to the time after Jesus's resurrection (cf. 14:20). In John, the verb erōtaō ("to ask") can mean either "to ask a question" (1:19, 21, 25; 9:2; 16:19, 30) or "to ask for [something]" (4:31; 14:16; 16:26; 17:9). In 16:23, the latter meaning seems preferable. The disciples would not ask Jesus anything else, but they would ask the Father in Jesus's name. The resurrection (and glorification) of Jesus would inaugurate a new state of affairs. His accomplishments in redemptive history would grant validity to any request made in His name (see commentary on John 14:12–14).

16:25–33. No Longer in Figures. Jesus again referred to the importance and nature of what He was saying to the disciples (16:25; cf. 14:25; 15:11; 16:1, 4, 6, 33) as the Farewell Discourse in John is coming to an end. The figurative nature of what Jesus was saying (paroimia) probably refers to the discourse as a whole and not to the immediately preceding parabolic illustration (16:21). In light of the resurrection, the use of veiled language would no longer be necessary. The last clause of v. 25 does not refer to further teachings about the Father, but to the time when everything Jesus said would begin to make sense to the disciples. That Jesus would not ask (erōtaō) the Father on behalf of the disciples (v. 26b) does not contradict the NT affirmations of Jesus's intercessory work (e.g., Rom. 8:33; 1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 4:14–16; 7:25; 8:1–2; 9:24; 1 John 2:1). The meaning here is that, though the disciples would ask in His name (cf. John 16:23–24), it would be the paraklētos, not Jesus Himself, who would mediate to them the understanding referred to in the previous verse (cf. 14:25–26; 15:26–27; 16:13–15).

By expressing their conviction that Jesus came from the Father and was about to return to Him, the disciples concluded that all their difficulties had finally been cleared up (16:29–30). But this was not the case. Their reaction to the imminent crisis would demonstrate that they did not yet understand. Assuming a prophetic posture, Jesus announced that the disciples would be scattered, leaving Him alone (v. 32). The use of this verb ("to scatter") is an allusion to Zechariah 13:7 (cf. Mark 14:27). However, though the disciples would abandon Jesus, the Father would not (cf. John 8:16, 29), even if it feels that way (cf. Matt. 27:46). This reminds us that ultimately the church owes its existence not to the virtues of its founding members (the disciples) but to the faithfulness of God in carrying out the plan He established before the beginning of time (cf. Rom. 16:25–26; 2 Tim. 1:9–10; Titus 1:2). The concluding thought of the Farewell Discourse (John 16:33) points back to what Jesus said in 15:18—16:4a concerning the hatred of the world toward Him and His followers. Thus, if trials and sorrows are the inevitable ingredients of our lot in this world, we should always take courage because Jesus triumphed over the world. His victory must continually give us the assurance that, in spite of our failures and deficiencies, through Him we can also be victorious in our Christian life (cf. Rom. 8:37; Rev. 3:21).

Jesus's Intercessory Prayer

The three parts of the Farewell Discourse are followed by the so-called Intercessory Prayer offered by Jesus for the disciples, the longest and most sublime of His recorded prayers. This prayer caps off the Farewell Discourse.

17:1–5. Glorification of the Son. Jesus started His intercessory or priestly prayer with a reference to the Father's work of salvation. Since the first step toward the glorification of Jesus would be His death on the cross (John 12:16, 23–28; 13:31–32; cf. 7:39), He prayed that the Father's plan would be fully accomplished in and through Him. From the very beginning Jesus was fully conscious of the main purpose of His mission (cf. 3:16–17; 10:11, 15; 12:47; 15:13). Now the hour had come, and He prayed to the Father to glorify Him, that He might also glorify the Father (17:1). Jesus's request to be glorified expressed His total willingness to return to the Father via the cross. This was the glory through surrendering His life for others. But the exaltation of the Son through the cross also brought glory to the Father because His death was part of the plan of the Father for the salvation of the world (3:16–17).

Jesus received from the Father authority over all people (lit. "flesh"; 17:2a) in the sense that He might give eternal life to all those the Father had given Him (v. 2b). That is to say, the eternal destiny of all humankind had been committed to Jesus. That final clause of the verse highlights the divine initiative in salvation, a recurrent theme in John's Gospel (6:37, 44–45; 10:27–29; 17:6–8; 18:9; cf. 16:9). In the final analysis, every person is responsible for his or her response to God's offer of salvation, as the next section clarifies (17:3; cf. 3:19–20; 5:40; 8:24; 12:46). Salvation or eternal life is experienced only when the Father is acknowledged as the only true God and Jesus Christ as the One sent by Him (cf. 5:43–44). This practical knowledge is obtained by means of a personal, intimate relationship with God (cf. Is. 1:3; Jer. 31:34; Hos. 6:2–3). This is the way Jesus knows the Father (John 10:14–15; 14:10, 20; 17:21) and how He wants us to know Him (14:20–21; 15:4–9). What Jesus was emphasizing at this time included the experience of salvation itself, going way beyond the simple act of believing. Believing can sometimes be superficial and transitory (2:23–25; 8:30–31; 12:11; cf. 12:37).

Jesus returned to the main topic and provided the grounds for His urgent request: He asked to be glorified with the same glory He had before creation because He had glorified the Father by completing the mission the Father assigned Him (17:4–5). This is certainly an affirmation of the preexistence of Jesus (cf. 1:1–3, 15; 8:58; 16:28; 17:24), but it is much more. In the conflict Jesus faced on earth against evil powers, what was at stake was not only His own glory in heaven but also that of the Father. Consequently, the victory of Jesus is acclaimed as a source of assurance (16:33; cf. 17:11). It represents the victory of the Father as well.

17:6–10. Given from the World. The main part of the prayer deals with the disciples. The most important aspect of the earthly mission of Jesus was the revelation of the character of the Father (14:9). His works revealed as much about the Father as about Himself (5:19–20; 10:25, 37–38; 14:10–11). Such revelation was available not only to the disciples, but they were among the ones who responded favorably to it. They accepted the divine message or word (14:15, 21; 15:10; 17:6). The disciples believed and confessed that Jesus came from the Father (16:30; 17:8), and now Jesus added that they also knew that His work was from God (17:7). They had also embraced His words as the words of the Son of God (see commentary on John 6:66–71). Therefore, Jesus interceded for them before the Father.

By saying that He was not praying for the world (17:9), Jesus was not saying that He had no concern for the world—just that at that moment His deepest thoughts were with those whom the Father had given Him from the world (cf. v. 6). In fact, the salvation of the world was envisaged in the mission of the Twelve (v. 23), and Jesus would also pray for those who would believe through their testimony (vv. 20–26). The idea that it was the Father who gave Jesus the disciples (vv. 6, 9; cf. 6:44–45) implies that it is only through divine influence that people can come to believe in Jesus (16:9; cf. Phil. 2:13; 1 Thess. 4:8). And since the Father and the Son are one and have everything in common, Jesus could speak of the disciples as His own (John 17:9–10). As He was talking about the belief of the disciples, Jesus returned to the thought of glory (cf. vv. 1–6). It is not that the disciples would reveal the glory of Jesus just as He revealed the glory of the Father during His mission (cf. 13:31–32). The thought is rather that the effectiveness of Jesus's ministry was made manifest in the fact that the disciples believed in Him. Whenever a human being turns to Jesus, He is glorified.

17:11–19. Well-Being of the Disciples. Starting from v. 11, Jesus prayed for the well-being of the disciples. Since He was soon to return to the Father, Jesus spoke from the perspective of His absence. He prayed for the protection of the disciples and made four special requests. First, that the disciples might be one (v. 11; cf. v. 21), just as He and the Father are one (10:30). Such a unity is by itself a divine gift and can be attained only by God's grace. Up to this point Jesus had kept them safe in the name of the Father, except for Judas, the one headed for destruction (17:12; cf. 13:21–30). Second, He prayed that they would be filled with His joy (17:13), which was possible by remaining in the Father's love and by obeying His words (cf. 15:11; 16:20–24). Third, Jesus's request was that they might be protected from "the evil one" (17:15). The reference is to the active forces of evil in the world, which was expressed in hostility toward the disciples (cf. 15:18). Jesus did not ask that the disciples be taken out of the world because they had a mission to fulfill (cf. 17:18; cf. 13:20; 20:21). This is a reminder that though we are not of the world (17:14, 16), we are not to be detached from it, because the world is our mission field.

The last request of Jesus was that the disciples might be sanctified by the truth (v. 17). To be sanctified means to be brought into the realm of the sacred, to be dedicated to holy use. This sanctification was to be realized through the constant application of the Father's word to the life of the disciples because His word is truth. Here is the real tension between being in the world and not belonging in the world. The sanctification Jesus talked about had a mission purpose: the disciples were to be sanctified in order to be sent into the world (v. 18; cf. 13:20; 20:21). Jesus Himself was determined to sanctify Himself for the sake of the disciples (17:19). This carries a sacrificial connotation because He sanctified Himself for the task of dying for them (cf. 6:51; 10:11, 15; 11:50, 51–52; 15:13). It was His sanctification that made it possible for the disciples to be sanctified for their saving mission in the world.

17:20–26. Future Believers. Jesus directed His attention to the future generations of believers; He was praying for us as well as for those who will come after us. By the time John wrote this Gospel, the apostolic missionary activity had already achieved remarkable success (cf. Rom. 15:19; Col. 1:6). This happened in spite of the fact that the church was facing challenges from both inside and outside, threatening the faith and the unity of the church (see John: Introduction). In this prayer, Jesus's dominant concern was for the unity of His followers, grounded in the unity of Jesus with the Father (John 10:30, 38; 14:10, 20). The point is that, together with love (15:12–13; 17:26), unity is essential in the life of believers because it demonstrates the reconciling power of the mission of Jesus in the world (17:21; cf. v. 23). To achieve this unity, Jesus had given His followers His own glory (v. 22). Of course, Jesus referred not to His preexistent glory (v. 5; cf. v. 24) but to the glory of the character of the Father as a reflection in their own lives. Jesus displayed this glory in every aspect of His earthly ministry (1:14; 2:11; 11:4, 40; 14:9) because of His oneness with the Father (10:30). The unity of believers is neither self-generated nor an end in itself. It is the result of our inner apprehension of God's character through an intimate association with Jesus and the Father (14:20–21, 23; 15:4–7). This unity testifies to the world; it is the evidence the Father presents to the world to demonstrate that He sent His Son to save the world (17:23).

As Jesus moved to the end of the prayer, He expressed the desire that His followers might be with Him forever and see His preexisting glory (v. 24; cf. v. 5). This echoed the promise in 14:1–3. This request was based on the conviction that the Father loved Jesus (17:24) and that the disciples truly knew that Jesus had come from the Father (v. 25; cf. 6:68–69; 16:27). Despite the fact that the world did not accept His revelation (cf. 1:10; 8:55; 16:3), Jesus was pleased with the response of the disciples, though they still had much more to learn. He would continue to instruct them through the work of the Spirit (14:26; 15:26; 16:12–14) in order that the love with which the Father had loved Jesus would be in their hearts (17:26; cf. 13:34; 15:9–10, 12).

THE PASSION NARRATIVE

The arrest, execution, and resurrection of Jesus represent the climax of the story. John's account coheres with the Synoptic Gospels, although some differences in emphasis are found as well as some new material (19:35; 20:2; cf. 21:24).

18:1—19:16a

Jesus's Arrest and Trials

The events of Jesus's arrest and trial started in a garden, similarly as recorded in the Synoptics, and ended in the Roman Praetorium, where Pilate handed Him over to be crucified.

18:1–11. Betrayal and Arrest. John does not tell us where Jesus was when He finished the Farewell Discourse and prayed for the disciples (chaps. 15–17). Apparently, He was not in the upper room (cf. 14:31). Since it was late at night (cf. 13:30; 18:3), the suggestion that it was in the temple area does not seem altogether impossible. At any rate, when the prayer was over, Jesus went out with His disciples to a garden (Gethsemane) on the other side of the Kidron Valley, which separated the old city of Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. The garden is not named by John, but he says that Jesus and the disciples frequently went there (see also Luke 22:39). This explains why Judas, who betrayed Him, also "knew the place" (John 18:2).

The detachment of guards mentioned in v. 3 presupposes the betrayal story told in all three other Gospels (Matt. 26:14–16; Mark 14:10–11; Luke 22:3–6). The question Jesus asked about who they were looking for (John 18:4) highlights the fact that He was in full control of the entire situation (cf. 10:15, 17–18; 13:1–3, 27). In response to the answer of the guards He said, literally, "I am" (18:5). He identified Himself as the great I Am (cf. 8:24, 28; 13:19), and His divinity seems to have manifested itself with power, causing the soldiers to fall to the ground (18:6; cf. Ezek. 1:28; 44:4; Dan. 2:46; 8:18; Acts 9:4; 26:14; Rev. 1:17; 22:8). The guards probably realized that this was not an ordinary man (John 18:5, 7), but we are not told how this experience impacted them. In keeping with the main purpose of His mission (3:14; 10:11, 15; 15:13), Jesus surrendered Himself to them, but not without first securing the safety of His followers (18:8; cf. 17:12–16). The attack of one of the disciples on the servant of the high priest is mentioned in all four Gospels (Matt. 26:51–54; Mark 14:47; Luke 22:50–51), but only John gives the names of the two persons involved, Simon Peter and Malchus (John 18:10; cf. v. 26).

The reference to the "cup" Jesus must drink (v. 11) closes the arrest narrative and at the same time presupposes the agony of Jesus in Gethsemane (cf. Matt. 26:36–46; Mark 14:32–42; Luke 22:39–46). The cup, which is used here as a metaphor for death, also brings to mind the cup of God's wrath that evildoers will have to drink (cf. Ps. 75:8; Is. 51:17, 22; Jer. 25:15–17; Hab. 2:16; Rev. 14:10; 16:19). It is this cup that Jesus would drink for us. It is exactly because He would drink from the cup of God's final wrath against sin that those who accept Him can freely and abundantly drink from the living water that He has to offer (John 4:10–14; cf. Is. 55:1).

The Year of the Crucifixion

The salvation offered as a result of the crucifixion is not dependent on knowing the year of the crucifixion. This, of course, does not make the year unknowable or unimportant. Because the year of the crucifixion is not a stand-alone date, moving the date of the crucifixion affects other well-established data points. The crucifixion is inexorably tied to the seventy-weeks prophecy of Daniel 9 and to the 2,300-day prophecy of Daniel 8, the ends of which (1798 and 1844) are confirmed in both Daniel 12:11–12 and in the historical events associated with them. These two dates (and thus the crucifixion) are tied to 457 B.C. (the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes I; Ezra 7:11–26; Neh. 2:4–10, see "The Decree of Artaxerxes I as Fulfillment of Daniel 9:25," p. 584) and to A.D. 508 (see "The Union of Church and State," p. 1033).

The timing of the crucifixion was associated in some way with the Lord's Supper and the feast of Passover (John 13:1–2; 18:28; Matt. 26:17; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7–8). According to John's Gospel, the feast of Passover began on the Friday evening on which Jesus was crucified. Thus, one proposal for dating the year of the crucifixion is to identify the year that Passover began on a Friday night using astronomical data (although there are some difficulties in doing this).

Another proposal for dating the crucifixion is to establish the beginning year of Jesus's ministry by dating the year of His baptism. Jesus had a ministry that lasted about three and a half years, a fact widely recognized through careful analysis of all four Gospels; thus, simple calculations from His baptism should also provide the year of the crucifixion.

Regarding the first proposal, there are a number of problems with attempting to identify the year of the crucifixion using astronomical data. The most obvious is that we are able today with our technology to finely tune the identification of the new moon and to calculate its appearance using advanced mathematics. Then, using this data, we can identify every new moon in every month going back in time forever anywhere on the globe. However, it is certain that the skill of the first-century priests in detecting the first faint glow of the crescent moon in conjunction with the movements of the sun (since the new moon is invisible) after the vernal equinox was not as highly accurate, resulting in a necessary flexibility of a day or even two from our rigid calculations. Further, if there were certain indications that spring had not yet arrived (such as the ripening of barley, cessation of the winter rains, the drying of the roads, and young pigeons fledging), the council would meet and declare a thirteenth month (Adar 2). Thus, if one of these extra months might have occurred in the year of the crucifixion, it would throw off the correlation with our modern astronomical calculations. Those who hold to an A.D. 30 or A.D. 33 year for the crucifixion do so based almost solely on modern science's ability to identify the exact day of the week that Passover should have fallen between A.D. 26 and 36 (the years Pontius Pilate served as governor), which results in Passover being on Friday only in those two years during that span under the assumption that Jesus was crucified on Passover (Nisan 15). This technical "certainty" does not allow for the practical realities that existed in Jewish festal calendars at that time.

Regarding the second proposal, Luke 3:1–2, provides crucial data that may be used to calculate the year that Jesus was baptized. The most prominent data point is that the baptism took place in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar. There is some debate regarding when Tiberius's fifteenth year was. Because Augustus Caesar was sick, Tiberius was declared co-princeps (emperor) in a ceremony in A.D. 12, when he returned from Germania. Augustus died in A.D. 14, which began Tiberius's solo reign. If the fifteen years are counted from when he was declared co-princeps, then Jesus was baptized in A.D. 27. If the fifteen years are counted from his solo reign, then Jesus was baptized in A.D. 28 or 29 (depending on how one counts). Either of these methods of identifying Tiberius's year fifteen eliminates the A.D. 30 date of the crucifixion, for if Jesus did indeed have a ministry of three and a half years, there is no way to arrive at A.D. 30. The A.D. 27 or 28 date of the baptism also, for the same reason, eliminates the A.D. 33 date for the crucifixion. This is why those who maintain an A.D. 33 date for the crucifixion also maintain an A.D. 29 date for the baptism. On the choice between A.D. 27 or 29, historicist interpreters of Daniel 9 find that passage definitive in establishing the fall of A.D. 27 as the beginning of the Messiah's ministry, which began formally at His baptism. Thus His three and a half years of ministry ended at the cross in A.D. 31.

18:12–14. Interrogation by Annas. After His arrest, Jesus had a preliminary hearing before Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas, who was the high priest (John 18:13). This hearing, which is recorded only in John, seems to have had an informal character—perhaps only in deference to Annas's continuing influence.

18:15–18. Peter's First Denial. The narrative is skillfully interrupted to insert the story of Peter's first denial of Jesus. His second and third denials follow in John 18:25–27. The unnamed companion of Peter was probably the Beloved Disciple (cf. 20:2–4, 8), that is, the fourth Evangelist himself. The fact that this disciple was known to the high priest (18:15) and consequently was allowed to enter the courtyard does not preclude his identification with John the son of Zebedee. There are certainly many ways in which a simple Galilean fisherman (cf. Mark 1:19–20) could have become acquainted with the high priest in Jerusalem. The question of the maid, aiming at identifying Peter as a disciple of Jesus (John 18:17), provides the context for the first denial. Perhaps Peter's impulsive, crude answer may have reflected only his desire to have access to the courtyard. Unfortunately, it was a denial that paved the way for other denials.

18:19–24. Back to Annas. The narrative then returns to the hearing before Annas. The high priest questioned Jesus about His followers and His teachings. Even if the interrogation was not an official hearing, the procedure was illegitimate because among the Jews a trial was not to be held at night. Besides, the accused were not expected to incriminate themselves. In other words, no case was to be established until the evidence of the witnesses had been stated and confirmed. And this is exactly the point Jesus tried to make. Determined to protect His followers, He made no reference to them. Instead, He brought attention to Himself while pointing out to Annas that it should not have been difficult to find eyewitnesses to confirm the nature and content of His teaching. He could not be identified as the leader of an underground or seditious movement because everything He had said He said in public (vv. 20–21). Implied in His answer is the idea that if Annas wanted to proceed with the trial, he should do it in accordance with the law (v. 23). Jesus's argument probably embarrassed the high priest as well as others who were there because one of the guards struck Jesus with his hand (v. 22). By inviting the guard who struck Him to show evidence that He had done wrong, Jesus was again calling into question the integrity of the legal procedure. Annas decided to send Jesus on to Caiaphas; that is to say, to the Sanhedrin, which was presided over by Caiaphas (cf. Luke 22:66–71)—the details of which John does not recount.

18:25–27. Peter's Final Two Denials. The attention shifts back to Peter. The Evangelist had already said that it was a cold night and that the servants of the high priest together with a number of officers made a charcoal fire in the courtyard to warm themselves (John 18:18). Peter was warming up among the enemies of Jesus (v. 18). This was the last place he should have been, especially after Jesus's warning (13:36–38). The result was almost inevitable. When he was questioned two more times, asked if he was a disciple of Jesus or whether he had been with Him in the garden, his denials were very emphatic. And then, as Jesus predicted, the rooster crowed (18:27; cf. 13:38). John does not say anything about the effect of this experience on Peter (cf. 21:15–17).

18:28–40. Interrogation by Pilate. From the Sanhedrin, Jesus was taken to the Praetorium, the official residence of Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor of Judea (A.D. 26–36). John's account of the Roman trial is by far the most detailed and dramatic in the Gospels. As has been noticed by scholars, he narrates the proceedings before Pilate in seven units with an alternating pattern of outside and inside scenes: outside (18:29–32); inside (18:33–38a); outside (18:38b–40); inside (19:1–3); outside (19:4–7); inside (19:8–11); and outside (19:12–15). This section covers the first three scenes.

It was early in the morning. According to rabbinic tradition, the homes of Gentiles were considered unclean. By entering such homes, a Jew would become ceremonially impure—a spiritual defilement that would last seven days and prevent them from entering the temple. In order for the Jewish authorities to celebrate the Passover, they did not go inside to see Pilate (18:28) but waited for him outside. (On the relationship of the Lord's Supper, the Passover, and the crucifixion of Jesus, see "The Year of the Crucifixion," p. 1460.)

As required by Roman law, Pilate asked first for the charges, and as soon as he was informed, he showed no interest in getting involved in what he considered to be an internal Jewish dispute (cf. Acts 18:12–16). It was only after the Jews responded by pointing out that they did not have the legal right to execute people (John 18:31) that Pilate concluded that the situation deserved a closer look. The Jews wanted an execution, but capital punishment was a criminal charge that only the Roman governor could legally authorize. From John's perspective, if Jesus was to be "lifted up" (3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34), He would have to be handed over to the Romans.

Having taken Jesus inside the Praetorium, Pilate started examining Him, asking if He was the King of the Jews (18:33; cf. Matt. 27:11; Mark 15:2; Luke 23:3), which indicates what the charges were (cf. John 18:34–35). In His triumphal entry, Jesus was acclaimed the King of Israel, and He did not oppose it (12:13; cf. 1:49). This was conveniently used to persuade the Roman governor that Jesus represented a potential threat to the Roman Empire. Jesus did not deny the charges but clarified that His kingdom was "not of this world" (18:36). He was assuring Pilate that He was not seeking political rule and that consequently He was not leading an insurrection against the Romans.

Annas and Caiaphas

Under Roman occupation, the high priesthood became a political office. Annas was appointed high priest in A.D. 6 by Quirinius, the Roman governor of Syria, and deposed in A.D. 15 by Valerius Gratus, Pilate's predecessor in Judea. For many years thereafter, however, Annas continued to exert significant influence, not only because his deposition was considered arbitrary among the Jews, who thought of the high priesthood as a life office, but also because five of his sons and Caiaphas, his son-in-law, became high priests at one point or another. Caiaphas held the office from A.D. 18 to 36.

The point Jesus was trying to make was that His kingdom is not like the kingdoms of the world, represented by Rome, but that it is spiritual. He had come into the world to bear witness to the truth—the truth about Himself and His saving mission (cf. 3:16–17; 12:47; cf. 4:42; 6:33)—and He said that everyone of (i.e., on the side of) the truth listens to His voice (18:37). This probably impacted Pilate because the accused was placing the Roman governor on trial. Pilate was challenged to stand by the truth, but he was not willing to pursue that subject any further. His question, "What is truth?" (v. 38), may have been a sincere desire to come to know the truth, but the pressure was too high, and he did not have time for Jesus. He ended the conversation, thus distancing himself from the implicit challenge posed by Jesus. But in fact he had made a choice against the truth as revealed in Jesus and this led him later on to sentence Jesus to death.

Without waiting for the answer (cf. 14:6), Pilate went outside to the people and proposed releasing Jesus. He was convinced that Jesus was not guilty of anything, much less of suspicious political activities. By referring to the king of the Jews (18:39), he sought to influence the crowd in favor of Jesus and to appease his own conscience. But the plan failed. The Jews emphatically refused Jesus and asked instead for the release of Barabbas, a criminal who had probably been a member of the resistance movement against the Romans (v. 40; cf. Matt. 27:16; Mark 15:7; Luke 23:19).

19:1–11. Pilate Capitulates. Since the first attempt of Pilate to release Jesus failed (John 18:39–40), he tried another tack. Hoping that the Jews would be satisfied with the humiliation of the accused and would not pursue the death penalty (19:4; cf. Luke 23:16, 22), he had Jesus severely beaten, abused, and mocked by his soldiers. Such beating was a brutal torture. It was inflicted with a whip (flagrum) of several leather thongs loaded with small lead balls and/or sheep bones and often had broken glass. The Romans knew three types of such beatings: from least to most severe, the fustigatio, the flagellatio, and the verberatio. We are not informed which one was applied to Jesus, but it was probably the fustigatio, as it seems to have been intended only to appease the Jews. The flagellatio was much more severe, but not as severe as the verberatio, which was so violent that not infrequently the (naked) victims died while still bound to the post.

After the beating, the soldiers indulged themselves in mockery. Jesus was accused of claiming to be king, so they arrayed Him in royal purple, placed on His head a crown of thorns, and saluted Him (John 19:3). When Jesus was brought before the crowd, dressed in this shameful apparel of royalty, Pilate pronounced his famous words, idou ho anthrōpos (v. 5; Lat. Ecce homo)—"Behold the Man" or "Here is the Man!" There are some usages of this phrase in classical literature in what appears to be a condescending tone like, "Look, the poor fellow." But in the present setting it could simply have been an expression of mockery with the term "man" standing for alleged king (cf. 1 Sam. 9:17). Even though insisting on the innocence of Jesus (John 19:4), Pilate did not hesitate to submit Him to this theatrical, humiliating mockery. But the priests and the temple guards were not moved at all by any feeling of sympathy toward Jesus and vociferously called for crucifixion (John 19:6).

Pilate tried to distance himself from what was happening and told the crowd to take Him themselves and crucify Him (v. 6). The tone of his words seems to have been sarcastic, for he knew very well that the Jews could not enforce the death penalty, but even if they could, they would probably stone Jesus rather than crucify Him (see commentary on John 18:28–40). The Jews answered that Jesus was condemned by their law because He had declared Himself to be "the Son of God" (19:7). This was the real issue. The Jews were not entirely abandoning the charge of political insurrection (cf. v. 12) but were raising the additional charge of blasphemy, which for them was in fact much more serious (cf. 5:18; 8:58–59; 10:30–31, 33). Pilate was right from the very beginning: this was an internal Jewish affair (cf. 18:31).

Pilate took Jesus back inside to gather more information from Him. His question about the origin of Jesus (19:9) touched on that which is perhaps the most important and sensitive issue in the ministry of Jesus (e.g., 6:38–39, 41–42, 46–51, 57–58; 7:27–29; 8:14, 23–27). Pilate's authority, even if he represented the power of the Roman Empire, was granted to him from the heavenly Father (cf. Rom. 13:1). Jesus's response to Pilate's statement contrasted the source for their authority: the Jewish authorities versus Jesus, Himself. Pilate was at this time only exercising an authority that was legitimately entrusted to him. Though Jesus did not excuse what he was about to do, He clarified that Pilate's sin was not as great as that of the one who had handed Him over to him; probably meaning the high priest (John 19:11; cf. 9:41).

19:12–16a. No King but Caesar. Pilate tried to set Jesus free, but the price was too high. Political survival was much more important to him than his commitment to justice. Of course, he had reason to fear the threat of the Jewish leaders (v. 12). Emperor Tiberius was notorious for dealing ruthlessly with those who threatened his position and subordinates suspected of misconduct and disloyalty. The threat worked, and Pilate gave in. At noon (the sixth hour) on Friday (Preparation Day; v. 14), Pilate sat down on the judgment seat, normally located in the forecourt of the governor's residence, to pass the death sentence against Jesus. He brought Jesus out and told them to look at their king (v. 14). The tone was cynical as he mocked the Jews while displaying before them their king. Under subjection to Rome, this wounded and abandoned prisoner was the only king they could expect to have. Even as the Jews insisted that Jesus be crucified, Pilate pulled out another ironic question, asking if he should crucify their king (v. 15). The answer was, "We have no king but Caesar." The true King of Israel was left out of the picture; in fact He was heading to the cross. In order to please them and to protect himself, the weak Pilate handed Jesus over to be executed.

Crucifixion and Burial

John's account of Jesus's crucifixion and burial is somber, but not as intense as that of the Synoptics. It also includes several details not recorded there.

19:16b–27. The Crucifixion. Pilate handed Jesus over to be crucified, and the Roman soldiers took charge of Him. At this point, He must have been beaten a second time. It was the brutal verberatio that was used on such occasions (see commentary on John 19:1–11). John says that Jesus carried the cross Himself, though the Synoptic Gospels clarify that at some point He was helped by Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21). Jewish practice required that stoning should take place outside the camp or city (cf. Lev. 24:14, 23; Deut. 22:21; Acts 7:58), and the same certainly applied to crucifixion (John 19:20; cf. Heb. 13:12). The Aramaic name of the place where Jesus was crucified was Golgotha, which means "skull" (Lat. calvariae). John's description of the crucifixion, as well as that of the other Gospels, is short and objective. Contrary to popular piety, none of the Evangelists lays emphasis on the sufferings of Jesus. What really matters for them is that He was dying for us. The four Gospels indicate that Jesus was crucified with two others, one on each side (John 19:18; Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27; Luke 23:33).

An inscription was attached to the cross indicating the reason for which Jesus was being crucified. There are some differences among the Gospels in the exact wording of the inscription, which demonstrate different emphases of the full inscription ("This is Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews"). All four Evangelists agree on the main part of it: "The King of the Jews" (John 19:19; Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38). John and Matthew both name Jesus, but only John records the portion of the inscription that describes where He was from. In this John further personalizes the Messiah. Also, only John adds that the inscription was written in three languages and that it was read by many passersby. It was the Roman custom to locate crucifixions along main roads in order to serve as a warning for others. Most archaeologists have agreed that the traditional site of the crucifixion, which is now within the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, is accurate and that in Jesus's time it was located outside the city wall, near the Garden Gate (see "Archaeology and the Bible," p. 91).

As Jesus was being crucified, the soldiers divided His outer garment into four pieces, one for each soldier—a possible indication that, following the Roman practice, Jesus may have been crucified naked. They also cast lots over His tunic, which was seamlessly woven in one piece from top to bottom (John 19:23). John identifies this as a specific fulfillment of prophecy (cf. Ps. 22:18). In addition to the four soldiers, among the bystanders was a group of four women standing beside the cross: the mother of Jesus (Mary), who is not named in this Gospel (cf. John 2:1–5, 12; 6:42); the sister of His mother, who may be the same woman as the mother of the sons of Zebedee, who was named Salome (cf. Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40); Mary, the wife of Cleopas (cf. Luke 24:18); and Mary Magdalene. While hanging on the cross, Jesus made provision for His mother, who almost certainly was widowed with little or no personal income and dependent on Him. The fact that He entrusted her to the disciple whom He loved (John 19:26), and not to one of His brothers, is probably because of His brothers' unbelief (cf. 7:5; see "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252). By caring for His mother amid all His physical pain and mental anguish, Jesus provided "the perfect example of . . . filial love [which] shines forth with undimmed luster from the mist of ages" (DA 752).

19:28–30. Death of Jesus. Knowing that everything that brought Him to this earth had already been accomplished, Jesus said that He was thirsty (John 19:28). Again, John related this as the fulfillment of prophecy (cf. Ps. 69:21). The sour wine vinegar that was given to Him (John 19:29) is a reference to cheap wine. This was different from the wine with myrrh that was offered to Jesus on the way to the cross and that He refused to drink (Mark 15:23). While the latter was believed to have sedative effects, sour wine vinegar—as the presence of the sponge and the hyssop branch suggests—seems to have been intended to hydrate the victim in order to extend the time the person had to suffer on the cross (cf. Luke 23:36). When the sponge was lifted to Jesus's lips, He exclaimed, "It is finished" (John 19:30). Then, bowing His head, He died, crowning His mission with glory and bringing His redemptive work to its expected end (12:27–28; 13:31–32; 17:1, 4).

19:31–37. Piercing of His Side. Crucifixion was a slow, painful execution in which the person was nailed (or tied) to a large wooden cross and left to hang until dead. This could take several days. According to Jewish law, however, the body of an executed criminal should not remain hanging overnight (Deut. 21:23), that is, it should be buried on the day of death. The day Jesus died was Friday, and the following day was the Sabbath of the Passover week. The Jewish leaders asked Pilate to have the legs of those crucified broken to hasten death so that the bodies could be taken down (John 19:31). Since Jesus was already dead, a Roman soldier used a spear to pierce the side of Jesus, and blood and water flowed from it (v. 34). Medical experts have suggested that the water would have been the fluid from the pericardial sac that would have come out mingled with blood.

This description of what happened at the cross had an impact on the mind of the Beloved Disciple (v. 35; cf. 1 John 5:6–9)—water (John 4:10–14; 7:37–39; Rev. 7:17; 22:1) and blood (1 John 1:7; Rev. 1:5; 5:9; 7:14; 12:11) are important symbols of the sacrifice of Christ and the work of the Holy Spirit in John's writings. By recording this incident, he was explicitly claiming eyewitness credibility in order to elicit faith on the part of the readers (cf. John 20:31; 21:24). In keeping with his interest in showing how several details of the death of Jesus had been foretold by the prophets (cf. 19:24, 28), John introduces two more of these: that none of His bones was broken (v. 36; cf. Ex. 12:46; Num. 9:12; Ps. 34:20) and that He was pierced (John 19:37; cf. Zech. 12:10).

19:38–42. Burial. Jesus's burial brought to the stage two silent disciples, so to speak: Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, both members of the Sanhedrin (cf. John 3:1; 7:50–52; Mark 15:43). Joseph of Arimathea (and perhaps also Nicodemus) was one of those alluded to in John 12:42–43, that is, Jewish leaders who believed in Jesus but who kept their faith secret for fear of compromising their reputation and religious privileges (cf. John 9:22, 35). In addition, as members of the Sanhedrin, they were attempting to be more helpful to Jesus. When Jesus was crucified, Joseph stepped forward and revealed his true identity as a believer (19:38). It was common for disciples to organize the burial of their master, so Joseph of Arimathea used his influence to ask for Jesus's body, while Nicodemus brought along about seventy-two pounds (33 kg) of a mixture of myrrh and aloes. Wrapped with spices in long sheets of linen cloth, the body of Jesus was laid in a tomb never used before (v. 41) that had recently been hewn in a garden near the place where He was crucified. Since it was late Friday afternoon (cf. Mark 15:42), it was necessary to get the burial done before sunset, when the Sabbath would begin.

20:1–29

The Resurrected Lord

Concluding the passion narrative, chapter 20 records the resurrection of Jesus and His appearances to both Mary Magdalene and the disciples.

20:1–10. The Empty Tomb. Very early on Sunday morning, before it was light, Mary Magdalene headed to the tomb to anoint Jesus's body. When the Synoptics state that the sun had already risen (Mark 16:2), they were actually referring to the time when she arrived at the tomb site. The use of the plural form "we" (John 20:2) suggests that a few other women who had also witnessed the crucifixion were with her (Mark 16:1; cf. John 19:25). Realizing that the stone that sealed the tomb's entrance had already been removed, she concluded that the body of Jesus had been taken away (cf. Matt. 27:62–66; 28:11–15).

The story that follows involving Peter and the Beloved Disciple (probably the Evangelist himself; see John: Introduction) is intended to highlight the historical reliability of the resurrection of Jesus. When they saw the empty tomb, the linen strips of cloth, and the cloth handkerchief that had covered Jesus's head, they finally understood and believed that Jesus had resurrected (John 20:8). No one would have taken the corpse of Jesus leaving behind the head cloth and linen strips. The fact that there were two men renders credibility to the story, as under Jewish law at least two witnesses were required to establish the evidence (Deut. 17:6; 19:15). A woman's testimony usually was not accepted in court. The reference to "Scripture" (John 20:9) indicates that the resurrection was foretold in the OT. Though no specific passage is given (see also 1 Cor. 15:4), John could have had in mind Psalm 16:10, Isaiah 53:10–12, Hosea 6:2, and Jonah 1:17 (cf. Matt. 12:40).

20:11–18. Appearance to Mary. After telling Peter and the Beloved Disciple of the empty tomb, Mary Magdalene returned to the tomb and stood outside crying (John 20:11). She still did not know about the resurrection (cf. v. 13). As she bent down to look inside the tomb, she saw "two angels in white" (v. 12), who asked her why she was crying. She was looking at the past, to an empty tomb, not knowing that the future was behind her—her hope was alive. When the resurrected Jesus stood behind her, she did not immediately recognize Him, as was also the case in other of His post-resurrection appearances (cf. John 21:4; Luke 24:16). He was the same Jesus, with a body that could still be seen and touched (John 20:27; Luke 24:39; 1 Cor. 15:5–8) and bearing the marks of crucifixion (John 20:20, 27). The problem seems to be that Mary was looking for a dead body, not a living person, and consequently she confused Jesus with the gardener. Anxious to give Jesus a decent burial, she let her sorrows and tears obscure her vision of the risen Lord. It was only after Jesus called her by her own name (v. 16) that she realized this man was Jesus—there might have been something special in the way Jesus pronounced her name that the written record is not able to preserve for us, such as the tone of His voice. At any rate, this is a stirring illustration of the fact that the sheep know the voice of their Shepherd (cf. 10:3–4).

The Greek behind John 20:17 may be taken to mean that Mary was either trying to embrace Jesus or, more probably, had already done so. There was nothing wrong or sinful in her action (cf. Matt. 28:9). Jesus's words suggest nothing more than a sense of urgency, in that He did not want Mary's homage to detain Him from His immediate ascent to the Father. This might have been a temporary, private ascension different from the public one that occurred forty days later (Acts 1:1–11). The purpose of such an ascension is not given by John, but it might have been related to the completion of Jesus's earthly ministry (cf. John 12:27–28; 17:4–5; 19:30). By referring to His Father and their Father, rather than "our Father," Jesus was perhaps intentionally establishing an important difference between His divine Sonship and that of the believers. He is Son in the sense of possessing the same nature as the Father (5:17–18; 10:29–33), while believers can enjoy such status through the operation of the Holy Spirit (1:12–13; 3:3–7; cf. 1 John 3:1–2, 10; 5:2). It is noteworthy that the first person to see the risen Savior was Mary Magdalene—not Peter or even John—and now she was appointed to share this important message with the disciples, who are here referred to as the brothers of Jesus (John 20:17; cf. Matt. 12:49–50). First, on believing, they were "disciples" (John 2:2, 11); then, by separating themselves from the world, they were "friends" (15:13–15; cf. 6:66–69; 17:6, 16–17); and, lastly, after the resurrection they were brothers (20:17). One of the most inspiring teachings of the NT is that through His death on the cross, Jesus constituted us members of the family of God and He became our eldest Brother (Rom. 8:29; Heb. 2:11–12, 17).

20:19–23. Appearance to the Disciples. Sunday evening (the first Easter), Jesus showed Himself to the disciples, who were gathered somewhere in Jerusalem—probably the same upper room of Thursday night (cf. Mark 14:15–16) because the Feast of Unleavened Bread was still in progress. That the doors were locked for fear of the Jews highlights Jesus's miraculous entrance. "Peace be with you" (John 20:19) is a common Jewish greeting (cf. 1 Sam. 25:6). On this occasion, it may have been particularly intended to dispel the fear of the disciples, but it certainly underscored the saving gift Jesus was bringing to them (see commentary on John 14:25–31). Though no reason is given in John for Jesus showing His hands and side (but see Luke 24:36–43); this is intended to prepare the reader for the story of Thomas (John 20:24–29).

John's account of the commissioning of the disciples parallels that of the Synoptics (Matt. 28:18–20; Luke 24:46–49), except for the breathing of the Spirit on them (John 20:22), probably a dramatized parable in anticipation of the actual coming of the Spirit at Pentecost (cf. 7:39; 16:7). No argument on the nature of the Spirit should be derived from such an episode. As for John 20:23, the gift of the Spirit would enable the church to declare forgiveness of some sins but not of other sins. This is not about actually forgiving or withholding forgiveness, as this is a divine prerogative (Mark 2:7; cf. 1 John 1:9). In Greek both verbs apheōntai ("forgiven") and kekratēntai ("held," or in this context, "not forgiven" or "retained") are in the perfect tense, which seems to indicate that the divine actions actually precede the statement of the church. The church proclaims what God has done for us.

20:24–29. Appearance to Thomas. In this first appearance to the disciples, Thomas was not present (John 20:24). When told about what happened, he required physical evidence before he could believe (v. 25). His initial reluctance provides additional (circumstantial) evidence for the resurrection of Jesus. About a week later, when Jesus appeared again to the disciples, including Thomas this time, the evidence was provided, and he was moved to declare, "My Lord and my God!" (v. 28). This is the climax of the Gospel. For the first time Jesus is acknowledged and proclaimed with unmatched clarity and conviction to be who He really is: Lord and God. Now John was ready to bring his Gospel to a close. But before doing so, he recorded one of the most precious remarks made by Jesus: "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed" (v. 29). The blessing travels through time and reaches each one of us. The physical presence of Jesus is not incumbent for faith because the gospel story itself speaks. The written word can elicit the same faith as the incarnate Word, as John moves on to say (vv. 30–31).

Purpose of the Gospel

Having finished the gospel story, John stated the purpose for the writing of his Gospel and underscored its sufficiency for faith. John's main concern was not about retelling the story of Jesus but about drawing out its significance. The Evangelist was fully aware of the fact that the ministry of Jesus was extremely rich and that He did many other signs, but he selected only seven (see "The Seven Signs in the Fourth Gospel," p. 1417), most of which Jesus performed through His spoken word and not by His touch, as often recorded in the Synoptics. For those to whom he wrote, those who did not have the privilege of seeing Jesus, this might have been particularly meaningful: Jesus's word is as powerful as His touch, which means that His physical absence is not an obstacle for faith (cf. 20:29). And so John wrote in the service of faith—more precisely, to strengthen faith, as the present tense (pisteuēte) indicates: "that you may [continue to] believe" (v. 31). His ultimate goal, however, went far beyond this. He wrote in order for men and women to enjoy eternal life—the divine gift for those who believe that Jesus is what He claimed to be (cf. 3:16, 36; 5:24–25; 6:40, 47; 10:10).

21:1–25

THE EPILOGUE

To close his Gospel, John added an epilogue dealing with some church-related issues: the reinstatement of Peter, set in a fishing context by the Sea of Galilee, and the impending death of the Beloved Disciple. Though it looks more like an appendix, there is no question that this section is the work of John himself, with the possible exception of a portion of the last two verses (vv. 24–25).

21:1–14. Catching Fish. This is the third account of the appearance of the resurrected Jesus to the disciples (v. 14), and it took place by the Sea of Galilee (also known as the Sea of Tiberias; v. 1). That the disciples—only seven are mentioned—were back in Galilee indicates that the Passover week was over (cf. 13:1; 18:28, 39). They returned to the profession they had before they met Jesus. The first part of this section deals with the restoration of Peter. The story of the miraculous fishing, despite its significance, only provides the occasion for Jesus's dialogue with Peter.

The richness of details with which the story is told is impressive: Jesus's command to toss the net over "the right side of the boat" (21:6); the remark (in the Greek) that Peter was naked (some translations hold that "naked" here means "without his outer garment") before he jumped into the sea (v. 7); the distance the boat was from the land (v. 8); the charcoal fire and the bread (v. 9); the exact number of fish; and the information that the net was not torn (v. 11). Why so many details? On the one hand, they are evidence of a firsthand witness, which implies that the Evangelist was one of the seven disciples. In fact, this is the only episode in John's Gospel that combines in the same narrative the eyewitness character of the author (cf. v. 24), the Beloved Disciple (v. 20), and the sons of Zebedee (v. 2), who are elsewhere in the NT identified as John and James (Mark 1:19; 3:17; 10:35). On the other hand, we should by all means resist any temptation to find a symbolic meaning in each one of the details. There is nothing to suggest that they are symbolic, much less fictitious. One thing, however, should be emphasized: the miracle happened as a result of the faithful obedience of the disciples to the command of Jesus. Salvation is by grace, but when we obey, we put ourselves in a position where God can operate in and through us.

21:15–19. Restoration of Peter. After breakfast, Jesus proceeded to restore Peter. Peter's threefold affirmation of love for Jesus corresponds to his threefold denial the night Jesus was arrested (John 18:15–18, 25–27). Although Jesus had already forgiven him, the public nature of the denial demanded a public reinstatement to service (e.g., Acts 1:15; 2:14, 37; 3:1, 12). It is frequently pointed out that Jesus used two different words when probing Peter's love. In the first and second questions (John 21:15–16), He used agapaō, which is said to represent a higher type of love than phileō, the word used by Peter in each of his three replies. In His third question, Jesus used phileō (v. 17), as if doubting whether Peter felt even the lesser form of love for Him, and this has been taken to be the reason why the disciple was grieved. Despite giving an appealing interpretation to the dialogue, however, it is highly doubtful whether such subtle distinction can be maintained. In this Gospel, the two verbs are used interchangeably. Both are used to describe the Father's love for the Son (3:35; 5:20) and the love of Jesus for both Lazarus (11:5, 36) and the Beloved Disciple (20:2; 21:7). In addition, the text clearly says that Peter was grieved because Jesus asked the same basic question three times.

There is no reason to think that any special significance should be attached to the change from lambs in 21:15 to sheep in vv. 16–17, as if Jesus entrusted to Peter not only His individual lambs but also the whole flock. It is more likely that the two words are simply different ways of designating the same thing—the one flock of Jesus Christ. It is also important to recognize that this passage deals with Peter's restoration and reinstatement to service, not to some kind of elevation to primacy in the church. He was not being invested here with a distinctive authority as the earthly vicar of Jesus or being appointed as the chief shepherd who should rule over all other shepherds (cf. 1 Pet. 5:4). He was simply being commissioned to take care of Jesus's flock, as were all of the disciples and as are all of those God has chosen to lead His people.

Jesus added a thought that probably struck Peter. The night he denied Jesus, Peter said he would give his life for Him (John 13:37), and here Jesus told him how this would happen. The enigmatic language Jesus used seems rather general, but in the ancient world the expression "stretch out your hands" (21:18) was widely taken as a reference to crucifixion. And according to Christian tradition, Peter was crucified in Rome under Nero around the year A.D. 67 several years before the writing of this Gospel.

21:20–23. John's Imminent Death. The introduction of the Beloved Disciple into the scene and the way Jesus referred to him generated among the brethren the rumor that this disciple would not die before the return of Jesus (vv. 22–23). By the time John wrote his Gospel, the rumor might have become even more serious, for he was the only apostle still alive, the last living link between Jesus and that generation of believers. It is as if hope in the Second Coming could be maintained only as long as John lived, whereas his death could sink the church into a deep crisis. It was, therefore, necessary to prepare the believers for the reality of his own eventual departure. The Second Advent of Jesus (14:1–3) should not be tied to John's life—or, for that matter, to any other definite period of time. Our hope has to be based entirely on the faithfulness of the One who made the promise (Heb. 10:37; Rev. 22:20; cf. Hab. 2:3).

21:24–25. Concluding Words. The statement in John 21:24 should be read primarily in the context of vv. 20–23, but by extension it also represents a validation of the entire Gospel (cf. v. 25). The identity of the "we" in v. 24 has been a subject of debate. The idea that the first-person plural is a self-reference to the Evangelist himself seems the least satisfactory solution, as there is a clear distinction between the disciple who testified and wrote these things and those who knew that his testimony was true. A better alternative is to think about a group of church leaders, probably at Ephesus, who knew John well enough to confirm his testimony to the believers of their own time, as well as to those of future generations. John's astonishing Gospel is the product of an eyewitness, someone very close to Jesus—in fact, the disciple "whom Jesus loved" (13:23; 20:2; 21:7, 20)—and his trustworthiness was recognized from the very beginning.

The Gospel closes with a reminder that its content is no more than a short selection of what Jesus did and taught. The greatness of Jesus cannot be limited to one single book, not even to four. If everything had been written, the world would not even be able to hold all the books that would have been produced (21:25). This is hyperbole, of course, as far as Jesus's physical life is concerned, but in relation to His spiritual accomplishments, no truth could be more accurate. Jesus came to save the world (3:17; 4:42; 5:34; 10:9; 12:47) and to reveal the Father's glory (12:28, 45; 14:9, 13; 16:14; 17:4). Both of these were accomplished at the cross, which became the instrument through which God's final victory over the forces of evil was secured (12:31; 16:11; 19:30) and creature and Creator were finally brought together again (14:3; 17:24). In fact, the entire universe and the whole eternity would not be large enough to record the full significance of Jesus's accomplishments when He was made flesh and lived among us. The power of the ministry and work of Jesus is today as effective as it was when He was with the disciples. His constant victory over spiritual powers and His resurrection from the dead assure us that our hope for the consummation of that victory at His glorious return is certain and unmovable.

ACTS

INTRODUCTION

Title. The earliest extant title associated with the book of Acts is simply "Acts of Apostles." This title appears as a short postscript at the end of two fourth-century manuscripts (Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus). Later variations of the title include not only the traditional "Acts of the Apostles" but also expanded titles like "Acts of the Holy Apostles," "Luke the Evangelist's Acts of the Holy Apostles," and even "The Wise Acts of the Wise Apostles." In contrast to these lengthier titles, one manuscript from the tenth century is simply titled "Acts."

As is the case with the Gospels, it is unlikely that any of these titles were originally part of the book. While the traditional title is familiar to modern readers, the use of the term "apostle" has caused some to wonder if this accurately fits with the contents of the book. Within both Luke and Acts, the term "apostle" almost always applies in a specific sense to those who lived with Jesus and witnessed His ascension (Acts 1:21–22). The only apostles of this category mentioned in the book, however, are Peter, John, James, and Matthias. However, more than half of the book focuses on the ministry of Paul, who does not technically fit into the category of an apostle. While he is designated as an apostle twice in Acts (14:4, 14), where the title is used to refer to one who was "sent," it is also used of Barnabas. It is in this broad sense that the traditional title of the book is fitting. The titles associated with the book also may have arisen in the late first or early second century in connection with the identification of Peter and Paul as the two chief apostles in the church.

Authorship. As is the case with the Gospel of Luke, Acts is technically anonymous. While the two books were clearly written by the same author, nowhere in either book is the name of the author mentioned. Clues about his identity, however, are numerous throughout the two volumes. The preface to Luke, which introduces both the Gospel and Acts (cf. Luke 1:1–4; Acts 1:4–5), reveals that although the author was not an eyewitness of the events of Jesus's life, he had contact with some who were eyewitnesses. In addition, he was a well-educated individual who had not only read other written accounts of the life of Jesus (apparently Matthew and Mark) but also personally and carefully investigated the events himself. The presence of several "we" passages in Acts even suggests the author had served as a frequent member of Paul's missionary entourage (Acts 16:8–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1—28:16). Eliminating the names of the individuals associated by name with Paul during those "we" sections in Acts and comparing the remaining individuals Paul identifies as his colleagues in his Epistles suggest that Luke was the author. This was the unanimous viewpoint of the early church by the end of the second century.

Date. The date attributed to the writing of Acts is contingent on the dating assigned to the Gospel of Luke (see Luke: Introduction). Since Luke acknowledges having consulted other accounts of the life of Jesus in preparation for his own Gospel, some time had to have elapsed before his account could have been written. A careful examination of Luke's Gospel in Greek makes it clear that the Gospel of Mark was at least one of those earlier accounts. Assuming Mark was written in the late A.D. 60s, sometime after Peter's death but before the fall of Jerusalem (see Mark: Introduction), Luke's two-volume work would have come after that—perhaps in the 70s or early 80s. This coheres with the viewpoint of Irenaeus, the second-century church father from Gaul, who said Luke wrote his Gospel after Peter and Paul were martyred. It is also affirmed in the Muratorian Canon, the oldest known Christian list of authoritative books that is thought to date to the late second century, and also in the works of the fourth- and fifth-century church father Jerome. A later date than this is not plausible because Acts does not make any reference or allusions to the collection and circulation of Paul's authoritative letters among the churches at the end of the first century. Moreover, it is hard to imagine that the author would have written so positively about Rome's attitude toward the church if it had been written during the persecution some Christians experienced under the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81–96) for refusing to comply with the demands for emperor worship.

However, since Acts ends with Paul's situation unresolved as he awaited trial in Rome, it can be argued that Acts could not have been written after A.D. 62 or 63. If the author knew the outcome of Paul's story, how could he have ended the book at that point? In order to accommodate an earlier date for the composition of Acts, it can be concluded that Mark must have been written in the late 50s, rather than nearly a decade later. It is important to remember that Acts is not a biography of the lives of Peter and Paul. Although Peter plays a significant role in the first half of the book, he completely disappears after chapter 15. The reason for Peter's absence is almost certainly not that Luke had no further information about Peter. The focus of Acts is not Peter but the spread of the gospel to Jews and Gentiles from Jerusalem (2:1—8:1), to Judea and Samaria (9:1—12:19), and finally to Rome itself (cf. 1:8). Peter fades out of view when his role in that larger story has been fulfilled. It is the same with Paul. The purpose of Acts is not to tell Paul's story but to tell the story of how the gospel reached Rome. And that is the climax of the story—Paul proclaiming the gospel in Rome (28:28). So, although Acts ends around the year 62 and does include the deaths of other apostles, it does not require that it was written at that time. However, without incontrovertible evidence, it is best not to be overly dogmatic. Acts (along with Luke) would have been written sometime after A.D. 60 but sometime before A.D. 70.

Recipients. Like the Gospel of Luke, Acts is addressed to a certain Theophilus. While the name Theophilus means "loved by God," that does not imply that the name was simply a synonym for Christian believers. The name Theophilus was a common name among both Jews and Greeks at that time. The individual Luke addresses was likely his patron, that is, the individual who provided the funding necessary for Luke to research, write, and publish his two-volume work. Although addressed to Theophilus, Luke certainly envisioned a larger audience—the members of the early church, whom he sought to encourage and confirm in the teachings they had already heard (Luke 1:4). His primary readers were most likely Gentiles—since the book largely focuses on the gospel going to Gentiles and takes a rather positive view on the Greco-Roman world.

Luke's account makes it clear that the early church was characterized by strong tensions between Jewish Christians and those of Greek origin. The problem raised at the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15) and Paul's need to emphasize his loyalty to Jewish law (Acts 21:17–26) reveal this tension. Within this challenging context, Luke's account seeks to demonstrate that there was no discord between Peter and Paul, the leaders of these two groups, on the essentials of the gospel. And in response to the opposition of some Jewish believers to Paul's ministry, Luke was moved by the Spirit to praise Paul's work and his calling to preach the gospel to the Gentiles.

Paul's name is mentioned 128 times in the book of Acts, and his calling is reported three times (Acts 9:1–19; 22:6–21; 26:12–18). Luke goes so far as to establish, for the sake of Judeo-Christians, that Paul could not rightly be accused of unfaithfulness to tradition (23:9; 25:8). Although he does not meet all the requirements to be an apostle in the technical sense of the word—he was not one of the Twelve (1:21–22)—Luke makes it clear that the risen Christ commissioned Paul to proclaim the gospel (9:15) and that the church officially recognized his calling (13:1–3). In doing so, Luke assures his readers that the inclusion of Gentiles into the church was part of God's overall plan to bring salvation to the world and that Jewish and Gentiles believers should be united in together proclaiming that same gospel.

Theology. As already indicated, the book of Acts is a sequel to the Gospel of Luke (Acts 1:1). The complete work comprises about one fourth of the NT. The book underlines the fact that the work of Jesus did not end with His death and resurrection. The Gospel gives an account of what Jesus began to do and teach (1:1). By contrast, the book of Acts recounts the continued accomplishments of Jesus through the Holy Spirit in the establishment and development of His church. It brings focus to the importance of the mission that must be fulfilled during the "intermediate" period spanning His ascension and His return in glory.

1. Acts of the Apostles. The book could have been called "Acts of Peter and Paul," considering that the first twelve chapters of Luke's work are dedicated to Peter's efforts in spreading the gospel, though he is not mentioned beyond chapter 13, with the exception of a short intervention at the Jerusalem Council (15:7–11). The rest of the book is entirely focused on Paul's efforts to spread the gospel. In the Hellenistic world of the time, commemorating the "acts" of major figures, such as Alexander, Hannibal, and others, was common practice. Christians chose to commemorate the "Acts of Martyrs" and the acts of some apostles (often referred to simply as Acts), probably to differentiate them from this work of Luke.

We might also contrast this work of Luke with those of Josephus, a Jew who lived at the time of Paul, whose writings were an attempt to portray Judaism in a favorable light. Indeed, Luke's work portrays the Romans as helpful (21:31–36) and appreciative of Paul's Roman citizenship (chap. 25). In fact, Paul's first convert was a Roman administrator (13:12). The book concludes with an emphasis on the freedom of action Paul enjoyed in the pursuit of his work of evangelization despite being a prisoner of Rome (28:31). These adverse circumstances led to the conversion of a slave by the name of Onesimus (Philem. 10).

2. Acts of the Spirit. This book might have also been called "Acts of the Holy Spirit." Indeed, the Holy Spirit is mentioned seventy times in its pages. The Spirit presided step by step over the geographical and ethnic deployment of the church and its mission. He used the church to fulfill the command of Jesus (1:8) to spread the gospel message from Jerusalem (chaps. 1–7), to Judea (5:16), and beyond to Samaria (chaps. 6–12), Asia Minor, and finally Rome (chaps. 13–28). It was through the work of the Spirit that the gospel reached even the Gentile world. The book reports the conversion of Jews (2:41–46), Samaritans (8:1–14), an Ethiopian previously converted to Judaism (8:26–40), and Cornelius (10:1–2), a "God-fearer" who was a convert to Judaism and fervent in his practice of Jewish rituals. Lastly, the book narrates the activities of Paul and Barnabas in the deployment of their divine mission to the Gentiles (13:12, 46–47).

According to Acts, the mission of the church is fulfilled through the activity of the Holy Spirit manifest in the lives of all kinds of individuals. The mission is to reach all people no matter who they are. The good news of salvation is for all humanity.

3. Mission and Hope. Acts is about the hope based on the promises God made to His people in the OT and their fulfillment in Christ Jesus. This was the hope of the coming of the Messiah and His death and resurrection (26:7–8). David placed his hope in the future Messiah (2:25–26), and after He had come, Paul and the other apostles suffered on account of serving and preaching Him (28:20). But since the work of Christ continues on behalf of His people, the promise of His return fills the hearts of people with hope. The Jesus that the disciples saw ascending to heaven will return again (1:9–11). It is this hope that propels the church, empowered by the Spirit, to go to the nations to proclaim to them Christ's redemptive work and His soon return in glory.

Hope in Acts also includes the resurrection from the dead (23:6; 24:15). Without this hope the emphasis on mission that is patently clear in the book would be meaningless. Hope energizes the church for mission.

Text. The textual history of Acts is of special interest since it circulated in the early church in two different forms. These two forms are often referred to as the Alexandrian text and the Western text—though it should be noted that there are no longer grounds for locating "Western" texts in the West and "Alexandrian" texts in Egypt. The Alexandrian text of Acts is the basis for all modern Bible translations, and the earliest representatives of it are the two great fourth-century Greek manuscripts, Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, as well as two significant third-century papyri (P45, P53). The so-called Western form of Acts, however, includes additional narrative details and explanatory comments that make it about 10 percent longer. This expanded form of Acts is found in Codex Bezae, a fifth-century bilingual manuscript, with Greek and Latin on facing pages, as well as in some Latin, Syriac, and Greek manuscripts that date to the late third century. Since the Western text as a whole has a fondness for paraphrase, harmonizing difficult texts, and the rather free addition of other material, most scholars tend to consider the differences in the Western form of Acts to be later and secondary additions, even though some of the additional material may include factually accurate information at times. Western readings will be noted in the commentary only in places where they reveal a difference between modern translations or may have some other significance.

1:1—5:42

BEGINNINGS OF THE CHURCH, ITS MISSION, AND CONFLICTS

In this section Luke lays down the foundations of the mission entrusted to the apostles (1:1–11) and identifies their basic elements: the divine mandate, the gift of the Holy Spirit, the proclamation of Christ as Lord of all, and the unity of the church. He then discusses how the apostles dealt with conflicts.

Prologue or the Foundations of the Mission

The prologue of the book of Acts shows that the church was not born to spread a new philosophy, nor was it founded on utopian ideals or an idle millenarian hope. It is the risen Lord Himself, exalted to the right hand of God, who continues His redemptive work through the auspices of His church. He is the Lord of the harvest (Matt. 9:38).

1:1–3. Origin of the Mission. The mission of the church is entirely rooted within the ministry of Jesus, thus showing a deep continuity between the Gospel of Luke and Acts. The Gospel narrates what Jesus began to do, while the book of Acts narrates what Jesus continued to do. The mission is focused not only on teaching but also on accomplishment (see Matt. 28:19–20) through those set apart (Acts 13:2) and sent (Rom. 10:15) to serve (diakonia; Acts 1:25). The resurrection of Jesus is the substance of the mission. Without it there would be no mission (Rom. 15:15–19) because there would be nothing to announce. Jesus made Himself visible to His disciples and personally testified to them that He was alive. Particularly instructive is the fact that for forty days Christ also instructed them in regard to the kingdom of God (Acts 1:3). This post-resurrection instruction opened the eyes of the disciples to understand like never before the significance of the ministry and work of Jesus and prepared them for their mission.

1:4–8. Power and Extent of the Mission. According to Acts, nothing can be accomplished without the power of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit is mentioned fifty-six times in Acts. He comes to us as a gift, and His work in the hearts of people is essential (8:16–17; 19:2; Gal. 5:22). The mission is unlimited in time and scope. The church is not to be obsessed with the question of the timing of the return of the Lord. This is a matter that is in the hands of the Father, and we are called to trust Him (Acts 1:6–7). The main concern of the church should be its mission to the whole world (v. 8). It is a community on the move: from Jerusalem (1:12—7:60), to Judea, Samaria (8:1—12:25), and the rest of the world (13:1—28:31).

1:9–11. Mission and Hope. The ascension of Jesus imbued the disciples with hope as they got ready to fulfill the mission. The ascension was bodily and therefore visible. The incarnate God ascended with a glorified human body to the Father, His return will also be visible, and He will descend analogously to how He left ascending (v. 11). Since then, the Christian church has been looking forward to seeing the Lord coming in glory from heaven. Meanwhile He is sitting at the right hand of God (2:33) and has placed His own omnipotence at the service of the mission of His church (cf. Matt. 28:18–20).

1:12—2:4

The Church United and Equipped

The mission started in Jerusalem, and the church was to be equipped to continue it. Its primary purpose was to announce to the Jews that the long-awaited Messiah had come in the Person of Jesus. The new community was not formed outside of Israel or adjacent to it but from within the Israel of faith and in continuity with its history.

1:12–14. A Community of Prayer. Jesus ascended to heaven, and from there He reigns above all rule and authority, power and dominion (Eph. 1:20–21), whether visible or invisible (Col. 1:16). His redemptive power is to be manifested through the church, which is motivated and moved by the power of His Spirit. The promise that in the seed of Abraham all nations of the earth would be blessed was about to be fulfilled through the mission of the church, the Israel of faith (Gen. 12:2–3; 18:18; Rev. 7:9).

The apostles returned to Jerusalem, to the upper room, to pray and wait for the coming of the Spirit. Jesus left, but the Spirit was coming to be with them. There were eleven apostles, plus a number of women and members of Jesus's family. These women may well have been those who followed Jesus (Matt. 27:55; Mark 15:40–41; Luke 8:2–3; 23:55) and the spouses of the apostles. Together they formed the first community of believers, the core of the church in Jerusalem. Luke emphasizes the fact that the community was Jewish and that they respected the rules related to Sabbath observance (e.g., 1:12, 16, 20; 2:1, 16–21, 25–28, 34–35). Through prayer the church makes itself open to the outpouring of the Spirit, and it was a primary feature of the original community (Acts 1:14, 24; 2:42; 3:1; 4:31; 6:4; 12:5, 12; 13:3).

1:15–26. A Community of Service. Peter was the first to take a stand (1:15). Rehabilitated after his denial of Jesus (John 21:15–17), Peter spoke to the young community of faith. His own experience with the merciful Jesus led him to avoid any derogatory terminology when referring to Judas (Luke 6:16). He simply reported on the behavior of Judas. In order to emphasize the fact that the vocation of Israel was to be perpetuated through the church, Luke recounts Peter's initiative to fill the void left by the absence of Judas. The original core of Israel was to be reconstituted (Rev. 7:1–8) to fulfill the divine plan of salvation that could not fail. The replacement was conducted in two phases: the loss of Judas (Acts 1:15–19) and his replacement by Matthias (vv. 20–26). Both segments of this section are introduced with expressions of certainty: edei plērōthēnai tēn graphēn—"it was necessary for the Scripture to be fulfilled" (v. 16)—and dei oun—"therefore one must" (v. 21). This wording should not be understood in terms of predestination. Scripture facilitates the understanding of events by bringing clarity on their fulfillment (John 14:29). God did not predestine the actions of Judas, but He foreknew them (Acts 2:23; 4:27–28; cf. 2:31).

The death of Judas is mentioned only to show that Judas left a void that had to be filled in the ministry (diakonia, "service") of the apostles (v. 17). Judas left a topos—"a place" or "part" in the ministry—and went to another topos that was fatal to him (v. 25). The ministry of the gospel and the church are safely protected from the assaults of Satan as long as it remains in its God-appointed place (topos) conducting the mission to which it has been called (Rev. 12:14). This place of ministry is twofold: it involves prayer and preaching (Acts 6:4).

Three criteria determined the choice of a new apostle. It had to be a disciple who was active in the ministry of Jesus since the beginning, devoted to service, and an eye-witness of the resurrection (v. 22). Drawing lots made possible the integration of Matthias into the group of eleven. By using lots, the decision was removed from the hands of the congregation and left to God. This did not mean that there was going to be some sort of ongoing apostolic succession. James, who was killed by Herod (12:2), was never replaced as an apostle. Subsequently, those selected by the church to further the cause in any fashion, whether as evangelists (6:5–6), elders (14:23), pastors (1 Tim. 4:14), or missionaries (Acts 13:3), were to be chosen under the guidance of the Spirit and commissioned with prayer and by the laying on of hands. If Paul could rightly say of himself that he was an apostle, it was only because he used the term in its original sense: as one who was sent (22:21; 26:17), not as one of the Twelve (1 Cor. 15:9), whose mandate he affirms (Acts 13:4; Gal. 1:18–19, 2:2, 9). Of course, we should also keep in mind that Paul witnessed the resurrected Jesus (1 Cor. 15:8).

2:1–4. Coming of the Holy Spirit. At Pentecost the Spirit of God who presided over Creation (Gen. 1:2), inspired the prophets (2 Pet. 1:19–21), and anointed Jesus for His ministry (Is. 11:1–2; Luke 3:22), acted to empower the church for mission. The community of believers gathered in anticipation of the gift of the Spirit. Luke does not specify the location or the number of those present. The disciples did not always meet in the same place and often went to the temple to worship (Acts 2:46; Luke 24:53). Although Luke mentions the presence of only apostles (Acts 2:14), we can assume that others were present because the gift of the Spirit was not reserved for the apostles alone (2:38). All 120 present were probably included in the bestowment (1:15). Luke insists on the facts that the community was tightly united (1:14; 2:1) and that they were seated (2:2) to pray and meditate (see AA 36–37). This type of unity was for Luke an essential feature of the church in its infancy (2:42, 46; 3:1; 4:24; 5:12). Later it was to safeguard the unity of the church that Paul opposed Peter at Antioch concerning eating with Gentiles (Gal. 2:11–14). Unity is indeed an essential precondition for the survival of the church (John 17:20–21).

The gift of the Spirit was given at Pentecost, fifty days after Christ's resurrection and ten days after His ascension (Acts 1:3). Pentecost was the Feast of First Fruits (Lev. 23:15–17). It symbolized beautifully the beginning of the great harvest of faith that was brought about by the gift of the Spirit (Acts 2:41). To mark the solemn moment when the promised Spirit was bestowed along with the commitment of the church to the mission, Luke uses an unusual verb. For him the day of Pentecost was symplēroō ("accomplished"; 2:1). He uses the same form of speech in Luke 9:51 in reference to the ascension of Jesus.

The wind, noise, and fire associated here with the outpouring of the Spirit were visible manifestations of the presence of God—a theophany. When God came down on Mount Sinai to give the Law, there were thunders and trumpets, fire and lightning (Ex. 19:16–18; see also Rev. 11:19). In the same way, the sound of a mighty wind and the tongues of fire at Pentecost indicated that the coming of the Spirit was indeed a manifestation of God (Acts 2:2–3).

On Pentecost God brought the gospel within the reach of all languages and cultures. A kind of "second Pentecost" occurred during the Protestant Reformation, when the Scriptures were translated into the languages of the common people. Up until that time, the Bible had been translated only into Latin during the Middle Ages. Since the common people could not read Latin, the Bible had become the exclusive property of the educated clergy. In the spirit of Pentecost, the Bible continues to be translated into as many languages and dialects as possible.

2:5—3:26

The Gospel Announced with Power

Through an inspired sermon Peter spoke to the hearts of the people, the good news was received by many, and a miracle provided Peter with the opportunity to speak again to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

2:5–13. Crowd's Response. Pentecost was celebrated during a season when people "from every nation under heaven" (v. 5) gathered together in Jerusalem. The list of fifteen nations in vv. 9–11 describes the different regions around the ancient world where there were large numbers of Jewish inhabitants. The list of the nations appears to be organized on the basis of the four cardinal points of the compass: Parthian, Medes, Elamites, and the dwellers of Mesopotamia were east of Jerusalem; Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia Minor, Phrygia, and Pamphylia were to the north; Egypt and Libya could be reached only by traveling south; and Rome was to the west. Completing the list are those people to whom the gospel was to be addressed first: the Jews and their proselytes. The scope then broadens to include the nomadic shopkeepers of the sea, the people of Crete, and those of the earth, the Arabs. This description provides a universal synthesis of all the people to whom the gospel was to be proclaimed.

The whole context of Pentecost suggests that speaking in tongues was the gift of speaking known foreign languages (AA 40): (1) The apostles spoke in heterais glōssais—"different/other tongues" (Acts 2:4). (2) The listeners heard them in their own language (2:6, 8). (3) Yet the apostles were recognized as Galileans (2:7), implying that they were assigned to a particular geographical location and language. It is therefore surprising that they spoke as they did. (4) Clearly, the apostles were not in a state of ecstasy. Contrary to what happens with glossolalia (speaking in tongues; 1 Cor. 14:27–33), the apostles were able to keep silent while Peter addressed the crowd. (5) The text quoted by Peter to explain the event speaks about proclaiming a prophetic message (cf. Acts 2:17–21; Joel 2:28–32). Peter was teaching, as indicated by his emphasis on the prophetic nature of the message and by adding phrases not found in Joel's prophecy (Acts 2:18). (6) The charge of drunkenness against the apostles was made by scoffers (v. 13) who were not credible because the hearts of those who heard the message about the greatness of God were touched (v. 11). Those people understood Peter's message with clarity.

Speaking in Tongues

Ancient civilizations were familiar with ecstatic speaking in tongues. Plato described the phenomenon involving individuals who had lost their senses while in a trance. This is totally different from the experience of the apostles, who spoke with clarity. Isaiah spoke out against whispering and muttering mediums and spiritists (Is. 8:19). He implored the people to return to the understandable clarity of the word in Scripture (Is. 8:20). Hosea the prophet compares infidels to those who utter indistinguishable and foolish sounds (Hos. 9:7). Paul emphasized the same thing when he encouraged the Corinthians to use intelligible words (1 Cor. 14:7–12), going as far as to say that those who prophesy bring edification, encouragement, and comfort to people (v. 3).

2:14–39. Peter's Sermon. The gift of the Spirit gives to those who receive a clear understanding of salvation along with the courage needed to testify about it (Acts 4:31). Peter stood up and explained the meaning of the cross and resurrection of Jesus. He stated that the gift of the Spirit that they had received was the result of the mediation of Christ at the right hand of the Father as the exalted Lord (v. 33). His sermon, the very first recorded in the history of the church, brought up two important points: the church anticipated what was expected for the end time (2:14–21), and Jesus was the promised Messiah (2:22–36). Each segment of the sermon began with a call to akousate—"listen" or "hear" (v. 22)—and in v. 14 the verb enōtisasthe is used, which literally means "to put it in your ears."

Quoting from the prophet Joel to explain their experience, Peter emphasized the universality of the gift of the Spirit, regardless of age, gender (v. 17), or social condition (v. 18). Peter stated only conditions of repentance and baptism (v. 38). The eschatological signs mentioned in vv. 19 and 20 emphasize the grandiosity of the events that would mark the time just before the return of Jesus with His offer of salvation to anyone willing to turn to the Lord (v. 21; see "Outpouring of the Spirit," p. 1084). The second part of the sermon develops a central dogma of Christianity, the risen Christ. Jesus is first introduced in terms of His human condition—Jesus was a "man" (Acts 2:22–23). This type of preaching develops extremely important theological themes that summarize the entire gospel message. Jesus must be proclaimed as the Word that became flesh who is now at the Father's side, from where He fills us with His grace (John 1:1–18; see also Phil. 2:5–11; Col. 1:14–20; Heb. 1:1–4).

Peter's sermon is a model of preaching that should influence those who now proclaim the gospel. It progressed toward a highpoint that placed the listener at the heart of Christian theology with the conclusion that God made Jesus, whom they had crucified, to be both Lord and Messiah (or Christ) (Acts 2:36). It offered God's grace along with a call to follow Him.

Peter introduced his sermon by bringing up the notable recent event that brought the people together with curiosity (2:12). He began by telling them that what had just happened was not what they thought (vv. 14–15). Answering the implied question, Peter recalled Joel's prophecy. He knew that for his Jewish listeners a statement from Scripture would be of greater value than a thousand words.

First, Peter placed the statement within its context. What was taking place was an eschatological event (v. 17a). Although the phrase referring to the "last days" is not in the text of Joel, it is implied in vv. 19–20. This was about a momentous event, and people had to make a vital decision before the great and magnificent Day of the Lord would arrive. The quotation from Joel (vv. 17b–18) explains the event in question. God was to pour out His Spirit and bestow the gift of prophecy to His servants. Joel associated the Holy Spirit's gift of prophecy with endtime events. Verse 21 justifies this exhortation because the period before the Day of the Lord was identified as a time of grace—giving sinners a special opportunity to find salvation.

A listener might have wondered why he or she was considered a sinner. As Jews, they had come to Jerusalem for ritual cleansing. Had they perhaps violated one of the cleansing rules or omitted a precept? No, worse than that: they had behaved like criminals (vv. 22–23). Jesus of Nazareth was well known. He had performed countless miracles, and these miracles were obvious signs that God was acting through Him (v. 22). Peter did not mince his words. Consequently, God vindicated Jesus by raising Him from the dead (v. 24).

What proof do we have that Jesus was resurrected? First, we have the prophecy of David (vv. 25–31). Obviously, the Holy One of God (v. 27) who would not see corruption could not be David, who was still in his grave (v. 29). David, says Peter, was talking about someone other than himself, and that other was Jesus (v. 32). Second, the gift of the Holy Spirit they had witnessed demonstrated that He was resurrected (v. 33). Finally, Scripture makes it clear that Jesus is seated at the right hand of God (vv. 34–35). Since God vindicated Jesus and made Him Lord (v. 36a), those who crucified Him need repentance (v. 36b).

The public was moved to ask what it was that they could do to change their status before God (v. 37). The listeners may have felt that an act of piety might be in order, such as a sacrifice or an offering that would appease the wrath of God. Peter's approach was simple and clear: receive freely the forgiveness and grace God has given you in Christ (v. 38). Indeed, Peter preached salvation by grace. Not cheap grace, but a grace that involves a heartfelt repentance, resulting in a radical change expressed through the acceptance of baptism and a new life under the guidance of the Spirit. With great fervor Peter extended the gift of God's grace to his audience, including even their children. The call itself would come from God (v. 39).

In his conclusion, Peter addressed all of the people of Israel (v. 36) as well as all the rest of the visitors to Jerusalem (v. 38). The listeners were not just from Jerusalem but also from all across the ancient world (vv. 8–11). The plight of all human beings as condemned sinners (Rom. 3:9) as well as the promise and offer of grace and forgiveness are both universal and personal (Rom. 3.9).

2:40–47. A Vital Church Growth. The action of the Spirit appealed to the hearts of the listeners (Acts 2:37). Peter exhorted them to set themselves apart from this skolios—"crooked," "corrupt," or "perverse"—"generation." The Greek word genea ("generation") had a particular meaning at the time of Peter. The term applies not specifically to the Jewish people or a certain age group but to all people responsible for resisting the message of salvation. This concept was developed by the Essene community at Qumran, who felt that ever since the beginning, the world was divided in two "generations": the unfaithful generation of Cain (Gen. 4:17–24) and the generation of Seth, the faithful one (Gen. 4:26).

God responds to the commitment of those who receive baptism and gives them a new life through the gift of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22–23). The reference to God's calling (Acts 2:39) reminds us that it is not the human response that saves. Salvation is an individual matter that remains in God's hands. Peter's sermon included the offer of salvation to the Jews and their posterity, as well as to all who are far away—that is to say, to all people. The ethical requirements of the Holy Spirit were not earmarked just for a few people.

The apostolic preaching bore fruit, and as a result the early church community continued to grow. Verse 42 provides a description of the life of the community of believers, which included the proclamation of the apostles' teachings, that is, the message of the gospel explaining the meaning of the cross of Christ (3:15) with an interpretation drawn from the OT (3:22–26). This message was in line with the teachings of Jesus that everything written in Scripture pointed to Him (Luke 24:27, 44–45). Luke also mentions the church's koinōnia—"fellowship" or "community." This is an essential attribute of the Christian mission. It implies unity among believers (Acts 2:44, 46), their willingness to share (v. 45), as well as their openness toward all people without exception. The Council of Jerusalem extended this level of communion to all believers of Gentile background (Acts 15). (3) The "breaking of bread" is also mentioned. This was the expression of the unique identity of a community united in Christ (Luke 22:19) and living with the expectation of His return (1 Cor. 11:26). (4) Also noted by Luke are prayers of the church; these were petitions offered in the synagogues and the temple (Acts 2:46) or extemporaneously (4:24–30). Prayers addressed for one another strengthened the unity of the church.

3:1–10. A Lame Man Healed. The account of Peter and John healing the lame man, followed by their testimony before the Sanhedrin, provides the opportunity for Luke to discuss the work of the Holy Spirit and how it strengthens the preaching of the gospel, especially when the testimony is bolstered by miracles (4:30–31; cf. Mark 16:15–18). Luke also shows how obstacles can be overcome with courage and faith.

Peter and John went together to the temple. This is the first explicit mention of John in Acts. The two are paired together in Acts several times (Acts 4:13, 19; 8:14), and this pairing of Peter and John may harken back to the way Jesus arranged the disciples for ministry (Luke 10:1; 22:8). In his gospel, John underlined the connection between these two men (John 18:15–16; 20:2–3; 21:7, 20–21).

The apostles were respectful of the ceremonial time for prayer. We can assume that Peter and John were going to the temple not just to pray but also to testify. Like Jesus, they accomplished their purposes through deeds and words (Acts 2:22; 3:22). True discipleship is recognizable when deeds harmonize with the message proclaimed (Matt. 5:16, 19–20). The apostles continued to visit the temple at the time designated for prayer. Luke reminds us of this fact to show that the new faith was not in opposition to the faith of Israel. The crippled man appears to have been a paraplegic because he had to be carried to the temple (Acts 3:2). Excluded from worship in the temple because of his condition, he sat at the busiest gate begging for alms. Though the lame man was able to see (v. 3), Peter stared at him and asked the man to look at him (v. 4). Peter perceived something more important than this man's lameness; he saw a unique opportunity to testify. The reference to silver and gold was a common way of referring to a large amount of money (1 Pet. 1:18). Living in a community that shared their belongings (Acts 2:44–45), the apostles would have lived modestly with limited financial resources. Peter recognized that he had something far more valuable to give to the lame man—new life in Jesus Christ of Nazareth (Acts 3:6).

The use of the name of Christ (v. 6) was not a magic formula. It was another way for Peter to say that he had nothing to offer and no special power of his own (v. 12). The paralytic was healed by his faith in Jesus (v. 16). He had heard about the teachings of Jesus and wished to be healed by him (AA 57–58). By helping the paralyzed man to stand (egeirō) on his feet, Peter testified of the power of Christ, who raises (egeirō, "to resurrect") the dead. The man now had access to God's presence in the temple along with the privileges of fellowship (Acts 3:8). The fact that he leapt in the temple is reminiscent of the eschatological song in Isaiah 35:6 along with the praises following in v. 10 of that passage. From now on it is clear that all the sick, rejected, or marginalized have access in Jesus to all the blessings He bestowed to His church.

In a sense the healing of the lame man could be spiritually pointing to the healing of Israel. Indeed, it was after his fight with the angel that Jacob was named Israel. Having received a blow in the hip, he became lame (Gen. 32:31), and the limp he sustained was symbolic of the spiritual condition of his descendants (cf. 1 Kin. 18:21). Now, however, their faith in Jesus made it possible for Israel to be raised, as was the lame man Peter healed, to enjoy communion with God in His temple (Acts 3:25–26). Two additional meaningful symbols frame the story: the ninth hour, when the apostles went to the temple (v. 1), was the exact time of Jesus's death (Luke 23:44), and the man was over forty years old (Acts 4:22), which was the length of Israel's sojourn in the desert. Thus, the healing of the lame man in the name of Jesus has been seen by some commentators as a type of the healing still made available to Israel by entering into the joy of salvation.

The crowd reinforced Peter's testimony (4:16, 21). They knew that the man had been paralyzed but that now he was cured. Ultimately, the fact that Jesus did not heal the man during His earthly ministry served the cause of the gospel. Peter's listeners are characterized by three Greek terms: thambos ("wonder," "amazement," or "fright") and ekstasis ("beside oneself," "amazement," or "not knowing what to think") in v. 10 and thaumazō ("marveling," "admiration," and "astonishment") in v. 12. This mixture of inquisitiveness and anxiety was probably due to the fact that Peter was mistaken for a magician. At first glance he appeared to have supernatural powers.

3:11–26. Preaching in Solomon's Portico. This passage is structured similarly to the experience of Pentecost. The crowd rushed to them because something extraordinary had taken place, and Peter explained what had happened. His message serves as a model for how to present the gospel to the Jews (vv. 12, 26): it placed the Passover within the historical context of Israel (v. 13); it provided a true Christology by proclaiming the real identity of Jesus of Nazareth (vv. 13–15); it interpreted Scripture (vv. 18, 22–24); it included a call to conversion (v. 19); and it proclaimed salvation in Jesus (v. 26) and His Second Coming (vv. 20–21). The sermon is rich in theology and Christology, and it includes the following points:

1. God Is the Mastermind of the Plan of Salvation. He made a covenant with Abraham and the patriarchs (v. 25); from the Creation of the world He announced that He would restore all things (v. 21); He repeated it continually through His prophets (v. 21); through them God also announced that the Messiah would suffer (v. 18) and that He would raise Him from the dead (v. 15) and glorify Him (v. 13). We should note that Peter mentions the glorification of Jesus first because without it we would not understand His nature or His work (Phil. 2:9–11). The NT never presents God in opposition to Jesus. Jesus did not come to change God's attitude toward humanity. It is because God loved the world that He gave His only son (John 3:16). Jesus is the mediator between God and humanity (1 Tim. 2:5), in contrast to the false belief that Mary can mediate on behalf of humans. Jesus does not need to persuade the Father to love us because the Father already loves us (John 16:26–27).

2. The Glorification of Jesus Reveals His True Identity. Peter spoke of Jesus as the Messiah/Christ (Acts 3:18), the servant of God (vv. 13, 26), the holy and just or righteous One (v. 14), the Prince, the Author of life (v. 15). Each title contributes to a fuller understanding of His redemptive work. The title "servant" is understood through the prophecy of Isaiah 52:13—53:12. Jesus was the Suffering Servant for whose death all humanity is responsible (Acts 4:27). Peter quoted this prophecy explicitly to encourage all those suffering from bondage to recognize Jesus as their example (1 Pet. 2:21–24).

3. God Is "the Holy One" (Is. 40:25; Hab. 3:3), "the Holy One of Israel" (2 Kin. 19:22; Ps. 78:41). By calling Jesus holy, Peter proclaimed His divine sonship (cf. Matt. 16:16; John 6:69). He was conceived by the Holy Spirit (Luke 1:35), as confirmed in His baptism (Luke 3:22). In the OT the terms "Yahweh" and "the Holy One" are equivalent (Ps. 71:22; Is. 5:24). Raised to the right hand of God (Mark 16:19), Jesus was exalted and given the name "above every name" (Phil. 2:9), making it possible for Him to present Himself as holy and true (Rev. 3:7).

4. Jesus Fulfilled the Prophecy of Isaiah 53:10–11 as the Righteous Servant. By His sacrifice, Jesus justifies many believers by bearing their iniquities. The concept of "the Righteous One" is linked to Calvary. It was at the foot of the cross that a centurion recognized Jesus as "a righteous man" (Luke 23:47). Himself the victim of murderers (Acts 7:52), Jesus was crucified in the place of a murderer (3:14; Matt. 27:19). Enlightened by the Spirit, the apostles understood that the murderers mysteriously fulfilled the purpose of God (Acts 2:31; cf. Rom. 8:32) that He might forgive our trespasses (Rom. 4:25). His humiliation all the way to the cross (Phil. 2:8) also revealed the divinity of Jesus (Matt. 27:54).

5. The Title archēgon tēs zōēs (3:15) Is Unique. In Greek the noun archēgos is a compound word. It includes archē, which means "first," "source," and "author," and the verb agō, which means "to go." Thus, archēgos has a dynamic meaning: Jesus is the source of life (Acts 3:15), salvation (Heb. 2:10), and faith (Heb. 12:2). As the Author of life and our Savior, He is the One who came to offer Israel repentance and forgiveness for their sins (Acts 5:31). In contrast to His suffering and death, these four references extol the dynamic impact of the resurrection and glorification of Jesus.

Peter concluded his sermon with a call beginning and ending with a reference to the grace of God (Acts 3:17–18) and the steadfastness of His promises (vv. 25–26). He did not place himself as a judge accusing his listeners but spoke on their level, calling them fellow Israelite brothers and sisters (v. 17; cf. 2:29). Their condition was not hopeless because they acted out of ignorance (v. 17), but through them God succeeded in carrying on His purpose (v. 18).

Ignorance (v. 17) does not absolve the sinner's fault. It is only the starting point of a journey that involves listening and learning. The listeners were aware of the innocence of Jesus, but they had not yet identified Him as the Messiah, whose full identity had been revealed through His resurrection. They could, however, recognize Him through the miracles He performed (2:22). The reference to ignorance, therefore, calls the listeners to grow in knowledge. Paul would later employ the same procedure to address Jews (13:27) and Gentiles (17:30). Acknowledging ignorance could lead to repentance (3:19).

Christ had suffered (v. 18) because salvation required the Messiah's death. The prophets had announced that the plan of salvation (3:24–25) includes God's forgiveness for whoever places faith in Him (10:43). And in one way or another, they all announced the sufferings Christ would endure. His death was foreknown from eternity because God loved the world before its foundation (Matt. 25:34; John 17:24; Eph. 1:4; 1 Pet. 1:20). His love is so great that He was prepared all along to hand His Son over (John 3:16–17; 1 John 4:9, 14) to the depraved (Acts 2:23). The prophets had been announcing this plan since the beginning of the world (3:21; cf. Gen. 3:15).

God fulfilled what He had foretold (Acts 3:18). Despite the reckless actions of humans, God had accomplished His work. Likewise, the census ordered by Caesar Augustus (Luke 2:1), which was intended to collect more taxes, allowed the fulfillment of the prophecy concerning the Messiah's birth in Bethlehem (Matt. 2:5–6). In the course of the story, the divine web was intertwined with human strands to fulfill God's plan of salvation.

Peter then called on the people to repent (Acts 3:19). God fulfilled His promise, requiring a response. Peter connected this call to what he had previously said by using the word oun—"therefore" or "so then." Some of Paul's Epistles are also segmented by the word "therefore." Having highlighted justification by faith in Romans 1–11, Paul introduced in chapter 12 a resounding "therefore" to indicate how we should live our faith (cf. Eph. 4:1; Col. 3:1). There is no such thing as a Christian faith without a Christian life. Jesus did not come for the sole purpose of providing forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38; 3:19) but also to change behavior (3:26).

Peter promised that Jesus would return (Acts 3:20–21). Faith in the soon coming of Jesus was part of the early missionary preaching. Jesus had prophesied His return (Matt. 24:30–31; Mark 13:26–27; Luke 21:27) and emphatically promised it (John 14:1–3). He took an oath before the supreme court of Israel, the Sanhedrin, that He would return (Matt. 26:64). Even angels corroborated His declaration (Acts 1:11). From this point forward the gift of the Holy Spirit was to testify that Jesus was indeed elevated to the Father's right hand (2:33; 3:21), from where He would return (3:20). Peter demonstrated the remarkable dynamism of this hope decades later (2 Pet. 3:1–13).

Peter also discussed the covenant with Abraham (Acts 3:22–26). Moses and all other prophets announced the coming of the Messiah based on the covenant made with Abraham and the promise it involves (v. 25). It is possible that Samuel was mentioned first after Moses because of the prophecy of Nathan (2 Sam. 7:16) regarding the throne of David, of which Jesus is the heir (Acts 13:23; Matt. 1:1; 12:23; 21:9; 22:42; Luke 1:32; John 7:42; Rev. 5:5; 22:16). As children and heirs, the Israelites were to be the first beneficiaries (Acts 3:26) not only in terms of the temporal order but also in terms of their right to the Son's salvation. The Septuagint expresses the concept as a promise made to all the tribes (phylē; Gen. 12:3; 28:14), peoples, or nations (ethnos; Gen. 18:18; 22:18; 26:4), and Peter added that it is being offered to all families (patria), including the Jews. The call to repentance and conversion belongs to a long tradition found in the OT. God calls His children to conversion, calling them to return to Him (Mal. 3:7; cf. 2 Kin. 17:13; 2 Chr. 30:9; Neh. 1:9; Jer. 3:22; Hos. 14:2; Zech. 1:3). The initiative comes entirely from God. He offers to convene all those who have turned away from Him. Though Peter emphasized the warning of Moses (Acts 3:23) by inserting the word of Leviticus 23:29, he did not fail to emphasize the fact that Jesus came not to condemn but to bless (Acts 3:26; cf. John 12:47).

Peter and John before the Sanhedrin

The mission did not progress without obstacles. With faith and courage, Peter and John confronted the Jewish authorities. On returning to the community of believers, they prayed, not for deliverance from difficulties but for the ability to overcome them.

4:1–4. Peter and John Arrested. In the temple, Peter and John had been preaching and teaching the resurrection of Jesus for three hours. At the ninth hour (3:00 p.m.), a disabled person was cured, and dusk was falling rapidly. The first reaction came from the priests. Their leaders had been very aggressive against Jesus during His trial. They are mentioned in every narrative of His death (e.g., Matt. 26:47; 27:1, 12, 41). Jesus's message and cleansing of the temple were viewed as assaults against the sanctuary and the priesthood. In fact, it was because of statements made about the sanctuary that Jesus was first charged before the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:61). The captain of the temple was also a priest. He was personally involved with the arrest of Jesus (Luke 22:2, 52). The Sadducees, who did not believe in the resurrection (Luke 20:27), were also involved. Most of the priests were Sadducees (Acts 5:17). Strangely, the Pharisees, who believed in resurrection (23:8; Matt. 27:63), are not mentioned.

One wonders why the elite called to serve in the Sanhedrin were so opposed to the apostles. It should be kept in mind that as far as the Pharisees were concerned, the resurrection from the dead was an eschatological event. It was to occur only at the end of the world, along with the restoration of all things. Yet Peter and John were now preaching about a resurrection by the name of Jesus (Acts 4:10, 18). Unlike the resurrection of Lazarus or the son of the widow of Nain, the resurrection of Jesus was that of the last resurrection. His resurrection was to anticipate the end of time (Heb. 10:11). The gift of the Holy Spirit was the announcement that the end was on its way (Acts 2:16–17) and the present was the time to be converted (2:38–40). One's faith in the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus energizes hope "now," though it is "not yet" fully manifested (John 12:31; Eph. 2:6; 2 Tim. 1:10–12; Heb. 9:26; 1 John 3:2). In the mind of the crowd listening to the apostles, the end of the world was associated with the termination of the sanctuary services (Matt. 24:1–3)—no wonder the priests were offended.

With the arrival of the evening (Acts 4:3), the work of the Sanhedrin stopped, and Peter and John were placed in custody. In spite of the opposition, the Holy Spirit accomplished His work in the hearts of the people, and the number of believers increased from three thousand to five thousand (v. 4; cf. 2:41). Luke was careful to mention this fact because in its deliberations the Sanhedrin was compelled to take the fast-growing number of believers into account (4:16–17).

4:5–12. Addressing the Sanhedrin. Peter and John had to face the Sanhedrin, the highest court in Israel. It was a gathering of the political authorities (rulers, elders), lawyers (scribes), as well as the highest religious authorities—the priests, the presidency of which belonged to the high priest (v. 5). During the period in question two high priests presided: Annas, the rightful high priest deposed in A.D. 15, and his son-in-law, the well-known sitting high priest, Caiaphas (v. 6). The mention of their names suggests that Peter and John were to follow a path similar to that of Jesus (John 18:13, 19). In fact, they were arrested on the same grounds as Jesus—the sensitive question of legitimate authority (Acts 4:7; Matt. 21:23).

The priests held the reins of spiritual authority (2 Chr. 15:3; Ezek. 7:26). Considering that Peter and John were teaching in the temple, they were doing so in the very place where priests exercised their power. Thus, in the eyes of those in charge, Peter and John had no legitimate right to teach on the temple's premises. However, by making a fuss over the question of authority, the Sanhedrin fell into its own trap. Its members knew that the apostles were preaching in the name of Jesus, whom they regarded a crucified criminal. By declaring themselves disciples of Jesus, the apostles were aligning themselves with the offender, thus they were legally declaring themselves His accomplices. Yet Peter and John were proclaiming the resurrection of Jesus. The problem for the Sanhedrin was that they decided to question the actions of the apostles and not so much what they were saying (Acts 4:7). Respectfully (v. 8), Peter handled the facts of the matter before giving his interpretation. He stressed the absurdity of the situation: they were being condemned not for any wrong they might have committed but for having done something good (v. 9). The man who was healed was present (v. 14). The witness responsible for supporting the charges against them became a star witness for their defense.

Under the inspiration of the Spirit (v. 8), Peter boldly confessed his faith in Jesus of Nazareth and became an accuser. Why did you crucify Him, the Author of healing? By so doing you became adversaries of God (2:23–24). Peter quoted Psalm 118:22, as Jesus had done before (Acts 4:11; cf. Matt. 21:42; Luke 20:17). His listeners would have certainly recognized the passage as messianic (DA 597). They were at a crossroad (Matt. 21:23–41). Their choice would determine their future. Either the vineyard would be left in their keep or it would be entrusted to others (Matt. 21:43). Peter's speech ended with a call to accept salvation in Jesus (Acts 4:12). His entire speech revolved around a matter of salvation. The paralytic was saved/healed (v. 9), and this confirms that Jesus was indeed the Savior. Salvation could be obtained not through the performance of temple rituals or through personal works but only through the Person of Jesus. For Peter, all are in need of salvation, and as any good preacher would, he included himself among those called to salvation ("we"; v. 12).

4:13–22. The Name of Jesus Forbidden. The members of the Sanhedrin were perplexed. First, they were amazed at the ability of the apostles to quote Scripture judiciously in spite of their lack of formal education (v. 13). The apostles were among those despised and even cursed for their alleged lack of the knowledge of the law (John 7:49; see John 7:15). Yet Peter, with the assistance of the Spirit, had mastered the law well (Luke 12:11–12; 21:12–15). Like Peter, we must trust in the promises of Jesus and the assistance of the Spirit when given the chance to testify for the Lord.

The Sanhedrin was also concerned about the beneficiary of the miracle—the lame man—and preferred not to deal with him. The miracle was so powerful that it could have been only the work of God (cf. John 3:2). But they were unwilling to recognize this fact. Clearly, if Jesus was the One acting through the apostles, it must have been that He was resurrected and seated at the right hand of God.

The Sanhedrin adjourned to deliberate. It had no option but to acknowledge that a miracle had

Jesus the Stone

As a response to Peter's confession that Jesus was "the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16), Jesus stated that He would build His church on the rock represented by this confession of faith (v. 18). Peter later demonstrated his understanding that Jesus was the living Stone on which the church must be built (1 Pet. 2:4–7). But not just any understanding of Jesus was adequate; it needed to be the perception of Jesus preserved for us by His apostles (1 Cor. 3:10), the church's confession of Him as Lord (Rom. 14:9) and as the Word of God (John 1:1) and Creator of the universe (Col. 1:15–16), by whom all things are upheld (Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3). After quoting from Psalm 118, Jesus declared that those who fall on the stone will be broken, but those on whom it falls will be crushed (Matt. 21:44–45; cf. Luke 20:18). This is a direct reference to Daniel 2:44–45, where the victory of the stone cut out of the mountain is announced. It will break not only the kingdoms of the world but also the hardened hearts of unbelievers. Jesus is not only the Foundation of the church but also its Cornerstone, the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last (Rev. 22:13), the Beginning and the End (Rev. 21:6, 13; see Col. 1:18).

been accomplished (Acts 4:16) and to concede that it was done in the name of Jesus (v. 17). Yet this was the one thing they refused to do. To emphasize their refusal to link the miracle to Jesus, they avoided mentioning the name of Jesus in their speech—choosing instead to refer to "this name" (v. 17). And in an attempt to extract themselves from this difficult situation, they decided neither to convict nor to acquit Peter and John but simply to threaten them and to place a ban on any further evangelistic activity. The Sanhedrin feared the situation and wanted to do everything they could to contain the activities of the apostles so that it would not spread any further (v. 17).

After being informed about the final decision, Peter appealed to the conscience of the members of the Sanhedrin. It is clear that for them obedience to God was paramount. But in condemning the apostles they revealed their inconsistency because Peter and John had not violated the law. While Peter revealed surprising courage (v. 13), the Sanhedrin demonstrated cowardice—they feared the people who were impelled to glorify God in the face of this undeniable miracle (v. 21). The Sanhedrin demanded that the apostles recant. But their threats were empty because the apostles had managed to not only maintain their self-confidence (v. 13) but also strengthened their position (v. 31). When Jesus was arrested, the Sanhedrin had managed to sway the people to their side (Matt. 27:20). This time the people were siding with the apostles. Faith can reverse outcomes and discard fear.

4:23–31. Prayer for Boldness. The apostles did not flaunt their courageous achievement before the Sanhedrin (v. 23); there was no boasting. They merely gave an account to the believers of the Sanhedrin's position against them. The believers must have been praying for their safety, fearing that the Sanhedrin would condemn them as they had condemned Jesus (AA 67). They must have been overwhelmed with joy when the apostles were released despite the Sanhedrin's opposition.

Descriptive accounts of prayers are rare. Here, Luke provides for us a typical prayer from the early Christian communities. The prayer is addressed to the Creator God in terms reminiscent of the Decalogue (Ex. 20:24). It recognizes in the experience of the church the fulfillment of events foretold by prophets (Acts 4:25–28) and includes a request (vv. 29–30). The main purpose of prayer is to glorify God. Peter quoted Psalm 2, a messianic Psalm often quoted by Christians (Acts 13:27–41; Matt. 21:37–45; Phil. 2:9–11). The psalmist's words were regarded as the utterance of God. The Holy Spirit was viewed as having mediated God's word to David. The Master of the universe is not surprised by the revolt of humans; instead this becomes an instrument in His hands to accomplish His redemptive plan. Together, Herod and Pontius Pilate represent the union of church and state. John later denounced this union in his description of the prostitute sitting on the beast (Rev. 17:3). The separation of these two powers is necessary for religious freedom to be preserved.

The prayer of Acts 4:29–31 is surprising. It does not request deliverance but instead asks for the strength that emanates from trusting in God. It does not request power to work miracles but asks God to accomplish them. These requests were intended not to serve the believers but to glorify and exalt God through the name of His holy Servant Jesus (v. 30). This selfless prayer of faith was answered with power in accordance with their request (v. 31).

4:32–37. Sharing in All Things. This section includes a chaism in vv. 32–35 with its center in v. 33. Verses 34 and 35 merely develop the topic introduced in v. 32: unity made possible through the presence of love in the community. The prayer of Jesus in John 17:2 was being fulfilled. The mutual love of believers strengthened the testimony of the apostles (Acts 4:33; cf. John 13:34–35). But it was the content of the message that unified them: the resurrection of the Lord Jesus (Acts 4:33). This message is the centerpiece of the passage. It also initiated the fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah 25:8. For Jews the resurrection is an eschatological event without parallel. For Christians the resurrection of Jesus is an anticipation of and what makes possible the resurrection of God's people (cf. 1 Cor. 15:54; Rev. 7:17; 21:4). The resurrection of Jesus instills in the heart hope and the assurance that He is "coming soon." Consequently, the possessions of this world begin to lose their luster, and their value is relativized.

It should be noted that Luke does not say that all those who owned land sold their property or that those who did sold everything at once. It appears rather that those who had means did not see their possessions as their own but were willing to generously liquidate their assets to meet the needs of the community as they arose over time. After all, we are told in Acts 12:12 that some ten years later a believer named Mary still owned a home. The behavior of the Jewish believers reveals a sacrificial willingness to put the needs of the community of faith before their own. To live in hope is a matter not of expecting Jesus to return in a distant future but rather of waiting for Him in the here and now. This was particularly emphasized by Jesus when He called us to be ready for His return now (Matt. 24:44; Luke 12:40). Luke depicts the early community not as a model but as an example for any community that is waiting for the coming of the Lord.

Barnabas is an example to follow (Acts 4:36–37). He was among those who served in the temple and was converted (cf. 6:7). In order to provide for the needs of Jewish believers in Jerusalem, Barnabas sold a piece of property he owned. We are not told whether the property was located on Cyprus or somewhere around Jerusalem—or if this was all the property he owned. Whatever the case, it was a generous gift from which he expected no special privilege in return. He merely placed his offering at the feet of the apostles (4:35–37). The mention of Barnabas prepares the way for the narrative of Ananias and Sapphira.

5:1–42

God's Interventions

Acts 5 shows the difficulties the church met and how it overcame them with strength and courage. The first is the experience of Ananias and Sapphira (vv. 1–11), which is followed by a report about the growth of the church (vv. 12–16). Finally, we have a narrative about the imprisonment of the apostles and their deliverance (vv. 17–42).

5:1–11. Lying to the Holy Spirit. The story of Ananaias and Sapphira demonstrates that there were some serious imperfections among the believers. Yes, they were all filled with the Holy Spirit (4:31), but Satan had filled the hearts of two persons (5:3). Ananias and Sapphira had apparently publicly accepted the call to liberality (4:32). Unfortunately, what they really coveted was the prestige that would come from giving a large offering (AA 72). They lied by claiming that they were giving all the proceeds to the apostles from a piece of property they had sold. Like Achan (Josh. 7:1), however, they secretly decided to keep back some of the money for themselves. The sudden nature of the death of both Ananias and Sapphira indicates it was an act of divine judgment. Whether the actual cause of their death was a heart attack or shock due to the public exposure of their deceit or if it was entirely supernatural is not stated. They had failed to recognize that God sees and knows all and that people are ultimately accountable to Him for their actions. The love of money and the pursuit of human recognition and praise lead to spiritual death, for they are always accompanied by duplicity and hypocrisy. Only the presence of the Holy Spirit in the heart makes it possible to live one's faith with integrity.

5:12–16. Continuing Power in the Church. Although the Sanhedrin banned their preaching, the apostles continued to gather together in Solomon's Portico (5:12; cf. 3:11). Likely concerned with how the Jewish leaders might retaliate against such public defiance, many people who had great respect for the apostles chose to keep their distance. However, God worked to overcome the fears of the people, and through the ministry of the apostles, many more men and women joined the church. Victories over Satan are noticeable (5:3) as the apostles healed the sick and cast out evil spirits (vv. 15–16). Even residents of Judea flocked to the city to receive healing. Even though not all is well in the church, as the episode with Ananias and Sapphira demonstrates, it pursues its mission with strength as it at the same time tries to remain pure for the Lord. It should not be overlooked that Luke specifically mentioned women among the converts (v. 14).

Though one might think that the sick people over whom Peter's shadow was cast were healed (Acts 5:15–16), Luke does not clearly state it. Those healed may have superstitiously thought that it was his shadow that healed them, but Peter knew very well that this was the work of the Spirit (cf. 4:32). It is true, however, that God makes His sun shine on both evil and good (Matt. 5:45) and that Jesus showed Himself full of compassion for all (Matt. 14:14; 15:30–32).

5:17–21. Imprisoned Apostles Freed. Another arrest opened the door for a new testimony before the Sanhedrin. Persecutions were consistent with Jesus's predictions that His followers would be persecuted and would have to testify before the authorities of this world (Mark 13:9; Luke 21:12). The gospel was spreading beyond the city limits of Jerusalem (Acts 5:16), and the success of the apostles once again aroused the indignation of the priests, all the more because Annas and Caiaphas recognized that they had lost a great deal of popularity. This time they wanted to strike a heavy blow, so they arrested all the apostles and incarcerated them in a common/public prison to malign them before the people (v. 18). But the walls of the prison could not thwart the progress of the gospel. God intervened through a miracle, sending an angel to deliver them (v. 19). This would also happen later to Peter (12:4–10) and Paul and Silas (16:25–34). Things worked out differently for James, however (12:2). In this case, all the apostles were set free by an angel of the Lord, who told them to continue teaching in the temple.

Early in the morning (5:21), as soon as the temple doors opened for the morning sacrifice, they proclaimed the life-giving message to all the people—even those who wanted them dead (vv. 20, 33). The apostles were preaching in the temple because this was the place from which truth should flow to the people (cf. Is. 66:6; Hab. 2:20). This was also the place where Jesus taught the crowds (Luke 20:1). The angel had told them that they must "stand" (Acts 5:20). In the Greek, the theme of standing appears several times using different Greek words: previously, the high priest anastas to arrest them (v. 17), and later on the guards were estōtas (from the same verbal root, histēmi) outside the prison after the apostles had escaped (v. 23). But it was the apostles who at the end were estōtes ("standing") in the temple teaching the gospel (v. 25). Looking forward to the final crisis, Jesus gave the same admonishment to His followers: they are to anakyptō—using a different but related word meaning "to straighten up" (Luke 21:28).

5:22–32. The Apostles on Trial Again. After their deliverance, the apostles returned to the temple to instruct the people about the gospel of salvation. They were risking their lives in fulfilling the divine mission assigned to them. This time the authorities had valid accusations against them: the apostles had disobeyed the strict orders given them (v. 28; cf. 4:18, 21). But those in power had to take into account the fact that the crowd favored the apostles. The religious and civil authorities were afraid (5:21–26), while the apostles manifested surprising courage (4:13).

The high priest pressed charges on three counts: the apostles had defied an order, disturbed the peace, and accused members of the Sanhedrin of murder. Nothing was said about the escape from prison, perhaps to avoid dealing with its supernatural element—the involvement of an angel—because the Sadducees among them did not believe in angels.

Answering the charges, Peter argued that the apostles followed a higher order, that of God Himself (Acts 5:29; cf. 4:19). Obedience to God first and foremost was the premise of all Christian martyrs in history. As witnesses filled with the Holy Spirit, it was their duty to make known to all people what God had done through Jesus (5:32). A true witness cannot remain silent, hiding the truth. Lastly, Peter pointed out the disparities between God's actions and those of the Sanhedrin. Using antithetical parallelism, Peter made the following statements (vv. 30–31):

A You killed with your hands, and
  B You hanged Him on a tree. But,
A′ God raised Him, and
  B′ God exalted Him to God's right hand.

The goal was not to accuse but to raise awareness because immediately afterward God's forgiveness was offered. Note the contrast between God's tribunal and that of humans. God considered the Sanhedrin guilty of murder (v. 30), but this was followed by an offer of grace. The human tribunal plotted to murder despite the lack of evidence (v. 33). Peter was focused on God, the glorified Jesus, and the Holy Spirit.

Women in the Early Church

In Acts Luke gave an account of the important role women played in the early church. They participated in prayer meetings before Pentecost and received the Holy Spirit along with all of the others (2:4). They, like any male believer, believed in the Lord (5:14), received baptism (8:12), and suffered persecutions (8:3; 9:13; 22:4). They were taught the new doctrine (8:12) and enjoyed full integration within the new community of believers (2:1–5). While some prominent Jewish women in Pisidian Antioch were instruments of persecution (13:50), others were converted (17:12) and contributed to the spread of the gospel (16:14). One was declared to be a good mother (16:1; 2 Tim. 1:5). Luke mentions some by name for their generosity, such as Lydia (Acts 16:14–15), some for their helping hands, such as Tabitha (9:36), some for being notable believers, such as Damaris (17:34), and some even as missionaries, such as Priscilla (18:2; cf. Rom. 16:3; 1 Cor. 16:19). They were doing the work of ministry for Jesus and His church.

5:33–42. Gamaliel's Advice. An important and influential Pharisee came to the rescue of the apostles and their mission. He was among the few on the Sanhedrin who believed in the resurrection of the dead (Acts 23:6–8). He seems to have recognized the voice of God in Peter's message (AA 82). After recalling two examples of failed revolts, he advocated entrusting to Providence the fate of the gospel (Acts 5:38–39). His persuasion seemed to peak when he warned his companions of the risk they were taking by the possibility of opposing God.

To save their pride the Sanhedrin decided to punish the apostles. A twofold measure was administered, both through a physical blow—the apostles were whipped (derō, to punish by flogging with a three-stranded strap of calf hide typically on the back and chest of the victim)—and a moral blow as the apostles were again forbidden to preach (v. 40; cf. 4:18, 21). Far from being discouraged, the apostles were happy to have been worthy of suffering shameful treatment for the sake of Christ. Only faith can bring joy in the face of hardship (Acts 20:24; 2 Cor. 7:4; 8:2; 1 Thess. 1:6; Heb. 10:34; James 1:2; 1 Pet. 4:13). The Greek word chairontes ("rejoicing") is a present participle, meaning that the joy that comes from God is permanent, not occasional. Similarly, the preaching of the gospel had not been ended, and it still persisted within the temple. Not only that, but Luke adds that they were in the temple and in homes every day, with the good news spreading more than ever despite the many obstacles.

His Blood Be on Us

Although prior to Jesus's crucifixion the Jews had shouted to Pilate that His blood would be on them (Matt. 27:25), here Caiaphas clearly did not want to be found guilty of Jesus's blood (i.e., death; Acts 5:28). Unfortunately, Christians later in the history of the church labeled the Jews as killers of God, planting the seed of anti-Semitism. They forgot that Jesus's blood was shed for the forgiveness of sin (e.g., Acts 20:28; Matt. 26:28; Mark 14:24; John 6:53–54; Rom. 3:25; 5:9; Eph. 1:7). This obviously does not excuse the Jewish leaders from doing what they did. They were the ones who manipulated the crowds. But here again Peter did not seek justice; instead, he offered forgiveness in the name of Jesus (Acts 5:31). Speaking of the God of their ancestors, Peter called attention to the fact that God had not abandoned His people Israel.

6:1—9:31

THE MISSION SPRANG OUT OF TRADITIONAL JUDAISM

The first section of Acts begins in 1:15 ("in those days"). It describes the development of the Christian community composed of Israelites. The second section begins in Acts 6:1 ("in those days"). It describes the development of the Christian community as it began to include believers of different backgrounds: Greek-speaking Jews (6:1–7), Samaritans (8:4–8), an Ethiopian proselyte (8:26–39), and people from other Gentile regions, such as Azotus and Caesarea (8:40). Like the first section, the second section involves a number of crises. There was dissension between Hebrew-speaking and Greek-speaking Jews (6:1–7). The apostles faced new opposition from the Sanhedrin, but this time it resulted in the death of the accused (7:8–15, 54–60). Hellenist Jews suffered persecution (8:1–3), and once again we find a new believer, Simon the magician, falling from the faith on account of the lure of money (8:14–24). But the church, through the power and intervention of the Holy Spirit, overcame these crises and began to grow beyond the walls of Jerusalem.

6:1—7:60

The Hellenists and Stephen

In these chapters we first observe tensions within the church that led to the development of church order and differentiation of functions (vv. 1–7). What follows deals with the experience and speech of Stephen that resulted in his death. This speech plays a very important role in the narrative of the work of the Spirit in the apostolic church and is connected to the prophecy of the seventy weeks in Daniel 9 (see "Prophetic Significance of Stephen's Speech," p. 1487).

6:1–7. Seven Chosen to Serve. This section is placed between two affirmations of the growth of the church (vv. 1, 7). Anything that could have facilitated or hindered the development of the church was of central importance. The Greek term having the infinitive diakonein is used three times in this section: In v. 1 it refers to the daily distribution or serving of food to the widows. In v. 2 it is used to refer to the work of serving at or waiting on tables—the work that the apostles were not able to do in addition to attending to the word of God. In v. 4 it refers to this very work of the ministry or service of the word of God that they refused to neglect due to other matters. The new community of faith faced problems, most likely because new converts were excluded from the benevolent services of the synagogues. Thus, the new church was led to create its own plan of benevolence (4:35).

The sudden spurt of growth revealed some malfunctions within the system. The Hellenists—that is, Greek-speaking believers of Jewish ethnicity—began to complain that their widows were being neglected in the distribution of goods. Their complaints were evidently justified and no one disputed them. The apostles recognized the importance of delegating responsibilities to others. Ultimately, their spirit of openness to one another's opinions and gifts resolved the crisis. The apostles suggested sharing responsibilities and delegating to others the responsibility of serving at the tables. Their assignment of this work to seven men with names of Greek origin suggests that in all wisdom they resolved the crisis by choosing individuals from within the ethnic group manifesting displeasure. It was not the intention of the apostles to suggest that the services/ministries related to tables were more important than those related to prayer and teaching. In order to administer the food distribution, one had to be filled with the same Holy Spirit as the apostles (6:3, 5). Like them, they would be also engaged in the work of evangelization and teaching (vv. 8, 10). Luke insists on the importance of wisdom in the selection (vv. 3, 10). It was not their purpose to elect deacons as we know them today, although when Luke was writing, there were deacons with specific functions in the church (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8, 12). Luke uses not the word "deacon" (diakonos) but the word diakonia ("service") or the verb diakoneō ("to serve"). All the ministries of the church were considered services (6:1, 2, 4).

Prayer and teaching including the ministry of the word (v. 4) are foundational in Jewish tradition (3:1). The text stresses that the apostles were devoted to evangelizing Jews in locations traditionally designated for this work, the temple. Stephen, leader and representative of the group (6:5), taught Jews of the Diaspora in the Synagogue of the Freedmen (v. 9). This was the beginning of a new ministry that would eventually reach out to Gentiles, a movement initiated by Hellenists (8:5). Paul later demonstrated that he was Stephen's true heir in the faith (7:58).

Luke emphasizes the fact that order needed to be established within the new community. Seven qualified men, headed by Stephen, were chosen to serve. Philip was second in charge. The rest of the story focuses entirely on the helpful actions of these two men. Nothing is known of the other five, with the exception that Nicolas was a proselyte—a Gentile converted to Judaism. Luke specifies this fact as the acknowledgement that the election of a former pagan to a church function marked an opening of the gospel to the Gentiles.

In this episode the authority of the apostles was not disputed. The laying on of hands did not fill the deacons with the Holy Spirit because they already had the Spirit (6:3, 5). This action indicated that they were being authorized or appointed to fulfill a specific function within the church (v. 3). Once the crisis was resolved, the church continued to grow. Unity was restored. While the number of disciples was multiplying before this crisis, it now was increasing significantly—Luke uses the Greek word sphodpa ("exceedingly"; v. 7). God's word was spreading (auxanō—"to multiply," "to increase"). The past tense of this verb conveys a continuing action.

6:8–15. Stephen: Accused of Blasphemy. This story is sandwiched between two descriptions of Stephen (vv. 8, 15). First, Hellenists confronted him (vv. 9–12), then the Sanhedrin (vv. 13–14). Stephen followed the same path as Jesus. He was unceremoniously arrested (6:12; cf. Luke 22:54), accused of blasphemy (cf. Matt. 26:65), and taken before the Sanhedrin (Acts 6:12; cf. Luke 22:66). False witnesses (Acts 6:13; cf. Matt. 26:60) distorted some of Stephen's statements about Jesus (Acts 6:14; cf. Matt. 26:61; Mark 14:58) and accused him of antagonism toward the temple. Stephen's life ended showing the same spirit of forgiveness Jesus had demonstrated during His death (Acts 7:70; cf. Luke 23:34). Like Jesus, Stephen called out to God before he died (Acts 7:59; cf. Luke 23:46). In both cases, the Son of God was described as standing at the right hand of God (Acts 7:56; cf. Luke 22:69).

The Hellenists

The "Hellenists" were Jews who spoke Greek and were open to Greek culture. They were different from "Hebrews," whose language was Aramaic or Hebrew. Most of the Hellenistic Jews were scattered throughout the Mediterranean Basin. Many Hellenists were among the pious Jews who came to Jerusalem to celebrate Pentecost. Some of those who became Christians chose to remain in Jerusalem to live within the new community of believers.

Stephen, like Jesus (Acts 2:22) and the apostles (2:43), is also recognized as coming from God because of the signs and wonders. The power (dynameōs) that energized his work came from the divine aid he received. Some manuscripts indicate that he was full of power and charis ("grace"), while others have pistis ("faith"). Of course the concepts are closely related, and either way the point is clear that Stephen's ministry was made possible only through divine aid (6:8). It was not in the temple but in a synagogue that he delivered his specific message. His discourse was reiterated later in his speech before the Sanhedrin (7:1–53), the essence of which can be gathered through the accusations of the false witnesses. The allegations were false because they distorted the truth of the matter. Stephen was accused of blasphemy (which carried a death penalty; Matt. 26:66) against Moses and God (Acts 6:11), which is to say against the temple and the law (v. 13). But he was simply announcing that the sanctuary services and its archaic customs were to be terminated (v. 14; cf. Luke 21:12–15).

Throughout the charges, Stephen proclaimed some of the most revolutionary teachings of Jesus, namely, His Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:17–48), containing insinuations against certain traditions, and His eschatological message (Luke 21:5–36) announcing the destruction of the temple. Those who thus far had favored the Christians (Acts 6:8) and opposed the Sanhedrin's murderous intentions (4:21) were now siding against Stephen (6:12). His face, like that of Moses (Ex. 34:29), was glowing like that of an angel, indicating that he had been in communion with God. His message carried the seal of divine approval.

Prophetic Significance of Stephen's Speech

The speech of Stephen is located at a critical juncture in the narrative of the book of Acts. It is therefore important for us to point here to its significance. The ending of the prophecy of the seventy weeks mentioned in Daniel 9, which occurred in A.D. 34, connects his speech to some elements of that prophecy (see commentary on Dan. 9:20–27). When exploring the importance of the speech, it is necessary to look at the development of the plot of the book of Acts.

1. The Place of the Narrative in Acts. The story of the church recorded in the book of Acts begins with a meeting of Jesus with the disciples in Jerusalem and ends in the city of Rome, where Paul was preaching while under house arrest. The proclamation of the gospel moved from Jerusalem to the capital of the Roman Empire. In a sense, the development of the story is summarized in Acts 1:8: Jesus commanded His disciples to be His witnesses in Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria, and to the ends of the earth. The disciples moved geographically from Jerusalem (2:42—6:7), through Judea and Samaria (6:8—9:31), to Syria (9:32—12:24), to the eastern part of the empire (12:25—19:20), and eventually to Rome itself (19:21—28:31). The speech of Stephen and his martyrdom led to the mission to the non-Jews (7:1—8:1). The account is located at a significant point in the narrative.

2. The Purpose of the Speech. Stephen's speech was an indictment against the Jewish leaders and their supporters who did not recognize Jesus as the Messiah and who actively opposed Him (7:1–53). Although many of the Jews and priests in Jerusalem became Christians (6:7), there was strong opposition to the disciples from the Jewish leaders, particularly from the Sanhedrin. The speech traced the history of Israel from the call of Abraham to the time of Moses in order to show God's dealing with Israel and the opposition of the people to Moses, who like Jesus was God's instrument of deliverance. Then Stephen said that the Israelite temple is not indispensable for the worship of God. Interestingly, Stephen did not call the Jewish leaders to repentance and conversion, as was the case in the previous speeches in Acts (2:38–39; 3:19); he simply indicted them. The leaders were being condemned by the Lord.

3. The Impact of the Speech and Death of Stephen. The speech and death of Stephen played a very important role in the development of the Christian mission by pushing it beyond the limits of Jerusalem and Judea to the rest of the world. His ministry led to the universalization of the Israelite faith as it found its fulfilment in the coming of Jesus as the promised Messiah. Daniel 9 had prophesied that during the 490 years the covenant faith would reach beyond the boundaries of Israel. This is precisely what we find in Acts after the death of Stephen. First, his death resulted in the scattering of the church through persecution, forcing the apostles to go to the non-Jewish world to preserve their lives. They were forced by the circumstances to leave Jerusalem. Second, the result of the scattering of the church was that the message of salvation through the Jewish Messiah reached a new audience in Samaria and the rest of the world who were avid to hear the gospel. Under the leadership of Jewish-Christian apostles and believers, God's original plan to bless all the nations of the earth through Abraham was being fulfilled (Gen. 12:1–3).

Third, God indirectly used the persecution to spread the gospel to the Gentiles, and with the conversion of Paul and the mission that God entrusted to him, God Himself was assuming center stage in moving the church to a universal mission. This took place at the historical junction created by Stephen's speech and death. Stephen's ministry did not close the doors of salvation to the Jews but opened them up for the influx of Gentiles into the experience of salvation through faith in Christ, the Messiah. God's plan was progressing as He intended, and prophecy was being fulfilled. That should reaffirm our conviction that the rest of God's redemptive plan for humanity will also achieve its divinely intended purpose through Christ.

7:1–8. Stephen's Address: The Call of Abraham. In Stephen's speech, he related how God constantly labored to save His people. He did not mention the name of Jesus but only alluded to Him (7:37, 52, 57), probably because the accusations were aimed at Stephen's teachings about Jesus (6:14). His purpose was not to discuss the history of Israel but to teach his listeners about salvation using the work of God among them. This methodology had been used previously by God, including in Jesus's ministry (e.g., Matt. 12:3–5), and was aimed at reaching the people where they were. His account commanded authority in the eyes of his listeners.

The high priest asked Stephen if the charges against him were true. Stephen responded respectfully, all the while including himself as part of Israel, referring to "our father Abraham" (Acts 7:2). Stephen's defense aimed to explain why he was accused of speaking against the temple and the law in the name of Jesus (6:13–14). He used the experience of Abraham for several reasons: God revealed Himself to Abraham in a foreign land, Mesopotamia (7:2). Abraham left his country and went to the land where the Israelites currently lived, but Abraham never had possession of it (v. 5). God promised to give this land to his descendants, but first they would have to live in a foreign land (v. 6). God, however, promised to deliver them in order for them to serve Him in the promised land (v. 7). Abraham entered into a covenant relationship with the Lord, whose sign was circumcision, which would demonstrate that God keeps His word (v. 8). One of the important theological insights of the passage is that God's self-revelation is not restricted to the land of Israel. God is with His people wherever they are. What matters is faithfulness to God. Unfortunately, the generation that left Egypt proved unfaithful (v. 39).

7:9–16. Stephen's Address: The Patriarchs in Egypt. This account follows the same structure as the experience of Abraham: God was with Joseph in a foreign land, Egypt (vv. 9–10). Jacob found refuge in Egypt (v. 12). Joseph was there to rescue them (v. 13), reuniting the divided family in Egypt (vv. 14–15). Finally, the patriarchs did not get to enjoy the promised land; they died and were later finally buried in Shechem (vv. 15–16). So God revealed Himself outside of the Holy Land.

God was shown to have been with Joseph throughout his ordeal. The suffering he endured was not an indication that God had rejected him or that he had sinned. God was present and active even in Gentile territory.

7:17–36. Stephen's Address: God Delivers Israel by Moses. Stephen spent more time in his speech discussing Moses perhaps because he had been accused of speaking against Moses (6:11). While his Jewish listeners may not have realized it, thanks to Stephen's speech Christian readers are now led to perceive Moses as a type of Christ. There are two sections about Moses in the speech. The first is about Moses in Egypt (7:17–29). Once again Stephen emphasized the fact that Judaism began abroad (v. 17) and that Moses received his training in Egypt (v. 22). Moses was mighty in action but also in his words (v. 22). A popular misconception of Moses was that he stuttered. However, Stephen's own claim here was that while Moses was still a prince in Egypt, he spoke well. Speaking well was highly valued in ancient Egypt. This helps us understand that when at the burning bush, some forty years after fleeing from Egypt, Moses's claim to slowness of tongue and speech (Ex. 4:10) had more to do with the ever-changing nuances of the Egyptian language and his forty-year absence than with any physical condition. It should be noted that this characterization of Moses (that he was mighty in action and in his words) is almost exactly the same as the disciples' description of Jesus in their conversation on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:19). Christian readers can draw a clear parallel between Moses and Jesus. This is especially true considering that God wanted Moses to deliver his people, but the people failed to understand (Acts 7:25; cf. John 1:11). Moses was to bring reconciliation and peace (Acts 7:26). The Greek text literally indicates that "he reconciled them [synallassō] for peace [eirēnē]." The theme of reconciliation through Christ is prevalent in the NT (e.g., Rom. 5:10), while that of peace pervades the message of Jesus (Luke 19:42). Moses was pushed away (Acts 7:27, 39) as Jesus was later rejected (Luke 17:25; 20:17).

Shechem

According to the Bible, the patriarchs were not buried at Shechem but in Hebron (Abraham: Gen. 23:19–20; 25:1–9; Isaac: Gen. 49:30–31; Jacob: Gen. 50:1–14). Only Joseph is mentioned as having been buried in Shechem (Josh. 24:32). It is possible that the remains of the patriarchs were later transferred to Shechem. By specifying Shechem (Acts 7:16), which is in the territory of Samaria, Stephen was pointing out the fact that the patriarchs were buried in a foreign land—another way of saying that the promised land was no longer a matter of significance. The people of God were not to be exclusively defined on the basis of geography because the faith of Israel had been universalized.

The second part of Luke's account of the speech dealing with Moses is about Moses in Sinai (Acts 7:30–36). Moses found relief in Midian, a foreign land where he prospered (v. 29); and he met God at Mount Sinai, holy ground (v. 33), though God's people were still in Egypt (v. 34). The temple was not the only place where God heard the prayers of His people (1 Kin. 8:30); He also heard them in Egypt (Acts 7:34). Thus, God revealed Himself everywhere, and the Holy Land was in principle wherever God revealed Himself while recognizing His people (even in hostile territory). Moses is associated with the words archōv ("ruler"), dikastēs ("judge"), and lytrōtēs ("deliverer," "redeemer"; v. 35). All these functions are those of Christ. Jesus is recognized as the Beginning or Ruler (archē; Col. 1:18), the Head who guides, the Judge (kritēs) of the living and the dead (Acts 10:42), and the one through whom we have redemption (apolytrōsis; Rom. 3:24). Moses was sent by God to encounter those who had rejected him (Acts 7:35)—to bring them out of Egypt (v. 36) while performing signs and wonders (v. 36), as Jesus did (2:22). In this passage Stephen established himself as an admirer of Moses, contrary to the claims of his accusers. That admiration for Moses and his ringing affirmation for Moses's authority allowed him to describe his listeners as the very ones were who were unfaithful to Moses (7:53).

7:37–43. Stephen's Address: Israel Rebels against God. Stephen was accused of blasphemy against Moses, when in fact the forefathers were the ones who rejected Moses (v. 39). They did not want to enter Canaan and would have preferred to have returned to Egypt (v. 39), which implies that the Holy Land was not important to them. Furthermore, they turned their backs on God to worship idols (vv. 40–43). By contrast, Stephen did not reject the law of Moses. For him it was God's living words or oracles—"words of life"—delivered by a heavenly being (v. 38). God's response to the rebellious forefathers, who turned back to Egypt in their hearts (v. 39), was to turn away from them (v. 42). God allowed humans to bear the consequences of their own choices. He withdrew the protection they rejected; He paredōken—"handed them over" or "gave them over/up" (v. 42; cf. Rom. 1:16, 26, 28). Without the help of God, we are left to our own devices, but through Christ there is freedom from our own deceptions (Col. 1:12–14; Heb. 2:14–15; Rev. 1:6).

7:44–50. Stephen's Address: God's True Tabernacle. In this section, Stephen dealt with the accusation that he was opposed to the temple as the dwelling of God. He first discussed the instructions God gave to build a tabernacle for Him according to the model He showed Moses. It was a symbol of His presence among His people. The people brought it into the land of the Gentiles (the nations), of which they took possession (vv. 44–45). Under David a place was found to construct a temple for the Lord, but he was not to build it (vv. 46–47). Second, the task of building a temple was given to Solomon, who soon realized that God does not live in a temple made with human hands (vv. 47–50). This theological insight was misused by the Sanhedrin to accuse Stephen of speaking against the temple (6:13). His defense was that this insight originates in the speech of Solomon during the dedication of the temple. God is a universal and cosmic Being who cannot be totally contained in temples built by humans (1 Kin. 8:27).

The implications are clear. First, according to Stephen, God manifests His presence anywhere in the world. This universalistic vision clashed with Hebrew conservatism. Second, he had also made clear that the Holy Land was defined by God's presence. The patriarchs did not possess the promised land, and the forefathers preferred Egypt. Third, the people of Israel proved rebellious as they turned away from God to worship idols. Fourth, the worship services in the temple were at this time pointless because God did not dwell there any longer. Stephen was echoing the words of Jesus to the Samaritan woman, that the time would come when people would worship God neither on Mount Gerizim nor in Jerusalem and that all worship, no matter where it takes place, must be in spirit and in truth to be pleasing to God (John 4:21–24). The only thing left to do was for Stephen to draw his conclusion. He brought his accusers to God's tribunal using their history and theology and found them guilty of the same charges they raised against him.

7:51–53. Stephen's Address: Israel Resists the Holy Spirit. Before his martyrdom, Stephen pronounced three accusations: (1) His contemporaries were no better than their forefathers because they also resisted the Holy Spirit (v. 51). They prided themselves on the circumcision of the flesh but failed to understand the circumcision of the heart (Rom. 2:28–29; cf. Jer. 9:25–26). (2) The forefathers persecuted and killed the prophets, but his listeners had done worse; they murdered the Just One whom the prophets had announced (Acts 7:52; cf. Luke 23:47). (3) They accused Stephen of not keeping the law (Acts 6:13), but they were the ones who failed to keep it (7:53; cf. John 7:19). This accusation hit them particularly hard because his listeners presumed themselves to be guardians of the law (Rom. 2:17–20, 23). The implicit unstated conclusion was that the covenant was broken, not by God, who is ever merciful, but by His people.

7:54–60. Stephen the Martyr. Stephen was the first Christian martyr, the first link in a chain that would extend over centuries. But God takes that which is senseless and brings out of it that which serves His purpose. Following this aggressive persecution, the mission of the church burst out of the walls of Jerusalem to reach the world. The charges Stephen made (v. 54) failed to produce repentance (cf. 2:37); instead, they instigated anger and indignation. Though Stephen was disapproved by the Sanhedrin, he was approved by God (vv. 55–56). When accused of blasphemy against God (6:11) because of his teachings about Jesus (6:14), he stood up and informed them that this same Jesus was at this time standing at God's right hand (7:56). Jesus was condemned for saying that they would see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of God coming on the clouds of heaven (Matt. 26:64; see also Mark 14:62; Luke 22:69). This was exactly what Stephen claimed to have seen in heaven, anticipating Jesus's glorious return when he would be rewarded for his faithfulness to the Lord.

God in the History of Salvation

Although Stephen took his time to deal with the lives of Abraham, Joseph, Moses, and the forefathers, the central figure portrayed in this historical review of salvation was the One responsible for all the action verbs: God. All initiatives for the redemption of His people are His. He appeared to Abraham (Acts 7:2), brought him to Canaan (v. 4), promised to give him land and posterity (v. 5), and gave him the covenant of circumcision (v. 8). God thwarted the plans of Joseph's brothers (v. 9), sustained Joseph and delivered him from his trials, and gave him wisdom and the graces of Pharaoh (v. 10). Later again, it was God who wanted to deliver His people through Moses (v. 25). He appeared to Moses (v. 30), spoke to him (v. 32), and sent him to deliver His people (vv. 34–35). Though God allowed His people to follow after their own inclinations (v. 42), He continued to manifest His presence in the tabernacle (v. 44) and to overcome their enemies (v. 45). Finally, by placing Jesus on His right hand, God demonstrated that the history of salvation was continued in Jesus (v. 55). God never abandoned His plan to save, even when the attitudes of those whom He intended to save disappointed Him (v. 52). The blood of Stephen became the seed from which Paul's ministry sprouted (v. 58).

The very idea that the One they condemned was now ruling in heaven was utterly unacceptable to the Sanhedrin (Acts 7:57–58). In accordance with the law (Lev. 24:14), Stephen was dragged out of the city as was Jesus (John 19:20). The clothing of witnesses was laid down at the feet of a young man. The language reminds us of Barnabas and Ananias and Sapphira, who brought their gifts and laid them at the apostles' feet (Acts 4:36–37; 5:1–2). Perhaps the idea is that it was in obedience to the apostles that the gifts were brought to them. In this particular case, Saul was held responsible for what was happening, and he hastened to take action (8:1; Gal. 1:13).

8:1–40

From the Jews to the Gentiles

The gospel spread out of Jerusalem at this time, and the result was that non-Jews joyfully received the good news of salvation through Christ. The church was gradually coming to an understanding of the full magnitude of its mission. The content of this chapter is organized as follows: Philip's evangelization of the Samaritans (8:1–13); Peter's approval of the work of Philip and purification of the church (8:14–25); Philip's evangelization of non-Jews (8:26–40). This structure intends to show that the expansion of the church is taking place in a spirit of unity.

8:1–4. Saul Persecuted the Church. Luke recounts the revival of the mission in a brief paragraph in a chiastic style:

A Persecution caused dispersion, except for the apostles, who remained in Jerusalem (v. 1)
  B Devout men buried Stephen (v. 2); contrary to the requirements of the law to hang a man who had been stoned to death (Deut. 21:22–23), Stephen was buried as a righteous man
  B' Saul persecuted the Hellenists who were Stephen's companions (Acts 8:3); the apostles were spared and allowed to move about freely (8:14)
A' Dispersion (diaspeirō—"disperse" or "scatter," from speirō, meaning "to sow seeds") allowed the spread of the gospel (v. 4).

This literary construction, in which the mission frames the death of Stephen and the persecution that Saul (later called Paul) was perpetrating, emphasizes that the mission was fulfilled in spite of persecutions. Nothing can impede God's plan. Thus, the death of Stephen, like that of Jesus, marks not an end but a new beginning in the fulfillment of God's plan of salvation.

8:5–8. Christ Preached in Samaria. The gospel spread beyond Jerusalem and Judea into Samaria. Painful circumstances led the church to fulfill its mission to testify in Samaria (Acts 1:8). Just as evangelism in Jerusalem went through a crisis that was surmounted (5:1–11), so also evangelism in Samaria faced a crisis created by Simon the sorcerer. In both cases money was at stake. But the church emerged purified from the crises. We are left to realize that emotional enthusiasm leading to baptism does not necessarily mean that we are true citizens of God's kingdom. Conversion should transform our lives.

Philip, the second evangelist (21:8–9) in the list of seven (6:5), took over the duties of Stephen and evangelized Samaria. This Philip should not be confused with the apostle of the same name. In fact, the apostles remained in Jerusalem (8:1). Philip preached Christ (v. 5), His salvation, and His coming in glory. The passage indicates that he went to the city of Samaria, where his preaching was received with unexpectedly positive results. This is the first time Luke spoke of the crowds in the plural (Gr. ochloi; v. 6) and portrays them as undivided (Gr. homothymadon—"united together with the same purpose"). Unlike the united—homothymadon—priests and rulers in Jerusalem, who covered their ears (7:57), these listened to Philip. The people were interested not just in the signs or miracles that Philip performed; they also listened attentively and were persuaded by his teaching and preaching about Christ (8:6). However, Simon's interest peaked because of the miracles (v. 13).

For Luke, miracles were signs intended to expand the meaningfulness of the message. They were intended to corroborate Philip's teachings as coming from God (cf. Mark 16:20). Once again, healing and preaching were meant to dovetail. The Christian message is the expression of God's love and includes caring for those who suffer. This is consistent with the ministry of Jesus (Matt. 8:16-17). Preaching resulted in great joy (Acts 8:8; see also 2:46; 8:39; 13:48; cf. Matt. 13:20; Luke 2:10; Phil. 4:4; 1 Thess. 5:16), a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

8:9-13. The Sorcerer's Profession of Faith. The territory where Philip labored had for a long time been influenced by the work of a man called Simon (vv. 9, 11). He had claimed to be someone great. Philip, in contrast, pointed away from himself to Christ (v. 5). The people of Samaria were originally mostly expatriates from Babylon and Arabia (2 Kin. 17:24). The Samaritans had accepted monotheism and the laws of Moses, but they had incorporated idolatrous customs and beliefs (2 Kin. 17:29-33). They were fascinated by magic and witchcraft, and they readily accepted Simon as almost divine (Acts 8:10; cf. 14:11-12).

The truth Philip taught drew the Samaritans away from the misleading demonstrations of Simon. A conflict had been ongoing between Jews and Samaritans over the temple in Jerusalem (John 4:20). The Samaritans were inclined to side with the Hellenists, who challenged the importance of the temple itself (Acts 7:48-50). True evangelism, Philip demonstrated, is about preaching the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ (8:12), not the location of the preaching. Preaching the name of Jesus Christ is acknowledging that He is Savior and Lord because He was resurrected from the dead (Phil. 2:9-11). Preaching the kingdom is proclaiming the return of Jesus (Dan. 2:44; 7:13-14; Heb. 1:8). Philip harvested in a place where he had not sown (John 4:37) because Jesus had previously prepared the hearts of the people when He met the Samaritan woman at the well (John 4:39-42). Simon was also baptized, but unlike other believers, who were converted on the basis of what they heard (Acts 8:12), he was attracted by what he saw—the signs and miracles (Acts 8:13; cf. John 2:23-25). Baptism is not a pursuit for power but the acknowledgment of our helplessness and need of a Savior.

8:14-25. The Sorcerer's Sin. Although believers were scattered, contacts between believers in Jerusalem and the apostles persisted. Philip's preaching was obviously not limited to the one city of Samaria. The gospel was spreading throughout the province. The apostles sent Peter and John to pray for the believers and to lay their hands on them for the reception of the Spirit. The laying on of hands by Peter and John had two functions: the apostles welcomed the newly baptized members into the larger community of believers, and the believers received the Holy Spirit to equip them to testify (see 1:8). The Holy Spirit is essential to the mission of the church. The apostles did not control the Spirit but only prayed for the believers to receive the Spirit. According to the words of Peter at Pentecost, the gift of the Holy Spirit was to follow baptism (2:38), but this was not always the case (10:44-48). God works in different ways in order to achieve His intention for us. Simon also was baptized (8:13), but apparently he did not receive the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 12:11). He wanted the power to give the Spirit to others, totally misunderstanding the work of the apostles.

The narrative of Simon the sorcerer reminds us of the other Simon who left everything to follow Jesus (Luke 5:10-11, 18, 28). The present Simon wanted to possess everything and even to buy what came as a free gift (Acts 8:18-19; cf. 2:38). The sorcerer was driven by personal ambition (8:9) and a quest for power (v. 19). Peter rebuked him severely and exhorted him to pray to God for forgiveness (vv. 20-22), to which Simon responded with a request for Peter to pray for him for divine protection (v. 24).

Peter and John not only endorsed the work of Philip but also continued to provide support by testifying and preaching in many villages in Samaria (v. 25). Luke shows that though Peter and John came from Jerusalem, they were totally open to share the gospel with the Samaritans. In the near future further steps would have to be taken to reach the world with the gospel.

8:26-40. Christ Preached to an Ethiopian. God was behind all the actions that took place in the story of Philip and the Ethiopian (vv. 26, 29, 40). Philip was God's faithful and obedient instrument, so he obeyed and went as he was commanded (v. 27). Philip embodied the attitude of a true disciple of Jesus. A man of Ethiopia (that is to say, from Nubia, the remote kingdom south of Egypt) was returning home. He was a very important and powerful person because he was responsible for the treasury of his queen, and perhaps even the state. But he was probably considered weak and despised by many because he was a eunuch. The fact that he had visited Jerusalem in order to worship in the temple and was reading from Isaiah indicates he was likely a proselyte—a convert to Judaism. Since Luke seems to clearly identify Cornelius as the first Gentile convert (10:45; 11:1), it is unlikely that the Ethiopian was simply a Gentile interested in visiting the temple. Although eunuchs were officially prohibited from entering the inner courts of the temple (Deut. 23:1), he could have certainly worshiped in the outer court. Moreover, it is difficult to know how or whether the prohibition against eunuchs was actually enforced. Whatever the case, it is certainly possible that during his stay he had heard echoes of the apostles' preaching in the temple.

The passage he was reading was from Isaiah 53 about the Suffering Servant. The passage may have spoken to his heart because he too had likely suffered from rejection because he was a eunuch. As he wondered about the identity of this Suffering Servant, Philip approached. As was the custom in antiquity, the man read aloud, which led Philip to ask him about his reading. How humble this high-level official was in being willing to invite Philip, whom he did not know, into the privacy of his chariot in order to learn from him. In the process of explaining to him the good news about Jesus, Philip must have also taught him about baptism (cf. Acts 2:38). The confession of Acts 8:37 found in some manuscripts ("I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God") is possibly not original (it is found only in the Western text; see Acts: Introduction), but it is consistent with the faith of the apostolic church (e.g., Rom. 10:9). The baptism was by immersion, as indicated by the meaning of the verb baptizō ("to go under water") and the context of the story (Acts 8:38).

After the baptism, the eunuch "went on his way rejoicing" (v. 39). Although Luke does not mention it, the Ethiopian would have certainly taken great joy in having read just three chapters later in Isaiah 56:3-8 the promise of a messianic age when eunuchs would no longer be excluded from God's assembly. He would certainly have believed that day had now arrived in Jesus. It may not be wrong to suggest that his joy led him to introduce the gospel in sub-Saharan Africa. His conversion was part of God's plan for that region of the world.

A Church United

In Acts 8 Luke emphasizes the importance of preserving the unity of the church within a community that was growing and embracing people of non-Jewish origin. In this particular case the evangelization of a new territory needed the approval of the mother church (Jerusalem) in order to be integrated into the larger community of believers. The risk was that the church would be divided between Christians of Gentile background and people of Judeo-Christian background (strongly attached to the Jewish traditions; hardly any interaction with Gentiles [10:28]; insistence on the rite of circumcision [15:1]; respect for ritual purification [21:21-24]). Luke, a disciple of Paul, whose concern for church unity took center stage (Gal. 2:11-14), highlights the importance of integrating the Gentiles within the Christian community. The narrative indicates that Peter and John not only approved of the work of Philip among Gentiles but also labored with him (Acts 8:25), although Peter clearly still wrestled with their acceptance until God showed him his error in a vision (Acts 10-11).

Philip pursued his evangelization efforts along the Mediterranean coast. He stopped at Caesarea, a Roman city, and settled there (Acts 8:40; 21:8). Peter would later baptize a Roman centurion and his family in that city (Acts 10). The gospel was thus reaching far and wide into Gentile territory. At this point, the narrative turns back to Saul and his conversion (Acts 9), which would result in the message being taken even farther afield.

9:1-31

Conversion of Saul of Tarsus

Saul was the man who approved the murder of Stephen (8:1) and who was involved in the great persecution against Christians in Jerusalem (8:3). And he was even ready to deal with those who fled to Damascus, but on the road his life changed forever. The persecutor became the persecuted and became a witness for Jesus. On the way to Damascus Saul experienced the gift of divine grace that enlightened and determined his entire ministry.

9:1–9. The Damascus Road: Saul Converted. While Philip continued his work as an evangelist (8:40), Saul was still intent on persecuting Christians. The text describes this in the vivid terms of breathing murderous threats against the Lord's disciples (9:1). He remained a zealous fundamentalist closed to new light (1 Tim. 1:13). By persecuting the Christians, who are here called the disciples of the Lord, Saul was really fighting against their Master. He would be defeated, however, because he was up against an undefeated opponent who would reach him through His mercy and grace (1 Tim. 1:13–14).

Judaism was tolerant of different religious sects, such as the Pharisees or Sadducees, but only insofar as they were respectful of Jewish traditions. But here an emerging sect (Acts 24:14) called "the Way" opposed the values of the temple. It is called "the Way" because it was the way of salvation (16:17), the way of the Lord (18:25), the way of God (18:26). The expression sheds light on the foundation of Christianity: (1) ethically it is a way of living life, a way of being (Matt. 7:13–14; 22:16; cf. 21:32), a path on which one must walk (John 12:35; Gal. 5:16; Eph. 5:2, 8); (2) in a christological sense, it is Jesus (John 14:6; Col. 2:6, Heb. 10:20); and (3) in a soteriological sense, it is the path that leads to God (Luke 1:79; John 14:4, 6; Heb. 9:8), the way to salvation (Acts 16:17), the way to achieve peace (Luke 1:79, Rom. 3:17). As a pure traditionalist, Saul could not tolerate this new Way.

To continue his persecution against Christians outside of Judea, Saul needed official documentation from the Jewish high priest and Sanhedrin authorizing him to arrest the followers of Jesus (who were seen as wayward Jews) and to transfer them back to Jerusalem to be tried and punished (Acts 9:1–2). Women were included in the persecution (v. 2), probably because of the important role they played in Christianity from the very beginning (1:14).

On his way to Damascus, Saul saw a light coming from heaven. This was clearly a manifestation of God (cf. Matt. 16:1; Luke 3:22; John 1:22; 3:27, 31). Jesus knows each of us by name, and in this instance, He spoke Saul's name twice. The repetition of his name shows insistence on the part of Jesus. He then asked Saul why he was persecuting Him (Acts 9:4; see Matt. 25:40). Saul asked two questions, first inquiring who the Lord was. Jesus answered, "I am [egō eimi] Jesus." The phrase reminds us of the true identity of Jesus as the great I Am (John 8:58). The second question is not found in some manuscripts of Acts, though it is mentioned in one of the two other accounts of the vision in Acts (Acts 22:10). This question implied Saul's surrender and demonstrated his measure of respect for God. It is a question every believer should place before God every morning: "Lord, what do You want me to do?"

Though Jesus appeared to Saul on the road to Damascus, He did not request that Saul work independently of His organized church in some type of independent ministry. Saul was to be at the service of the church. It was through its auspices that he was to recover his eyesight (v. 18), to join through baptism (v. 18), and to be instructed (v. 19; cf. 1 Cor. 15:3). He was always loyal to this relationship to the Lord and His church (Gal. 2:2, 9). He who believed he was enlightened was now blind (Gal. 1:14; cf. Acts 9:8), and he would recover his physical and spiritual sight through conversion (v. 9).

9:10–19. Ananias Baptizes Saul. A twofold vision (vv. 10, 12) made possible the encounter between Saul and Ananias. Ananias expressed his fear even though the Lord told him that Saul was blind (v. 12). Saul was a symbol of terror to Christians (Gal. 1:13; 1 Tim. 1:13), who here are referred to as those who call on God's name (Acts 9:14). Invoking the name of Jesus or praying to Him was a characteristic of the new Way (Acts 7:59–60; 22:16; 1 Cor. 1:2).

The mission to which Saul was now called was well defined (Acts 9:15). His first duty was to make known (to be a witness to) the name of Jesus to the Gentiles in accordance with the mission entrusted to the apostles (1:8; cf. Matt. 28:10). In the eyes of the Pharisees, the Gentiles were despicable, as were those who did not know the law (John 7:49). Saul was also to testify before kings—another category of people often neglected in Christian witnessing—and before the Israelites. It is with them that he began his ministry by teaching in their synagogues (Acts 9:20; cf. 13:14; 14:1; 17:1–2, 10; 18:4, 19, 26; 19:8) because God had not rejected them (Rom. 11:1). He was to suffer a great deal during his ministry (v. 16), not only physically through torture, stonings, and shipwreck (2 Cor. 11:8, 23–27; Gal. 4:13–15) but also emotionally (2 Cor. 11:28; 2 Tim. 1:11–12). Ananias referred to the new convert as "Brother Saul" (Acts 9:17). With these words, Saul was welcomed into the Christian community and invited to join it through baptism. Saul was then filled with the Holy Spirit, as were the apostles (2:4). He remained in the company of the disciples in Damascus to learn about his new faith.

9:20–22. Saul Preaches Christ. With his baptism, Saul was introduced to the mission of the church. He did not procrastinate but immediately obeyed the call (Acts 26:19–20; Gal. 1:15–16). Obedience is a form of faith (Rom. 1:5). Saul preached or proclaimed (kērysso) Christ, attesting Him as the Son of God. Proclaiming Christ is equivalent to proclaiming the gospel (1 Thess. 2:9). The proclamation is in fact teaching the meaning of Christ's death (1 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 2:20) and His dignity as the Son of God (2 Cor. 1:19) and as Lord (2 Cor. 4:5). This teaching (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:5) was known as the kērygma or the doctrine of the Christian faith (Rom. 16:25–26; 1 Cor. 2:4–5). We are sent to fulfill this ministry (Rom. 10:15). Thus, faith in Christ is not merely a matter of believing in the Person of Jesus; it is the acceptance of His teaching that expresses itself in a new way of life (Gal. 1:16; 2:20).

9:23–25. Saul Escapes Death. The reference to hēmerai hikanai ("many days" or "quite some time"; v. 23) is to be differentiated from that of hēmeras tinas ("some days" or "several days"; v. 19). It allows for the time needed for Saul's sojourn in Arabia (Gal. 1:17–18). Here the one who had not been afraid to kill others (Acts 22:4; 26:10) was now the object of a plot to kill him. The Jews of Damascus had probably obtained favors from the governor of the city to place guards at the gates in order for Saul not to escape (2 Cor. 11:32–33). Because of this, he owed his survival to those in Damascus whom he had come to persecute.

9:26–30. Saul at Jerusalem. On returning to Jerusalem after three years in Arabia (Gal. 1:18), Saul was not received as a hero (Acts 9:26). His conversion was in doubt because the church had suffered much and suspected that this may have been a ploy of the Sanhedrin to capture them. Barnabas was appropriately called the son of encouragement (4:36), and it was he who introduced Saul to the apostles. This terminology is rather broad because he saw only Peter and James (Gal. 1:18–19; cf. Acts 15:13). By saying that Barnabas brought him to the apostles, Luke called attention to the unity of the church and the bond of harmony between Saul and the apostles. He diēgēsato (from diēgeomai—"explained," "described in detail," or "told") the experience of Saul and, in particular, his encounter with the risen Christ (v. 27). This is important in order to establish the forthcoming authority of Saul (1 Cor. 9:1; Gal. 1:1, 11–12, 15). Because he saw Christ on the Damascus road, Saul could also be said to be a witness of the resurrection of Jesus (Acts 1:22). After Barnabas's introduction, Saul accompanied the apostles freely (9:28).

It is surprising that Saul was no longer apprehensive of the high priest or the Sanhedrin. Two main reasons can be suggested: (1) Caiaphas was no longer the high priest, and the Sanhedrin may have been troubled over something more disturbing: the need to dissuade Emperor Caligula from his order that a monument of himself be erected in the Jewish temple. (2) The fact that Saul was a Roman citizen also made it difficult to arrest him. We find Saul arguing with the Hellenists who had put Stephen to death and who wanted to kill him also (v. 29), at which point the believers decided that it would be better for Saul to leave Judea. The text suggests that the decision was not his own, considering that he was always ready to face danger with courage, but that of the church. He boarded a ship in Caesarea and traveled to Tarsus, his native city in Cilicia (21:39). From there he spread his influence throughout the provinces of Syria and Cilicia (Gal. 1:21–22), where he probably established churches (Acts 15:23, 41). Roughly six years would pass before Saul's next appearance in Acts (11:25).

9:31. The Church Prospers. With the departure of Saul, the church enjoyed peace. The text does not specify the reason for the earlier trouble, but probably the presence of Saul among them had upset the Jewish authorities. Some manuscripts read "church" and others "churches"; either way the terms designate an entity with universal meaning that includes all the believers in Judea, Galilee, and Samaria. The church was united in a bond of peace. It grew in the fear of the Lord, that is, an attitude of respect and obedience supported by the presence of the Holy Spirit. Consequently, the church grew and was being edified.

9:32—12:24

PETER'S MINISTRY

Before focusing his attention on the ministry of Paul in the narrative, Luke writes about Peter's ministry. Through Peter the Lord performed mighty miracles and reached out in decisive ways to the Gentile communities. In a sense, Peter continued to do the ministry of Philip while at the same time anticipating the ministry of Paul.

9:32–43

Peter's Miracles

Miracles played a significant role in the early apostolic church and are associated with the proclamation of the gospel to both Jews and Gentiles. They reaffirmed the divine presence among the small group of disciples in a hostile environment. These miracles testified about the power of Jesus and served to reaffirm His resurrection. He was still alive bringing spiritual and physical healing to suffering humanity.

9:32–35. Aeneas Healed. In the absence of persecution, the church enjoyed peace, which made it easier to fulfill its mission. Peter left Jerusalem to evangelize, traveling by way of the road leading to the sea. Apparently, he took the initiative to go alone; John is not mentioned. He was planning to go to Lydda, Joppa, and Caesarea (Acts 8:40), following the footsteps of Philip and traveling extensively (9:32). Along the way he healed a man (vv. 33–34) and resurrected a woman (vv. 36–41), showing that the benefits of the gospel are accessible to men and women. In Lydda he met a new community (v. 32), probably converts of Philip, along with some who fled Jerusalem (8:1). These were probably Jews of Greek origin because the paralytic's name, Aeneas, is Greek. Peter began his foreign ministry among Jews of Greek tradition just as he had previously ministered to Jews of Jewish tradition—by healing a paralytic (cf. 3:1–8). Luke, a physician, provides details about the patient: the man in Acts 3 had been paralyzed since birth, and Aeneas had been bedridden for eight years (3:2; 9:33). Unlike Simon the sorcerer, who sought notoriety (Acts 8:19), Peter diverted the attention away from himself by saying that Jesus Christ was the One who healed the man (9:34). Then, following Jesus's example, Peter urged him to stand and make his bed. Aeneas must have been well known by the inhabitants of this town as well as by those who had come from the rich valley of Sharon to see him. As a result, many turned to the Lord (v. 35). They were Jews who were persuaded that Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah.

9:36–43. Dorcas Restored to Life. Tabitha was recognized as a disciple living in Joppa. This is the only place in the NT where the word "disciple" is used in its feminine form. Her name is translated Dorcas ("gazelle"). She was full of good works, always doing charitable deeds and helping those in need, similar to the seven deacons who were full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom (Acts 6:3). She ministered in the community of Joppa. Philip may have influenced her to undertake such a work, based on the model of Jerusalem, involving a service to widows. Her unexpected death brought tears to many in the church (9:39). Peter was requested to come at once while she was being prepared for burial. The widows showed him the clothes she had made for them, and the mood of the verb implies that they were wearing the clothes. Peter approached the deceased and knelt down and prayed. Though he had received the power of the Holy Spirit, Peter recognized his dependence on God and humbly called on Him. Persuaded that his prayer was heard (Mark 5:41; Luke 8:5), and following the model of Jesus, he commanded Dorcas to stand (Acts 9:40). Then taking her by the hand, he presented her to the community of believers. Again, many were led to believe in the Lord Jesus (Acts 9:43; cf. v. 35).

After this, Peter continued to stay in Joppa with Simon, a tanner (v. 43). Simon lived by the sea to facilitate the use of water to wash the animal skins and to separate his business from the community because of the bad smell his trade produced. Leviticus 11:24–25 indicates that touching the flesh of a dead unclean animal made the person ritually unclean. Consequently tanners (who worked with hides from an assortment of clean and unclean animals for a variety of uses) were stigmatized in Jewish society. It was likely that animals who were victims of accidental death or disease were brought to Simon to process their skins. Peter showed great openness of mind by staying in the house of an unclean Jew—though only a vision from God would make him feel comfortable associating with an unclean Gentile!

The Gospel to the Gentiles

Once again, the church continued to grow under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Though Cornelius observed the Jewish rules, he was not only uncircumcised but also Gentile. This new reality would serve to transform the church. The obedience of Peter and that of the church brought Christianity to a new level; it was no longer a Jewish sect—it had become a universal movement sharing the faith of Israel with the world.

10:1–8. Cornelius Sends a Delegation. Cornelius lived in Caesarea, the city designated for Roman procurators responsible for Judea. He was a centurion, who commanded a military unit, likely comprised of eighty to one hundred soldiers, that was called the Italian Regiment or cohort (v. 1). He probably belonged to an auxiliary force, since no Roman legion was posted in Judea at the time. The name Cornelius suggests that he was a Roman citizen, a foreigner in the land (v. 28). He was devout, full of love for God and eager to keep His laws (Deut. 10:12–13). He and his family feared God with the respectful kind of fear that leads to the observation of basic rules such as almsgiving and prayer (Matt. 6:1–7; 11:23; Luke 18:12). We are told that he regularly prayed, implying that he observed the designated times for prayer (Dan. 6:10; Luke 1:10). The ninth hour, which is 3:00 p.m., was the time designated for ritual prayer and was one of three times during the day when devout Jews prayed (9:00 a.m., 3:00 p.m., and sunset). Earlier in Acts, Peter and John went to the temple to pray at the ninth hour, also reflecting this practice (Acts 3:1). Thus, Cornelius appears to have been following this practice in his own life (10:3), demonstrating his devotion to what he believed God desired.

As he was praying, Cornelius had a vision in which an angel appeared to him (v. 3). He was told of the Lord's care for the uncircumcised and that He was pleased with his pious life and prayers (vv. 4, 31). The angel who was speaking to him was well informed about the details of the life of Peter—for example, his name, his address, and his associate (vv. 5–6)—indicating that God pays careful attention to the lives of those who serve Him and that He cares for them. As a good soldier, Cornelius obeyed and sent two servants accompanied by a soldier from his personal guard to protect them in their journey (v. 7). This attending soldier was one who shared in Cornelius's devotion (vv. 2, 7, 31).

10:9–16. Peter's Vision. Caesarea was about thirty-one miles (50 km) north from Joppa (modern Tel Aviv), a trip that would take about fifteen hours on foot. Joppa was the major port city (2 Chr. 2:16) until Herod had Caesarea built to replace it. Cornelius did not waste any time. The fact that his messengers arrived around noon (Acts 10:9) indicates that they must have left the very same night Cornelius received the vision. Peter had obviously remained in Joppa to complete his mission. The miracles he performed increased the interest of the people in the gospel (vv. 35, 42). Mission and prayer are inseparable in the life of believers.

Peter, like Cornelius, was praying. Noon was not the time for ritual prayer. It is a little surprising to find Peter praying on the roof of the house during the heat of the day. By specifying that he was hungry, Luke made it clear that Peter's vision was not caused by exposure to the heat. Peter, in the vision, refused to follow the heavenly command to eat, asserting that he had never eaten anything common or unclean. In response, Peter was told that he must not call anything that God had cleansed "common" or "defiled" (koinos).

This passage is often interpreted to mean that God was removing the distinction between clean and unclean animals. That is not what the text says, however. The problem was not that Peter declined to eat the unclean animals. It was that Peter refused to eat the clean animals because he believed they had become common (defiled) by coming into contact with the unclean ones. In doing that he was calling "common" what God had made "clean." During the intertestamental period, Jewish tradition expanded the OT laws of separation to include the belief that animals, humans, and even objects could become ritually "defiled," or made "common," by their association with items declared to be unclean (cf. Mark 7:2–9). This unbiblical belief had made observant Jews unwilling to associate with Gentiles for fear that they would become ritually impure in the process. The purpose of Peter's vision was not about a new approach to diet. It was to prepare Peter to accept the invitation to go to the home of Cornelius. Without this sort of divine intervention, Peter might have refused. Although Peter did not understand the meaning of the vision at first (Acts 10:17), he eventually recognized that God was telling him not to call any person common or unclean (v. 28). Thus, the vision was about the way Jewish Christians were to relate to Gentiles (10:34–35; 11:17; 15:7). It had nothing to do with clean or unclean food except to use those symbols as metaphors for the purpose of the vision. If Christians were afraid to associate with unbelievers, the mission Jesus gave to the church would never be fulfilled.

10:17–23. Summoned to Caesarea. Peter was confused (diaporeō—"to be perplexed;" cf. Acts 2:12; Luke 9:7). The heavenly voice did not clearly explain the vision to Peter. Its meaning would be clarified as the story developed. While Peter was immersed in his thoughts on the roof, Cornelius's messengers were carefully searching (Gr. dierōtaō, "to ask for directions") for the location of his house. They finally stood near a large gate (pylōn, "portal") by the courtyard of the house (Acts 10:17).

The messengers introduced Cornelius as well as any Jew could do it: he was righteous, a God-fearing man, and of good reputation among the Jews (see also Luke 7:4–5). The overnight hospitality Peter offered to these travelers revealed his open-mindedness (Acts 10:23, 28–29; 11:3). He left with them the next day because the messengers doubtless had needed rest and food and because Peter wanted to be better informed. He also took along six local Jewish Christians, perhaps as witnesses to whatever might transpire. As any good leader, he did not act alone or hastily.

10:24–33. Peter Meets Cornelius. Peter and his companions arrived the fourth day after the vision of Cornelius (v. 30). Cornelius had a great deal of faith in the success of the mission. Anticipating the arrival of Peter, he gathered all his family to share this important event. Some manuscripts read "he entered/arrived" (that is, Peter; the preferable reading) while others read "they entered" (the whole group). The singular verb could be used for Peter's entrance as the leader of the group, while also implying their arrival as well. Later, some Jewish Christians would reprimand Peter for defiling himself by entering the house of an uncircumcised Gentile (11:3).

Seeing Peter, Cornelius fell down at his feet—a gesture of respect in the Middle East. To this gesture Luke adds the Greek verb proskyneō, with the same meaning, but in biblical language it expresses the idea of worship, as in the presence of the divine (Matt. 4:10; Heb. 1:6; Rev. 19:10). The immediate reaction of Peter suggests that he realized that this could be interpreted as an act of worship, and he told Cornelius to get up (Acts 10:25–26). The messenger should never give even the impression of willingness to take the place of the Sender.

At first Peter seemed to be a little apologetic, but then he warmed up to his hosts. The word he used to say that a relationship between Jews and Gentiles was not permitted is not from the Greek word nomos ("law"), normally used to designate the law of God, but from the word athemitos, implying the rules of customs (v. 28). In Israel, according to the Torah, aliens had rights (Gen. 17:12; Ex. 12:19, 49; 20:10). It was only after the Exile that Pharisees established traditions that over time built walls of separation between Jews and Gentiles—including the idea, mentioned above, of defilement by association. In the house of Cornelius, Peter referenced not the law of God but human traditions. In Acts, the law of God retains its rightful place in the life of believers.

10:34–43. Cornelius's Household Listen to the Gospel. Peter's testimony is a model of apostolic preaching to the Gentiles. Let us consider both the theology and the methodology involved. First, regarding the theology of the passage, found at the beginning and closure of the text, (1) salvation was now available to all and not only to the Jews (v. 42). This notion of "all" is repeated eight times and highlights the universality of salvation. He refers to all nations (v. 35); Jesus is Lord of all (v. 36); Jesus healed all who were under the devil's power (v. 38); and all who believe in Him receive forgiveness (v. 43). (2) The work of salvation is from God Himself. He is not partial (v. 34); He anointed Jesus with the Holy Spirit and power; He was with Jesus (v. 38); He raised Him from the dead (v. 40); He chose His witnesses to the resurrection of Jesus (v. 41); and He established Jesus as the supreme eschatological Judge (v. 42). (3) To believe in Jesus is to acknowledge that He is Lord (v. 36) and that He was appointed to judge over the living and the dead (v. 42; see also Luke 5:21–24; John 5:22–23; 2 Tim. 4:1; 1 Pet. 4:5). (4) Salvation is about forgiveness (Acts 10:43) and peace (v. 36)—that is to say, our reconciliation with God (Rom. 5:1, 10; 2 Cor. 5:18–21).

Second, we find the methodology used by Peter to share the message to non-Jews. He moved from what was known to the unknown: They knew about the ministry of John the Baptist (Acts 10:37) and the baptism of Jesus and His ministry (v. 39), which show that God was with Him (v. 38). Then what they did not know was that Peter and the other disciples were alongside Jesus during His ministry (v. 39); that Jesus was crucified but God raised Him from the dead and Jesus appeared to His followers (vv. 40–41); that after the resurrection they even ate with Him (v. 41); that He ordered them to testify about Him (v. 42); and that all Jesus went through was according to the Scriptures (v. 43).

Seeing they were pious people who feared the Lord, Peter invited them to accept Jesus as the Messiah, through whom there was forgiveness of sin for all who believe (v. 43). Peter no longer doubted that the gospel was also for the Gentiles. He saw the truth that God does not show favoritism or partiality. This is a major theme in the NT (e.g., Rom. 2:10; Gal. 2:6; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25; 1 Pet. 1:17). With regard to salvation, there are no distinctions based on gender, social status, or race (Gal. 3:28). The message was clear: Jesus Christ is Lord of all (Acts 10:36).

10:44–48. The Holy Spirit Falls on the Gentiles. Peter was still preaching when the Holy Spirit came on all who were hearing his words (v. 44). The gift of the Spirit is dependent on the divine freedom to bestow it on whomever God chooses (8:17–18), before or after baptism (19:2). Peter's companions were astonished (existēmi—"to be amazed," "to be out of one's mind") that the Spirit had fallen on Gentiles (10:45). Thus Peter's companions realized that circumcision is not required to receive the Holy Spirit or to be part of God's people.

Those who received the Spirit were speaking with tongues and magnifying God (v. 46). The association of these two actions implies that the new converts spoke intelligible languages. Similarly, when the apostles received the Spirit at Pentecost, they prophesied (2:17). Peter, in response to what had happened, invited them to be baptized. Baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ indicates that the listeners had accepted Jesus as Lord and appropriated the message Peter had proclaimed about Him (10:38, 40, 42–43).

11:1–18. Peter Defends God's Grace. In Jerusalem Peter was compelled to defend his actions. It was important for the believers in Jerusalem to accept that the Gentiles could be part of the people of God. This would be important for the future unity of the church. Peter summarized his experience with Cornelius but chose to modify a few details that might have inflamed the prejudices of his Hebrew listeners.

Luke does not report the reaction of the other apostles to the conversion of Cornelius. But some of the Christian Jews challenged Peter, particularly those who believed that new converts should undergo circumcision and practice the traditions of Judaism (vv. 2–3). They considered Peter's actions inappropriate because he was willing to fellowship and to eat with uncircumcised Gentiles—let alone the fact that he also baptized them (see Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:4; Luke 15:2). This was the position Peter would have advocated before he had his vision as recorded in Acts 10.

While the story Luke told in chapter 10 addresses the reader, chapter 11 addresses a Judeo-Christian public. Peter summed up the discussion with arguments in his favor. He specified that in his vision he saw all kinds of animals (11:6). Cornelius is mentioned not as being a Roman officer but as a "man" (v. 12), implying that the gift of the Spirit was not only for Cornelius but also for any person who believes. Peter said that a heavenly angel spoke to Cornelius and that his message implied that salvation was for him and all his household (v. 14). By shortening his discourse, Peter placed the emphasis on God's intervention on behalf of Gentiles. Peter closed his report by arguing that God had made clear His intentions and that he could not oppose God's purposes (v. 17; cf. 4:19; 5:29; 5:39). His emphasis had been on the work of the Spirit (11:12, 15), Jesus (v. 16), and God ("from heaven," vv. 5, 17). The positive reaction to Peter's speech was crucial in order to preserve the unity of the church. The church had already survived the danger of a split between the Hebrew and the Hellenist converts (6:1). While unity was preserved once again, the threat of a rift remained (see chap. 15).

11:19–26. Barnabas and Saul in Antioch. Judeo-Christians of Greek origin fled along the coast toward the north in a centrifugal pattern. From Phoenicia, where the ports of Tyre and Sidon were located, some sailed to Cyprus, while others went farther north to Antioch. At that time Antioch was a cosmopolitan city with a population of about 500,000—the third largest of the empire after Rome and Alexandria. Luke specifies that they were preaching exclusively to the Jews (v. 19), distinguishing them from the Jewish Hellenists (see 6:1).

Conversely, in a centripetal movement some believers left Cyprus and others Cyrene, now Libya, and made their way to Antioch, where they spoke to non-Jews. They proclaimed Jesus as Lord (11:20), implying that through His resurrection He demonstrated His divinity as well as His status as Judge and Savior (cf. 2:36; 10:42–43). We do not know who taught them about Jesus, but perhaps it was Simon of Cyrene, who carried the cross (Mark 15:21), or the prophet Lucius (Acts 13:1). The reference to the Lord's "hand" being with them (11:21) is a reference to the manifestation of power (Ex. 14:31), sometimes miraculous (Acts 9:3; 13:11). Through the use of this expression Luke suggests that miracles continued to complement their preaching (cf. 2:43; 4:30). New believers placed the Lord at the center of their lives. Though faith involves the teaching of ethics, it is primarily a commitment to Jesus (11:21, 23).

When the gospel first reached the Samaritans, the apostles had sent Peter to evaluate the situation. This time the church sent Barnabas.

Surprisingly, he did not return immediately with a report but spent a year ministering to the Gentiles. Barnabas was the man for the job. He was a peaceful and good man, full of the Holy Spirit and faith (v. 24). As a Levite he had the trust of conservative Jews, and as a Cypriot he was well accepted by the Greek-speaking Jews. Seeing what the grace of God can accomplish, Barnabas was glad (v. 23). If there is joy "in heaven over one sinner who repents" (Luke 15:7), there is joy on earth as well.

Given the large number of converts (Acts 11:24), Barnabas needed help, and he thought about Saul, whom he had last seen some six years earlier (9:27). Remembering that Saul had gone to Tarsus, Barnabas went and brought Saul to Antioch (9:25–27, 30). Both preached Christ, leading the Gentiles to use for the first time the nickname "Christians" (11:26). The word is Greek with a Latin ending, which suggests the name did not come from the Jews. The Jews referred to the Christians as "Nazarenes" (24:5). Though the name was initially intended to be disrespectful (1 Pet. 4:16; cf. Acts 26:28), believers willingly adopted it as their own.

11:27–30. Relief to Judea. The mention of the prophet Agabus and famine allowed Luke to highlight the unity that existed between the church of Antioch and that of Jerusalem. The organizational structure of the apostolic church was not congregationalist. It was deeply united through the bonds of faith and service. Paul himself recognized the importance of the mother church (Gal. 2:2–9; cf. Acts 15:2; 18:22; 21:15, 17) and endeavored to maintain the connection with it (Rom. 15:26; 1 Cor. 16:1; 2 Cor. 8:1–7; Gal. 2:10). Strong bonds of faith were not alone responsible for the unity of the church; solidarity was equally important. Donations were delivered to the elders, not to the apostles. This suggests that the church was not organized hierarchically with Peter as its first pope. Paul appears to make reference to this visit in Galatians 2:1–10 (see Galatians: Introduction).

12:1–4. Herod's Violence to the Church. When Herod Agrippa I (ca. 9 B.C.–A.D. 44) began to assert his power over the Christians, he caused a great deal of pain and suffering. But ultimately, he suffered a terrible fate (12:23). Luke introduces him simply as Herod because he belonged to a line of persecutors. Herod the Great, his grandfather, murdered the children of Bethlehem (Matt. 2:16), and his uncle, Herod Antipas, beheaded John the Baptist (Matt. 14:1–12). Luke later introduces his son, Herod Agrippa II, as simply Agrippa to differentiate him from his predecessors on account of his favorable inclination toward Paul (Acts 25 and 26).

Promoted to office by Emperor Claudius, Herod sought to find favor with the ruling class by beheading James the apostle (Acts 12:2). James became the first martyred apostle and the only one Luke mentions, probably to show that despite obstacles, the mission persisted. Though later Peter was miraculously delivered, God allowed James's work to be completed with his martyrdom.

Seeing that the Jews were pleased with what happened to James, Herod also arrested Peter (12:3). In doing so he was taking aim at the church leaders who had been spared during the earlier persecution (8:1). Here the term "Jews" refers to those who opposed the new faith. It was only out of respect for the celebrated Feast of Unleavened Bread that Peter was not immediately executed. Thus, Herod kept him in prison until the end of the festivities. Four squads of soldiers were assigned to keep watch on him, a total of sixteen soldiers. The day was divided into four watches of six hours each; four soldiers were thus assigned every six hours to guard Peter. Two soldiers were chained to Peter and two others kept watch at the door (12:6). These details are given to demonstrate that it was impossible for Peter to escape. His release would have to be a case of divine intervention (see 5:18–25).

12:5–19. Peter Freed from Prison. After the arrest of Peter, the church responded with continual prayer that was ektenōs—"intense," "earnest," "constant," or "fervent" (v. 5). The conflict was really between Herod and God. Clearly, the outcome was divinely appointed (v. 23). On the eve of his scheduled execution, Peter was sleeping between two wide-awake guards (v. 6). In this dark place a light shone that the guards could not see. God was privately communicating with His servant, and the solders did not have access to this experience. Luke clearly emphasizes the miraculous nature of the deliverance of Peter by walking the readers through each part of the miracle (vv. 7–10).

Once outside, Peter went to the house of Mary, mother of John Mark (v. 12). The fact that she had her own house indicates that some believers continued to own property, and thus the earlier account that some believers sold their houses for the benefit of the community must have been a voluntary act. Peter knocked at the small door within the larger portal that allowed entry into the courtyard. The church had been praying for Peter's release. The humorous story of the servant Rhoda, who forgot to open the door for Peter, shows that even believers were prone to disbelief. They were astonished when they finally opened the door for Peter (v. 16). This parallels the reaction of the apostles after the women told them that Jesus had risen from the dead. After attributing the entire development to the action of the Lord (v. 17) and requesting that James, the Lord's brother who played a leading role in the church (15:13), be informed, Peter left without specifying where he was going. Rome was obviously not his destination because he had to remain not too far from Jerusalem to attend the first council (15:7) and to fulfill his ministry in Antioch (Gal. 2:11). The disappearance of Peter from prison was not noticed until the next day. Herod was humiliated and did to the soldiers responsible for keeping Peter in prison what he had intended to do to Peter (Acts 12:19).

12:20–24. Herod's Violent Death. Tyre and Sidon were two independent seaports supervised by Rome. These municipalities were trying to maintain a low profile and a peaceful existence with the help of Blastus, Herod's chamberlain (v. 20). Herod was angry against these two cities, probably for financial reasons. With the arrival of representatives from both cities (v. 21), he took advantage of the situation to boost his tarnished image. He arrayed himself in his royal apparel and sat on the throne to deliver an oration, a public speech that ignited the crowd (v. 21). The crowd enthusiastically flattered him and hailed him as a god (v. 22). Having achieved his objective, Herod managed to overcome the insults suffered when Peter escaped his control. Unlike Barnabas and Paul, who refused to be regarded as gods by the Gentiles (14:15), Herod was delighted. But as a Jew, he should have known that accepting such a title was a grave sin (Gen. 3:5; Is. 14:14; Luke 4:7–8). As a result, the God of heaven struck him when he was at the height of his glory. Contrary to what normally happens (Job 24:19–20), he was eaten by worms before dying (Acts 12:23). This was obviously more than a common intestinal disease. At the very least, his must have been an agonizing and horrifying death. Interestingly enough, the Jewish historian Josephus also mentions the death of Herod Agrippa I. He describes it as having come about as an intense, violent pain arising in his belly.

The obstacle for the spread of the gospel was now removed. When Herod's oration was silenced, the word of God persisted (12:24). It was like a seed of life growing even more (Luke 8:7–15; 13:19; cf. 1 Cor. 3:6–7), and through the ministry of Paul it would reach Rome itself.

12:25—15:35

PAUL'S FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY

Set apart to proclaim the gospel to the Gentiles, Paul was officially appointed and enabled to fulfill his vocation to its fullest extent. He accompanied Barnabas to Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Cilicia, where the Jews violently opposed them while the Gentiles enthusiastically welcomed them. The conversion of many non-Jews raised questions about their status in the church.

12:25—14:28

The Gospel in Asia Minor

Luke writes extensively about the spreading of the gospel in Asia Minor through the ministry of Barnabas and Paul. He describes for us their method of working, their success, and the difficulties they encountered.

12:25—13:3. Barnabas and Saul Appointed. Barnabas and Saul finished their ministry in Jerusalem by handing over the donations from the church in Antioch (11:30). When leaving Jerusalem to return to Antioch, Barnabas and Saul took with them a young man named Mark. Unlike Jerusalem, the church of Antioch had no apostles. Instead, they had five prominent leaders (13:1): (1) Barnabas, an evangelist who was full of the Spirit, who acted as a representative of the church in Jerusalem (11:22). (2) Simeon (or Simon), also called Niger ("black"). Some believe that he might have been Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21), who was converted with his two sons. (3) Lucius of Cyrene was from the same region—Cyrenaica, on the African coast, which was a Roman colony where a number of people became believers (Acts 11:20). (4) Manaen was a high-level Jewish aristocrat who was a childhood friend of Herod Antipas, known as the Tetrarch. Manaen had been faithful to God and had demonstrated that the gospel could reach the highest social classes. (5) And finally, there was Saul. Although Jesus had personally assigned him his mission and he had already preached the gospel in Damascus (9:23–25) and Jerusalem (9:28–29) at the risk of his own life, Saul was humbly placed at the end of the list of ministers in Antioch.

These leaders are identified as prophets and teachers—the two most important ministries after apostleship (1 Cor. 12:28). The teachers were to instruct believers and to work for the preservation of the unity of the church in faith and knowledge (Eph. 4:11–15). Saul was such a person (2 Tim. 1:11). Among the responsibility of these persons was leading in worship (leitourgeō, "to serve," "to minister," or "to worship;" a term used to refer to the ministry of priests in the tabernacle; Heb. 10:11). The worship of the early church included, among other things, hymns, some of which may have been preserved in the NT (e.g., Phil. 2:6–11; Col. 1:15–20; Rev. 19:6–8); prayers (Acts 2:24–31; 1 Cor. 16:22; Rev. 22:17, 20); fasting (Acts 13:2); preaching (20:20); and the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:20–26).

By order of the Spirit, Barnabas and Saul were selected to do the work for which the Holy Spirit had called them (Acts 13:2). The divine calling reached them before they were set apart for service, as determined by the Spirit. The Spirit also moved the church to recognize the call of Barnabas and Saul. The setting apart was done through the laying on of hands, a gesture signifying blessing, the recognition of a vocation, and ordination of service. It also served to establish a lasting bond of fellowship between those who remained and those who departed. Barnabas and Saul would not act independently from the church but were expected to report back (14:27). The text says that they were sent away (13:3). Who sent them? We do not know. The verbs in v. 3 do not refer to a specific subject; one must read v. 4 to find one.

13:4–12. Preaching in Cyprus. Although God uses humans to lead His church, ultimately all was done under the guidance of the Spirit. Barnabas and Saul were sent on their mission by the order of the Holy Spirit (v. 4). This was a divine assignment instigated by the Spirit, thus confirming the spiritual nature of their mission. Since Barnabas was from Cyprus (4:36), he began his mission among his own countrymen. Saul also preached the gospel first to his brethren (Rom. 1:16), before turning to the Gentiles. Such a mission approach had also been used by Jesus (John 1:11).

They evangelized the island from east (Salamis; Acts 13:5) to west (Paphos; v. 6). John Mark accompanied them (15:37), serving as their assistant (hypēretēs—"helper," "assistant," or "servant"; v. 5), probably helping them with practical matters (e.g., finding food and shelter) and in the work of evangelism. Their method consisted of visiting the many synagogues on the island to share the gospel. Other Jewish converts had already ministered on the island (Acts 11:19–20), preparing the way for the work of Barnabas and Saul.

When they reached Paphos, they met a Jewish sorcerer and false prophet named Bar-Jesus or Son of Yeshua. The term "sorcerer" could designate a wizard, a rogue miracle worker (8:9–11), or a learned savant wise man (Matt. 2:1–2). This mix of descriptions Luke provides gives us an insight about the man. As a Jew, his focus should have been the Torah. As a prophet, he should have been a teacher of salvation. As a magician, he must have been considered a wise man deserving of being heard. But he was a false prophet. He seduced the proconsul, who was an intelligent man (Acts 12:7). The rest of the story contrasts the ways of the Lord with this man's understanding of salvation. The proconsul was on a quest for truth. Hearing about Barnabas and Saul, he asked them to come because he was intensely interested in listening to the word of God (13:7). Luke loved to characterize the gospel as the logos—"word" or "message" (e.g., 2:41; 4:4, 29, 31; 6:2, 4, 7). It is a reference not only to Jesus (John 1:1) but also to the word He taught the disciples that had to be proclaimed (Acts 8:4, 25; cf. 2 Tim. 4:2). This is the creative word that gives life to those who listen to it (Phil. 2:16; cf. Gen. 1:20–23).

The magician was known by a second name: Elymas (Acts 13:8), which is also a title for the wise and erudite. He withstood Barnabas and Saul, possibly by challenging their teaching and using arguments intended to confuse the proconsul. Saul identified him as a son of the devil, rejecting the idea that he was a son of salvation, and called on the Lord to blind him. God used the miraculous immediate blinding of Elymas to convince the proconsul of the truth of Saul's teachings, and he became a believer (v. 12).

It is at this point in Acts that Saul's name is changed to Paul (meaning "the small one"; v. 9). Being both a Jew and a Roman citizen, Saul had both a Hebrew name, "Saul," as well as a Roman name, "Paul." The fact that his Roman name is similar to that of the proconsul Sergius Paulus was merely coincidental. Since he was now in a Gentile territory, he preferred to use his Roman name. From this point forward in the narrative Paul also becomes the prime speaker. Barnabas begins to fade, and they are referred to as "Paul and Barnabas" (13:43, 46, 50–51; 14:1, 6; 15:2, 22, 35; except 14:4). However, at the Council of Jerusalem, Barnabas spoke first (15:12) and was the first one mentioned in the official letter of the church (15:25). Apparently Barnabas remained at the helm in the eyes of the church of Jerusalem (11:22).

13:13–41. At Antioch in Pisidia. Paul and his companions boarded a ship to reach the port that today is called Antayla and went on to Perga (v. 13). They did not stop there but pressed on to Pisidian Antioch, the first of four cites they would visit in southern Galatia. They had to cross over the mountains of western Taurus, the passes of which can be as high as 5,000 feet (1,524 m). In that region the weather is cold and dry much of the year. Traveling on foot over unsafe roads while taking time to testify along the way and to gather the basic requirements for the journey made the trip challenging. This may have been what discouraged John Mark and prompted him to return home to Jerusalem (v. 13). Whatever the case, Paul was not pleased with the decision (15:37–40).

Paul and Barnabas attended Jewish synagogues in every town they visited. This was not only missionary strategy but also observance of the Sabbath. We know that Paul was a faithful observer of the law (23:29; 24:14; 25:8), referencing the Decalogue many times in his letters (first and second commandments, 1 Thess. 1:9; third, Rom. 2:24; fourth, Heb. 4:9; fifth, Eph. 6:2; sixth, seventh, eighth, and tenth, Rom. 13:9; ninth, 1 Cor. 15:15). It was customary in the Jewish synagogue to give passing visitors the opportunity to voice their views. Paul used this gesture of hospitality to share his faith. Although the invitation to speak was given to both Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:15), Paul was the one who spoke. Their word of exhortation based on the Law and the Prophets impressed the synagogue officials. The Greek word paraklēsis, sometimes translated "exhortation," can also be translated as "encouragement" or "consolation." Since Jesus is indeed the consolation of Israel (Luke 2:25), the opportunity was thus afforded to Paul to talk about Jesus.

It is interesting to compare the first evangelistic speech of Peter at Pentecost and the first recorded speech of Paul in a synagogue. Although different in form because of context and audience, they are identical in substance.

God-Fearers

Many Gentiles were accepted in the synagogues. Among them were proselytes, who should be distinguished from God-fearers. Proselytes (Heb. ger habberit or ger tsedeq, "proselytes of the covenant" or "proselytes of justice") were all Gentile converts to Judaism who had been circumcised and also had received the ritual cleansing and brought offerings to the temple. They observed all mosaic rules and were fully integrated into Judaism. Those who were called God-fearers (Heb. ger toshab) were pious Gentile sympathizers who observed the Sabbath and had forsaken seven practices: idolatry, blasphemy, adultery, murder, theft, eating pork, and eating meat containing blood. Many of them attended synagogue services because they were attracted to the simplicity and order of Jewish worship as well as to the high moral values they expounded. In their search they received instructions from the Holy Scriptures (cf. Acts 15:21). They had not, however, converted to Judaism, and the men remained uncircumcised. This group proved to be more open to the gospel. At first most of Paul's converts appear to have been from this kind of Gentile.

This table shows that Paul followed very closely the same basic theological argument that Peter did. They both offered the same message of salvation in essentially the same form of argument. Later, Peter came to Paul's defense at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:7–11). Paul's sermon can be outlined as follows: (1) Historical arguments (13:17–25); (2) Jesus the Savior (13:26–32a), (3) biblical arguments (13:32b–41).

1. Historical Arguments (13:17–25). Paul addressed his fellow Jews and those who feared God. Many God-fearers and proselytes were searching for answers to their own existential questions.

Paul, like Stephen (Acts 7:2–47), began his sermon with a historical overview. The purpose was not so much to attract the attention of his audience but to unpack lessons from a narrative that would have been meaningful to his audience. The subject of the story was God and His actions. The last statement before introducing Jesus referred to God's plans being accomplished by David (v. 22). Paul highlighted twelve actions by which God demonstrated his care and saving concern for His people: God (1) chose the Patriarchs (v. 17), (2) prospered and exalted the people while in Egypt (v. 17), (3) guided them out from there (v. 17), (4) was patient with them in the desert (v. 18), and (5) destroyed and overthrew seven nations in Canaan (v. 19). He (6) gave Canaan to His people as an inheritance, distributing the land among them (v. 19), (7) gave them judges (v. 20), and later (8) gave them King Saul (v. 21). After (9) God removed Saul, (10) He raised up David and made him their king, (11) about whom He testified that (12) He had found David. So Jesus did not come to move God to love His people, but rather He is the culmination of a divine project of love manifested throughout the history of Israel. Paul said God had acted again in Jesus Christ: He had kept His promise and had given Israel Jesus the Savior (13:23).

Paul stressed the Davidic descent of Jesus, an argument on behalf of His messianic identity. While Saul was requested by the people, David was not. He was appointed, raised up by God to be king of Israel (13:21–22). Jesus was a descendant of David (v. 23). Not only was Jesus of royal lineage, but He was also appointed and raised up by God to be King (Col. 1:15, 19) and, like David, to do God's will (cf. Heb. 10:9). In support of his interpretation, Paul mentioned John the Baptist, whose reputation was known beyond the borders of the Holy Land. John the Baptist had announced the coming of the Messiah and preached repentance in preparation for His coming (cf. Matt. 3:2; see also 2 Pet. 3:9, 11, 14).

2. Jesus the Savior (13:26–32a). In this section of the sermon, Paul announced to his audience of both Jews and Gentiles the word or message of salvation (v. 26), the joyful good news (v. 32). He described the saving death and resurrection of Jesus (vv. 26–32). First, he argued that the dwellers of Jerusalem, and particularly the leaders, were ignorant of the messianic prophecies of the OT and, in putting Jesus to death, they fulfilled the prophecies (v. 27). Second, he limited his charge of ignorance to the Jews in Jerusalem and not to all Jews. In other words, only the Jews in Jerusalem, particularly their leaders, killed Jesus. Third, they did not have a legal basis to put Him to death and consequently they executed an innocent person; Jesus was not a criminal. Fourth, the Jews took Him from the cross and buried Him. Paul was not making any distinction between the evil plots of the Jewish leaders and the concern of some of Jesus's followers to give Him a proper burial (v. 29). Fifth, God was also active in the drama of Jesus and vindicated Him by resurrecting Him from the dead. Sixth, Paul argued that this really happened because the resurrected Jesus ōphthē—"was seen" or "appeared" (cf. Luke 24:34)—for many days by His disciples, and they had publically testified about it (Acts 13:30–31). Faith is to be based not only on the fact that humans were able to see the resurrected Jesus but also on the fact that Jesus made Himself visible, or revealed Himself, to them.

3. Biblical Arguments (13:32b–41). At the end of his speech, Paul targeted the Jews more specifically in referring to himself and his contemporaries as the children of the ancient ancestors to whom the promises were made (vv. 32b–33). For Paul, the resurrection of Jesus was the moment when Jesus was made King (Rom. 1:4; cf. Heb. 1:5; 5:5). The quotation from Psalm 2:7 is interpreted in the light of the resurrection of Jesus, when He was declared to be the Son of God. Paul also stated that after the resurrection Jesus was glorified. He did not experience corruption in the tomb and would never experience it because He has been exalted (Acts 13:34). The quote from Isaiah 55:3 reaffirmed that Jesus had inherited the kingdom of David. He was indeed the messianic King.

In concluding, Paul brought his message home to his audience. Forgiveness of sins is possible only through this man, Jesus (cf. Heb. 2:14–18). It is also through faith in the resurrected Lord that anyone is justified before God (Acts 13:38–39). Compliance with the law cannot justify us in the eyes of God (Gal. 3:10). Saving grace is available only through Jesus the Christ. Paul's last warning (Acts 13:40) was based on Habakkuk 1:5. God announced through the prophet a message that seemed unbelievable to those who did not have faith. The implication was that now God had done something even more inconceivable through the death and resurrection of Jesus, and only those trusting Him would benefit from this saving act.

13:42–52. Blessing and Conflict at Pisidian Antioch. The initial reaction to Paul's message seems to have been positive. There is a manuscript difference in v. 42. Some manuscripts indicate that as the Jews left the synagogue, the Gentiles begged the apostles to preach to them the next Sabbath, whereas other manuscripts indicate that as Paul and Barnabas left the synagogue, the people in general made this request, not differentiating between Jews and Gentiles. The best textual evidence supports identifying Paul and Barnabas as the referent of "they went out." The noun "Jews," found in some translations, is not in the Greek text. Based on the best Greek manuscripts, we can read v. 42 as follows: "As they [Paul and Barnabas] were going out, they [the leaders of the synagogue—the Greek text does not mention the Gentiles; cf. v. 15] begged that. . . ." The Gentiles did not have the authority to invite speakers to the synagogue. Eventually many Jewish people, converts to Judaism, as well as Gentiles believed the apostles' message (v. 43). The initial response in Pisidian Antioch was positive. Many accepted Jesus as their Savior, and Paul and Barnabas encouraged them to prosmenein—"to remain attached to," "continue in," or "remain faithful to"—the grace of God (v. 43).

The situation changed the following Sabbath, as the preaching of the apostles upset almost everyone in the city. A large number of the Jews became upset and envious of the success of Paul and Barnabas. They began to contradict and blasphēmeō in opposition to Paul's arguments (v. 45). This verb sometimes translated "blaspheme" can be understood two ways: they were either insulting Paul or blaspheming Jesus Christ. Paul and Barnabas were not intimidated. It is interesting to note that the apostolic preaching based in the OT and the message of salvation through Christ is considered to be the word of God (v. 46)—that is to say, it was authoritative (cf. 1 Thess. 2:13). The two preachers, instead of accusing their opponents, drew some conclusions from their attitudes (Acts 13:46). The gospel was to be proclaimed first to the Jews, but their rejection of it resulted in the fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah 49:6: the faith of Israel would be universalized and would reach the Gentile world.

It would be incorrect to conclude that Paul and Barnabas would never again preach to the Jews. Paul continued to testify in the synagogues of Thessalonica (Acts 17:1), Berea (17:10), Athens (17:17), Corinth (18:4), and Ephesus (18:19; cf. 19:10), and many Jews accepted Jesus as the Christ. Later, even from his prison in Rome, Paul gathered the Jewish leaders of the city to announce to them the kingdom of God (28:17, 23).

The Gentiles were glad to hear the words of the apostles and glorified or honored the word of the Lord (v. 48). To glorify or honor the word of the Lord means to acknowledge its incalculable value and grant to it the importance it deserves in our lives. Salvation was also accessible to the Gentiles. The conversion of Gentiles was such a wonderful experience that Luke attributes it entirely to God. They had been appointed to eternal life (v. 48). This is about the miracle of conversion for which we cannot take any credit. We are to acknowledge that God loved us and planned for our salvation before the foundation of the world (Rom. 8:29–30; Eph. 1:4–6). Verse 48 is not teaching that God predestined some to salvation and others to damnation. This is about those who are saved and indicates that others will be lost because they decided not to honor the word of the Lord (see "Predestination, p. 1583).

The Jewish leaders were not happy that the word of God was spreading throughout the region (Acts 13:49), so they used the influential women of the city and the leading authorities to expel Paul and Barnabas from the region (v. 50). By shaking the dust from their feet, they indicated that they had fulfilled their responsibility (v. 51; cf. Mark 6:11). The disciples who remained in the region were filled with the joy of salvation and of the Holy Spirit (13:52), and Paul later returned to these regions to encourage the new disciples (14:22).

14:1–7. At Iconium. Instead of continuing their journey north, Paul and Barnabas branched off southeast, toward Derbe. They focused their efforts of evangelization primarily on cities that had larger concentrations of people and synagogues where they could meet. At Iconium they were exceptionally successful, and a great multitude of Jews and Greeks became believers (v. 1). However, some unbelieving Jews stirred the Gentile population against the new converts (v. 2). Luke uses the Greek term apeitheō, referring to the disobedient. Faith or its lack expresses itself in obedience or disobedience (Rom. 1:5; Heb. 3:18–19; 1 Pet. 2:7–9). In spite of opposition, Paul and Barnabas continued preaching and encouraging the new believers, instructing them in the practical aspects of the Christian faith. According to Luke, evangelism was accompanied by the testimony of Jesus through signs and wonders and in many other ways (Acts 14:3).

The opponents sowed discord among the population. The city was divided between the Jews and the apostles (v. 4). Luke uses the term "apostle" (only Acts 14:4 and 14) in the sense of being sent and not as a title he reserved for the Twelve (1:2, 6; 15:2; 16:4). The intention of all of the Jewish and Gentile opposition was to stone Paul and Barnabas, though this was a Jewish punishment never practiced among Greeks or Romans. Becoming aware of the plot against them, the two decided to leave but would return later (see 14:21–22).

14:8–20. Idolatry at Lystra. Paul and Barnabas were now in unchartered territory. The fact that they preached the gospel directly to the people in the open suggests that Lystra may not have had a synagogue. Sitting in the crowd was a paralytic who was deeply impressed by Paul's words of grace (v. 9). Luke provides three characteristics of this man: he was sitting, he was lame, and he had never walked (v. 8). Like Peter by the gate called Beautiful (3:2–4), Paul stared at the man (14:9), saw his faith, and with a loud voice ordered him to get up (v. 10). The man jumped to his feet and began to walk (see also 3:8). Although Paul had also performed other miracles (14:3), Luke reported this particular one likely because of its similarity to Peter's healing of the lame man in Jerusalem. It shows that God bestows His graces equally on Gentiles and Jews. In a sense this man represents all the Gentiles of the world. They lack hope because they are without God (Eph. 2:12), but some of them are willing to listen to the word of salvation.

In a dialect that the evangelists did not understand (Lycaonian), the crowd shouted that these two men were gods (Acts 14:11). Barnabas was likened to Zeus, the Greek name for the Roman god Jupiter, the father of all the gods of mythology. This may well be because Barnabas was advanced in years and looked dignified. Paul was likened to Hermes, the Greek name for the Roman god Mercury, the deity of eloquence believed to be the messenger of the gods. The notion that the gods could visit humans was common among pagans. The priests of Zeus, whose temple was outside of the town, prepared oxen and garlands to offer sacrifices. When Paul and Barnabas learned about the people's intentions, they tore their clothes in mourning and rushed toward the crowd to stop them.

The brief sermon that followed gives us an insight into Paul's message to the Gentiles. Instead of using the history of Israel or biblical references, this time he began with common beliefs shared by his listeners (cf. 1 Cor. 9:19–23). He compared the living God with their inanimate idols that were unable to move without being transported (cf. Is. 44:13–19). The very materials used to make these pagan images were the product of God's creation (Acts 14:15). The language of this verse is reminiscent of the Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20:11). Paul told them that the span of time that preceded the coming of Jesus was a time of divine forbearance (Acts 14:16; cf. Rom. 3:25; 9:22). It was not a period of silence, for God was still speaking to them through nature, lovingly bestowing on them all kinds of blessings (Acts 14:17; cf. Matt. 5:45). The reference to rain and seasons is particularly eloquent, considering that in this arid region of scarce rainfalls one must dig deep wells to have water.

Meanwhile, unbelieving Jews arrived from Pisidian Antioch and Iconium, and taking advantage of the crowd's disappointment, persuaded the multitude to stone Paul (Acts 14:19); Barnabas was spared, likely because he was not the one speaking before the crowds. The way the scene is described suggests a spontaneous act of mob violence—Paul was stoned within the city limits. Believing he was dead, they dragged Paul's badly beaten body out of the city. Removing Paul's body away from the scene of the crime may have been an attempt by his persecutors to avoid having any charges made against them (cf. Acts 19:40). Paul kept a painful memory of this occurrence (2 Cor. 11:25; 2 Tim. 3:11). This incident, however, did not discouraged the disciples, who gathered around Paul (Acts 14:20). Were they trying to protect him from further abuse, paying him their last respects, or tending to his wounds? The text does not say. Whatever the case, God worked a miracle. Paul stood up, gathered his energy, and returned to the city. Due to the difficult situation there, Paul and Barnabas left the next day for Derbe, where they planned to continue to proclaim the gospel of salvation through Christ. This trip even under the best of circumstances would have taken several days.

14:21–28. Strengthening the Converts. Paul and Barnabas arrived at Derbe, and there they made many disciples. After this successful mission they decided to return to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, where they had encountered so many challenges. By their living example they were able to strengthen and encourage the disciples and urged them to remain firm in the faith (v. 22).

The new communities they had established needed to be organized. Elders were appointed in every church (v. 23). The verb cheirotoneō ("to appoint") literally means "to stretch out the hand to." However, the structure of the sentence gives the impression that Paul and Barnabas appointed the elders (cf. Titus 1:5). Whatever mode of selection may have been used, it was under the initiative of Paul that elders were chosen to administer the affairs of the church according to a model similar to that of the Jewish communities (cf. Num. 11:16). These locally elected elders were responsible for local work and not the work of the disciples (Acts 14:23). Through prayer and fasting the new leaders were commended or entrusted to the protection of the Lord. There is no indication that the laying on of hands was part of the ceremony at this early stage of the history of the church.

Instead of choosing the shortest route through Tarsus, the apostles preferred to take a rather wide detour through Pisidia and Pamphylia before boarding a boat that would take them to Antioch in Syria, where their headquarters was located. Although they experienced many difficulties along the way, their trip was a success. They made many disciples and organized at least seven churches (Salamis, Paphos, Perga, Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe). By the grace of God, they completed their mission (14:26). On returning to Antioch in Syria, Paul and Barnabas reported their activities directly to the whole church (v. 27). The report was not about what they had accomplished but about what God had accomplished through them and how He opened the door (an expression Paul liked; cf. 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12; Col. 4:3) of faith to the Gentiles. The report clarifies that God was the primary force in the mission of the church.

15:1–35

The Council of Jerusalem and the Gentiles

The joy Paul and Barnabas's report brought was quickly dampened by the attitude of some Jewish Christians who insisted that all male Gentile converts had to be circumcised in order to become genuine Christians. The church in Syrian Antioch brought the matter before the church in Jerusalem. In order to reach a decision, the elders and the apostles heard the views and opinions of different factions, such as the Jewish Christians and Paul and Barnabas. Rather than quickly proceeding to a vote that might have divided the community, James suggested an arrangement that would be acceptable to both Jews and Gentiles.

15:1–5. Conflict over Circumcision. A long time had already elapsed since the missionaries had returned from their journey (14:28). At first, information regarding the conversion of Gentiles was heard by the church in Antioch without any opposition. But apparently some individuals from Judea, without any official mandate (15:24), began to create a disturbance. These were probably the same Judean Christians Paul identifies in Galatians 2:12 as having come "from James" (see Galatians: Introduction). As sometimes happens, instead of spreading the gospel to the world, they chose to focus their actions on the believing community by sharing with the believers, those who were converted Gentiles, their own personal views. In their opinion, believing in Jesus and receiving His grace was not enough to be saved. They were persuaded that the new male converts should be circumcised according to the Mosaic custom. These Judeans reasonably believed that salvation was for the people of Israel and that in order for converted male Gentiles to be saved they had to be circumcised and become Jews.

The topic was very divisive. There was significant stasis—"disagreement," "dispute," "dissension," "uproar" (cf. Acts 19:40; 23:27). Assuming that Galatians was written shortly before the Jerusalem Council (see Galatians: Introduction), the trouble caused by these Judean Christians had influenced Peter, who was visiting in Antioch at the time, along with Barnabas and other local Jewish believers to avoid eating with the uncircumcised Gentile converts (Gal. 2:11–13). Recognizing the hypocrisy of such behavior—and fearing it might destroy the unity of the church—Paul publically confronted the situation (Gal. 2:14–21). In an attempt to resolve the problem, the church of Antioch sent their own delegation with Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem to discuss the matter with the leaders. The journey was made on foot, allowing them time to speak to the churches along the way about the conversion of Gentiles. The result was rejoicing among believers, particularly in the churches in Phoenicia and Samaria, where the Gentile population was dominant.

On arriving in Jerusalem, the delegation from Antioch was welcomed by the three groups involved in the council (Acts 15:4): the church (the followers of Jesus in Jerusalem, mostly Jewish believers); the apostles (the surviving members of the Twelve who were present in Jerusalem); and the elders (the leaders of the Jerusalem church, including James, the brother of Jesus). After they were welcomed, Paul and Barnabas recounted what God had done through them among the Gentiles but did not say anything about circumcision (Acts 15:4).

Circumcision

The question of circumcision arose justifiably. The practice had been commanded to Abraham (Acts 7:8) as a symbol of his acceptance of God's covenant (Gen. 17:10–11). As such, it was meant to be the visible, personal sign of the inner faith that was to characterize the covenant relationship between God and Abraham (and to continue with his descendants). When Israel was later formally organized as a nation at Mount Sinai, God incorporated circumcision into the Mosaic law (Lev. 12:3). It was considered not only a sign linked to the covenant but also a sign of belonging to God's people Israel. Accordingly, foreigners who wanted to participate in the Passover, Israel's celebration of their deliverance from Egyptian slavery, had to first be circumcised and become Israelites (Ex. 12:48).

Unfortunately, over time they largely lost sight of the symbolic meaning of circumcision—the experience Scripture calls the circumcision of the heart (Deut. 10:16; 30:6; Jer. 4:4). And without the inner experience of the heart, the physical act of circumcision had no spiritual significance (Jer. 9:25). It became nothing more than an outward mark of national identity. By insisting that male Gentile converts could not become genuine Christians until they were first circumcised, Jewish believers were inadvertently teaching that outward human behavior was what really mattered most—the very opposite of the original meaning of circumcision. Guided by the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 1:8–9), the church recognized that this was nothing short of legalism. Gentiles did not need to become Jewish to become Christian—what mattered most was the condition of the heart (Matt. 15:11).

Some of the Jewish believers, however, were not pleased with the report that was given. It is important to remember that a number of Jewish believers, including former religious leaders, had received Jesus as their Lord and Savior and joined the church (6:7). Among them were Pharisees who continued to be concerned with purity and loyalty to tradition. It was this group of Pharisaic Jewish Christians who spearheaded the opposition to Paul. They rose up in protest, insisting that if the Gentile converts wanted to be recognized as genuine Christians, they had to be circumcised and to keep the law of Moses (15:5). In his letter to the Galatians, Paul refers to these troublemakers as false brothers and sisters (Gal. 2:4).

15:6–21. The Council of Jerusalem. The apostles did not take on themselves the authority to make unilateral decisions. They met with the elders to discuss issues (v. 6). The questions raised in this case were important ones: How are Gentiles saved? What is the content of the gospel that should be preached to them? Peter opened the debate not with a reference to his apostolic authority but as a witness of the Lord. His speech was obviously very important because James quoted from its contents to close debate (15:14).

For Peter the conversion of Cornelius was not to be considered an exceptional case. Indeed, it was to be a model of the basic knowledge God wants all Gentiles to receive. The outline of his speech was very telling. Peter began by qualifying his intervention. He was siding with Paul and Barnabas because like them (chaps. 9 and 13), he was called by God to take the gospel to the Gentiles. In a tense atmosphere (15:7), Peter built his arguments in a chiastic order:

- A God gave the Holy Spirit to the Gentiles as He did to us all (v. 8).
  - B God cleansed their hearts (v. 9).
    - C One should never oppose God (v. 10a).
  - B′ Ritual cleansing characterized as an unbearable yoke (v. 10b).
- A′ Grace is offered to the Gentiles as God offers it to us (v. 11).

It should also be noted that as far as Peter was concerned, the mission was not to be under the total control of humans; it was God's mission. God is the One who decided (v. 7), who knows, who gives (v. 8), and who makes no distinctions between persons and purifies the hearts of believers (v. 9). Thus, it would be a mistake for the church to test God (v. 10) by failing to accept His clearly expressed will. There is only one approach to salvation: the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ (v. 11). The cleansing needed is that of the heart (v. 9), and it is not the result of submission to laws related to ritual impurity (v. 10). God makes no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, and He showed this by bestowing His Spirit and salvation on all people (vv. 8–9, 11; cf. Gal. 3:25–29).

Peter's speech was so persuasive that the debaters were silenced (Acts 15:12), making it possible for Barnabas and Paul to testify. They reported not on what they accomplished but on what God accomplished through them, thus falling in line with Peter's approach. What they reported confirmed what Peter had said. The meeting could have ended right then and there with a letter confirming the declarations of Peter. But James chose to introduce guidelines that would facilitate relationships between Jewish Christians and Gentiles.

James, a brother of Jesus (Matt. 13:55) and probably the highest-ranking member of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; 21:18), closed the debate. He was known as a conservative (Gal. 2:12), which provided greater credence to his support (Gal. 2:9). He took advantage of the fact that Barnabas's and Paul's reports did not raise new disputes to be addressed in the meeting (Acts 15:13–15). James began by commenting on Peter's speech and casting new light on its content. He clearly understood that God had epeskepsato—"visited" or "intervened on behalf of" the Gentiles in order to have a people for His name from among them (v. 14). As far as the Jews were concerned, the people of Israel were God's only people. Therefore, there were only two possibilities: either the converted Gentiles were to be a people apart from the Jews or they were to be fully integrated into the people of God. James chose the latter.

James not only provided rational arguments but he also relied on the words of the prophets (v. 15). The texts of the Minor Prophets were written on a single scroll, which may explain the plural reference to the prophets in the speech by James. The Hebrew text of Amos 9:11–12 predicts Israel's enemies (represented here by Edom) being possessed by Israel, and reference is made to the remnant from Edom and from the nations called by God's name (cf. Acts 15:14, 17). Then the coming of the Messiah was announced: He would be the One who fulfilled the promises of the covenant made with David (2 Sam. 7:11–16). James's quotation from the Greek version of the OT (the Septuagint) amplifies the Hebrew text, reinforcing this comprehensive promise concerning a faithful remnant coming out of the Gentiles and becoming part of God's people (cf. Acts 15:14).

In considering what other issues might hinder the fellowship of Jewish and Gentile believers, James formulated a decision (krinō—"I judge" or "I have decided") involving four guidelines. This decision is mentioned three times in Acts (15:20, 29; 21:25). Drawing on the laws in Leviticus 17 and 18 that addressed the behavior of foreigners living among Israel, the ruling applies to Gentiles turning to God by accepting the new way of life established by God Himself.

The first guideline deals with all forms of corruption related to idols (Acts 15:20) and anything sacrificed to idols (v. 29; 21:25; cf. Lev. 17:3–9). New converts, of course, would not be expected to abandon family ties, friendships, or relationships with neighbors and other residents. The challenge was, however, that those ties often involved invitations to share meals prepared and served in pagan temples. Jews, however, did not participate in such meals because in their eyes doing so would violate the second commandment (Ex. 20:4–6; Deut. 5:8–10; cf. Rom. 2:22). To preserve the unity and fellowship of the church in a mixed community, James desired that the new Gentile converts be sensitive to the concerns of the Jewish believers and avoid participating in any behavior that might be associated with pagan idolatry. The threat this sort of issue posed to the fellowship of the church can be seen in the sharp divisions that arose among believers in Corinth more than a decade later over whether it was appropriate to eat food offered to idols (1 Cor. 8:1—11:1).

The second guideline prohibits sexual immorality. The Greek word porneia is broad enough to include all illicit sexual relations (1 Cor. 5:1) mentioned in Leviticus 18 and 20:10–21. Jesus also mentioned the sixth commandment (Matt. 5:27–32; 19:18) on moicheia (adultery; Ex. 20:14; Deut. 5:18). The Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. 13:4) calls for the respect of marriage and prohibits porneia and moicheia.

The third guideline involves things "strangled," "smothered," or "choked." It is difficult to interpret this prohibition because it is virtually impossible to choke or strangle a sheep, let alone an ox. Some commentators have suggested that it refers to the rare cases of animals killed while hunting (Lev. 17:13–14) or accidentally (Lev. 17:15; Deut. 14:21). More generally, it is believed that this unusual statement refers to eating meat from animals whose blood was deliberately prevented from draining out properly at the throat during slaughtering. Such a practice, if not avoided, again would have prevented Gentile and Jewish believers from enjoying table fellowship together.

The fourth guideline is a prohibition against the consumption of blood, which was a law from the time of Noah (Gen. 9:4). It is also in Leviticus (Lev. 7:27; 17:10–14) and is related to respect for life (Gen. 9:5–6). Greek orgiastic cults involved the consumption of newly slaughtered animals' warm blood.

James concluded with a reference to the instruction given in the synagogues during the Sabbath (Acts 15:21). New Gentile converts could learn much by attending them (see below, "The Council of Jerusalem and the Decalogue").

The Council of Jerusalem and the Decalogue

The Decalogue is not explicitly mentioned in Acts 15 as a requirement for Gentile converts. But this does not mean that the council rejected it as a norm for the Christian life. There is enough in the apostolic decree to indicate the opposite. We should keep in mind the context of the passage and the significance of the content of the decree.

1. Understanding the Problem. The problem faced by the church is clearly expressed at the beginning of Acts 15. Some Christian Jews were telling Gentile converts that unless they underwent circumcision according to the instruction given to Moses, they were precluded from salvation (v. 1). Circumcision was the ritual of entrance into the Israelite faith (Ex. 12:48–49). It would appear, then, that the idea of circumcision being necessary for salvation reveals more than just a legalistic mentality. It assumes the biblical truth of salvation coming through the Jews (cf. Rom. 9:4–5) and that in order to experience salvation one needs to become part of God's people, the Jews. But the argument was that a Gentile needed first to become a Jew in order to benefit from the salvation that Christ brought to all. Paul was strictly opposed to this idea.

But the text says a little more. Some Jewish believers expected Gentiles to be circumcised and to obey the law of Moses (Acts 15:5). It could be that, according to them, Gentiles would have been keeping the law of Moses by being circumcised, but they seem to have had something else in mind. Peter suggested that the problem the council was facing included the laws of ritual uncleanliness. Speaking of the Gentiles, he said that God made no distinction between them and the Jewish believers, for in both cases God purified their hearts by faith (15:9). In other words, God did for Jews and Gentiles what the ritual laws could not do: He purified their hearts (cf. Acts 10:15; 11:9). Therefore, Gentiles did not need to follow the laws of ritual impurity.

2. Understanding the Decree. The decree established that circumcision was not to be required from Gentiles converts in order for them to become Christians, meaning that they did not need to become Jews in order to be saved. The truth of the statement made by Peter was assumed by all: all believers, both Jew and Gentile, are saved through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ (15:11). Salvation reaches both groups the same way: through Jesus.

The decree itself is based on Leviticus 17–18 establishing four expected aspects of abstinence for the Gentile Christians (Acts 15:29). First, they were to abstain from things polluted by idols (Lev. 17:3–9); second, from sexual immorality (Lev. 18:1–30); third, from what had been strangled (Lev. 17:15–16); and fourth, from blood (Lev. 17:10–14). We are dealing here with three closely related aspects of the Christian life. The first one is basically a statement against idolatry and is a reaffirmation of the first commandment of the Decalogue. This suggests that the Ten Commandments were not being set aside. The second one is about moral purity and is based on the seventh commandment, but it includes all kinds of sexual immorality. The last two are related to the health laws found in the OT (Lev. 11). They forbid the consumption of blood by drinking it or by eating the flesh of animals whose blood was not drained out. These stipulations reaffirmed the validity of the health laws found in the Bible by assuming that the flesh of the animals mentioned here is that of clean animals. The decree was promoting the spiritual, moral, and physical well-being of Gentiles believers, making it easier for them to relate to Jewish Christians.

3. Understanding the Law. Based on our previous comments, it could be stated that the decree not only assumed the validity of the moral law of God but also reaffirmed its value in the life of Gentiles Christians. This is not new in Acts. According to Acts, many Gentiles attended the synagogue during the Sabbath and kept the law, but they had not formally become Jews (e.g., the God-fearers; Acts 17:4, 17). When many of them became Christians, they were already keeping the Sabbath. It may be that Acts 15:21 is pointing to the practice of Christians, both Jews and Gentiles, of every Sabbath attending the synagogue where they were instructed about the moral and religious aspects of the law of God. Circumcision, as part of the ritual law, was not imposed on Gentiles.

15:22–29. The Jerusalem Decree. The church not only welcomed the messengers (15:4) but also actively participated in the decision-making process (v. 22). It supported the conclusions of the apostles and elders. Subsequently, representatives of the Jerusalem church were appointed to accompany Paul and Barnabas back to Antioch to report the decision reached. We know nothing about the identity of Judas, though he must have been a prominent person since he is mentioned first. Silas would become Paul's traveling companion (15:40; 17:4); Silvanus (2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thess. 1:1; 1 Pet. 5:12) is the Latin form of his Aramaic name. Both men were prophets (Acts 15:32). They were made responsible for bringing the letter and commenting on its contents (v. 27). The letter was addressed to several churches confronting the issue of circumcision: Syrian Antioch and those of the regions of Syria and Cilicia, the area where Paul was born

(v. 23). The church poured out a great deal of affection and esteem on Barnabas and Paul (vv. 25–26), thus corroborating their teachings and ministry. The council not only quoted Scripture but also interpreted its teachings under the guidance of the Spirit (v. 28)—a Spirit of grace and mercy. Though necessary, the instructions provided by the Council of Jerusalem were not considered conditions for salvation. Grace had not been replaced by a set of laws. These guidelines were to indicate how to do well in the Christian life (v. 29).

15:30–35. Continuing Ministry in Syria. On returning to Antioch in Syria, the envoys gave a report to the whole church. The exposition of the instructions found in the letter was received with joy because of its positive content (v. 31). Now Gentiles were recognized as genuine members of God's people without having to be subjected to circumcision or other rules and rituals. Judas and Silas felt the need to stay a little longer to encourage the believers and to nurture the unity achieved by the decision of the Council of Jerusalem. Some manuscripts include the further comment that Silas eventually chose to remain in Antioch rather than to return to Jerusalem (v. 34), while others do not have this information. Accordingly, some translations omit v. 34, as supported by the best textual evidence, while others mention it in a footnote or include it in the passage. The spirit of brotherhood and cordiality shown by the Jerusalem church revived the spirit of evangelism in which Paul and Barnabas participated along with many others. But once again, we see how divisions in the church can impede the fulfillment of God's mission.

THE SECOND MISSIONARY JOURNEY

Paul and Barnabas chose to separate from each other. With Silas as a new traveling companion, Paul headed north through Tarsus, revisiting the communities organized in southern Galatia during his earlier trip. After Timothy joined them in Lystra, they traveled to Troas before crossing the Aegean Sea into Macedonia and founding churches in Philippi and Thessalonica. Due to opposition, they eventually journeyed to Athens and Corinth. Paul remained one and a half years in Corinth. Eager to return to Syria, Paul set sail for Ephesus, where he remained three months, before finally reaching Antioch via Caesarea. During this journey of about three years (A.D. 49–52), Paul traveled roughly 2,800 miles (4,506 km) and wrote at least two letters: 1 and 2 Thessalonians.

15:36—16:40

From Asia Minor to Macedonia

An emotional disagreement concerning Mark resulted in Paul and Barnabas going their separate ways. Barnabas and Mark returned to Cyprus, while Paul and Silas traveled to the new churches established in southern Galatia before finally crossing over to Macedonia. While the Lord blessed his efforts in Thessalonica, Paul also suffered much because of the misconduct of a young girl.

15:36–41. Division over John Mark. Paul cared a great deal for the churches left behind in Pamphylia and southern Galatia. He was anxious to reconnect with his converts (Gal. 4:20; Phil. 1:8). After some time in Antioch (Acts 15:39), he suggested to Barnabas that they revisit the churches to evaluate how they were doing. Desiring to give his cousin John Mark (Col. 4:10) another chance, Barnabas was intent on taking him along again. Paul, however, did not agree. He did not want an unstable young man who had previously abandoned them (Acts 13:13) to go along. The disagreement between the two men became so sharp that they chose to go their separate ways. At some later time, however, Paul reconciled with both Barnabas and Mark—practicing in his own life the gospel message of forgiveness and reconciliation (cf. 1 Cor. 9:6; 2 Cor. 5:16–20; Col. 4:10)—and considered Mark a valuable collaborator (2 Tim. 4:11; Philem. 24). Barnabas returned to Cyprus, his island of origin, and Paul went back to the province of Cilicia, where Tarsus, his hometown, was located (Acts 21:39). Paul took with him Silas, who, being from Jerusalem, would prove to be of greater support in future disputes over the question of circumcision.

16:1–5. Timothy Joins Paul and Silas. Traveling once again, on foot rather than by boat, Paul and Silas went through Tarsus before reaching Derbe and Lystra, the city where he had been stoned three or four years earlier. Paul's courage in returning to Lystra was rewarded, for during his time there he became highly impressed with a young man named Timothy. Along with his grandmother and mother, Timothy had likely been baptized in connection to Paul's earlier visit to the city. Although his father was a Greek, Timothy was considered to be a Jew because his mother was Jewish. Apparently due to his father's opposition, Timothy was not circumcised as an infant. His mother Eunice and grandmother Lois (2 Tim. 1:5), however, made sure he was instructed in the knowledge of the Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:15). After his baptism, Timothy earned a positive reputation among the believers for his ministry in Lystra and Iconium. Recognizing much promise in the young man, Paul invited him to join his missionary team (Acts 16:3). Timothy accepted the invitation. It is perhaps at this time that Paul and the local church leaders publically recognized the Holy Spirit's calling of Timothy to the gospel ministry by laying their hands on him (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). Under Paul's guidance, Timothy became not only a "minister of God" (1 Thess. 3:2) and a valued coworker (Rom. 16:21; Phil. 1:1) but also Paul's most beloved colleague and spiritual son (1 Cor. 4:17; Phil. 2:19–20; 1 Tim. 1:2).

Since Timothy was considered to be Jewish, his lack of circumcision posed a problem to his witness to his fellow Jews. To facilitate his own testimony among Jews and that of Timothy, Paul circumcised him (Acts 16:3). Though Paul was against the idea that circumcision was necessary, he wanted to be a servant to all and to win as many people as possible (1 Cor. 9:19–23). To remove all confusion regarding circumcision, Luke mentioned that Paul and Silas made it widely known in the various cities that the Jerusalem decree no longer required circumcision for converted Gentiles, a recommendation that could have astounded the Jewish converts. Thus, with all ambiguity resolved and obstacles removed, the church continued to grow spiritually and numerically, as it did in Antioch of Syria.

16:6–10. The Macedonian Call. Paul probably intended to continue his journey toward Ephesus, but the Holy Spirit was in control of the mission of the church and did not allow it. Perhaps this was a time during which Paul was afflicted by a painful eye disease (Gal. 4:13–14) or a chronic condition he never overcame (2 Cor. 12:7–8). This may explain why at this time Luke, a physician, joined the team to provide the needed support (notice the use of "we" and "us" in Acts 16:10). It appears that Luke was converted before Paul arrived in Troas because he had already been involved in the preaching of the gospel in that city (v. 10).

Prevented from going east into the province of Asia Minor or north to Bithynia and the Black Sea, Paul traveled northwest to the city of Troas. While he was there, Paul received a vision in which he saw a man calling (parakaleō—"to urge," "to beg," or "to request") him to come to Macedonia (v. 9). This call to Macedonia was significant in relation not only to the expansion of Paul's ministry into Europe but also to the expansion of Christian missions around the world. Through the centuries, this story has led many believers to leave the comforts of home and to face, as did Paul, the dangers of proclaiming the gospel in remote mission fields.

16:11–15. Lydia Baptized at Philippi. Responding to the vision, the missionaries boarded a vessel bound to reach Macedonia as quickly as possible. They probably concluded that the favorable winds were a sign of God's providence. In two and a half days they covered a distance that later on, when traveling in the opposite direction, would take five days (20:6). They disembarked in a seaport roughly ten miles (16 km) from Philippi, which they would have had to travel on foot. Philippi was a Roman colony with 5,000 to 10,000 inhabitants (16:12). The call from the Macedonian might have suggested that they were called to Philippi, thus the team remained a few days in the city (v. 12). However, it was not a man but a woman who ended up welcoming them.

On the Sabbath they left the city in search of a place where they could pray (v. 13). Although the Greek term proseuchē ("place of prayer") can refer to a synagogue building, it is unlikely that Luke refers to that. If he had, one would expect him to have simply called it a synagogue (synagōgē), since that is what he does elsewhere in Acts (cf. 6:9; 9:2; 17:1, 10, 19). The fact it is not called a synagogue suggests there was not a significant Jewish presence in Philippi to establish one—not a surprising fact, since Philippi was populated with retired Roman soldiers. When a synagogue was not available, Jews often were known to gather together for prayer and worship outside the walls of a city near a riverbank. Access to water made it easy for Jews to carry out ceremonial washings (cf. Lev. 18:19). This appears to have been the case in Philippi.

When Paul and his companions found the place, there were only women present. Among them was Lydia, the head of a high-fashion trading company specialized in the extraction of purple from a certain shell or madder root used to color exquisite fabrics. Lydia was from Thyatira, a city where a guild of fabric dyers using purple had attained a great reputation. She probably owned a retail shop in Philippi.

Lydia was a God-fearing Gentile who was well acquainted with Judaism. Paul did not deliver a sermon but simply talked with the women. Lydia listened attentively, and God opened her heart (Acts 16:14).

As a result of hearing the gospel, Lydia and her household were baptized. Once baptized, she put what she had at the service of the servants of the Lord by demonstrating her hospitality (see Phil. 2:25; 4:10). In fact, Lydia had to firmly persuade Paul to accept her hospitality (parabiazomai, "to strongly urge," "press"; Acts 16:15).

16:16–24. Paul and Silas Imprisoned. Until this point Paul had largely had to endure the opposition of Jews who opposed his testimony. At this point in his ministry, however, he had to endure the rejection of Gentiles. As Paul and his coworkers were on their way to worship outside of the city, they encountered a slave girl possessed by a pneuma pythōv ("a spirit, namely, a Python," or "a Pythonian spirit). The term pythōv refers to a soothsaying spirit originally conceived of as a snake called Python, which Apollo killed near Delphi. It was believed that this spirit was what enabled the priestesses at Delphi, who were called Pythiai, to foretell the future. The slave girl in Philippi claimed to have such supernatural powers and used them to advise the superstitious people around her—and to enrich her owners. The Greek verb manteuomai, translated "fortune-telling" (v. 16), was used by the Greeks to designate prophets who had the ability to interpret unintelligible speeches of people who claimed to be speaking in unknown tongues. The Bible condemns such practices (Deut. 18:10; 1 Sam. 28:8; Ezek. 13:6).

The young slave girl stalked Paul and his companions, proclaiming that these men were the servants of the Most High God and were declaring the way of salvation. What she said was true, but it created confusion by suggesting that their teachings were in agreement with her own divination. Paul and his companions would have been perceived as mere clairvoyants, like her (cf. Mark 3:11; Luke 4:41). Paul did not want his ministry to be associated with this type of activity, but he patiently waited for several days, probably hoping to avoid the consequences of a conflict. Finally, he ordered the evil spirit in the name of Jesus to leave her, and immediately it came out of her. The exorcism of the demonic spirit brought an end to the girl's soothsaying abilities and also to the financial gains produced by it (Acts 16:19). The incident became a matter of conflict. We can surmise that her masters and those who profited from her services feared that Paul and his team would take over their business or at least damage their income. So they dragged them before the magistrate.

Three formal charges were brought against Paul and Silas: (1) They were Jews, who disregarded the gods of the city. (2) They were causing disturbances in the city—a serious charge, particularly in a Roman colony that prided itself on order. (3) They were disrespecting the teaching and customs of Rome, which was politically reprehensible—a serious charge in a Roman colony that was founded to mirror the values of Rome. After apparently tearing off the prisoners' clothes themselves, the judges ordered that Paul and Silas be publicly flogged and thrown in prison. Paul had a painful memory of the ordeal (1 Thess. 2:2). The jailer, who was responsible for prisoners at the cost of his life, was not satisfied with placing the two men in a dark dungeon, so he also had stocks placed on their feet. These were ill-fitting pieces of wood attached to the ankles to keep prisoners in a painfully uncomfortable position.

16:25–34. The Philippian Jailer Saved. While the jailer was sleeping, Paul and Silas were praying and singing to the Lord, unconcerned about their condition and relying on the Lord. In a place where commonly one would have heard screams, curses, and insults, hymns of praise were raised to God. The presence of God's servants transforms jails into cathedrals. In a sense, Paul and Silas were preaching through their loud prayers and hymns to the prisioners who were listening to them (v. 25).

Suddenly a massive earthquake shook the foundations of the prison, causing walls of stone to collapse, locked doors to open, and prison chains to be loosed. Miraculously all the prisoners were free but unharmed. Awakened by the earthquake, the jailer rushed out and found the doors of the prison wide open and immediately assumed that his prisoners had escaped. This was the worst thing that could happen to a Roman jailer; it was a total disgrace. He immediately decided that suicide was preferable to the shame of a public execution for allowing the prisoners to escape (v. 27; cf. 12:19). Recognizing what the jailer was about to do, Paul called out to him to not take his own life, for none of the prisoners had fled.

In the face of such a miracle, the Gentile jailer fell before Paul and Silas and then took them out, addressing them respectfully as "sirs" (16:30). He asked them what he should do to be saved. He had been listening to the hymns and must have been impressed by the Spirit. Paul told him about the real Lord Jesus Christ and that salvation could be had by believing in Him (v. 31). During the rest of the night Paul shared the gospel with him and his household. After the jailer washed their wounds, he and all his family were baptized. In gratitude he invited the two men into his house and placed food on the table before them. The joy of salvation filled the heart of this new convert (cf. 8:39; 13:52).

16:35–40. Paul Refused to Depart Secretly. As the sun rose, the judges sent word that the two prisoners were to be released, and presumably to leave the city. Luke does not elaborate on the reasons for this turn of events. Did they know about Paul and Silas's noble attitude during the earthquake? Did they see the earthquake as a sign of the gods' displeasure? Or did they simply feel that the two men had been punished sufficiently for their offense? The jailer received the news with joy and enthusiastically released them (v. 36). But Paul did not want to leave secretly, perhaps to protect the new believers in Philippi. To the surprise of the jailer, Paul told him that both he and Silas were Roman citizens (v. 37). According to the Porcia law of 248 B.C., it was forbidden to flog a Roman citizen under penalty of permanently losing one's official post of duties, and, depending on the mood of the sovereign, the entire city could have been penalized. Paul wanted to press charges against the judges because they had shamed them by beating them publicly, they did not hear both sides of the incident, and they had condemned and illegally imprisoned two Roman citizens (22:25–28). This was enough for the magistrates to have been dismissed or to have been severely punished. One can understand why on hearing these charges they were not only regretful but also frightened (16:38).

Paul's demand that the magistrates appear personally at the prison to arrange for their release likely was driven not by a concern merely to vindicate his own name but also by a concern for the new believers in Philippi. He wanted to make sure that they did not have to live under the shadow and potential ridicule of being the followers of a man who was seen as some sort of a criminal. Before leaving the city as requested, Paul went to Lydia's home, where a house church was budding. He exhorted the group before leaving town with Silas. From this point forward Luke no longer made mention of himself ("us"). He evidently stayed there to encourage the new believers in Paul's absence. He does not appear again in Acts until Paul's return to Philippi some six years later (20:6). Lydia continued to support Paul's ministry, for she, with the church, often sent aid to provide for his needs (Phil. 4:15–16).

Paul Ministering in Greece

Paul had great success among fair-minded Jews and not much among the Greek philosophers. But the infamous city of Corinth would be a place where there were many people (18:10) ready to receive the gospel.

17:1–4. Preaching Christ in Thessalonica. Paul and Silas were traveling once again on the Via Egnatia, a Roman road that connected the Black Sea to the Adriatic across the Balkans. They were going to Thessalonica, the most important seaport in Macedonia, located about ninety miles (145 km) from Philippi. With a population between 40,000 to 65,000 inhabitants, Thessalonica was much larger that Philippi. They probably knew there was a large synagogue in that city. As a Sabbath keeper, and in accordance with his practice, Paul went to the synagogue. Since visitors were called on to talk, Paul took full advantage of the opportunity, and for three Sabbaths in a row, he made Jesus known to those who were attending. We can also assume that during the two weeks, he accepted the hospitality of some of the relatively wealthy female believers (v. 4).

We find a number of verbs that show the method used by Paul to teach Jews: (1) Dialegomai ("to reason," "to debate"), from which we get the word "dialogue" (v. 2). It is a method of learning based on the Greek diatribe in which a series of questions are raised in a search for an answer (cf. Rom. 3:27–31). (2) Dianoigō—"to open," "to explain." By opening the Scriptures, Paul interpreted the text to them (Acts 17:3; cf. Luke 24:32). (3) Paratithēmi—"to present," "place on the side," or "side by side," as food is placed on a table (cf. Acts 16:34; 1 Cor. 10:27), in this case carrying the connotation of "demonstrating" or "proving" (Acts 17:3). In his exposition Paul placed biblical texts side by side to interpret the Scriptures. Some of the Jews were persuaded, as well as many God-fearing, devout Greeks, and many women who were prōtos—"first," "preeminent," "prominent"—also followed Paul and Silas (Acts 17:4). This aroused the jealousy of the Jews.

17:5-9. Assault on Jason's House. The jealousy of the unbelieving Jews is to some extent understandable. Paul was very successful among the Jewish proselytes in the synagogue and quite successful in reaching out to the Greeks (1 Thess. 1:9)—more so than the Jewish preachers among the Gentiles (cf. Matt. 23:15). The love that emanated from Paul's person most certainly had a part to play with his success (1 Thess. 2:7-8).

Paul and Silas were staying with Jason (Acts 17:5), who appears to have been a Greek-speaking Jew, since that name was common among Jewish men who, like Paul, grew up outside of the Holy Land. He must have been a man of some means, since his home was large enough to serve as the house church for the believers as well as to host Paul and Silas. He may be the person identified in Romans 16:21 as a Jew, along with Sosipater, who may be Sospater from Berea (Acts 20:4).

Since Emperor Claudius had forbidden Jews from living in Rome, it was rather easy to denounce them as disruptive. Using Paul as a pawn, the Jews of Thessalonica managed to whitewash themselves in the eyes of the population. They gathered disruptive elements in the marketplace and incited them to attack Jason's house (Acts 17:5).

When they were unable to lay their hands on Paul and Silas, these ruffians decided to haul Jason and other believers before the local magistrates instead. When they arrived, they accused Jason of harboring dangerous men. They laid two accusations against Paul and Silas: They were itinerant troublemakers with a track record of causing problems in other cities, and they were guilty of sedition for claiming that Jesus, not Caesar, was King. Sufficiently alarmed by these charges, the magistrates banned Paul and Silas from their city and required Jason to pay some kind of fee (v. 9) to ensure the two men would not return (cf. 1 Thess. 2:17-18).

17:10-15. Ministering in Berea. Due to the problem in Thessalonica, Paul and Silas had to flee the city during the night. Luke clarified that they left not out of fear but on the request of the brethren (v. 10). Continuing on the Egnatian road, Paul and Silas arrived at Berea, where once again Paul showed his love for his fellow Jews. Despite the opposition they had just experienced, the two companions went to the synagogue. The fact is that the Bereans showed themselves fully capable of overcoming their prejudices to listen eagerly to the word. They initiated their discussion by looking first at what the Scriptures had to say (v. 11). (Luke uses the word anakrinō—"to search" or "examine"; it is a verb that applies to legal settings, often used in terms of interrogation.) The Bereans were not satisfied with just listening; they asked questions. They were so interested that they studied the Scriptures every day (v. 11). The success was commensurate with motivation. Numerous Jews and Greeks, both men and prominent women, were accepting the new faith (v. 12). Apparently, many women were attracted to the teaching done in the synagogues (13:50; 16:13; 17:4, 12). The framework of the law offered them guiding principles of life and a sense of increased security. While the Greco-Roman world was steeped in amoral and orgiastic cults, Judaism promoted proper sexual behavior (Ex. 22:16-20; Lev. 18, 20; Deut. 22:22-30) and highly valued the family.

News of the success of Paul and Silas quickly reached the ears of their opponents in Thessalonica, who decided to follow them and agitate the crowds as they had done before. The brethren decided to play it safe and placed Paul on the first ship bound for Athens, and some remained with him until his arrival. Silas and Timothy were less exposed and remained in Berea.

17:16-21. The Philosophers at Athens. Once in Athens, Paul went to the agora, the marketplace, where he could observe and learn. He saw a city full of idols and with statues erected in honor of countless heroes and all kinds of deities. The city had become an art gallery. Since he was raised in Tarsus, Paul was used to seeing idols in public places, but his devotion to the one and only God made this abundance of idols disturbing to him. He felt a strong need to discuss the matter with the Gentile worshipers and fellow Jews (v. 17).

Athens was a highly intellectual metropolis where Plato and Aristotle had taught, but the most popular philosophers at that time were the Stoics and Epicureans. The political, economic, and social turmoil of the time had paralyzed societal progress and divided people into fixed social classes, giving everyone the feeling that their fate was sealed. Everything good or bad was explained through fate or providence. Stoics and Epicureans had different understandings regarding destiny. The Stoics held that God was active and present in the material world as divine reason (logos), ordering everything according to providence. Happiness was found, therefore, in learning to live in harmony with nature and letting go of emotions that resist our fate. Nothing existed beyond this material world. The Epicureans, however, believed that the cosmos was the result of an accident and that the gods were remote and did not interfere in this world. The best one could do was to try to find happiness through achieving an inner tranquility (ataraxia). This was done by learning to be content with simple things and in living moderately with friends. In short, these were ways of dealing with one's inevitable fate with as little pain and suffering as possible.

The attitude of the Epicureans and the Stoics gave Paul the chance to share the gospel with them (v. 18). Some disparaged Paul by referring to him as a spermologos (lit. "scavenger of seeds"), a term used to designate indigents who picked up scraps after the market closed but which in this context is a reference to a novice, an amateur "babbler" who picks up scraps of information from others. But Paul was able to spark their curiosity, and they took him to the Areopagus, where magistrates responsible for maintaining order and traditions congregated. Paul went from the synagogue (Judaism) to the center of Greek philosophy. The Areopagus was normally the place in the city where matters related to jurisdiction were debated. Discussions about foreign gods (v. 18) that challenged the legitimacy of national gods were forbidden.

17:22-34. Addressing the Areopagus. Standing in the midst of the assembly and in keeping with his customary approach (1 Cor. 9:19-22), Paul adapted his discourse to his audience; He did not use Scripture because its authority would not have been recognized by the Greeks. Luke provided a summary of the content of Paul's speech. The Athenians wanted to know this doctrine (Acts 17:19) so they could rationally examine it. They attentively listened without any objection before the reference to the resurrection. The introduction of the speech (v. 22) was appropriate and consistent with the rules of oratory. With relentless logic Paul made use of philosophical concepts and vocabulary to bring his listeners to a decision. Paul began with a common point of agreement: Athenians were religious. The Greek term deisidaimōn is applicable to both piety and superstition. The townspeople were careful to ensure the favor of the gods, living in constant fear of their anger and seeking to appease them. It is not surprising that they would have raised an altar to the unknown god. Paul felt free to make some comments about this most unusual phenomenon.

Playing with words, Paul took his listeners from the God they did not know (agnōstos) to the truth they did not know (agnoeō). He offered them a personal God, the Creator of the kosmos, the entire world (v. 24). Paul used logical reasoning as he developed his speech. The one God who created everything is logically the sovereign Lord of His creation and as Creator cannot be circumscribed to live in a sanctuary made by human hands. Paul was attempting to demonstrate that God is greater than the universe He made. Since God is the One who gives life, breath, and all things we need, He does not need anything from us (v. 25). On many of these points, the Epicureans probably would have agreed with Paul. But he was remarkably courageous to say all this near the Parthenon—a temple that was the pride of the Athenians. Paul was also criticizing the use of idols made by human hands to serve in some way as a dwelling of the gods.

The apostle used language that brought him very close to the idea of fate in an effort to connect with his audience. He argued that all humans have the same origin and that God is the One who determines the staging of nations in time and space (v. 26; see Gen. 1:28). The order of this world is in the hands of a generous God in whom we "live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:28). But Paul's real argument was that, with a common human ancestor and a God who created everything, humans have the same basic needs and are accountable to only this one God. He was now ready to conclude the speech. Having established that God made the world (v. 24), that He gives life generously to all (v. 25), that He determined appointed times and dwelling boundaries (v. 26), and that He allows Himself to be known (v. 27), Paul then concluded that God cannot be reduced to gold, silver, or stones, no matter how artfully they might be carved by industrious human hands (v. 29). Thus far the Epicureans and Stoics would have been able to approve of much of Paul's speech. But at this point he introduced a key Judeo-Christian component of faith that they would not accept: repentance. God is a personal God who can be offended by us and who calls us to repent (v. 30). This is, Paul implied, our common need based on the fact that God will judge every human being.

Paul introduced Jesus to this Greek audience in a unique way through the concept of God's universal judgment. Paul presented God as the Judge who would judge the world in righteousness by the Man whom He had appointed and ordained (v. 31; see 10:42). At this point Paul introduced the topic of the resurrection. He argued that God had given proof that this Man had been appointed by God for this task by raising Him from the dead. This was the best evidence He had to offer to demonstrate God's continuing activity in human history, with the consequential need to listen to Him and His will. But Paul's audience rejected the message of the resurrection of Christ and with it their only hope.

Was Paul's message to the Athenians a success or a failure? This is a subject of debate. Dionysius, who was a member of the Areopagus council, was converted. So also was a woman by the name of Damaris. The mention of her name implies that she belonged to the higher echelons of society. Still others joined the group of converts. Considering that Jesus would have given His life to save even a single soul, it is easy to make the case that Paul's speech was a success (cf. Luke 15:7).

18:1–17. Ministering at Corinth. Paul was not persecuted in Athens, but he decided to leave the city and relocate in Corinth, about 45 miles (72 km) away (v. 1). Regarding his stay, which lasted a year and a half, Luke mentions only three episodes: the split from the synagogue (vv. 5–8); the vision from the Lord (vv. 9–11); and the Jewish charges against him (vv. 12–17). These three episodes are characterized by three significant speeches: Paul to the Jews (v. 6), the Lord to Paul (vv. 9–10), and Gallio to the Jews (vv. 13–15). Despite the disruptions brought forth by the Jews of Corinth, Paul exercised a long ministry in the city thanks to the Lord's protection and the goodwill of the civil authorities.

Corinth was a Roman colony, the capital city of the province of Achaia. Located on a narrow land bridge connecting mainland Greece with the Peloponnese Peninsula, Corinth was an important north-south crossroad for overland trade and east-west for maritime commerce. To increase its commerical advantage, a paved road (called the Diolkos) was built across the four and a half miles (7 km) separating the Gulf of Corinth from the Saronic Gulf. In order to allow cargo and small ships to be transferred from one port to the other, a paved road was built connecting the city's two harbors: Cenchrea in the east and Lechaeum in the west. This road made it possible to avoid the long and dangerous journey around the Peloponnese. A vibrant and colorful cosmopolitan population enlivened the city of Corinth. It was a commercial city par excellence, where countless slaves were busy working in workshops, in stores, and in transporting goods. Its population might have reached 200,000 people. On the heights of the Acropolis was the temple of Aphrodite, the goddess of love and beauty, which contributed to the city's licentious reputation.

It was in this Gentile city that Paul's ministry flourished. On arriving in Corinth, probably while in the synagogue, Paul met a Jewish couple named Aquila and Priscilla, who offered him accommodations in the city. Forced out of Rome on orders of Emperor Claudius, the couple had come to Corinth and set up their own tentmaking shop. It is likely when Paul met them they had already accepted the gospel. Aquila and Priscilla appear to have been affluent enough to own their own business. Later, in Rome they hosted church services in their home (Rom. 16:3–5), as they also did in Ephesus (Acts 18:24–26). They were sufficiently educated to enlighten Apollos (v. 26) in the faith. Paul valued their hospitality, and since they practiced the same trade, he worked with them in the manufacturing of tents. It was part of Jewish rabbis' training to learn a trade to ensure their financial security. Paul benefitted from that vocational skill throughout his ministry. Not only did it provide for this livelihood, but it was also the means through which he could meet and share the gospel with Gentiles (1 Cor. 9:13–18).

The eventual arrival of Silas and Timothy allowed Paul to give himself entirely to the work of evangelization (Acts 18:5–8). In a way, they brought him good news (1 Thess. 1:6–10) and financial support (cf. 2 Cor. 11:8–9; Phil. 4:15), though not enough for him to give up working with his hands (1 Cor. 9). Energized by these expressions of God's grace, Paul devoted himself entirely to sharing the message with the Jews, testifying to them that Jesus was the promised Messiah.

The Jewish opposition against Paul was unreserved. Luke uses the verb antitassō—"to oppose" or "to resist," and even "to prepare for battle." Although Paul based his teachings on Scripture, his listeners were denigrating Jesus to the point of blasphemy. Paul decided to end the debate (Acts 18:6). On the strength of a common Jewish saying, "Your blood be on your own heads" (v. 6; cf. 2 Sam. 1:16; 1 Kin. 2:32–33; Ezek. 33:4), Paul disclaimed any liability from the potential bad consequences that a rejection of God's grace would bring on them. When Paul announced that from that time on he would turn to the Gentiles, he was still hoping to touch the hearts of his listeners (cf. Acts 13:46). He began to teach in a house near the synagogue where a Roman named Justus, who was a God-worshiping proselyte, was living (18:7). At that time Jews and Christians were worshiping the same God side by side but in separate buildings. The image was powerful: the gospel to the Gentiles was not in opposition to that of the synagogue; the two were very close to one another. There was indeed a temporary separation but not a divorce, because the first convert was Crispus, the chief of the synagogue, followed by his whole household (v. 8). Some Gentiles, slaves, and common people also accepted the message of salvation (1 Cor. 1:26). In addition to baptizing Crispus (1 Cor. 1:14), Paul also baptized Gaius, Stephanas and his family (1 Cor. 1:14–16), who were probably prominent people in the city (1 Cor. 16:17; cf. 1:11), and Erastus, who was the city treasurer (Rom. 16:23). Despite these successes Paul was deeply saddened by the disbelief of his fellow Jews (cf. Rom. 9:1–3), and perhaps by the depravity of the city.

Paul had good reasons to be fearful. The conversion of the chief of a synagogue as well as many Gentiles could create a violent reaction against him. It was at this moment that Paul had a vision from the Lord in which God encouraged him not to be afraid and promised him protection (Acts 18:9–11). This is how He had spoken with Moses (Ex. 3:12), Joshua (Josh. 1:9), and Jeremiah (Jer. 1:8). The prophet Isaiah proclaimed the same message to the people of God (Is. 41:8–11; 43:1–7). There are times when we feel weak and unable to deal with difficult situations in our personal lives and in the work of evangelism, but the grace of God is always available to sustain us (see 2 Cor. 12:9).

Paul was also encouraged when God said to him that He had many people in the city (Acts 18:10). The implications were that in a city as depraved as Corinth, there were people willing to listen to the gospel; there were Jews and Gentiles who did not yet know Jesus; Jews and Gentiles are one in Christ (cf. John 10:16); and the love of God for the lost is actively present before we come to love them. Encouraged by the vision, Paul continued there and taught them the word of God for a year and a half (Acts 18:11), during which time he also wrote 1 and 2 Thessalonians.

Once again Paul faced the opposition of the Jews, this time initiating a formal charge that forced him to appear before the governor (Acts 18:12–17). Honoring the official gods was a civic duty because these gods were believed to ensure the well-being of the city. The practice of certain religions was either authorized or prohibited by Roman law, and Paul was accused of introducing an unauthorized religion. But the proconsul Gallio wanted to determine first if Paul was really violating a public order. He found that Paul was not guilty of wrongdoing, premeditated offense, wicked crimes, deception, or misrepresentation. He was merely debating matters related to Jewish law. Gallio did not press charges, choosing instead to dismiss the case.

This incident is of particular importance because Gallio, who was the elder brother of the Stoic philosopher Seneca, happened to also be a friend of Emperor Claudius. As proconsul, he spoke on Rome's behalf. Depending on the outcome of this judgment, it might be determined if Christianity should be considered lawful or not. On hearing the charges, Gallio determined that Christian teachings were merely a dispute related to Jewish law, not Roman law. Since the Jewish religion was legally recognized under Roman law, Judeo-Christianity could not be considered subversive or disruptive of public order. From Gallio's point of view the debate was internal to Judaism.

At this point Sosthenes, who probably was the successor of Crispus or the leader of another synagogue, was attacked. It is not entirely clear who attacked him. The Greek literally says that they all seized and beat him (v. 17). Some interpret this to have been an anti-Semitic outburst by the Greeks, who beat him for wasting the court's time, others see it as the Jews attacking their own leader for the shame brought on them due to his inefficiency, and others see poor Sosthenes being clobbered by both Greeks and Jews. If this is the same Sosthenes mentioned in 1 Corinthians 1:1, then he too eventually became a Christian, perhaps influenced by the way his fellow Jews turned on him.

18:18–22. Paul's Return to Antioch. Luke notes Paul's trip to Jerusalem and Antioch to emphasize that his missionary journey continued uninterrupted. He begins by pointing out that once again Paul was undeterred by persecutions (v. 18). His desire was to continue his work in Syria, and to do so, he took a boat to cross the Aegean Sea. Before setting sail from Cenchrea, the western port of Corinth, Paul made a vow and shaved his head. Paul's vow might have simply been a prayer of rededication to God asking Him to bring him back safely to his own country (cf. Gen. 28:20). Perhaps he feared that the brethren in Jerusalem would not fully approve his ministry.

Regardless of the reason for his vow, while in Ephesus Paul took the time to meet with the Jews in the synagogue, where this time he was welcomed (Acts 18:20), as he had been in Berea (17:11). Needing to resume his trip, Paul declined the invitation to remain with them in the city, but Aquila and Priscilla, who had traveled with him, remained in Ephesus. Paul would later return during his third missionary journey and stay three years in Ephesus (20:31). After arriving in Caesarea, Paul went to Jerusalem, where he addressed the church before going to Antioch.

PAUL'S THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY

During this third missionary journey, Paul did not attempt to share the gospel in new territories. He strengthened the churches previously founded and for three years focused his efforts on Ephesus. Although it is not mentioned in Acts, it was during this trip that Paul wrote several letters that are included in the NT: 1 Corinthians from Ephesus, 2 Corinthians from Macedonia, and Romans from Corinth. In addition to summarizing the nature of Paul's ministry in Ephesus, Luke also provided a few entries of a travelogue highlighting significant events that occurred while Paul was passing through Troas and Miletus.

18:23—19:41

Paul at Ephesus

This section of Acts focuses on Paul's sojourn in Ephesus, and many consider this the pinnacle of his missionary work (Acts 19:18–20). The success of the gospel in Ephesus did not come without opposition. Paul faced strong hostility from both Jews (vv. 8–9) and Gentiles (vv. 23–40). In both cases, however, God turned the situation for the good. The power of the gospel to transform human lives was magnified (vv. 9–12, 18–20), and the Christian faith was exonerated of the charges brought against it (vv. 37–41). The Lord's name was glorified among the people (v. 17), while those who called on the name of the goddess Artemis were silenced (v. 36).

18:23–28. Ministry of Apollos. Antioch was not Paul's final destination but a stopover of undetermined duration. He eventually left there to lend a helping hand to suffering Christian communities in Galatia and Phrygia and to strengthen the faith of the disciples.

At this point Luke almost unexpectedly introduces the experience of a man named Apollos, who had also worked in the city of Ephesus (1 Cor. 3:6). In a sense, this story links the success of Paul in Ephesus and Asia Minor with the work of Jesus in the Holy Land. Indeed, the life of Jesus, His identity, and His ministry were not confined to the narrow boundaries of the land of Israel but were also spoken about in synagogues as far away as Alexandria and Rome (Acts 18:2). Apollos was an eloquent scholar; he was educated in Alexandria, which was one of the most prestigious schools of antiquity. It is also clear that he had mastered the Hebrew Scriptures. Although he had known only the baptism of John, he was able to teach accurately, from the Scriptures, that the Messiah was Jesus (18:24–25).

On arriving at Ephesus Apollos spoke boldly in the synagogue where Priscilla and Aquila were attending. One can admire the humility of such a scholar, who willingly accepted the instruction given by a woman, Priscilla (named first in the text; v. 26; cf. v. 2), and Aquila, her husband. Apollos had not yet heard about what had happened at Pentecost and the powerful outpouring of the Spirit. The positive manner in which Luke records Priscilla's involvement in teaching Apollos reveals not only his approval of her activity but also the variety of roles women played in the early church (cf. 1:14; 16:13–14; 17:4, 12, 34; 21:9).

Apollos left Ephesus to travel to Corinth with the support and recommendations of the brethren in Ephesus. There he helped people whom Paul had previously converted and was able to vigorously refute the Jews in their assemblies. Later, Paul would write that he planted, Apollos watered, and God caused the growth (1 Cor. 3:6). The relationship between Paul and Apollos was always fraternal and gracious. Although some believers expressed a preference for Apollos (Acts 1:12), Paul considered him with respect (4:6) and requested Titus to take good care of him (Titus 3:13).

19:1–7. The Baptism of the Holy Spirit at Ephesus. According to his promise to the Ephesians and fully assured that it was God's plan (18:21), Paul returned to Ephesus. There in Asia Minor, Paul encountered a group of disciples well versed in the message of John the Baptist and the baptism of repentance (19:3). They were living righteously as they anticipated the soon coming of the Messiah, just as John the Baptist had taught them (Luke 3:1–18). As regards the events of Pentecost, however, these disciples had not heard anything (Acts 19:2). Clearly, in Paul's view the baptism of repentance preached by John the Baptist was insufficient.

As far as Paul was concerned, a believer needed the gift of the Spirit. He was not satisfied with laying hands on disciples for the reception of the Holy Spirit; he felt compelled that they be baptized again. Christian baptism requires neophytes to place their faith in Jesus. The gift of the Holy Spirit is intricately linked to baptism. The same was the experience of Peter (2:38), who baptized Cornelius and his family although they had already received the Holy Spirit (10:47). Baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus (19:5) involves believing that salvation is obtained only by way of Jesus (3:19–20; 4:12; 16:31; 20:21). It is a matter not only of starting a new life (26:20) but also of participating by faith in the death and resurrection of Jesus (Rom. 6:3–4) and of making us members of the body of Christ, His church (Acts 2:41). The Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of Jesus (16:7), brings the presence of Christ into our hearts (Col. 1:27) and enables us to testify of our new faith (Acts 19:6).

19:8–12. Missionary Work of Paul. Paul attended the synagogue on the Sabbath as a devout Christian who was still keeping the Sabbath. Luke also specifies that Paul was able to parrēsiazomai ("to speak boldly" or "freely") and to dialegomai ("to argue" or "dialogue") persuasively (peithō, "to convince," or "persuade," which he did for three months; v. 8). In the synagogue, Paul spoke about the kingdom of God. The Jews had been expecting the restoration of the kingdom of Israel (1:6). Instead, Jesus had announced to them the kingdom of God (1:3). Given their hardness of heart, lack of faith, and public denigration of the message, Paul distanced himself from the Jews to protect the new disciples from their negative influence. There were indeed good reasons to fear that public disorder might force him to leave (1 Cor. 16:8–9). However, this time, as in Philippi (Acts 16:19–24), the menaces came from Gentiles at odds with the Christian message.

Paul decided to move his meeting place to the school of Tyrannus. This man might have been a Jewish teacher or possibly a well-known Greek philosopher who lived in the city. Interestingly enough, the so-called Western text inserts that Paul taught between 11:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. (the fifth to the tenth hour). If this is case, then Paul was making use of the building during off hours—the hot hours of the day, when many people took a siesta. While it is uncertain whether this manuscript tradition contains the original reading, the timing does make sense. In any case, Paul taught there for two years, to which we must add the previous three months and the timeline implied in v. 22. This gives us a ministry of three years in Ephesus (20:31).

The move away from the synagogue compelled the Christians to organize their Sabbath worship at the homes of believers. Paul preached in homes and in public places (20:20–21) with the support of collaborators such as Gaius and Aristarchus in Ephesus (19:29), Timothy and Erastus in the province of Asia Minor (19:22), and Epaphras in Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Col. 1:7; 4:12–13). During these three years the gospel spread tremendously throughout Asia Minor. The miracles seen and experienced by the people in Ephesus testified to the fact that Paul's ministry was both supported and accredited by God. Some individuals even took handkerchiefs and aprons Paul used in the tent-making workshop to apply them to the sick or to those possessed with evil spirits so that God would free them from their ailments. This behavior illustrates that God can use different ways to manifest His healing power. In the superstitious setting of the Ephesians, this approach served initially to legitimize the work of the apostles among them. God saw fit to use material things in the performance of miracles in both the OT (i.e., Ex. 14:16; 17:6; Num. 21:9; 2 Kin. 2:14; 13:21) and the NT (Matt. 14:34–36; Luke 8:43–48; John 9:6–7). However, the miracle was the result not of placing the object on someone but of the power of God's grace, which was recognized by the people in Ephesus (Acts 19:17).

19:13–20. Failure of Simony. There were among the Jews itinerant exorcists (Matt. 12:27; Luke 9:49; 11:19) such as the sons of a Jew named Sceva, an unknown high priest whose name is not documented in the lists of high priests who served in Jerusalem. These exorcists were taking advantage of people's superstitious gullibility. Impressed by the success of Paul (Acts 19:12), these seven sons claimed the ability to exorcise demons in the name of Jesus. Having access to someone's name was thought to give a magician power over a person or power to use the name to do unusual things. But God does not allow Himself to be manipulated (Gen.

32:29; Ex. 3:13–14; Judg. 13:18), and to take His name in vain is a serious offense (Ex. 20:7; Lev. 24:16; Deut. 5:11; 28:58–59; Zech. 5:4). These exorcists realized the name of Jesus was powerful against demons. But by referring to him as "the Jesus whom Paul preaches," they were demonstrating that they did not know Jesus personally (Acts 19:13). The demons did not recognize their authority (v. 15). Like Simon Magus (8:18–19), these professional exorcists were trying to take personal advantage of the new faith. The disastrous outcome for the exorcists shows how dangerous it is to venture into the field of spiritualism (19:16). The people of Ephesus drew the right conclusions and responded with appropriate fear and honor to God (19:17).

The exorcists misused the name of the Lord (v. 13), with damaging results for them. But as a result of their experience, the name of the Lord was glorified (v. 17), and the word of the Lord continued to increase in influence and power (v. 20). Many confessed and renounced their use of magic and burned their books in a public and solemn act of devotion to Jesus. The value of the books represented about fifty thousand days of a worker's earnings (v. 19), or about 137 years of salary (Matt. 20:9–10). The significance of this burning ceremony is all the more notable because Ephesus was a city renowned for its books about magic, even though Roman law had banned their use. This experience in Ephesus was one of the highest points in Paul's ministry.

19:21–41. The Riot at Ephesus. The phrase hōs de eplērōthē tauta—"after all these things were fulfilled," "after all these things were finished," or "after all this happened" (v. 21)—suggests the conclusion of an important achievement. Paul could therefore consider turning the page and leaving Asia Minor for Rome (v. 21), thinking even about the possibility of going to Spain (Rom. 15:24).

Once again Paul wished to return to Jerusalem to tell the brethren about the progress made in the Lord's work and to strengthen the unity of the church. Before leaving he wanted to revisit the churches in Macedonia and Achaia to gather an offering of solidarity for the church in Jerusalem (2 Cor. 9:1–15; Gal. 2:10). While Paul chose to remain in Asia Minor a little longer, Timothy and Erastus were sent to Macedonia in advance to make preparations for Paul's arrival (Acts 19:22). At this time Paul confronted opposition not from the Jews but from a Gentile syndicate of silversmiths. Luke recounted the episode in three stages: a mobilization of tradesmen led by Demetrius (vv. 23–28), the uprising of the people (vv. 29–34), and the intervention of a city clerk (vv. 35–40).

It is clear that Paul's message challenged the worship of idols for being incompatible with the way of the Lord (v. 23). As far as Paul was concerned, believers were to radically break away from all idols (1 Cor. 5:9–11; 6:9–10; 10:20–22). The second commandment (Ex. 20:4–6) preserved Israel from such aberrations. The prophet Isaiah had ridiculed such practices (Is. 40:18–20; 44:12–18). Idolatry has always been a prosperous commerce of religious artifacts.

Demetrius, an artisan silversmith (Acts 20:24), benefited greatly from the sale of silver shrines, probably cast in molds, dedicated to the goddess Diana. Diana is the Roman name of Artemis, the great Greek goddess of fertility and the patron goddess of Ephesus. The Ephesians had built such an extravagant temple on her behalf that it was recognized for centuries as one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. A figure of her made of cedar or ebony wood covered with gold leaf was believed to have fallen from heaven (Acts 19:35). It was placed at the center of a magnificent temple that was 144 feet long by 85 wide (44 by 26 m) and comprised of 127 marble columns. The worship of Artemis attracted people from all walks of life, particularly during popular celebrations that involved carrying this effigy in solemn procession through the city.

Demetrius defended his personal interests by making it sound like Paul had unleashed a major disaster. Skillfully, he shifted from the problem of his own failing business to that of his companions (v. 25) and the worldwide reputation of the goddess (v. 27). The target of his attack was clearly identified as Paul (v. 26), and he stimulated the anger of his companions who stood for Artemis (v. 28). Soon the whole city was in turmoil and confusion (vv. 29, 32). Gaius and Aristarchus, Paul's companions, were led to the huge theater, which could hold 24,000 spectators seated on sixty-six bleacher levels. They might have been placed on the 130-foot-wide (40 m) stage or in the arena between the stage and the bleachers (v. 29). Luke emphasizes once again that Paul was unafraid of the lurking danger. He was ready to face the crowd, but the disciples intervened once again (v. 30; cf. 9:25, 30; 17:10). Even some of the officials of Asia Minor (Asiarchēs) begged him not to venture into the theater (19:31). The Asiarchs were wealthy civic leaders of Ephesus who were elected for one-year terms. It was their duty to organize, at their own expense, the provincial celebrations to honor the emperor and to pay for the games associated with the festivities. They were allowed to retain their titles even after their term of service concluded. Considering that the great festival of Artemis was taking place in spring, it is possible that these officials were present in the city for the occasion. Paul had in fact intended to stay in Ephesus until Pentecost (1 Cor. 16:8–9). It is remarkable to see that these high-level personalities showed concern for Paul.

Amid such confusion, a Jew named Alexander was pushed toward the front in order to speak to the crowd (Acts 19:33–34). Probably it was his intention to show that the Jews had nothing to do with Paul. But this Alexander was unable to defend the position of his coreligionists (v. 33). Recognizing that he was a Jew, the crowd did not listen to him and for two hours shouted, "Great is Artemis [Diana] of the Ephesians!" (v. 34).

At this point the secretary or clerk of the city intervened. His job was to take notes at city meetings—he was an influential man expected to enforce all decisions made. He requested the crowd to quiet down and then, as a good lawyer, he decided to evaluate carefully the validity of the claims. First he considered the situation to be a matter of religion. Ignorant of the facts, the crowd came to the defense of the goddess, shouting that she was great. This was, of course, an established fact not in dispute (vv. 35–36). The clerk argued that those under scrutiny had not undermined the dignity of the temple by stealing from it or speaking blasphemies against the goddess (v. 37). Therefore, he implied that at the very least the crowd was acting precipitously (v. 36). Then he dealt with the matter of merchandizing. If Demetrius and his companions wanted to complain in defense of their businesses, they could have taken their cases to the courts available for that purpose (v. 38). Note that the clerk did not mention Paul's name; he preferred instead to remain rather vague by using the term tina—"anyone"/"anybody" (or since the term is masculine—"any man"; v. 38). Finally, the clerk concluded addressing the matter of social relationships that affected both the crowd and the silversmiths. Indeed, he argued, the entire city was now in danger of being held accountable for this revolt (v. 40). The Roman authorities were intolerant of unrest. Demetrius and the silversmiths were running the risk of capital punishment, and the city was at risk of losing some of the very privileges that contributed to its wealth. Having said all this, the grounds for disputes were resolved, and the city clerk dismissed the assembly. It is clear from this episode that even when Christianity challenged the validity of temple worship, whether Jewish (7:48) or Gentile (17:24), it remained respectful of public order.

Luke does not recount all the hardships that Paul suffered in Ephesus. In 1 Corinthians 15:32 Paul speaks metaphorically about the fierce battles he confronted in Ephesus. We know that Paul had many opponents in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:9) and that Priscilla and Aquila saved him at the peril of their lives (Rom. 16:3–4). He may have been in prison with Andronicus and Junia (Rom. 16:7) in Ephesus, where he may have also been exposed to some of the suffering he mentions in 2 Corinthians 11:24–27.

Marching on to Jerusalem

The account describing the conclusion of Paul's missionary journeys is narrated by Luke in the form of a long excursion that led Paul to Corinth, the most remote point of his missionary endeavors, and his long journey that took him from Corinth to Jerusalem. Paul traveled several months, covering about 2,700 miles (4,345 km), about half of which were on land. Paul was following the path of service of his Master (Luke 9:23).

20:1–6. Journey in Greece. It was Paul's intention to go to Rome after Jerusalem (19:21). Prior to his departure he wanted to visit once again the communities he had recently founded to encourage them (20:2). He began in Macedonia (v. 1), where he had received a warm welcome (Philippi and Berea), and then he went to Achaia (southern portion of modern Greece), where he remained in the city of Corinth for three months during winter. It was during this time that Paul wrote his letter to the Romans (Rom. 16:1–2, 23). A plot perpetrated by Jews, probably at the seaport of Cenchrea, forced Paul to abandon his intention to take a boat bound for Syria, and instead he backtracked to Macedonia (Acts 20:3). It is possible that he wanted to reach Jerusalem for Passover by way of the sea, but his plans had to be changed.

The roads were quite unsafe, especially considering that Paul was responsible for bringing generous contributions from the Greeks and Macedonians to the poor in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:25–29). Thus he was accompanied by seven representatives of different churches (Acts 20:4): Sopater of Berea, perhaps the same person mentioned as Sosipater in Romans 16:21; Aristarchus of Thessalonica (Acts 27:2); Secondus of Thessalonica; Gaius of Derbe; Timothy of Lystra (16:1–3); Tychicus (Eph. 6:21–22) and Trophimus, both from Ephesus (Acts 21:29). On arriving at Philippi Paul found Luke ("we"; 20:6), whom he had earlier left there (16:16–17). Paul remained in Philippi, where he spent the Passover in a loving environment (20:6; cf. Phil. 1:3, 7, 8; 4:10). Paul and Luke then boarded a ship in Neapolis, the seaport of Philippi, and arrived at Troas, where five days later they rejoined the seven companions sent as forerunners (Acts 20:5).

20:7–12. Ministering at Troas. After keeping the Sabbath, during which Paul did not travel, he decided to leave. On the first day of the week he had one more meeting during which he gave final recommendations to his disciples (see below, "The First Day of the Week").

The room where they met was lit by many lamps, suggesting that this was an evening meeting. Luke, a physician, specifies that young Eutyichus fell from the height of a three-story building and that he died. The miracle wrought through Paul brought comfort to the believers (20:12). What would have been a tragedy became an occasion to rejoice in the goodness of the Lord. Incidentally, the name Eutychus means "Lucky"—and he certainly was blessed that a miracle made his life an encouragement to other believers.

The First Day of the Week

Some have used Acts 20:7–12 to support the position that Sunday was a special day of worship in the apostolic church to replace the seventh-day Sabbath. But several elements in the narrative itself preclude such an interpretation of the passage.

1. The Time of the Meeting. Although the text says that the meeting was held "on the first day of the week," the mention of lights in the room and the reference to midnight indicate that this was an evening meeting. If Luke was using a Jewish calendar, according to which days were reckoned from sunset to sunset, then that would mean that the evening of the first day of the week (Sunday) would be what we today call Saturday night. If he was using the Roman calendar, according to which days were reckoned from dawn to dawn, Sunday evening would be our Sunday evening and the next day would have been Monday. Some who maintain a Sunday Sabbath argue that Luke combined the Roman time reckoning (dawn to dawn) with the Jewish calendar, in which the first day was Sunday. This is highly unlikely. The best option is that Luke was using the Jewish calendar (see Luke 23:53–56) and that in this case the meeting took place on what we call Saturday evening.

2. The Type of Meeting. The text indicates that this was not a regular day of worship. First, Paul met with church members because he intended to depart the next day (Acts 20:7). This was clearly a farewell meeting. Second, the meeting was not strictly speaking a worship service—there are no references to prayers and singing—but a long meeting during which Paul interacted with the audience. Luke uses two verbs to describe what Paul was doing: "to speak," (dialegomai; vv. 7, 9) and "to talk" (homileō; v. 11). The verb dialegomai ("to argue," "to instruct") conveys the idea of reasoning and engaging others in dialogue. Paul did this in the synagogue (e.g., 17:2; 18:4; 19:8) and in the marketplace (17:17). Homileō ("to speak," "to converse") implies dialogue and interaction (e.g., Acts 24:26; Luke 24:14–15). In postapostolic times it came to mean "to preach." Both verbs indicate that Paul was dialoguing with believers, instructing and answering questions. Third, the phrase "to break bread" does not necessarily designate the Lord's Supper but was the common Jewish designation for having a meal (e.g., Acts 2:42 [cf. v. 47]; 27:35; Luke 9:16; 22:19). In the second century A.D. the phrase became a technical expression for the Lord's Supper. This meeting was a farewell meal taken after midnight before Paul left. Even if, in this case, it was a Lord's Supper, this would not indicate which day of the week the meeting was on or the type of service since even the first Lord's Supper was not on a Sabbath.

3. The First Day of the Week. The reference to the first day of the week is almost casual, used to date the event. Luke likes to date events (e.g., Acts 20:6, 15–16; 21:1, 4, 15). What is more important is that the previous day was a Sabbath day, during which Paul would not have traveled. In other words, he kept the Sabbath and waited until Sunday to travel. The sequence of events is quite clear: During the Sabbath Paul worshiped with believers, and during the evening (the first day of the week) he met with them to instruct them and answer questions before he had to leave early the next morning. The death and resuscitation of a young man lengthened the meeting. Paul returned to the meeting hall and continued to teach. Early in the morning they had a meal, and Paul finally departed. Perhaps the main interest of Luke was to report the impact of the miracle on the believers, and in doing this he placed it within its historical context—it happened in Troas before Paul left, during the first day of the week. It is clear that Luke was not promoting Sunday observance.

20:13–16. From Troas to Miletus. Navigation by sea was most often undertaken by sailing along the coast from port to port. Paul first traveled from Troas to Assos on foot (about thirty miles [48 km]), but no specific reason is given for this decision, although it would have afforded much time for meditation and prayer. Paul rejoined his companions at the port of Assos. Each day involved a new stage, seven of them in all if Troas is included in the count. It appears that the group may have rented the boat, considering that Paul was the one who gave the marching orders (v. 13) and who decided not to stop at Ephesus (v. 16). Interestingly, he called a meeting of the elders of Ephesus at Miletus, roughly fifty miles (80 km) away. Luke provides a reason for not stopping at Ephesus: Paul was in a hurry. He wanted to reach Jerusalem before Pentecost in order to meet more people. Of course, it is also possible that the captain of the ship decided not to stop in Ephesus because he had planned to stop for a day at Miletus to load or unload goods.

20:17–38. The Ephesian Elders Exhorted. Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus is divided into four parts. There is an introductory section (vv. 18–21), followed by three others introduced by kai nyn idou ("see now" or "now behold"; vv. 22, 25) and kai ta nyn ("and now" or "so now"; v. 32).

1. Paul Defended His Ministry (Acts 20:18–21). In this section Paul justified the way he had led his ministry (cf. 2 Cor. 1:12; 1 Thess. 2:1–12; 2 Thess. 3:7–8). The defense illustrates how we should perform our own ministry: We should understand that in our ministry we are serving the Lord, whose ministry is our model for ministry (Acts 20:19). Ministry should be undertaken with profound humility, implying that we are willing to courageously experience trials as we serve others (v. 19; cf. 2 Cor. 4:7–11; 11:7), which was also the experience of Jesus (cf. Is. 53:7). Also like Jesus, Paul's preaching was of a practical nature or helpful (sympherō, "useful," "helpful," "profitable"; Acts 20:20) in order to demonstrate how the Christian faith affects a person's everyday life. In his ministry, Paul did not seek to please people but rather to fully instruct them (vv. 20, 27). He preached the need and importance of repentance and of placing one's faith on our Lord Jesus Christ (v. 21).

2. Paul Spoke about His Coming Arrest (Acts 20:22–24). He was going to Jerusalem compelled by the Spirit (or alternatively, "bound" or determined in his own mind, as some translations imply) as prisoner of his vocation (v. 22). The statement does not specify if the prospect of martyrdom was for him an inner feeling or a revelation he received from the Holy Spirit (v. 23). In any case, Paul was persuaded that the Holy Spirit was leading him (cf. Acts 16: 6–7; Rom. 8:14) and that imprisonment and persecution awaited him in Jerusalem (Acts 20:23). It is also possible that prophets had warned Paul about his travel to Jerusalem (cf. 21:11). As a faithful servant of Jesus (cf. Luke 9:23–26), he was willing to give his life for the Lord, not because life was unimportant to him but because he fully trusted in Him (cf. Phil. 1:20–21; 2 Tim. 1:12).

3. Paul Spent Time Exhorting the Church Elders (Acts 20:25–31). It was the duty of the elders to watch over the flock that the Holy Spirit had appointed to them as its overseers (v. 28). Paul made three specific statements. First, he testified that he had fully equipped the elders to take charge of the church (v. 27). He described the content of his preaching in various ways: turning to God for repentance and having faith in the Lord Jesus Christ (v. 21); testifying about the good news of God's grace (v. 24); preaching the kingdom of God (v. 25) and the boulē—"purpose," "intention," or "plan"—of God (v. 27).

Second, Paul exhorted the elders to prosechō—"be on guard," "pay careful attention," "take heed." Here, for the first time in the passage, Paul used a verb in the imperative form. Knowing the truth of the gospel carried responsibilities and consequences for those who ministered in the church. In particular, they were expected to take care of themselves and to behave as good instruments of God (1 Tim. 6:11), meaning that they were to be true to God's mandate (2 Tim. 2:15), as was Paul (Acts 20:19–20, 24, 26). They were also to keep watch over the community of believers (v. 28; cf. John 21:15–17; 1 Pet. 5:4) and to consider the church as the property of the Lord, remembering the high price He paid for its salvation (Acts 20:28; cf. 1 Pet. 5:1–3; see below, "By His Blood").

Third, Paul said the elders were to feed the flock of God. Continuing the symbolism of the shepherd and his flock, Paul evoked "wolves" (Acts 20:29), a metaphor Jesus had already used (Matt. 7:15; 10:16; Luke 10:3). The reference is to false apostles and teachers who would lead the church into apostasy. Paul was very well aware of the dangers of heresy that would threaten the church. This prediction began to be fulfilled in Paul's own day and continued after the apostles died, when the church allowed the introduction of false teachings and rejected biblical truth (cf. 1 Tim. 4:1, 7; 6:3; 2 Tim. 3:6–7). Therefore, it would be important for the elders to watch and protect the flock of the Lord.

By His Blood

The phrase referring to the church of God, which He purchased/obtained with His own blood (v. 28), is unique in the Bible. Is "His own blood" referring to God the Father or to Jesus the Son? Since in the NT the blood that saves is always that of Jesus, most interpreters find here a reference to Jesus's blood. This could be supported by the fact that the Greek could be also translated "with the blood of His Own" implying His own Son. If we take the noun "blood" to mean sacrifice, then we could perhaps keep what appears to be the most natural way of interpreting our passage: God purchased the church through His own sacrifice. The Godhead was directly involved in the sacrifice of Christ. It was the Son who died on the cross, but God the Father was in Christ reconciling us to Himself (2 Cor. 5:19). The saving death of Christ was the work of the Godhead. The giving of His only Son for our salvation is the greatest sacrifice God could have made for us (cf. Rom. 3:25, John 3:16). But perhaps the ambiguity of the Greek text is intentional in order to force us to reflect on the glorious fact that our salvation was infinitely costly to the Godhead. (See "Paul, the Law, and Salvation," p. 1186.)

4. Paul Concluded with Words of Encouragement (Acts 20:32–35). No one can control his or her future, thus Paul placed the community of Ephesus in God's hands. Echoing an image dear to him, that of the church as a building (e.g., 1 Cor. 3:10–14; 8:1), he placed the church in the hands of its founder, Jesus Christ (see Matt. 16:18). He also reminded them about their glorious inheritance, available to those who are sanctified (Acts 20:32). It is God Himself who sanctifies us by means of the truth contained in His word (John 17:17–19; 1 Thess. 5:23). Paul concluded his exhortation by reminding the community that his service had always been selfless (Acts 20:33–35; cf. 1 Tim. 3:9; 6:8–10). This detail should be interpreted in the context of the work of greedy and self-centered false teachers (see 1 Tim. 6:5; Titus 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:3, 14).

The narrative closes with Paul's departure (Acts 20:36–38). There were prayers and tears as these church leaders separated from Paul knowing that they would not see him again until the return of the Lord in glory (v. 38). The type of kiss used at the farewell was common among Jews (Luke 7:45; 15:20; 22:47) and was adopted by the church as a greeting and farewell (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 1 Thess. 5:26, 1 Pet. 5:14). They accompanied Paul, their beloved teacher, to the ship and probably stood by the seashore watching it disappearing on the horizon.

21:1–14. Warnings on the Journey to Jerusalem. Luke documented here the stages of the journey from Miletus to Jerusalem. Navigation had to take place during daylight. As they passed near the island of Cyprus, Paul must have remembered his first missionary journey with Barnabas (13:4–12). While waiting for a new ship to go down the coast, the travelers took the opportunity to seek the local disciples and eventually found some (21:4). For seven days Paul and his companions enjoyed their hospitality. During that time, the believers attempted to dissuade Paul from going to Jerusalem (v. 4). That they spoke to him "through the Spirit" means not that the Spirit forbade Paul to go to Jerusalem but that the Spirit was telling him what was going to happen. This led the believers to discourage him from going to Jerusalem. Finally, they with their wives and children accompanied him to the sea. Once more the encounter ended with a prayer (v. 5; cf. 20:36). Paul was persuaded that his life was in God's hands. If he should die, God would raise him on the last day (2 Cor. 4:14). His faith in Christ delivered him from the fear of death (Heb. 2:15).

The ship took them to Ptolemais, and there they spent a day with the brethren (Acts 21:7). They finally managed to reach Caesarea, where Paul had previously fled on his way to Tarsus when his life was threatened in Jerusalem (9:30). Luke does not specify whether they traveled on foot or by boat. There were about thirty-five miles (56 km) between Ptolemais—now called Acre—and Caesarea, where they found shelter in the home of Philip. This Philip was one of the seven evangelists (6:3, 5), and he had four unmarried daughters still living with him who had the gift of prophecy (21:9). This implies that they contributed to the edification of the church (1 Cor. 14:3). Many prophets are known to have participated in the development of the early church (Acts 11:27–28; 13:1; 15:32; 19:6). Joel's prophecy announced that this gift would also be given to women (Acts 2:17; quoting Joel 2:28), and Paul recognized its rightful place in the church as a gender-inclusive gift (1 Cor. 11:5, 11; 14:5).

In Caesarea, the prophet Agabus, who came down from Judea (from the heights of Jerusalem), is introduced in the narrative (Acts 21:10; cf. 11:27). In a symbolic gesture Agabus used Paul's belt to announce to him the ordeal he would suffer in Jerusalem (21:11). Unlike v. 4, here Luke made a clear distinction between the prophetic announcement inspired by the Spirit (v. 11) and the expressions of affection from the disciples who were trying to keep Paul from pressing on to Jerusalem (v. 12). Ultimately, the Romans fulfilled the prophecy of Agabus when Paul was seized and beaten in the temple and then arrested by the Romans (vv. 30–33; cf. 24:1–27).

21:15–25. Paul Urged to Make Peace. Before leaving for Jerusalem the company prepared the luggage. The group still had to travel about sixty miles (96 km) before reaching Jerusalem, and the road was never safe. Before reaching Jerusalem, lodging was provided in the house of a long-time disciple, a native of Cyprus called Mnason (vv. 16–17). The welcome of the brethren in Jerusalem was heartfelt. Paul presented them with the gifts from the churches in Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Greece, a beautiful expression of their spirit of sacrifice. This gift not only helped the believers but also resulted in many people offering thanks to God (2 Cor. 9:12).

The next day Paul was to meet with James and the council of elders of the church in Jerusalem. In the meetings, Paul made reference not to his own work but to the work God had accomplished among the Gentiles through him (Acts 21:20). The Jerusalem church praised God and spoke of the many Jewish converts to Jesus (v. 20). These Jewish converts remained faithful to Jewish laws and customs (vv. 20–21) and continued to practice circumcision. The Council of Jerusalem had dealt with matters related only to Christian Gentiles. Unfortunately, many of these Jewish believers misunderstood Paul's message of justification by faith as a rejection of the Jewish traditions (13:39; 18:13; 21:28). Their concern was not so much about Gentile believers but about Paul encouraging Jews in the Diaspora to reject their Jewish customs. The elders knew that these accusations were false because they did not criticize Paul (21:24).

James and the elders were concerned about Paul's presence among them, fearing that it might provoke the Jews. In the year A.D. 58 the ideas that led to the revolt against Rome that culminated with destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 were already circulating. Strong nationalist undercurrents were agitating the Holy Land, and assassinations were common (v. 38). The turmoil surrounding Paul's ministry had probably been reported to the Sanhedrin (v. 22), and Paul could be accused of endangering the peace and unity of the nation. Again, the accusations were not about Paul's message to the Gentiles, but about what he was assumed to be teaching the Christian Jews.

Instead of defending Paul, James and the elders asked him to demonstrate to his accusers that as a Jew he was not opposed to Jewish law. In a spirit of conciliation, and probably also to protect the converted Gentiles, Paul made the fateful decision to try to be "all things" to everyone (1 Cor. 9:19–23). He saw no reason to oppose his coreligionists for preferring to persist in their religious practices, but only so far as they would not consider these practices a condition for salvation (Acts 13:39). On behalf of all (21:23), the leaders of the Jerusalem church suggested that Paul should join four men who were about to take a vow, most probably a Nazirite vow. According to Numbers 6:1–8, during the vow, which lasted at least one month, the Nazirite was not to cut his or her hair, drink wine, or approach a dead person. At the end of the period, a lamb, a sheep, a ram, a basket of bread, and cakes were presented in the temple as an offering of thanksgiving. Then the Nazirite was to shave his or her head and burn the hair in the fire of the thanksgiving offering (Num. 6:13–18). The elders requested that Paul pay for the expenditures of the four men (Acts 21:24)—an expensive request. Paying from his own money instead of using some of the offering he brought would show that he was sincere in what he was doing, and he later clearly stated that the money was given to his people, the nation of Israel (24:17).

As if that were not enough, James and the elders requested that Paul purify himself as well. It was customary for most Jews to purify themselves in the temple when they returned from a foreign land. Paul would thus demonstrate that he remained a faithful practitioner of Judaism by remaining pure despite living among Gentiles (21:24). His presence at the temple was not contrary to his convictions considering that he had himself made a vow while in Corinth (18:18). To reassure Paul, they confirmed that the decision made in favor of non-Israelites at the Council of Jerusalem was not in question (21:25). Paul met the demands the very next day. He went to the temple with the four men to make arrangements for the date when the sacrificial offerings would be made (v. 26).

21:26–36. Arrested in the Temple. The presence of Paul had not gone unnoticed in the city (v. 29). The Jews from Asia Minor, probably from Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Ephesus, had seen him in the company of Trophimus of Ephesus, one of his traveling companions (20:4). The appropriate moment came when Paul was alone in the temple. They roused the crowd to riot, as they had done in Lystra (14:19), by igniting their nationalistic fervor. They accused Paul of discrediting everywhere the people of Israel and their law and temple (21:27–28). And since such a charge would not have been enough to put him to death, they accused him of having admitted Greeks into the sacred places in the temple, which was strictly forbidden (v. 28). Signs prohibiting Gentiles from trespassing under penalty of death were erected around the courtyard. The Jews seized Paul and tried to lynch him (vv. 21, 32). Extremists and ultranationalist zealots did not hesitate to kill anyone lacking commitment to their cause. Among them were many murderers (v. 38).

Paul was dragged out of the sacred area, lest his blood should stain the sanctity of sacred places, and the doors of the temple were closed (v. 30). The situation was so difficult that the guards of the Antonia Fortress, which adjoined the temple, were alerted. The garrison commander Claudius Lysias (23:26) was informed. The cohorts under his command consisted of between 600 to 1,000 soldiers. Since the Pentecost festivities always brought lots of people to Jerusalem, the Roman guards were on permanent alert, always ready to quell possible riots. Using the stairway linking the fortress to the Temple Mount, the officer took immediate action and rushed into the crowd, which was quick to yield passage to the Roman forces (21:32). Paul was tied at the wrist with two small chains (halysesin), as was Peter when he was earlier tied to two soldiers while in prison (12:6). Luke specifies that the officers acted justly as they sought information regarding the nature of the charges brought against Paul. However, since the crowd was in disarray, they led Paul to the fortress for questioning.

Paul and the Law

While Paul preached justification by faith in Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:28; 4:14–16; Gal. 2:16), salvation by grace (Rom. 6:14; Gal. 2:21), and the inability of the law to save us (Rom. 3:20), including circumcision (Gal. 5:3–4), he upheld the legitimacy of the law (Rom. 3:31; 7:12, 16; 1 Tim. 1:8). It is not a means of salvation but an instrument of condemnation to bring to an end any attempt to obtain salvation through works (Rom. 3:19–20; 7:5–9; 9:31; 1 Cor. 15:56; Gal. 3:10–11). But the law is also a guide for the Christian life that assists believers in their character development (Rom. 2:15; 8:4; Gal. 3:23–24; 5:14, 22–23; Eph. 4:24). Since the law is a law of love (James 2:8; 1 John 5:3; 2 John 1:6) and love is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22), love fulfills the law (Rom. 13:10). Because Paul knew the Ten Commandments were as applicable as they had always been, he continued to rely on the Decalogue to admonish believers (e.g., Rom. 13:9; Eph. 6:2).

21:37—26:32

FOUR DEFENSES OF PAUL

Luke recorded four occasions during which Paul testified to different groups about his experience and faith. He first spoke to the crowd in Jerusalem (21:37—22:21), then to the Sanhedrin (22:22—23:10), next to the Roman governor Felix (24:11–21), and finally to the Jewish king Agrippa (26:2–23). Though the differences between the defenses are at times significant, they were primarily due to adaptations made to reach each audience.

21:37—22:21

Addressing the Mob in Jerusalem

Paul's speech to the people in Jerusalem is composed of four parts: his commitment to the Jewish traditions (22:3–5); his encounter with the risen Lord (vv. 6–11); his conversion and baptism (vv. 12–16); and his mission (vv. 17–21).

21:37—22:2. Paul Asks Permission to Speak. As Paul was about to disappear behind the heavy fortress doors, he addressed the commander in Greek. Though Romans were fluent in Latin, Greek was the language of the higher classes. The commander was surprised because he thought he had arrested an Egyptian who was the ringleader of an insurrection (v. 38). Felix, the procurator, had earlier persued the troublemakers and killed many, but the Egyptian got away. Capturing this Egyptian would have benefited the commander, as it would have greatly impressed his superiors (cf. 23:27). At first Paul did not reveal his Roman citizenship; he was known as a Jew (cf. 16:37–38). Thus, he could reject any charges of illegally entering the temple premises. By reporting that he was from Tarsus, the capital of Cilicia, a city as prestigious for its culture as Alexandria in Egypt and Athens in Greece, he could expect more respect. Intrigued by all this, the Roman officer consented to allow Paul's request to address the crowd (v. 40). In a rather authoritative manner (cf. 12:17; 13:16: 19:33), Paul spoke in Aramaic, the local language, to the fascinated crowd. His speech and demeanor did not manifest anger or revenge.

With great empathy and respect Paul addressed his brothers and fathers, offering them an apology or a defense for his faith (22:1).

22:3–5. Paul, the Jew. Paul summarized his biography in four steps (v. 3). (1) He was born in Tarsus of Cilicia. This fact made him a fellow citizen of his most malicious accusers, the Jews from Asia Minor (21:27). It was as if he were saying, "I am one of your own," while at the same time questioning their attitude toward him. (2) Paul was brought up in Jerusalem, suggesting his family moved from Tarsus to Jerusalem, where he was exposed to the purest Jewish tradition. (3) He was taught by Gamaliel, the famous rabbi who was highly respected by all the people (5:34). As such, not only had Paul learned the Mosaic law, but as a Pharisee he was also trained to follow it strictly. These three steps are the same ones Stephen used when talking about Moses (7:20–22). This biographical information was intended to be a rejection of the accusations that his teachings opposed the law (21:21, 28). (4) Finally, Paul showed his profound loyalty to the Jewish faith through his zeal for God.

Two testimonies corroborated Paul's statements: (1) He persecuted to death the new Way (v. 4) and sent to prison its followers, both men and women. The affront to the dignity of women in wartime was considered a supremely criminal act (Is. 13:16; Amos 1:13). (2) The highest religious authorities of the land, including the high priest and elders, all had supported Paul's zeal (Acts 22:5). It is probable that some were still alive and listening to him. Paul kept alive the memory of his crimes until the end of his life (1 Cor. 15:9; 1 Tim. 1:3), but who can best appreciate the grace of God if not the one who has been forgiven much (1 Tim. 1:14; cf. Luke 7:47).

22:6–16. Paul Encountered the Resurrected Jesus. Paul now dealt with the incident in his life that radically changed him. En route to achieve his nefarious designs in Damascus, Paul was stopped dead in his tracks. Jesus came to him in a glorious event. The statements of Jesus are once again reminiscent of those of Gamaliel (Acts 5:34–39). To persecute the church is to enter into conflict with the divine Messiah (Luke 10:16). Indeed, the reference to light, great or bright and gloriously brilliant, coming from heaven (Acts 22:6, 9, 11), greater than that of the sun (26:13), is a depiction of a theophany (in this case a Christophany). The answer Jesus gave to Paul's question became foundational in his teachings: the crucified Christ is the glorified Christ, and the One in heaven is indeed Jesus of Nazareth (Phil. 2:10). The sudden appearance of Jesus on the road to Damascus involved for Paul more than an exchange of ideas; it was the very source of his gospel (Gal. 1:12). The coming of the Messiah and the resurrection of the dead was, for the Jews, the very sign of the end of this world and the beginning of the new. The vision of the risen Messiah persuaded Paul that the times had been fulfilled (Gal. 4:4), that the old things had passed away (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17), and that believers were at this time invited to enter a new life in the Spirit (Rom. 8:10, 14). Thus, a new era had just begun, though the former endured (Gal. 1:4). While the foundation of his faith was given to him through his encounter with Jesus (Rom. 1:1–6; Gal. 1:16), Paul shared the traditional teachings of the church as they had been transmitted to him (1 Cor. 15:3) by believers such as Ananias, who had baptized him (Acts 9:18–19; 22:16). The character of Ananias is not otherwise known, but he seems to have been respected and appreciated for his spirituality within the Jewish community of Damascus (22:12). The mention of baptism for the forgiveness of sins (v. 16) was intended to bring back to the minds of his Jewish listeners the message of John the Baptist announcing the soon coming of the Messiah. The reference to Ananias and indirectly to John the Baptist served to reinforce Paul's testimony.

The words of Ananias deserve our attention because they are about the divine call and the mission of Paul. Although at first believers referred to God as the God of their fathers or ancestors, the divine intention was that Paul would carry forward the promise given to Abraham that all the nations of the earth would be blessed through him (Gen. 12:3; 18:18). The God of Israel destined Paul to accomplish three things, each expressed through a verb and a compliment (v. 14): (1) To know His will. Paul knew God's will as revealed in the Torah, but now he had to understand God's will as revealed in both the Torah and in Christ. He was gaining a deeper understanding of the God of his fathers and of His plan for humanity. (2) To see the Just or Righteous One. The Christological title "the Just/Righteous One" (Acts 3:14; 7:52) is a reference to the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah 53:11. This statement in context is referring to the encounter that Paul had just had with the risen Jesus outside of Damascus and perhaps to others he would have in the future (e.g., Acts 22:17; 2 Cor. 12:1; Gal. 1:12; Eph. 3:3). But at a deeper level it was the announcement of the profound knowledge Paul would gain concerning the mystery of Christ (Rom. 16:25–26; Eph. 3:4; 1 Tim. 3:16; cf. Eph. 1:7–10; 3:6; 5:32; Col. 1:27; 2:2–3). (3) To listen to the voice/words of God's mouth. To listen (Heb. shama') to the voice of God means to obey Him (shama' is often translated as "obey"; see Ex. 23:21–22; Deut. 13:4; Jer. 40:3; cf. Heb. 3:7). In the OT the people were called to listen to the voice of God, but now the call was to listen to the voice of Christ. This obedience of Paul to the Messiah who appeared to Him on the road to Damascus is comparable to that of God's appearance to Abraham (Acts 7:2), which made him into a witness to all people (22:15). Witnessing is about testifying (v. 18) and the willingness to experience suffering for the Lord (v. 20).

After staying some days in Damascus (Acts 9:19), Paul went to Arabia and later returned to Damascus (Gal. 1:17). Three years later (1:18), after testifying to the Jews of Damascus (Acts 9:20, 22), Paul went to Jerusalem, where he continued to communicate the new way to his fellow Jews (9:28; 26:24).

22:17–21. Vision and Mission in Jerusalem. In continuing his defense, Paul told his listeners about a previous experience he had while praying in the temple. In the context of the current accusation against him of desecrating the temple, he told them that it was there that three years after his conversion Jesus appeared to him in a vision (see Acts 21:28). Up to this point the crowd had listened intensely to his message. That a person received visions and that God spoke to him and sent him on a mission to all people was perfectly consistent with the experience of the forefathers and prophets of old. But what Paul was about to say presented a real challenge. It is the only place where he spoke about it from a position of defense. At first, it might appear that there seems to be a conflict between what Jesus expected of Paul and what he was doing. Indeed Paul, who was sent to preach to all people, ended up in Jerusalem in the company of fellow Jews. He wanted to be with them, and it was to them that he was speaking at this time. He came to Jerusalem, but Jesus told him to leave Jerusalem immediately. He wanted to testify before the Jews, but Jesus told him that his testimony would not be received (v. 18). He wanted to be with his brothers, but Jesus told him to go to the Gentiles (v. 21). But Paul was not resisting his divine calling. He was identifying with the experience of his fellow Jews. He was once where they were. It was solely on account of God's direction that he had taken the gospel to Gentiles (cf. 1 Cor. 9:16; Gal. 1:15–16; Col. 1:25). It was God's plan. He was indirectly trying to persuade them that they, too, should accept that the gospel, the faith of Israel, had now been universalized as a result of the coming of the Messiah in Jesus the Christ.

22:22—23:10

Addressing the Sanhedrin

Paul's audience did not want to listen to him anymore and silenced his voice through loud shouts, violent actions, and calling for his death. They felt deeply offended by Paul's defense and wanted to permanently end his witnessing (vv. 22–23).

22:22–29. Paul's Roman Citizenship. The contrast between the attitude of the Jews in Jerusalem against Paul and the consideration of the Roman authorities is impressive. This portion of the story is in a sense an address to Roman readers. It shows that Paul, who was a Roman citizen, did not hold against them the abuse to which they subjected him. The idea that God would want to send messengers to the Gentiles angered the ultra-nationalism of the Jews. The extreme agitation of the crowd was incomprehensible to the Roman commander. Torture by whipping was the method Romans used to obtain confessions, but that was not permissible against Roman citizens. Unlike the experience in Philippi, this time Paul revealed his identity before the torture. He immediately placed himself on legal ground (v. 25). Becoming a Roman citizen was not easy to achieve. Indeed, Lysias had acquired it during the reign of Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41–54) and had attached, as was the custom, the name of the emperor to his own (Acts 23:26). Paul belonged to a family with Roman roots for a long time; he was a Roman by birth (22:28).

22:30—23:10. The Sanhedrin Is Divided. Since the commander was unable to obtain a confession by torture, he released Paul from his bonds and decided to have him appear before the Sanhedrin (v. 30). His intention was not to allow the Jewish court to reach a verdict (cf. 23:10) but to better understand the accusations against Paul (23:28) in order to prepare a report for the governor.

Unlike a culprit, Paul did not look downcast. Instead, he was able to look the various members of the council straight in the eye (23:1). In fact, although he had not been in Jerusalem for six years and was many more years removed from the circles of Jewish power, he may have recognized some of his former acquaintances. Instead of addressing them as rulers and elders (Acts 4:8) or fathers (7:2), he chose to call them brothers. In doing this, he intended to remind them that he had once been in their position and that he still considered himself one of them. He began his defense by stating that He had lived his life as a law-abiding Jew and therefore his conscience before God was clear (v. 1). The expression Paul used in v. 1—politeuomai—means to live as a good citizen (Phil. 1:27), hence denying on his part any disruptive social behavior offensive to God and to others (Acts 21:28, 38).

Apparently offended at Paul's claim of innocence, the high priest Ananias ordered the bailiffs (cf. John 18:22) to strike Paul on the mouth (Acts 23:2). Ananias—not to be confused with Ananias of Damascus or with Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas—was an ambitious and cruel man. He had been elevated to the esteemed position of high priest by Herod of Chalcis, brother of Herod Agrippa I, and his pro-Roman sentiments allowed him to serve as high priest for over a decade (A.D. 47–59). His friendship with the Romans got him murdered later by assassins hired by his own son at the outbreak of the Jewish revolt a decade. The highest spiritual authority of Israel was simply interested in shutting the mouth of a prophet God had sent to proclaim to him the good news of salvation.

Paul reacted vigorously to this physical insult (v. 3; cf. John 18:23). The mention of the whitewashed wall is a reference to Ezekiel 13:10–15, where the prophet denounced false prophets, whom he compared to plastered-over walls of Jerusalem in an attempt to hide the obvious spiritual cracks instead of returning to God for total reconstruction. The words of the prophet included threats from God, just as Paul's did. Like prophets claiming to be speaking on God's behalf while telling lies, Ananias claimed to be judging according to the law while actually doing the opposite.

One might wonder why Paul did not recognize the high priest until informed of his identity. Three reasons might explain this detail: he had poor eyesight (Gal. 4:14–15; 6:11); the trial was not held in the courthouse where the high priest normally sat; or Ananias was not wearing the traditional garb of his function. But perhaps the idea was that the high priest was not recognizable because his conduct was inconsistent with his function.

On hearing the charge of blasphemy brought against him (as high priest Ananias was supposed to represent God), Paul defended himself. Not only did he not know who Ananias was, but also, as a faithful observer of the law, he cited

Exodus 22:28. It is true that the text refers to civil, not religious, authority; however, since the return from exile, the high priest had been given almost supreme authority. By quoting Scripture Paul showed his knowledge of the law as well as his willingness to live in accordance with its precepts.

Unable to rely on the fairness of the high priest, who failed to follow the recommendations of Deuteronomy (Deut. 13:14; 17:4), Paul addressed the assembly composed of both Sadducees and Pharisees. He was not attempting to manipulate or sidetrack the proceedings by addressing the assembly. Instead, he used the positive attitude of many Pharisees by calling himself a Pharisee and the son of Pharisees. In fact, while he showed himself more Roman than the commander, he also showed himself more Pharisee than the Pharisees because he was the son of a Pharisee. The day before, he had introduced himself as a disciple of Gamaliel, and the story he told about his vision of the risen Christ raised no objection from Pharisees. The Pharisees believed in the resurrection of the dead on the basis of Job 19:25–27, Isaiah 26:18–19, Ezekiel 37:1–14, and Daniel 12:1–3. Paul was merely displacing the debate from the secular, where there was no substance for argument, to the level of religion, particularly to the topic of the hope of the resurrection of the dead (Acts 23:6). Instead of remaining cautious, as did Gamaliel, the Pharisees sided vigorously with Paul (v. 9). The ruckus and commotion that ensued became such that the commander in charge of the security of a Roman citizen began to fear for Paul's life and ordered the police to take him back to the fortress (v. 10). To deliver Peter from prison God had sent an angel (5:19; 12:7); to deliver him from the Sanhedrin He had sent Gamaliel and a Roman commander. God's help can sometimes come in surprising ways.

Addressing a Roman Administrator

Paul needed encouragement. Although he was a man of prayer dedicated to Jesus and the mission, he also experienced discouragement. He was not alone in the barracks; the Lord was with him, ready to encourage him. God comes to us in our most difficult moments to comfort us and to prepare us for our next service for Him.

23:11–22. The Plot against Paul. During the night the Lord came to Paul's side (v. 11). It must have been a wonderful privilege to rub shoulders with the living Christ. Did not Jesus promise to be with His servants until the end of the world (Matt. 28:20)? Jesus gave Paul credit for his courage to testify on His behalf in Jerusalem in obedience to what He told Paul in a previous vision (Acts 22:18). Now Jesus told him that he would also witness for Him in Rome. No obstacle could possibly prevent the mission from moving forward. Paul would go to Rome to testify there (19:21).

Unfortunately, the powers of darkness were not about to give up. A group of Jewish conspirators, perhaps associated with the Zealots (also called the Sicarii), got carried away with hatred and vowed to eliminate Paul. Their vow not to eat or drink demonstrates the extent of their fanaticism and suggests they planned to act soon. The problem was that Paul was being kept in the safety of the Antonia Fortress. They needed to find a way to get him out of there. The assassins approached the Jewish leaders (see 4:5) and informed them of their plan (23:14). Although Acts does not state the reaction of the chief priests and elders, it is implied that they agreed to join the conspiracy against Paul. One can only feel dismay for the deplorable condition of the religious authorities at that time.

The subterfuge of the assassins' plan in regard to the Sanhedrin was subtle. It exempted the Sanhedrin from all liability while remaining free to pursue their project. A ploy of some kind was required because the Sanhedrin had no legal right to put to death a convict, let alone a Roman citizen. In addition, the demand to investigate the matter further (diaginōskō—v. 15) was legitimate, given the confusion that occurred following the previous investigation.

Somehow news of the conspiracy leaked out. We do not know how it happened, but Paul's nephew became aware of the ambush that was planned. Before his conversion, Paul had been sympathetic with those who advocated the use of violence to purify Israel, so perhaps members of his family continued to have ties with such individuals—or at least connections with others who did. We do not know if Paul's family members in Jerusalem had become Christians. In any case, his nephew does not appear to have been a fanatic; otherwise he would not have risked his life to expose the conspiracy. As we have already seen, God does not always send angels to protect us; He might also send a brother, a friend, or even a stranger.

Paul did not suffer a sentence as severe as that of Peter (Acts 12:6), for he was allowed visitors while he was under arrest (cf. 28:17, 30–31). Although Jesus had told him he would go to Rome (23:11), Paul did not stand idly by, waiting for yet another miracle. Instead, the arrival of his nephew was for him a sign that he should take immediate action. He called one of the centurions and asked him to lead the young man to the commander (v. 17). He knew how easy it would have been for his nephew to be denounced before the Sanhedrin, so he did not give any reason for requesting such a meeting. Presumably one can assume that because of the same concern the commander took the boy aside (v. 19) and asked him not to tell anyone about the plot (v. 22). The Jewish authorities had sufficient connections with the Roman authorities to create trouble for the commander if they knew that he had sided with Paul. The commander also could have faced serious accusations for allowing the assassination of a Roman citizen. The clash between Roman guards and real or potential conspirators could easily have degenerated into a massive uprising. Claudius Lysias had to take immediate action. After all, dealing with this matter appropriately might also contribute to his personal advancement. Even the personal ambitions and interests of people can be used by the Lord to accomplish His design for us.

23:23–35. Sent to Felix. The precautions the commander took are impressive. He gathered 470 men (v. 23), half of his garrison, to safely take Paul to Caesarea. Presumably, he might have wanted to remove Paul from his jurisdiction as soon as possible to avoid a Jewish revolt. In any case, the commander did not have legal power to do anything to stop the plot, free Paul, or remove him from his jurisdiction. Thus, Lysias referred Paul to his superior. Unaware of the standing of his prisoner, he chose to play it safe by avoiding any possible reprimand. This story made it possible for Luke to establish how carefully the Romans protected their citizens at that time, even those of the Christian faith. Paul traveled on horseback like a person of import (v. 24), while most of the troops had to walk.

Claudius Lysias wrote a letter in Latin, of which the basic message is provided in Acts (vv. 26–30). It was his duty to report on the charges made against the prisoner. He exposed the matter to his advantage and somewhat distorted the facts because he had learned about Paul's Roman citizenship only after his intervention, not before. Out of this report we gather the following points: The Sanhedrin abused its power by planning to kill Paul (Acts 23:27); Paul was innocent (v. 29); he deserved protection because he was a Roman citizen (v. 27); and a plot was threatening Paul's life (v. 30). All these elements could play in Paul's favor when he would later appear before Caesar.

The company left at night (9:00 p.m.) bound for Antipatris, about thirty-seven miles (60 km) away. Then the seventy horsemen traveled the remaining thirty-one miles (50 km) to Caesarea with Paul while the infantrymen returned to Jerusalem.

Caesarea was the seat of the central administration for the Roman province of Judea. It was a strategic city on the edge of the sea, which would have made it possible for the procurator to escape by way of the sea in the event of an uprising. Governor Felix seemed rather embarrassed by the arrival of the prisoner. As with Pilate's dealings with Jesus, he asked Paul which administration had the jurisdiction over his case (v. 34; cf. Luke 23:6–7). When he learned Paul was from Cilicia, Felix decided to handle the case himself (vv. 34–35). Since eastern Cilicia, like Judea, was officially under the supervision of the Roman legate in Syria at the time, there was no reason to send Paul anywhere else.

While Felix could have referred the case directly to the legate in Syria, he likely did not want to run the risk of bothering his superior with a relatively minor matter. Besides, if things worked out, he hoped he might be able to extract money from Paul in return for his freedom (see Acts 24:26). Until Felix could meet with Paul's accusers, the governor ordered that Paul be held in the Praetorium, a palace built by Herod the Great that had become the official residence of governors. Meanwhile, Lysias informed the Sanhedrin that Paul had been legitimately transferred to the governor. God did not produce miracles to allow Paul to continue his mission, but He preserved Paul's life from those who wished to kill him (24:27).

24:1–9. Accused of Sedition. Paul lived in peace for five days in Caesarea in the governor's palace. The high priest Ananias took advantage of this time to gather a few Sadducee accomplices, including Tertullus, a rhetorician and lawyer familiar with Roman law. He was probably Roman, considering his Latin name. The fact that the high priest Ananias went to Caesarea himself demonstrates how important this case was to the religious authorities in Jerusalem. They wanted a guilty verdict, and they hoped that such a prestigious group of Jewish dignitaries would influence Felix accordingly.

Tertullus began his speech with thanksgiving in honor of Felix (vv. 2–3). It is impressive that Luke would so carefully report what these people said considering their unreliable character. This adds credibility to the veracity of Luke's historical account. Indeed, Felix is praised for the peace he was procuring (v. 2) while the country was undergoing several rebellions (cf. Acts 21:38), for reforms (v. 2) that brought prosperity, and for widespread support of the people (v. 3) while many Jews were rebelling against him.

Felix seemed to show signs of impatience with so much hypocritical flattery. Tertullus decided to end his opening words (v. 4) and to deal with the matters at hand. Three complaints were raised against Paul: The first accusation was the most important because it was designed to show that Paul was a threat to the public order (v. 5), a matter of great interest to Rome. Paul, he said, created strife or insurrection among the Jews. Paul was then accused of being the leader of a sect, that of the Nazarenes (v. 5). This made him a most dangerous person. Lastly, it was stated that Paul had desecrated the temple (v. 6), which legally required the death penalty. Verses 6b–8a are not found in some Greek manuscripts. They convey further details of Tertullus's attempts at accusation, adding that the Sanhedrin had not been able to try Paul because Lysias took him from their control and then asked them to come to see Felix (vv. 7–8a). A charge was thus brought against the commander of Jerusalem in order to discredit or reduce the value of his official report. But Tertullus erred on a matter of the law. He said that Lysias requested the accusers to appear before Felix, but in fact he had never made that request. The scene was all the more preposterous in that the Jews who were present were fully corroborating the lawyer's statements.

However, Felix was not fooled. The charges were far too vague, and the request to further investigate the matter allowed Felix to handle the matter without losing face and to drag the case on for two years. It was a way to bury the issue. Felix satisfied the Jews with the promise not to release Paul (v. 27). But he granted Paul relative freedom (v. 23).

24:10–21. Defense before Felix. The defense of the apostle was in keeping with the rules of Roman law. It attempted to show the following: the complaint had no reason to be presented to Felix because it was not a matter of public law but a simple religious dispute; the accusers failed to present any evidence of wrongdoing; the detention of Paul lacked a legal basis. After being granted authorization by the governor to speak, as required by Roman law, Paul began his defense. The moderation of his introduction contrasts greatly with the flattery of Tertullus. Felix had been in his post for a half dozen years and was sufficiently aware of the situation in the province for Paul to trust him.

Paul began by refuting the accusations of the Sanhedrin by providing the facts of the case that could be easily verified. Since Tertullus indicated that what he said was verifiable (24:8), Paul suggested to Felix to go ahead and actually check the facts (v. 11). Paul indicated that an investigation should be relatively easy considering the fact that Paul had been present in Jerusalem for only twelve days—clearly, not enough time to organize a mutiny (v. 11). Paul had come to Jerusalem for the sole purpose of worshiping, as pilgrims did during Passover (v. 11), he had caused no incident in the temple, in synagogues, or in any part of the city (v. 12), and no evidence could be brought forth to validate the charges (v. 13).

In the second part of his defense Paul provided a confession of faith. He happened to be in the very condition Jesus had predicted (Matt. 10:17–18). His confession was deserving of special attention because it shed a great deal of light on the nature of Christianity. The people of Israel considered Deuteronomy 6:4 their confession of faith: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one." Christians specified in a form of confession that "Jesus Christ is Lord" (Phil. 2:11). This public confession of faith (1 Tim. 6:12) is a requirement for salvation (Rom. 10:9–10) and is at the heart of worship (Phil. 2:10; Heb. 13:15). It was not, however, in competition with the Israelite confession of faith.

Paul confessed that he worshiped the God of his ancestors. Thus, his faith was not in opposition to Judaism but was anchored on the message of the Law and the Prophets (Acts 24:14). It is interesting to note that had he rejected the Sabbath in favor of Sunday, as is sometimes suggested today by modern scholars of early Christianity, he could not have made such a claim. The fact that his accusers did not focus on this critical point of Jewish life is yet more evidence that there was no such early change. Paul also testified that Christianity is a path, a way of life, a halakah, not a political movement (v. 14); that this path involves moral obligations considering that judgment will follow the resurrection of the dead (v. 15); and that he strove to live with a clear conscience, one offending neither God nor humans (v. 16). Therefore, his case did not fall within the realm of public policy but in the realm of religious thought and schooling.

In the third part, Paul counterattacked the arguments of the members of the Sanhedrin who were present: They had accused him of being as undesirable as a plague (v. 5), when in reality he came to Jerusalem to bring offerings to his nation (v. 17). They accused him of creating dissension (v. 5), when in fact, Jews from Asia Minor attacked him (v. 18). They accused him of defiling the temple (v. 6), when in fact he was in the temple to cleanse himself (v. 18). They said that they were judging him in accordance with the law (v. 6), when in fact they had silenced key witnesses (v. 19; cf. Deut. 17:6; 19:15).

Finally, Paul brought an argument that must have surprised his accusers. Faith in the resurrection of the dead was widely shared by the Jews. Some believed only in the resurrection of the righteous, but only the Sadducees denied all forms of resurrection. That was exactly the position of his accusers. Thus, Paul confronted head-on the position of the Sanhedrin regarding the resurrection. In believing in the resurrection, Paul was being more faithful to the Jewish faith than his accusers. They were being unfaithful to tradition. His accusers remained silent. Felix, who was knowledgeable about these things (24:22), must have smiled at the skill of Paul's legal self-defense.

24:22–27. Felix Procrastinates. Felix was clearly embarrassed, but he knew that the Sanhedrin had the right to complain before the emperor. Whether the complaints were justifiable or not, the simple fact that this problem was under his jurisdiction could affect his professional advancement. Cleverly, Felix took advantage of Tertullus's suggestion to verify his report (24:8). The lawyer had expected Felix to believe him. But Felix had read the report of the commander, and it was different from the lawyer's declaration. This allowed Felix to buy time and to embarrass the Jews because they could have imagined very well what Lysias would say. So the announcement was made that additional information was needed (v. 22). Felix could not release Paul without incurring the wrath of the Sanhedrin. Moreover, he could not release Paul to the Sanhedrin without risking the accusation of having failed to care for a Roman citizen. So he kept Paul in a safe place in relative freedom.

In his confession, Paul did not mention the name of Jesus, but Luke suggests that Felix was aware of the problems between Christians and Jews not only because he was a political leader but particularly because his second wife, Drusilla, was Jewish (v. 24). Paul's reference to the Way (v. 14) was a clear allusion to Jesus and His teachings. Additionally, Felix knew that Paul was speaking about Jesus because he had intended to ask him about faith in Christ (v. 24). Paul preached salvation by grace, but he was clearly not speaking of cheap grace, because he also dealt with the moral and ethical implications of salvation (v. 25). Interestingly, in this scene the accused appears full of courage, and the judge is afraid. For two years Felix had the opportunity to hear the gospel. He seemed interested, considering that he conversed with Paul several times, but he lacked the courage to make a decision for Jesus. Instead, he plunged into greater evil by suggesting that Paul should pay a ransom to be released, something that Roman law officially forbade and that Paul was not willing to do (v. 26).

Felix missed the opportunity God provided him. The arrival of Porcius Festus was a bad omen because Felix had to leave his office. Emperor Nero had summoned him to Rome following a complaint made by a delegation of Jews. Indeed, Felix had been brutal in his repression of riots in Caesarea. To avoid making things worse, he left Paul in prison (v. 27). Finally, Nero dismissed Felix from his functions because of all his wrongdoings. His brother Pallas attempted to defend him, but Pallas was poisoned. About Felix, nothing further is said in history.

25:1—26:32

Addressing Agrippa: A Jewish King

Festus went to Jerusalem to visit its citizens. As was often the case when a new leader was appointed, the Sanhedrin made a motion on a point that the predecessor may have failed to grant. In this case, they requested a retrial for Paul. This request resulted in the decision to send Paul to Rome.

25:1–12. Paul Appeals to Caesar. The Jewish leaders feared that Festus, an official known for his integrity, might choose to release Paul because no charges had yet been filed against him. Resentment against Paul was obviously still alive, and the assassination project was reinstated (v. 3). Festus did not want to give the impression of being weak. He decided not to make a legal decision while in Jerusalem but promised to rule on the day following his return to Caesarea (v. 6). As a good lawyer, he requested that those who were qualified for the occasion should come down to Caesarea for the prosecution. The name of the high priest Ananias is not mentioned because he had been deposed toward the end of the reign of Felix and replaced with a man named Ishmael son of Phiabi.

Once again, accusations without evidence were brought against Paul. According to Paul's defense (v. 8), the accusations were always the same ones: he was against the Jewish tradition, the temple, and Rome (21:28; 24:5–6). The Jews requested a favor (24:3), and Festus tried to compromise by granting it (25:9). He was willing to allow the trial to take place in Jerusalem. This would have made it possible for him to resolve the problem as rapidly as possible. However, he stipulated that the judgment had to take place in his presence in order to safeguard the rights of Roman citizenship.

Paul was not willing to return to Jerusalem and refused the compromise. Instead of remaining passive, waiting for a turn of events in his favor, Paul appealed to Caesar. The risen Lord had told him that he would go to Rome, and he was ready to go (23:11). Roman law allowed any Roman citizen to refer any matter of conviction deemed unfair to the emperor. Paul had not yet been tried, but he was threatened in front of the governor, therefore he was already legally in Caesar's court (24:10). The appeal was therefore a mere extension of his current situation. Festus was uncomfortable because he had no evidence to provide to the emperor (cf. 25:26). He called a meeting of the court, but he eventually preferred to rid himself of a burning issue by accepting Paul's appeal to the emperor.

25:13–27. Paul before Agrippa. Paul remained in prison for a few days before departing for Rome. Plans had to be made for the transfer not only of Paul but also of other prisoners to Rome (27:1). In the meantime, King Herod Agrippa II and his sister Bernice arrived for a courtesy visit to welcome Festus as the new leader. Agrippa, whose full name was Marcus Julius Agrippa, was the son of Herod Agrippa, whose death was reported in Acts 12:20–23, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. He was thirty-two years old at the time he arrived in Caesarea. His sister Bernice was a year younger, and as a widow she went to live with her brother, with whom she was accused of having an incestuous relationship. During the war with Rome she became the mistress of Titus.

Festus was largely unfamiliar with Jewish affairs and doctrinal issues. He took advantage of the opportunity to ask Agrippa—a Jew to whom Rome had granted the responsibility of appointing the high priests—to help him better understand the charges against Paul. Agrippa was supposed to be knowledgeable of the Jewish religion, so it seemed like an opportune situation. In reviewing the case with Agrippa, Festus noted that Paul was right to refuse a return to Jerusalem to be tried (25:9–11) because he would have clearly been handed over to the Jews (v. 16), and since they were intent on murdering him (v. 3), a transfer to Jerusalem would have been a sentence without trial.

The challenge for Festus was that he recognized that the charges were related not to Roman law (v. 18) but to the Jewish religion and that in this regard he was too ignorant to decide. However, he understood the nature of the debate, which he summarized by saying that the matter was about a certain Jesus, who died but whom Paul believed was alive (v. 19). This happens to be the foundation of the Christian faith, yet it was incomprehensible to a Roman official (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18, 23). Paul had appealed to the emperor, but he continued to be held temporarily in Caesarea (Acts 25:21). Festus's request for Agrippa's help flattered his pride. Indeed, this gave him an opportunity to make himself important. Agrippa decided to grant Paul an audience. The next day he appeared garbed in his most beautiful pageantry in the auditorium, where the questioning was to take place (v. 23). He showed the same interest for Paul his great-grandfather had shown toward Jesus (Luke 23:8).

Festus took the opportunity to invite the celebrities of the city of Caesarea (Acts 25:23), local members of the Greek and Jewish aristocracy alongside the military commanders of the five cohorts of auxiliary soldiers at the governor's disposal. Thus, just as previous enemies Herod and Pilate became friends during the arrest of Jesus (Luke 23:12), Festus attempted to reconcile Jews and Romans during Paul's trial. Bound in chains (Acts 26:29), Paul was introduced to the assembly. Festus confirmed Lysias's report and emphasized the paradoxical nature of this meeting. For the third time Paul was declared innocent of the charges against him (23:29; 25:18, 25). Pilate had done the same thing to Jesus (Luke 23:4, 14, 22). Just as Jesus had to appear before Herod the Great (Luke 23:8–11), Paul had to appear before Herod Agrippa II. Festus had handed over the charge of the debate to Agrippa. In reporting these facts Luke emphasizes the unreasonableness of the suspicions brought against Christian missionaries, whose activities were not illegal considering that they were limited to matters of religious teachings. For the reader, this case is a confrontation between the lord of Festus and the Lord of Paul.

26:1–11. Paul's Early Life. King Agrippa took charge of the session with caution. He used an impersonal form of speech to inform Paul that he could speak: epitrepetai—"You have permission" or "it is permitted," rather than "I allow you," in order to include Festus in the role of chairman. In accordance with the custom of the time, Paul may have raised his hand with three fingers up and two folded down. He began with a statement of courtesy. He could speak more freely to the king than he did before Festus since the litigation was regarding religious issues about which Agrippa was well informed (v. 3).

Paul's first line of defense was to show that in spite of the fact that he was accused by Jews, he was not in conflict with the Jews because he was one of them, using the terms "my" and "our" to allude to his identity with them (vv. 4–7). Within his nation Paul had acquired quite a significant reputation. Since his youth the people of Jerusalem had been aware of the fact that he had been a zealous, activist Pharisee (vv. 4–5). If these people were willing to testify honestly, they would be not against him but for him. His argument was about the hope he shared with them regarding God's promised Messiah. Behind these remarks we can detect an implied call to the Roman courts to be cautious not to accuse Christians of incivility or social crimes when in reality the problems they faced were motivated by Jewish religious concerns.

Paul had not yet specified the nature of the promise and hope about which he was talking. His purpose was to first demonstrate that this promise represented the very essence of Jewish faith and religion (v. 7). This faith was founded on the belief in the resurrection of the dead (v. 8) and the last judgment (cf. 24:15, 25) shared by all Pharisees. The controversy was not whether God raises the dead (26:8) but whether to believe that the resurrection of Jesus was indeed the fulfillment of God's promise and that consequently He was the promised Messiah (cf. 13:32; 23:6; 24:14–15; 28:20, 23). It was therefore with great zeal that Paul had been proclaiming Jesus as the promised Messiah. Paul also talked about his involvement in the death of Stephen and the persecution of many other Christians and indicated that he did all of these things on behalf of the high priests (26:9–10; cf. 9:1–2). We also learn that he had been obsessedly enraged against Christians in the synagogues and had compelled them to blaspheme (26:11)—or perhaps, according to some translators and interpreters, he tried to compel them to blaspheme. Speaking ill of Jesus (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3) was considered a blasphemy against God.

After describing the darkness of his past conduct, Paul described the light of the revelation that came to him on his way to Damascus. This rather long report was intended to help listeners to better understand the radical change he experienced in his life. By persecuting Paul, were they now not committing the same error Paul committed in his past?

26:12–23. Paul Recounts His Conversion. This section is divided into three parts (see vv. 12–18, 19–21, 22–23). Each one of these parts comprises four elements: the vision of Jesus, Paul's ministry, his message, and his listeners and their response.

1. The Vision of Jesus. This is Luke's third account of Paul's encounter with Jesus on the road to Damascus (cf. Acts 9:3–22; 22:3–16). Apart from minor differences compared to previous accounts, this one is theologically significant and deserves special attention. Four actions highlight the first section: Paul traveled (26:12), he saw (v. 13), he heard (v. 14), and he spoke (v. 15). Paul had left on a trip, but he was not traveling on the right path. Christianity is the Way (24:14), the way of salvation (16:17), but Paul was on the way of darkness as he traveled to Damascus. He was not following "the way of the Lord" (18:25; 19:9, 23). He was persecuting the children of God (26:10) and was pushing them to blaspheme God (v. 11). But while on this dark way he saw a light (v. 13). It enlightened Paul because that light was Jesus (v. 15) and the light of the gospel that he was called to proclaim (v. 23). Paul heard the voice of the heavenly Christ in the innermost of his being, speaking in his native tongue (Hebrew or Aramaic). His words were taken by Paul to be a helpful message from God (v. 22; cf. 1 Tim. 1:16). This voice made it possible for him to walk on the right path.

2. Paul's Ministry. Jesus instructed Paul to rise up and stand. He appeared to him in order to make him a servant/minister and a witness of what he had seen and what God would reveal to him (Acts 26:16). Here, the definition of Christian ministry is given, which is to be witnesses of the resurrection and the teachings of Jesus. To be a witness is not just a matter of reporting facts; it implies being filled and compelled by these facts. Paul's conversion is a testimony to the truthfulness of his message. The call becomes almost irresistible, something he could not disobey (26:19; cf. Gal. 1:16). He could not do anything else but to stand and testify for the Messiah. Paul did not resist the call of God on his life (Acts 26:22), and as such he fulfilled the divine plan that was intended for him before he was born (Gal. 1:15–16). Paul implied that his audience and readers should do as he did.

3. Paul's Message. God's message carried by Paul had become the testimony of his own experience. He had personally passed from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to that of God (Acts 26:18)—an experience that led him to invite others to repent and convert (v. 20). The call to repentance is needed because faith in the resurrection of Jesus is deeply connected to the last judgment (17:30–31; cf. Dan. 12:2; John 5:29; 2 Pet. 3:7; Rev. 20:11–13). And the call to conversion is a challenge to live a new life of faith. The resurrection of Jesus brought the light of life to both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 26:23). God wants sinners not to die but to repent and enjoy true life (cf. Deut. 30:19; Is. 18:23; 33:11; Col. 2:4–6; 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9). Paul's message was consistent with the teachings of Moses and the prophets (Acts 26:22).

4. Paul's Listeners and Their Response. On the basis of Galatians 2:7–8, Paul has been considered the apostle to the Gentiles. This is not exactly the understanding Luke conveys. Not only was Peter called by God to bring the gospel to both Jews and a Gentile (Cornelius), but Paul also claimed to have been given a message that was universal. He was sent (Acts 26:17; cf. Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 9:1; Gal. 1:1), like all the apostles (Matt. 28:19), to preach to both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 26:17; cf. 22:21) from Damascus to Jerusalem, from Judea to other nations (26:20), to the small and the great alike (v. 22), bringing light to all people, whether Jews or Gentiles (v. 23). The light was not his own, but it appeared to him on the road to Damascus. Jesus was indeed the Servant of the Lord described as the One who was to become a light to all nations (Is. 49:6). Like Jeremiah, Paul was called from the womb (Jer. 1:5; cf. Gal. 1:15). Like him, he became a prophet to all nations (Jer. 1:5). Like Jeremiah (Jer. 1:10) Paul's mission was to build and to plant (Jer. 1:10; 1 Cor. 3:6; 14:3, 4, 17; Eph. 2:20, 22). His prophetic mission and authority were unquestionable. Paul's testimony was not given without struggle. It took the power of God to deliver him (Acts 26:17) from those who wanted to kill him (v. 21). The listeners' response to his message was similar to the response his Master had endured.

26:24–32. Reactions to Paul's Defense. Festus reacted in a similar way as the Athenians had (17:32). Apparently, it was inconceivable to him that a dead person could be raised from the grave. This was folly to the Gentiles (1 Cor. 1:23). He attributed Paul's teachings to mental damage (Acts 26:24) that his academic training had done to him (2:13). Someone who is not willing to listen to the voice of God may come up with strange reasons to justify decisions (e.g., Acts 2:13). Paul answered Festus respectfully, telling him that what he said was truthful and reasonable (26:25), the two pillars of philosophy. He told Agrippa that his teachings about Jesus were well known and that he was fully aware of them (v. 26).

Paul was not just a debater but a person interested in the salvation of the perishing. As such, he indirectly made an appeal to Agrippa. Paul was convinced that the king believed in the prophets and that he probably believed in the resurrection, although not in the resurrection of Jesus. The king's answer is difficult to translate (Acts 26:28). It can be translated, "You almost [oligos—"little" or "short"] persuade me to become a Christian," "In a short time you will persuade me," or "Are you trying to persuade me in such a short time?" Paul appealed also to the audience, sharing his prayer to God that Agrippa as well as all the other hearers would become a Christian like he was himself (v. 29). He wanted for all of them to have what he received from the Lord. In order to release any possible tension, he added with a touch of wistful humor, "except for these chains" (v. 29). The embarrassment of Agrippa became obvious, and not knowing what else to say, he rose to end a risky dialogue. Clearly, Paul was innocent of the charges raised against him (v. 31). What Agrippa did not know was that it was God's plan to take Paul to Rome.

The finale of this court appearance anticipates what is to come in the book of Acts. Paul was made a prisoner in Rome, but this fact did not prevent him from fulfilling his ministry (28:30–31). Paul remained a prisoner without charges ever being registered against him (25:26) after being found innocent several times (26:32). The situation was simply unreasonable (25:27). An appeal to a higher court was possible only in the event of an unjust sentence. But God sometimes uses human absurdity to carry out His plans (23:11). Thus, Paul was able to go safely to Rome without fear of assault by zealots.

27:1—28:31

FROM CAESAREA TO ROME

Luke concludes his book with an account of Paul's journey from his prison in Caesarea to his prison in Rome. The narrative can be divided in five parts: sailing into a storm (27:1–44); Paul's mission to the Gentiles in Malta (28:1–10); Christians welcoming him in Rome (28:11–16); Paul's mission among the Jews (28:17–29); and Paul's universal mission (28:30–31). The message Luke intended to convey through this narrative will also be explored.

27:1–44

Adventures on the Sea

The time had finally come for Paul to leave for Rome. It appears that Luke was traveling with Paul (notice his use of "we" and "us"), along with Aristarchus (v. 2; cf. Col. 4:10; Philem. 24). However, Luke also appears to have been absent some of the time because he uses the third person plural ("they") in Acts 27:13–17, 27–29, 36–44.

27:1–8. The Voyage to Rome Begins. The trip is consistent with the sailing routes in the eastern Mediterranean Sea that took into account the prevailing winds. The vessels followed a circular course connecting Alexandria to Sidon, Ephesus, Corinth, Syracuse, and Rome. From Rome the ships sailed to Carthage or returned to Alexandria along the African coast of Cyrenaica. Paul and his companions thus left the secondary port of Caesarea bound for Sidon, where larger ships anchored. The prisoners were in the custody of a Roman officer named Julius of the Imperial Cohort; its importance is indicated by the use of the name of Augustus (v. 1). Julius was very considerate of Paul throughout the trip (v. 32) and even saved his life (v. 43). At Sidon, where all passengers disembarked, Julius treated Paul humanely (philanthrōpōs—"benevolently"), even allowing him to enjoy the company of friends, who may have been Christians in that city (v. 3; see 11:19; Luke 6:17).

An atmospheric depression brought strong headwinds on the seas, and the ships were compelled to continue along the coast while waiting for a change of weather. They managed to reach Myra, a port in Lycia. Fortunately, the centurion found a strong Alexandrian ship going to Italy—a kind of passenger cargo ship that could take on two hundred and seventy-six people in addition to a load of wheat (Acts 27:38). Egypt, from which it had come, was at that time one of the major granaries of the empire. Despite the vessel's power, the journey was very slow and painful (vv. 7–8), but it finally took them to a place properly called "Good Port" or "Fair Havens."

27:9–12. Paul's Warning Ignored. During the months between November and March, there was hardly any navigation in the Mediterranean Sea. Since compasses did not exist at that time, navigation was by sight along coasts and islands by daylight or by the stars by night. Luke dates the time of the year using the Jewish calendar by indicating that the Day of Atonement ("the Fast") had already passed (v. 9). It was celebrated on the tenth of the month of Tishri, in late September or early October. Paul, who had experienced shipwrecks before (2 Cor. 11:25), urged them not to pursue the trip because it was too dangerous (Acts 27:10). But the Roman officer chose to trust the knowledge of the helmsman or pilot and the owner of the ship. Following their advice would, in case of an accident, help him to justify his decision to his superiors. But the shipmaster and the captain had their good reasons to move on. By remaining too long in the ship's hold during the wet winter season, wheat was likely to be damaged and unsellable. Although the port was known as "Fair Havens," they found it unsuitable (v. 12) to sustain their cargo. They decided to reach the island of Crete, where they could store the wheat in granaries throughout the winter. By choosing to leave despite Paul's advice, the two men reluctantly suffered what they had wanted to avoid: the loss of goods (vv. 10, 21, 38). The best human calculations can result in failure when one lacks faith and confidence in the prophetic word. The second part of the narrative will show that confidence in the words of God's messengers brings salvation.

27:13–44. In the Tempest. The ship was facing such strong and threatening headwinds that only total trust in God would make it possible for all passengers to survive. The story is organized as follows: (1) salvation by works is always doomed (vv. 13–20); (2) the message comes from heaven (vv. 21–26); (3) solidarity is necessary for success (vv. 27–32); (4) the communion or sharing of bread (vv. 33–38); and (5) salvation for all (vv. 39–44).

1. The Failure of Human Efforts. The main problem facing the travelers was the strong wind, which Luke refers to by various designations: anemos—"wind" (vv. 4, 7, 15); notos—"the south wind" (v. 13); eurakylōn, or as in some manuscripts euroklydōn—"a strong northeast wind" or "Northeaster" (v. 14), which is described in the same verse as an anemos typhōnikos—"a tempestuous wind," "hurricane wind" or "typhoon." In sum, the crew did not know which wind they should depend on and ended up encountering a northeastern wind that pushed them back where they came from. By not listening to the will of God as Paul expressed it, they faced a storm (see Jon. 1:3–4; cf. Pss. 61:3; 91:1). They finally found refuge near an island called "Clauda" or "Cauda" (Acts 27:16). Thinking themselves masters of their destiny, they engaged in superhuman efforts to save themselves. They allowed the ship to drift and hoisted the lifeboat with difficulty because it was probably filled with water (v. 16). Then they reinforced the ship by stringing cables (v. 17), probably already in place, and tightened them using winches; they lowered the sails (v. 17) because they feared being stranded on the sandy coast of Cyrenaica in North Africa; and they lightened the ship by throwing overboard all unnecessary baggage (v. 18) but kept the cargo food of grain and wheat (v. 38), all too important to be lost. The sailors were exhausted from the work, so the travelers helped them to throw overboard the ship's tackle, probably the mainsail, ropes, and masts (v. 19). Now they had no means of navigation, not even the sun or stars to serve as benchmarks (v. 20). When the sailors had lost all hope, the word of salvation reached them.

2. Salvation Is Freely Offered by God. Paul appears to have taken charge of the ship since he spoke freely and everyone listened. Without naming the God he served, probably because he was among Gentiles, Paul gave them hope: not one of them would die (v. 22). This message, Paul said, was given to him during the night by an angel of the God he belonged to and served (v. 23). These words renewed their courage despite the fact that they had had to suffer material loss (vv. 22, 26). This is the first time God is mentioned in this story. With it Paul offered them God's grace. In the story of Jonah, all the sailors were endangered because of the unfaithfulness of the prophet (Jon. 1:12), but in this account the passengers were all saved because of the presence of a true prophet of God (Acts 27:24).

3. A Lesson on the Value of Solidarity. Luke indicates that the navigation continued for fourteen more nights. He does not mention the "days," perhaps to emphasize the sailor's dependence on God. While the sailors had been afraid to get too near the coast of Africa, they were relieved to realize that they were nearing the Adriatic Sea, which was the route to their destination. It was during the night that the sailors saw their first hope of salvation thanks to probes into the sea (vv. 27–28; cf. Matt. 25:6). They were hoping for the daylight of their deliverance (Acts 27:29). It is at this point that the selfishness of the sailors led them to lower the lifeboat to try to save themselves without helping the passengers or soldiers (v. 30). Knowledgeable as they were of the sea, they knew the risks involving grounding the ship (cf. 27:41). But the soldiers finally cut loose the last hope of human salvation left by cutting the rope that held the lifeboat to the vessel so the sailors could not abandon them.

4. A Meal That Brought Hope. At the dawn of a new day Paul invited the passengers to overcome their fears and renew their strength by eating some food (vv. 33–34). Four verbs highlight the scene of the meal: he took bread, he gave thanks, he broke the bread, and he began to eat (v. 35). The action Luke describes has led some to associate this meal with the celebration of the Lord's Supper—and in that the celebration also of the Passover meal. While the terminology is similar, the context indicates that Luke is simply describing a normal meal and how Jews and Christians gave thanks to God when they ate (cf. 2:42, 46; 20:7, 11). After all, there is no mention of the cup, no explanation of the elements, and the participants were not believers. And rather than distributing the elements, Paul simply began to eat. In taking the initiative in officiating at the meal and giving God thanks, the apostle sought to reassure all those on board that God was in control and also to encourage them to get the nourishment they would need to survive the rest of the journey. After eating, they all helped to lighten the ship by throwing overboard its precious cargo of wheat that had been the cause of the bad decision of the pilot (27:38).

5. All Were Saved. Having eaten, the sailors began operations for a forced landing on a beach they could see in the distance (v. 39). But a rise of the sea bottom did not allow them to make it to the beach. They remained stuck in the sand at a distance from shore. The soldiers knew that they would be severely punished if the prisoners escaped, so they wanted to kill the prisoners. But the centurion dissuaded them from their plan because he did not want Paul to die (v. 43). He immediately organized the escape of all of them from the ship (v. 44). This is unquestionably a story of hope and salvation that encourages us to hope in the Lord in the midst of our own storms, anticipating our ultimate deliverance.

28:1–31
Mission to the World

The difficulties Paul confronted did not bring to an end the mission Jesus had entrusted to him. After throwing themselves into the sea, the passengers arrived soaking wet on the island of Malta. They were shivering from cold and rain, but fortunately, the local inhabitants (barbaroi—"individuals who did not speak Greek") of the island rescued them.

28:1–10. Paul's Ministry in Malta. On the island, the life of Paul was once more threatened when he was bitten by a viper. Miraculously the event had no effect on him. He lived, and the snake ended up in the fire from which it was attempting to escape (v. 5). In the final destruction, Satan, the ancient serpent, will also be thrown into a lake of fire (cf. Rev. 20:10). This event in Paul's life foreshadows that eventuality.

The first reaction of the Maltese was to conclude that prisoner Paul must be an evil person who was able to survive the sea but who finally met the justice of God. They were sure he would die. They believed that evil is always associated with a fault committed (28:4; cf. Luke 13:1–5). But on seeing that Paul did not die, they, like the inhabitants of Lystra (Acts 14:11–12), considered Paul to be a god (28:6). This time, however, Luke does not tell us about Paul's reaction. The matter was cleared up later in the narrative, when through a second miracle Paul demonstrated that he was only an instrument of God.

Having been well received by Publius, the most prominent leader of the island, Paul was given the opportunity to heal the father of his host. He did it by praying, thus demonstrating that he was not a god (v. 8). We note in passing that the cure of the patient came about by the laying on of hands, including the hand the snake had bitten. Miracles accompanied the proclamation of the gospel as demonstrations of victory over the enemy (cf. v. 9; Peter, Acts 4:30; 5:16; Philip, 8:7; Paul, 19:12). Luke does not tell us that there were conversions on the island, and yet they benefited from God's mercy (cf. Luke 6:35–36). What is clear is that the entire paragraph is built on the unusual kindness of the Maltese (Acts 28:2) and their amazing expressions of generosity (v. 10) toward people who had lost everything in a shipwreck. We can only suggest that in the hearts of such Gentiles, the word of the gospel must have found a positive response.

28:11–16. Arrival at Rome. The stay on Malta lasted three months, the time needed for spring to arrive and navigation to become possible again. Luke no longer mentions the other passengers but focuses only on Paul and his companions, which include the Roman soldiers. They heard about a ship from Alexandria whose owners had wisely chosen to spend the winter in an island seaport and were able to sail with them (v. 11). From port to port the ship made its way closer to Rome, apparently docking in Puteoli (v. 13) because from then on the journey would be on foot because Rome was not a port city.

Was the centurion who accompanied Paul converted? Luke does not say, though one certainly would have to conclude that at the very least his heart was warmed toward Paul and the gospel he proclaimed. Not only was he responsible for saving Paul from death on the ship (27:42), but he also showed no urgency to rid himself of his prisoner. He even allowed a week-long stay with the believers in Puteoli (28:14), and his report was so favorable that Paul enjoyed a wide range of privileges from the soldier in charge of his care in Rome (vv. 16, 30).

Despite the warm welcome of his brothers in Puteoli, Paul seems to have been worried about the welcome he might receive from the churches in Rome. He was encouraged when brothers from Rome arrived to meet and welcome him on his way to the city (28:15). Although Paul had received specific visions (23:11) and divine reassurances (27:24), like everyone else, he also needed brotherly love.

28:17–31. Paul's Ministry in Rome. On arriving in Rome, Paul was transferred from the care of the centurion Julius to that of a lower-ranking Roman soldier and placed under house arrest as he awaited a verdict in his case (vv. 16, 20). The fact that Paul was not imprisoned indicates the weakness of the case against him. Luke describes Paul's ministry in Rome in three sections: Paul justifying himself before the Jews (vv. 17–22); the exposition of Paul's message and the reaction of his Jewish listeners (vv. 23–29); and the continuation of Paul's universal ministry (vv. 30–31).

1. Paul Justified Himself before the Jews. After three days in Rome, Paul resumed his missionary work. He took the initiative to convene some Jewish leaders to justify or clarify his presence in Rome. The authorities in Jerusalem had not sent a delegation to complain about him as would have been expected; therefore, Paul took the initiative in the dialogue. He assured the elders of two things: he had not done anything against his people or against the customs of the fathers (28:17), and he had no intention to raise charges against his nation before Caesar in order to establish his innocence (v. 19). As he had previously said in Jerusalem (23:6), it was because of the hope of Israel, the hope in the coming Messiah, who for him was Jesus, that he was indicted (28:20). He did not want his self-justification to be offensive to his Jewish audience.

The response of the elders was largely positive. They had not been officially informed about Paul by the authorities in Jerusalem, and people who had come from there had not spoken evil against him. Nevertheless, they were interested in listening to what he had to say about this sect that was being opposed everywhere. They were interested in Paul's teachings (v. 22).

2. Paul Defined His Teaching. Paul took the opportunity to share with his invitees the testimony from the Scriptures (v. 23) in accordance with the mission entrusted to him—to proclaim the good news of Jesus, especially how His life and death fulfilled the Scriptures (15:3; 20:24; 23:11; 26:16, 22; cf. 1:8). For him Jesus was the living Christ who is Son of God and Lord through His resurrection from the dead (cf. Rom. 1:4). Using the Scriptures, he tried to persuade them that Jesus was the Messiah. Unfortunately, sometimes the proclamation of the gospel pulls people apart, and in this case some believed and others did not (Acts 28:24). For Paul, accepting Jesus as Lord and Savior meant being faithful to the customs of his ancestors (v. 17). If the hope of Israel (v. 20) failed to be received by those to whom it was first given, it would bear much fruit among the Gentiles (v. 28). He told his Jewish friends that the faith of Israel was being made accessible to non-Jews because there is only one Messiah for humankind. The quotation from Isaiah 6:9–10 was not intended to condemn the Jews but was an expression of God's painful reaction to the misunderstandings, deafness, and hardening of the hearts of His people (Acts 28:26–27). In this concluding section Luke talks not about a rejection of the Jews but about the fact of the disagreement between those who believed and those who did not (vv. 24–25). Some manuscripts contain v. 29, which refers again to the disagreement between the believing and unbelieving Jews (cf. vv. 24–25) and to the great debate they had among themselves.

3. Paul Pursued His Ministry. The book of Acts closes with a positive picture of Paul as a servant of the Lord proclaiming and teaching the gospel with no one forbidding him to do it. Luke relates that from Rome he was preaching to all people (vv. 30–31; cf. Rom. 1:14; 1 Cor. 1:24). Luke stresses that the mission of the church was not about to end. It was to be taken, according to the words of Jesus, to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8; cf. Matt. 28:14).

The narrative ends with Paul in Rome proclaiming the hope that God entrusted to His people and that now belongs to humanity. It is a hope that found fulfillment in the coming of the Messiah and that looks forward to its consummation in the return of the Jesus, who ascended to heaven (Acts 1:9–11). That hope remains alive today.

EPISTLES

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT EPISTLES

The proclamation of the gospel through the apostles and believers resulted in the growth and expansion of the Christian church. As the groups of believers multiplied, they faced challenges of persecution, false teachings, and natural disasters. To encourage and guide the believers through all these challenging circumstances, and under the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the apostles communicated with their congregations through written correspondence.

Besides the four Gospels and the book of Acts, the New Testament contains twenty-one letters, or epistles, written by several authors. Most were written to specific congregations or to individuals ministering in the fledgling Christian movement, while some were meant for a broader Christian audience. These letters, together with the rest of the New Testament and the Old Testament, are the exclusive foundation for Christian doctrine, hope, and ethical behavior. The mission impetus of the church is reflected in the writing of the Epistles, and the Epistles provide guidance for conflict management and the organization of the church.

SIMILARITES BETWEEN THE NEW TESTAMENT EPISTLE AND THE GRECO-ROMAN LETTER

When comparing the early Christian letters to secular Greco-Roman letters of the first century, scholars find many similarities. Most letters were sent as rolled-up scrolls, and most began with the same basic elements: a salutation, a greeting, and a declaration of thanksgiving. The NT Epistles exhibit these common characteristics.

Salutation

At the top of the letter was the salutation. It included the name of the writer, along with his or her title or role and the name of the recipient. Thus, recipients could know at a glance—merely by the first few lines of the scroll—where the letter was sent from and for whom it was intended.

Greeting

The salutation was typically followed by a greeting, which was a wish for good health. A typical Greco-Roman greeting used the Greek word chairein (from the verb chairō, meaning "to rejoice" and thus "to wish one well"). Among the NT letters, only James uses chairein; all other authors replace this term with the similar-sounding word charis, usually translated as "grace" in English. Jewish letters usually add the greeting of "peace," from the Hebrew word shalom. Early Christians, however, appear to have been the first to make use of the composite greeting of grace and peace (e.g., Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:2; Rev. 1:4). This greeting embodied a blessing from God Himself and from His Son Jesus Christ. The usual Greco-Roman desire for the recipient's good health is found only in 3 John 2.

Declaration of Thanksgiving

The NT Epistles focus their thanksgiving on God. Paul's correspondence is noticeable for typically following the greeting with words of thanksgiving for his audience (e.g., Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:4; Phil. 1:3). He specifically thanks God for their growing faith, their love, and their Christian witness in order to build up the believers and to encourage a spirit of thankfulness to God in all Christians.

Body

The main part of the letter—the body—shares the author's main concerns for writing. Naturally, there are considerably different reasons someone might want to write a letter. Some letters mention previous correspondence and answer questions posed or further instruct on teachings only partially explained during an apostle's visit to the congregation (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:9; 7:1). In the Epistles, the apostles frequently struggled against the influence of false teachers and the incorrect understanding of spiritual themes. Thus, the NT letters attempted to correct doctrine or practice. Instructions were given for resolving conflicts, for qualifications of leaders, and for congregational worship and the use of spiritual gifts.

Concluding Remarks

Occasionally, Paul marks the conclusion of his letter with the term loipon ("finally" or "what remains," "other matters"; e.g., 2 Cor. 13:11; Eph. 6:10; Phil. 4:8; 2 Thess. 3:1). In each case, it is followed by an exhortation to pursue some course of Christian action: to pray, to rejoice, to think on spiritual themes, or to live in harmony with one another. These closing thoughts often summarize Paul's main points in the letters. The conclusion of these letters reveals their personal nature by including greetings to specific individuals in the congregation to which the letter is addressed, as well as passing along greetings to the church from individuals present with the author (e.g., Rom. 16:3–16, 21–23). Such greetings provide hints about Paul's traveling companions and his location when writing, and they even provide accountability for the recipient's behavior with respect to certain exhortations or imperatives given.

The way several of Paul's letters end may hint at what was once his original way of ensuring that the recipients knew the letter was from him, even if the bulk of the letter was penned by a scribe (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17; Philem. 1:19). Paul's statement at the conclusion of 2 Thessalonians is especially revealing, as he confirms that the letter was indeed from him (2 Thess. 3:17). This made it possible to distinguish Paul's letters from other correspondence.

Many of the letters conclude with a benediction: either a final wish for grace to the recipients (e.g., Rom. 16:24; Heb. 13:25), or for peace (1 Pet. 5:14; 3 John 14), or with a hymn of praise (Rom. 16:25–27; 2 Pet. 3:18; Jude 24–25). These letters exhibit graciousness and Christian love at both the opening and the closing. Several letters have unique conclusions. James and 1 John both end rather abruptly, lacking any type of salutation or greeting. James 5:12 uses the term pro pantōn ("above all") in a way similar to Paul's use of "finally," suggesting a cadence and therefore some closure; but the conclusion of 1 John is odd and somewhat puzzling, introducing idolatry for the first time in his writing at the very end of the document. The other two letters of John are quite brief and share similar endings. They conclude with a desire to continue correspondence face-to-face as opposed to with pen and ink (2 John 12; 3 John 13–14).

ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS

The field of archaeology has uncovered—at the time of this writing—more than six thousand handwritten fragments or complete collections of the NT, more than any other ancient source. These manuscripts are made up of various materials and were used for different purposes.

Papyri

The oldest of these manuscripts are written on papyrus, a reedlike plant whose pithy centers were split open, placed in two layers—one horizontal and one vertical—then pressed together and dried, making an early type of paper. The fragile nature of these manuscripts and the passage of many centuries, during which they were subject to many external forces (natural decay, neglect, destruction, accident, war, and other depredations), make it difficult to find complete papyri of the biblical text. Even so, with the exception of only 2 Timothy, all of the NT Epistles in Greek have been found on papyrus. One of the oldest manuscripts, Papyrus 46 (P46), contains most of the epistles of Paul and is dated by papyrologists to between A.D. 175 and 225, with the possibility that it may be even older. This confirms, remarkably, the accurate preservation of the apostles' messages from an era when all writing was done by hand on relatively perishable materials. This evidence from archaeology gives readers of the Bible a strong basis to believe that the biblical text we have today is a reliable copy of the thoughts and intentions of the original writers.

Parchments

Over time, more durable material for writing was developed. The most common for many centuries was dried, stretched animal skins called parchment. Most of the complete collections of the NT (e.g., the fourth-century manuscript known as Codex Sinaiticus) and all of the Epistles have been found on this more easily preserved and durable material.

Scrolls and Codices

While some of these documents may have first been copied and distributed in scroll format, by the early second century they were nearly all copied and bound in codex (plural, codices) form—the precursor to our modern book. Be[illegible] the pages of a codex could have writing on both front and back, it was possible to gather more documents in one place. Also, finding specific sections of the Gospels or referencing single letters was far easier in a codex than in a long scroll. By the fourth century, the popularity of the codex led to the abandonment of the scroll altogether in the broader culture, though the scroll is still used for the Hebrew Scriptures in Jewish tradition to this day.

LITERARY STYLE, SCRIBAL ASSISTANCE, AND CANONICAL ACCEPTANCE

The authors of the NT Epistles—few of whom were formally educated—present us with a range of literary styles and rhetorical techniques.

Differing Language and Style

The letters of John (often referred to as the Johannine Epistles) are, in spite of their profound themes, written in a basic style of Greek with common vocabulary. That is, they are written in a way that suggests Greek was not John's primary language. The simplicity of John's letters contrasts with the beautifully poetic and refined literary style of the Epistle to the Hebrews and with the complex vocabulary and the rich sentence structure of 1 Peter. The letters of the Apostle Paul fall between these extremes, generally revealing a broad knowledge of both Hebrew and Greek, as well as the literature common to the day. Each author displays a unique style, yet within this diversity an underlying thematic unity can be found.

Amanuensis

Several Epistles indicate the use of an amanuensis—a scribe who did the actual writing from the author's dictation. We find a greeting from Paul's penman Tertius in Romans 16:22. The introduction to the letter clearly states that Paul was the author of the content, but this verse reveals it was an amanuensis who did the actual writing. The use of an amanuensis by a biblical author should not disturb readers, as there is little reason to believe a literary assistant would knowingly alter the apostle's language or message without permission or review. The use of different scribes at different times by the same author helps explain the subtle differences in vocabulary and literary style that scholars have noted among an author's various letters.

Acceptance and Canon

Forming the NT collection of documents into a single book (a canon) was a process both fluid and intentional. Collections of NT letters have been possible as early as Christians started saving and sharing Paul's letters. One of the first lists containing most of our current books is the Muratorian Canon, a document that dates to about A.D. 180. As the church continued to grow and expand over the next two hundred years, the desire to possess copies of the apostolic writings led councils of church leaders to discuss which books should be recognized as sacred Scripture and which should not. While there was general agreement on most of the documents, there was ongoing debate surrounding the inclusion of others—the Epistle to the Hebrews, for example, which sounded very Jewish to some, and the book of Revelation, whose apocalyptic genre made it very different from other NT writings.

By roughly the end of the fourth century, however, our current collection of twenty-seven books was widely recognized and received as canon, and thus Scripture (see "Formation of the Biblical Canon," p. 21).

ORGANIZATION OF THE LETTERS

Once the canon was recognized as such, the individual documents had to be arranged in a logical format. The letters were not organized chronologically by the date they were written. Rather, their organization seems to have been influenced by the preferences of their users, based on the geographic spread of the gospel message. In the West, the Epistles were grouped first by author, then generally by length. The Pauline Epistles comprise the first and largest section, while the remaining documents were gathered in a separate group and identified as the General Epistles or Catholic Epistles ("catholic" meaning general or universal). In the East, in Bibles influenced by the Eastern Orthodox Church, the General Epistles precede the Pauline Epistles.

Pauline Epistles

Within the Pauline collection, scholars recognize two subcategories. The first is made up of the four Prison Epistles—Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon—so called because in each letter Paul indicates that he is a prisoner at the time of writing (Eph. 3:1, 4:1; Phil. 1:7–17; Col. 4:3, 10, 18; Philem. 1, 3–13, 23). The second subcategory is the Pastoral Epistles comprising three letters: 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus. Even though the Greek text of 1 Timothy is longer than several other Pauline Letters, this collection was kept together, proving an exception to the length-order rule. The stated recipients of the Pastoral Epistles are Timothy and Titus, two of Paul's close colleagues. These two men were appointed as Paul's apostolic delegates and were entrusted with providing spiritual leadership for the struggling believers in Ephesus and Crete.

With perhaps the exception of the Pastoral Epistles, the rest of Paul's letters were intended to be read to entire congregations. At least one letter, Ephesians, was probably intended as a kind of circular correspondence—a letter or tract originally intended for several of the churches in Asia Minor.

General Epistles

The final eight letters of the NT form a collection penned by at least four different authors. These constitute the General or Catholic Epistles. They are referred to as general or catholic in the sense that they are written to the entire church rather than to a specific congregation or individual. The first of these, Hebrews, has been subject to much debate regarding its origin, mainly because the letter is anonymous. Scholars have proposed several possible writers, and although tradition ascribes it to Paul, its placement outside the length-ordered collection of Pauline writings reveals some uncertainty. The letter is unique even among the Pauline writings due to its highly polished language and use of the Septuagint, the Greek version of the OT. While some of the themes certainly harmonize with Paul's theology, its poetic style, grammar, vocabulary, and sentence structure are considered of a quality superior to any other writing in the NT canon, setting it apart—stylistically at least—from the other Pauline Letters.

The Epistles of James and Jude are traditionally attributed to two of the brothers or step-brothers of Jesus (see "The Brothers of Jesus," p. 1252). Two epistles bear the Apostle Peter's name, and three are attributed to John the Beloved Disciple. Many secular scholars dispute these traditional attributions, but legitimate reasons remain for assuming their authenticity and accepting the traditional attributions. Further details about authorship are found in the introduction to each of these Epistles in this commentary.

Apocalyptic Letter

The only book in the NT considered apocalyptic in nature is Revelation. While not considered part of the collection of Epistles, it incorporates some of the typical marks of a Greco-Roman letter in its opening chapter (see Rev. 1:4–11). The original audience of the Apocalypse is stated in 1:11 as seven specific literal congregations in Asia Minor, located on or near what is today the western coast of Turkey. Most of Revelation's content—the unique imagery, allusions to the OT, and narrative style—is quite different from the main body of the rest of the Epistles. However, John returns to the epistolary format in the benediction in Revelation 22:21. At least portions of Revelation, therefore, should be read with the epistolary genre in mind.

HISTORICAL SETTING AND CHRONOLOGY OF THE PAULINE EPISTLES

Luke's careful attention to sequential narrative in the book of Acts and his occasional historical references to known events and people make it possible to reconstruct a tentative chronological timeline of Paul's ministry and missionary travels. This chronology allows scholars to narrow the range of possible dates for the writing of some of Paul's works to within a couple of years. Such reconstruction is valuable since it offers a historical context for the letters and in turn helps interpreters better understand the issues facing the recipients—giving deeper meaning to the apostles' teachings and advice.

The Chronology of Pauline Epistles Based on Acts

A history of the four Gospels places the baptism of Jesus in A.D. 27 (cf. Luke 3:1–3; 21) and His death some three and a half years later. It can be assumed that events in Acts begin in A.D. 31. Moreover, in Acts Luke recalls historical events and rulers that may be dated with certainty, such as the Judean procurator Felix (Acts 23–24), who governed from A.D. 52 to 58; his successor, Porcius Festus (Acts 25–26), who governed from A.D. 59 to 62; and the Sanhedrin ruler and Pharisaic rabbi Gamaliel (Acts 5:34; 22:3), who died circa A.D. 52.

The first half of Acts follows Peter's Spirit-led ministry as he comes to learn about and accept God's plan for saving the Gentiles by faith. The book gives no indication of specific timing and cannot be used to date the Epistles Peter wrote. The second half of Acts shifts to Paul and his missionary endeavors. First referred to by his Jewish name, Saul, he is introduced in Acts in connection with the violent stoning death of Stephen, a Greek-speaking Christian (Acts 7:58). After Stephen's death, Saul became more directly involved in the persecution of other Greek-speaking believers (8:1–4). This persecution resulted in the scattering of believers, which ironically resulted in the spread of the gospel beyond Jerusalem.

Acts and Galatians

The narratives of Acts and the first two chapters of the Epistle to the Galatians correlate somewhat chronologically. The systematic persecution of believers by Saul took him down the road leading to Damascus, where he was confronted by the risen Christ (Acts 9:1–2; Gal. 1:13–14) and accepted Jesus as the promised Messiah (Acts 9:3–9; Gal. 1:15–16). His conversion and commission as an apostle to the Gentiles is commonly dated to A.D. 34, the year of the stoning of Stephen, corresponding to the fulfillment of the seventy-weeks prophecy in Daniel (Dan. 9:24–27). Soon thereafter, Saul began using his Greco-Roman name, Paul (Acts 13:9), most likely as a way to identify more closely with his Gentile audience.

After his conversion, Saul spent several days in Damascus preaching in the synagogues (Acts 9:19–22). Galatians 1:16–17 adds that during the "many days" mentioned in Acts 9:23, Saul traveled into Arabia and after three years returned to Damascus. It is at this time that local Jews plotted to kill him, but he escaped (9:23–25). Three years later, Paul visited Jerusalem for the first time, but fear and suspicion about the authenticity of his claims to be a Christian prevented him from meeting any of the apostles other than Peter and James, Jesus's brother. It was at this time that God convinced Paul in a vision to leave Jerusalem hastily, because the Jews there sought his life. He was brought to Caesarea and then sent on to his hometown of Tarsus (Acts 9:30; 22:17–21; Gal. 1:21).

Several years later, Barnabas traveled to Tarsus, seeking Paul's assistance for the growing work among the Gentiles in Antioch. Paul accepted the invitation and ministered in Antioch for a year (Acts 11:22–26). During that time, a great famine struck Judea. To support their fellow Jewish believers, the church in Antioch sent Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem with a monetary gift to help with the purchase of food (11:29–30; 12:25). For more on the relationship of this famine to the time of the Jerusalem Council and the writing of the book of Galatians, see Galatians: Introduction.

After concluding their visit to Jerusalem, Paul returned to Antioch with Barnabas and John Mark (Acts 12:25); soon after, Peter came to visit. It appears that, at this time, Peter—influenced by Jewish Christians who felt the new Gentile converts needed to be circumcised before they could become genuine Christians—refused to eat with Gentiles. Recognizing Peter's hypocrisy, Paul rebuked him publicly (Acts 15:1; Gal. 2:11–21). This confrontation must have taken place before the Jerusalem Council mentioned in Acts 15, or Paul likely would have cited the Council's decision to accept Gentile believers without first being circumcised.

Paul's First Missionary Journey

Paul and Barnabas took Mark and set off on the first of Paul's three missionary journeys (Acts 13:4—14:28). This first trip took them to the island of Cyprus, then to the southern coast of Asia Minor. John Mark abandoned Paul and Barnabas at this point. But the two pressed on, continuing inland to the regions of Pamphylia and as far north as Pisidian Antioch. During this time, Paul also visited four cities in the southern portion of the Roman province of Galatia: Iconium, Lyconia, Lystra, and Derbe, where he raised up a significant number of disciples (14:21). It is possible that Paul wrote his letter to the Galatians either near the end of his first missionary journey or soon after returning to Antioch (ca. A.D. 49).

The reception of the Spirit by Gentiles brought questions from the Jewish believers, especially Pharisees who had accepted Christ as the Jewish Messiah: Why were the Gentiles not being encouraged to be circumcised and to follow the ritual law of the Torah? A council convened in Jerusalem to decide this as well as other matters relating to food sacrificed to idols, sexual immorality, the eating of blood, and the eating of animals that died without regard for hygienic methods of slaughter. After prayer and discussion regarding the work of the Spirit among the Gentiles—and based on evidence presented by Peter (15:7–11), Barnabas, and Paul (v. 12)—only a few Jewish practices were enjoined on the new Gentile believers in order to preserve fellowship among all the saints (15:1–29).

Paul's Second Missionary Journey

Decisions from the Council had to be reported to the churches, and Paul and Barnabas wished to revisit the congregations they had planted. But due to a disagreement over John Mark's involvement, Paul and Silas went one way and Barnabas took Mark another. Once again, the split caused by sharp dissention served to advance the kingdom: more territory could be covered by two missionary teams than by one (15:36–39).

Paul and Silas embarked on what would be Paul's second missionary journey (ca. A.D. 49), traveling first through Syria and Cilicia, then returning to Derbe and Lystra. Here they met Timothy, and it appears they took him along on their journey. Acts mentions that at this time they worked their way through the regions of Phrygia and Galatia. This may be a reference summarizing their movement from the area in southern Galatia to Phrygia in the north and then to Mysia and Troas (15:40—16:8). Others interpret the reference to Phrygia and Galatia (16:6) to mean that Paul visited the cities of Ancyra and Pessinus located much farther north in the geographical region that originally made up the ethnic kingdom of Galatia (for more on the background to Galatians and the North Galatian Theory, see Galatians: Introduction). Whatever the case, Paul eventually arrived at Troas, where he had a vision inviting him to Macedonia. In response to the vision, Paul and his companions sailed across the Aegean to Philippi (16:9–40).

After founding a church in Philippi, Paul continued westward through Amphipolis and Appolonia before stopping in Thessalonica, where he reasoned from the Scriptures in the synagogue that Jesus was the Christ, that is, the Messiah. As some Jews and Greeks responded positively to the gospel message, other Jews stirred up a mob (17:1–9). Paul and Silas were forced to leave. They traveled first to Berea and then on to Athens (17:10–34). Concerned for the Thessalonian believers, Paul sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to check on the spiritual condition of the new believers there, while he and Silas remained in Athens (1 Thess. 3:1–7). After strenuous reasoning with the Athenian philosophers, Paul won a handful of new converts and turned from Athens to Corinth.

Paul ministered in Corinth while also joining Aquila and Priscilla in making tents to support himself. He remained there for a year and a half (Acts 18:1–17). Scholars date the writing of the Thessalonian correspondence to Paul's time there (A.D. 50–51). The second epistle was likely sent soon after Timothy returned to the Athens-Corinth area with their response to his first letter. When Paul finally headed back toward Syria and home, he made his first stop in the port city of Ephesus (18:18–21). A brief but promising meeting with local Jews led him to promise to return once he settled his business in Antioch.

Paul's Third Missionary Journey

No sooner had Paul returned to Caesarea and Antioch than he set out again for Ephesus, as he had promised, stopping along the way to revisit the churches in southern Galatia (18:22–23; 19:1). For nearly three years Paul remained in Ephesus, teaching in the school of Tyrannus (19:9–10). While in Ephesus, news reached Paul about problems in Corinth. First Corinthians was written in an attempt to solve those challenges and to addresses several questions the believers had asked of him in a letter sent to him. Opposition to Paul's ministry in Ephesus arose sometime later and led Paul to leave the city. News that the situation in the Corinthian church had deteriorated influenced him to travel to Greece via Macedonia. On the way to Corinth, however, word that the situation had improved seems to have prompted Paul to write another letter to the believers there: the letter we know as 2 Corinthians (2 Cor. 2:12–13; 7:5; 8:1–5; 9:2). After arriving in Corinth, Paul remained there for about three months, likely writing his letter to the Romans while there (A.D. 56–57). If the churches of Galatia consisted of the churches Paul may have founded in the ethnic kingdom of Galatia during his second missionary journey—instead of the churches in southern Galatia—then some claim this may have also been the time when Paul wrote his letter to the Galatians.

The last part of Paul's third missionary journey took him somewhat hurriedly from Corinth, by way of several cities along the eastern coast of the Aegean Sea (Acts 20:4—21:15), so he might be present in Jerusalem for the Feast of Pentecost. Paul's eagerness appears to have been at least partially motivated by the evangelistic opportunity of preaching Christ to all the Jews who would be present in Jerusalem to celebrate Pentecost. Paul was also bringing a financial gift from the Gentile churches for the poor community of Jewish believers in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:25–27; 1 Cor. 16:1–4). Accompanied by a delegation of representatives from the Gentile churches Paul founded (Acts 20:4–5), this gift not only symbolized a bond of fellowship but also the fulfillment of the OT prophecies that spoke of the wealth of the Gentiles coming to Jerusalem (Is. 45:14; 60:5–17; 61:6).

Although Paul had been warned of the dangers that awaited him in Jerusalem—the prophet Agabus even foretold his arrest—he was determined to present Christ there (Acts 21:8–15). Agabus's prophecy came true. Paul was arrested on false charges and eventually felt forced to appeal to Caesar.

On the way to Rome, Paul was shipwrecked on the island of Malta but safely, and finally, reached Rome about A.D. 60 or 61 (27:1—28:15). Once there, he was kept under house arrest (28:16) and given freedom to meet with Jews (28:16–22). It is likely that during this time of custody in Rome Paul wrote the Prison Epistles—Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon—since in those letters Paul claims to be a prisoner.

Last Days of the Apostle Paul

The book of Acts concludes with Paul in prison for two years in a rented house but offers no conclusion to the apostle's life or Roman ministry. However, evidence from some of his later letters (2 Tim. 4:20; Titus 3:12–13) suggests that his expectations for a soon release (Phil. 2:23–24; Philem. 22) were realized and that, for a brief time, he was free. By the time of the writing of 2 Timothy, he found himself back in chains again (2 Tim. 2:8–9; 4:6–8). Based on the testimony of early Christian writers, Paul's life ended in Rome at the hands of Nero, who died in A.D. 68.

If Paul was released from prison in A.D. 63, he would have had several years to again visit the congregations he had established and to write his final three canonical letters: the Pastoral Epistles. First Timothy recalls a visit to Ephesus, where Timothy remained to better organize the work, while Paul journeyed to Macedonia (1 Tim. 1:3). The Epistle to Titus confirms Paul's work on the island of Crete, where he also left Titus as his apostolic delegate (Titus 1:5) and mentions wintering in Nicopolis (3:12). Second Timothy suggests Paul had also visited Troas and likely had to leave personal belongings behind due to another imprisonment that would eventually return him to Rome, where he spent his last days (2 Tim. 4:17). Thus, 1 Timothy and Titus were probably written about A.D. 65 or 66, after Paul's first Roman imprisonment. Second Timothy, however, was written sometime later, shortly before Paul's execution—probably about A.D. 66 or 67.

THE GENERAL EPISTLES

While the authorship of some of the Epistles and the dates of their composition can be determined with varying degrees of accuracy, other Epistles in the NT are not as clear. For these reasons, these are referred to as General Epistles. It is also helpful to look at these General Epistles together to establish common themes.

Issues of Chronology

While the chronology of Paul's ministry in Acts and his letters can be outlined with some certainty, the same cannot be said for the General Epistles. Scholarly discussion regarding the dating of these letters often hinges on the conclusions of authorship, an at-times debated subject. Accepting the stated or traditional author gives tentative, but definitely more solid, ground on which to form dating conclusions. It is possible that the earliest of the letters written was James, perhaps sometime in the mid to late A.D. 40s, based on the distinctively Jewish nature of the letter (e.g., James 1:1; 2:2, 8–13, 21, 25; 4:4) and on the absence of any reference to the conflict between Jews and Gentiles, which we would expect if the letter was written after the Jerusalem Council. The Epistle to the Hebrews is usually dated to the years just preceding the Jerusalem temple's destruction in A.D. 70. This seems reasonable, because in the extensive discussion of the sanctuary, the author never mentions Jerusalem's destruction, even when such an argument would unquestionably bolster his focus on the heavenly sanctuary. The latest written letters are likely the Johannine correspondence, which, based on theological and historical situations in the church, are frequently dated to the late first century (see the introduction to each epistle).

Themes

Each epistle identifies Jesus of Nazareth—the Jewish Messiah—as its primary subject, with all other subjects secondarily linked to Him. Various sections of some of the Epistles interpret the life and teachings, death, resurrection, ascension, and heavenly ministry of Jesus in the context of the cosmic battle between God and Satan. Some of them emphasize the confirmation of Jesus as the fulfillment of OT prophecy and reveal the work of the Holy Spirit as a continuation of the ministry of Jesus despite His physical absence. They at times proclaim the Christian hope in the physical, glorious return of Jesus and the judgment that accompanies it. They also sometimes apply the teachings of Jesus and the ramifications of His salvific work to congregational life in order to prepare the church for the "blessed hope" of the appearance and glory of Jesus Christ, our God and Savior (Titus 2:13). In short, the Epistles encapsulate the gospel: the good news as it is found in Christ.

Jesus Christ and His Work. The primary theme across the NT is the centrality of the person and work of Jesus Christ as the sole basis of the salvation of humanity. The historical reality of Jesus of Nazareth is affirmed by the apostles (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:1–8; 1 John 1:1–3; 1 Pet. 1:16–18). Yet the Epistles reveal Jesus as far more than just human; He is equal with God (Phil. 2:6), the image of the invisible God (Col. 1:15), and the ultimate radiance of the Father's glory and exact impress of His substance (Heb. 1:3). Paul even calls Christ "our great God and Savior" (Titus 2:13).

Christ's glory is juxtaposed with human need. The Gospels affirm God's holy law and that this moral law defines humanity as lawbreakers. The sad condition of humanity is summed up in Romans 3:23 and 6:23: "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" and "the wages of sin is death." Sin in Judaism has been defined as breaking the Jewish law, especially the Moral Law of God that is enunciated in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20 and Deut. 5). Paul argues that the Law's purpose is to point out sin—to make sin a tangible and reprehensible object that can be dealt with objectively (cf. Rom. 7:7–13; 1 Tim. 1:8–11). Without help from an outside source, humans are doomed to a short life on earth filled with pain and little more; they certainly have no hope for life after death. God's loving nature, in an expression of His grace, moved Him to open a way of salvation for humanity by sending His own Son, Jesus, who has "redeemed us from the curse of the law" (Gal. 3:13; cf. Col. 1:13–14).

There are many metaphors for salvation in the Epistles that point toward the realities of redemption from the slavery of sin (e.g., Rom. 3:24, Eph. 1:7), adoption by a new Father (e.g., Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:5), forgiveness for sin (e.g., Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14), substitutionary atonement (e.g., Heb. 2:9; 1 John 2:2), ransom from abductors (e.g., 1 Tim. 2:6; 1 Pet. 1:18), moral influence (e.g., Rom. 5; 1 John 4:9–11), restoration of relationship (Rom. 5:1; 2 Cor. 5:14–21), and others. Each one contributes to our understanding of what God has done in Christ. But the fundamental message is clear: Salvation is God's work, in which human beings are invited to participate. It is not the result of their work. In many of these metaphors, the sacrifice of Jesus while hanging on a Roman cross forms a central necessity for the reconciliation of God and humanity. No one but God, through Jesus, could carry out this work of salvation, because only His blood could truly cleanse the conscience from works of death (Heb. 9:13–14).

For the apostles, the death of Jesus was the act that revealed in a unique way the character of God in the cosmic controversy. But it was the resurrection of Jesus that ultimately and conclusively proved that Christians are no longer helpless in the controversy with sin and Satan. The power that raised Jesus from the dead is now available to believers as the Holy Spirit falls on them and fills them with power from above. Paul devoted an entire chapter to the resurrection (1 Cor. 15), showing that if Jesus did not rise from the dead, Christian faith is useless. Jesus is our divine Lord—alive and seated with His Father on the throne of grace. The empty tomb testifies that God has conquered death, not only providing hope in a future resurrection of the sleeping saints but also promising believers a hope-filled life of victory in the present. The victorious life is synonymous with the experience of growing in godliness or holiness—often termed sanctification—and influences the exhortations found throughout the Epistles (1 Pet. 1:14–16).

Christ's present work for His saints extends beyond His sacrifice on Calvary. It includes a ministry at the right hand of God, interceding for His people (Rom. 8:34), offering forgiveness and grace in time of need (Heb. 4:16), and guiding His church (Rev. 2–3). The cross and resurrection form the basis for Christ's ministry in heaven, where He serves in a temple of which the earthly sanctuary was only a shadow or copy (Heb. 8:1–5).

But a purely spiritual relationship with Jesus was, for the apostles, a temporary situation. The Gospels record Jesus's promise to return, and the disciples looked with joyful and awe-filled expectation for the day they would be physically reunited with their Savior and Friend. In his correspondence with the Thessalonians, Paul borrows the OT language of the "day of the Lord"—the great day of God's visitation of judgment on Israel and the nations—when speaking of Christ's return (1 Thess. 5:1–7; cf. 2 Thess. 2). He suggests that the coming of Jesus will initiate the first resurrection (1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 4:13–18). This coming of Jesus is also referred to as "the arrival" (parousia; cf. Matt. 24:27; 1 Thess. 2:19; James 5:7; 2 Pet. 3:4) and "the appearing" (epiphaneia; cf. 1 Tim. 6:14; Titus 2:13). At this grand event Christ will raise the dead, perfect the saints, and bodily reunite with His church.

Ethical and Moral Standards. The Epistles contain many moral imperatives that govern Christian relationships. Christ's teaching and modeling of loving service was a corrective renewal of God's high moral standard. Where the Moral Law served to regulate human affairs—often through prohibitions—the spirit behind these commands had been lost sight of in Jesus's day. The imperatives Christ initiated and the apostles strengthened do not ignore or abandon the Moral Law entirely; rather, they prescribe positive behaviors toward others. In fact, far from disregarding moral laws emphasized in the Scriptures relating to things such as sexual purity, murder, and divorce, the Epistles strengthen those laws by revealing the issues of the heart involved and pointing the Christian to Christ's power to effect change.

In order to carry out these ethical imperatives, believers are to be baptized with the Holy Spirit, a fulfillment of the words of Jesus in Luke that they would be enveloped by God's power from above (Luke 24:49). The Spirit empowers Christians to walk in obedience to the Law—a walk that goes beyond the letter of the written code without ignoring it, thus fulfilling the OT through love (Gal. 5:13–18). Christians who walk by the Spirit remain connected to the Source of physical and spiritual life and cannot help but bear fruit from this same Spirit. In Galatians 5:19–25, Paul contrasts the fruit of the Spirit with the actions of the sarx ("flesh"), which can be interpreted in this context as a reference to our sinful nature. The fruit of the Spirit is also a new covenant expression of Paul's exhortation to submit to one another (Eph. 5:21).

Several Epistles deal with household codes: guidelines governing behavior between husbands and wives (Eph. 5:22–33; Col. 3:18–19; 1 Pet. 3:1–7), fathers and children (Eph. 6:1–4; Col. 3:20–21), slaves and masters (Eph. 6:5–9; Col. 3:22—4:1; 1 Pet. 2:18–25), and citizens and governing leaders (Rom. 13:1–7; Heb. 13:17; 1 Pet. 2:11–17). The intent was to create a condition in which believers could live in peace with one other and, as much as possible, with society (see "Ancient Household Codes," p. 1721).

As is the case with any organization made of two or more people, disagreements and divisions can arise. The apostles used the unity that Christ established as a foundation for all relationships. The Epistle to the Ephesians, especially, is concerned with the unity of the believers (cf. Eph. 4:3). Paul warns believers to remain far from those who cause divisions (Rom. 16:17), and to find ways to agree with one another so that divisions may not occur and so that unity in both mind and thought can be preserved (1 Cor. 1:10). Only by an intense focus on the life and teachings of Jesus and the hope of His return could this unity be preserved.

Mission and Organization. The early church was not a static body; it was mission-focused, necessitating thoughtful and practical organization. The believers are likened to a beautifully created body where all the individual members work together under the loving guidance of Christ's headship (1 Cor. 12:12–27; Eph. 5:23; Col. 1:18; 2:19). Paul also compares believers in the world to an aroma of life (2 Cor. 2:15–17). Christians support the work of missionary preachers (1 Cor. 9:11–12; 2 Cor. 11:8; 3 John 5–8) and divide the work between different individuals (Gal. 2:8).

First Timothy and Titus provide directives on selecting local leadership in new congregations. The earliest evidence for organized labor is found in Paul's letter to the Philippians, where he mentions elders and deacons in his salutation (Phil. 1:1). Qualifications for elders/bishops (1 Tim. 3:1–7; Titus 1:5–16) and deacons (1 Tim. 3:8–13) are outlined in some detail; but surprisingly, very little is said about actual job descriptions. Either the congregations already knew what the work entailed or, more likely, the primary work of the overseer or deacon was ministry through the example of godly behavior. The qualifications were their primary ministry. Such teaching accords with the words of Jesus that those in the world exercise "authority" over others, but that it would not be so among the followers of Jesus (Mark 10:42–45).

The fulfillment of Christ's promise to send the Holy Spirit was attended by special, often supernatural, abilities called spiritual gifts. These gifts include capabilities such as missionary calling, knowledge and wisdom, healing ability, leadership, administration, generous giving, prophecy, and speaking in other languages or having the ability to interpret them (cf. Rom. 12:4–8; 1 Cor. 12–14; Eph. 4:11–12; 1 Pet. 4:10–11). These spiritual gifts are intended to sanctify the saints, strengthen the congregations, equip believers for service and mission, and organize and unify their efforts (see Eph. 4:12–13).

Greco-Roman Worldview and Heresy. The monotheistic faith of Judaism and Christianity was diametrically opposed to the Greco-Roman worldview and its polytheism. Several heresies with roots in pagan ideas are alluded to in the Epistles. John's first and second letters speak against an "antichrist" movement that denied the human nature of Jesus (1 John 2:18–23; 4:1–3; 2 John 7). This heresy, which came to be known as Docetism, claimed that Jesus only seemed to be human, but in reality he was a spiritual being who did not truly suffer in the flesh. Closely related to this heresy is Gnosticism—the modern name given to a loosely organized religious and philosophical movement in the second century that claimed elements of the divine are entrapped in the evil world of matter and can be liberated only when they learn the secret gnōsis (Gr. "knowledge") of their true identity. When later false teachers applied these concepts to the Christian faith, they claimed the material world was created by a lesser god, whom they often associated with the "god" of the OT. Additionally, Jesus was not considered to be God, but He came to show the way to salvation by revealing the secret, esoteric knowledge to those who themselves had a divine spark within them. Because the flesh was evil, Gnosticism either punished it to bring it into submission (aestheticism) or fed its lusts (libertinism). Although full-blown Gnosticism did not develop until after the NT documents had been written, proto-Gnostic ideas may have had some influence on the problems found in the Epistles. For instance, Colossians rejects self-abasement, the worship of angels, and abstinence from certain foods, since these have no power to truly control human desires (Col. 2:18–23). On the other hand, Peter and Jude both critique the supposed liberty offered by those saying that fulfillment of lusts or desires was now permissible in Christ (2 Pet. 2:12–22; Jude 7–8, 17–19).

The apostles, much like Paul to the Ephesians in Acts 20:29–31, were worried about their congregations being led astray. In confronting these heresies, the apostles sought to keep the congregations centered on the historical life and teachings of Christ, on their mission, and on the truth of the Scriptures.

Christian Hope. Although the Epistles were written in the midst of—and sometimes due to—conflict, they are permeated with hope (see "Hope and the Advent of God," p. 2). This is fitting, since hope finds its origin in God (Rom. 15:13). The Greek word for hope, elpis, means more than simply wishing for a certain future outcome; rather, it is the confident expectation of a certain outcome, the locus of Christian faith (Col. 1:5). As mentioned earlier, the Epistles consistently assure their readers that the followers of Jesus have much to look forward to both in this lifetime and in the future at Christ's return. This hope is manifested in the following specific aspects.

Personal Hope. The salvation found in Christ has personal ramifications to which all believers look forward. It is in the person of Jesus Christ that believers daily and directly place their hope (2 Cor. 1:10; Eph. 1:12; 1 Tim. 1:1). It is rooted not only in what Christ has done for us in His life, death, and resurrection but also in His present work for us as our High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 6:13–20). The transformation of life that begins when we place our faith in Christ will be carried to completion when righteousness becomes normative (Gal. 5:5; Phil. 1:6). The fact that the Spirit of God lives among even Gentile believers is evidence of God's work (Col. 1:27). John affirms this truth, saying that living hope in Christ has a purifying effect in the present as we await its fullness at the Second Coming (1 John 3:2–3).

In Romans 5:2–5, Paul points out that God can even use personal trials to develop Christian character that culminates in a strong hope that will not end in disappointment. Believers can have hope that because of the power of the Holy Spirit working in them, God's purpose for them will be fulfilled (Rom. 8:23–25). Hope is one of the greatest spiritual virtues, along with faith and love (1 Cor. 13:13). Paul even argues that the OT was written for our encouragement—that it might develop hope in us (Rom. 15:4).

Missiological Hope. Paul had the highest of expectations that God would work out His will and purpose for those who heard the gospel (2 Cor. 3:12; 10:15; Phil. 1:18–24). The faith of the believers was Paul's greatest earthly hope—that many would come to place their faith in Christ (1 Thess. 2:19–20).

Eschatological Hope. Many of humanity's fears and griefs have been addressed by Christ's work of salvation, and the Epistles point to a future time when even our greatest enemies will be overcome. A study of last-day events—known as eschatology—places the consummation of human hope in the events surrounding the Second Coming of Jesus Christ. When writing to Titus, Paul refers to this coming as "the blessed hope" (Titus 2:13). Certainly some will be alive when Christ returns, but what of those who have passed away before that time? The Christian can also hope in the resurrection. At Christ's return, graves will be opened and the resurrection of loved ones who have fallen asleep in death will reunite families (1 Cor. 15). Paul also contrasts our eager expectation of resurrection with the Gentiles who "have no hope" (1 Thess. 4:13–18). The resurrection will result in physical life that will never end (Titus 3:7).

Christ's return also brings an end to this current age, including the kingdoms of this earth that have for too long ruled unjustly, while their peoples scorn opportunities for repentance (2 Pet. 2:1–13). Psalm 110 is cited or alluded to in the NT as the hope that God will place all Christ's enemies under His feet like a footstool (Heb. 1:13; 10:13; cf. Eph. 1:20; Col. 3:1). This picture is revealed in symbolic form throughout Revelation, especially chapter 19.

While we Christians wait for these exciting events, we are encouraged to be prepared to give a defense of our hope (1 Pet. 3:15). What could be better than inviting others to join us in this optimistic experience?

ROMANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The title "To the Romans" presumes a larger collection of letters with the title "The Letters of Paul" that was collated and then circulated among early Christians. Based on its length and importance, this letter to the Christians in Rome is placed first in the collection of thirteen of his letters found in the NT. Romans claims to have been written by Paul (Rom. 1:1), and no serious scholar doubts that he was in fact the author.

Date. No date is provided in any of Paul's letters. His travel itinerary in Acts 20:1–3 included a three-month stay in Corinth near the end of his third missionary journey in the mid-50s, during the first half of the Emperor Nero's reign. Paul's host, when he wrote the letter, was probably the same Gaius of Corinth he himself had baptized (Rom. 16:23; 1 Cor. 1:14). Phoebe, who carried the letter to Rome, was a church leader in the nearby port city of Cenchreae (Rom. 16:1). This means that the letter was written in Corinth, which helps with the date of writing.

Backgrounds. The Christian believers in Rome were a mixed lot of Jews and Gentiles. A close look at Paul's long list of people he greeted in chapter 16 reveals many names typically bestowed on slaves. This suggests that the message of the risen and soon-returning Christ resonated particularly with slaves and freed slaves. The mention of a house church in 16:5 and the clustering of names in 16:3–16 supports the view that early Christians were denied the right to own worship centers other than their homes. Paul's greeting by name twenty-six people in a city he had never visited demonstrates the mobility of early Christians throughout the Roman Empire.

Rome as the capital of the empire was the destination of every new religious movement, to the consternation of its more traditional citizens. Unnamed Jewish Christian missionaries had brought the gospel of Christ to Rome "many years" earlier (15:23). Visitors from Rome were part of the audience of devout Jews who heard Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost and were likely among the three thousand who responded and were baptized (Acts 2:10, 41), eventually returning home and sharing their new faith. Sometime later, Emperor Claudius ordered the expulsion of Jews from the city (Acts 18:2). By the time Paul wrote to them, most of the Roman believers were Gentiles, though some Jews had returned, including Paul's dear friends Priscilla and Aquila (Rom. 16:3, 7, 11). The letter reveals Paul's awareness that the relationship between Jewish and Gentile believers had become strained (11:13–24).

Romans is the only surviving letter Paul wrote to a church he had not founded. For years Paul had been engaged in planting and establishing churches from Jerusalem to the Balkans (Illyricum; 15:19). Convinced that he had reached the eastern half of the Mediterranean with the gospel of Christ (15:19–23), he began to lay plans for a mission to Spain in the west (15:24). At the time of the writing of the letter Paul had not yet reached Rome, though he longed to visit the believers there (1:13; 15:22–23). He was determined to spend time with them. The Roman church could serve as a vital base for his evangelistic foray into Spain. But first, Paul had to fulfill his promise to return to Jerusalem and take with him substantial funds donated by the believers in Greece (Achaia) and Macedonia for the impoverished mother church (15:25–26; cf. Acts 20:16; 1 Cor. 16:15; Gal. 2:10). This gift, from largely Gentile congregations, was to be a tangible expression of gratitude to the Jewish believers in Jerusalem for sharing the gospel and a sign of the solidarity that bound otherwise hostile Jews and Gentiles into one body in Christ.

Theology and Purpose. Romans is a letter of introduction to believers in Rome that displays

Paul's understanding of the gospel as well as its implications for their communal life. We can only surmise the impact of the letter on its original hearers. But there is no mistaking the letter's role as a theological treasure house and as a source of spiritual renewal throughout the history of the Christian church. We will summarize some of its most important theological topics.

1. Divine and Human Righteousness. Two fundamental realities frame Paul's argument in Romans 1–8. The first is the righteousness of God; the essential character of God is revealed in His response to the unrighteousness of humanity. Like the moon's reflected light of the sun, the righteousness of the Creator ought to be matched by respect and righteous conduct from humanity. But faced with ungodliness and disrespect, God's righteousness requires a judgment against the ungodly (1:18). Divine indifference or tolerance of unrighteousness in the created order would be tantamount to a betrayal of the Creator's own righteous character.

Along the way, Paul levels all claims for removal from the list of the condemned. The only way forward to life for any of us passes through the gate of universal condemnation. Not only the blatant violators of human nature (1:24–27) but also the mass of humanity who live in a miasma of corruption and incivility (1:28–32). Not just the uncircumcised pagans, but also the people of the circumcision (2:17–26). Not just those ignorant and willingly indifferent to the divine laws but even the teachers learned in those laws will all stand condemned before the Judge (2:1–5, 17–21).

But what is unexpected in moral terms is the response of a righteous God to the unrighteous. Unrighteousness, sin, and evildoing cannot be redeemed. But in His everlasting love, God seeks to redeem and restore the unrighteous. The righteousness of God first damns and then delivers the unrighteous both from their fate and from the power of sin that binds them together for judgment. Taking a cue from the OT, where the righteous Judge was responsible not only for condemning the oppressor but also for rescuing the oppressed, Paul presents a God who not only condemns the evildoers but delivers them from the very evil that entraps them (cf. 7:4, 24–25). In other words, God, as the righteous Judge of the universe, is not satisfied to simply condemn sin and unrighteousness. His righteous and loving nature seeks to redeem and restore the sinners from their unrighteousness. Achieving this requires a great sacrifice and humiliation on the part of God: the public sacrificial death of His Son (3:24–25; 5:6–11). That death revealed in the most striking way conceivable both the righteous judgment of God against sin and the restoring righteousness of God, who has removed the barrier separating sinners from Him.

2. Faith as Response to Grace. The second reality that pervades Paul's letter is faith—a faith that acknowledges God's righteous condemnation and accepts the gracious gift of salvation through Jesus Christ. Paul does not speak much about the believer's love for God (except in 8:28). Saving faith involves more than mere assent; it must include the surrender of the whole of one's being to divine grace. Paul commends this faith as the sinner's only hope (3:28–31). Furthermore, only the believer (lit. "the faith-er") who renounces all sinful practices and boasting (3:27) receives undeserved salvation from the certain sentence of eternal death. True faith is faithful and leads to holiness.

3. The Indwelling Powers of Sin and the Spirit. Paul has an extended call for holy living intended to undercut every argument and temptation to fall into the old patterns of sin (6:1—7:6). For believers, there must be a complete change of loyalty from sin to righteousness. The initiating rite of baptism marks the bonding of believers with Christ in His death and resurrection. Baptism ought also to mark the death of any allegiance to the power of sin (6:1–11). To continue in sin is antithetical to the reign of God and the rule of righteousness. But Paul acknowledges the paradoxical effect of pressing the law's demands on fallen human nature, even when one seeks to live a holy life. Sinful passions are further aroused by the law's demands, and the power of sin increases its hold (7:5–25). Knowledge of the law's righteous demands seems to increase the impotence of the human will to do what is right. Both the righteous law of God and the human will are captive to the power of sin, the law only serving to tighten the hold of sin on the will. Only another presence beyond what we possess can release us from this bondage. Only by the indwelling of the Spirit of God can the deeds of the fallen nature be put to death (cf. 5:5–10; 7:6; 8:13). The united effort within the Godhead, strikingly evident in the Spirit's and Christ's intercession on our behalf (8:26–27, 34), breaks the hold of sin that pits our warring members against us.

4. Cosmic Hope. In Romans, Paul moves from the tragedy of sin and rebellion, which undermined the ability of humans to live at peace with God, to the restoration of that relationship for all through Christ. He also discusses the new life in Christ, who has freed us from the power of sin.

But there is another aspect of his understanding of salvation that needs attention: the consummation of salvation. He introduces it in the discussion using the subject of Christian hope. For Paul, the object of this hope is the future manifestation of "the glory of God" (5:2). This hope is so otherworldly that we can safely boast in it because it is not a human accomplishment. Such a hope is inseparable from joy (12:12). We can also boast in our tribulations because they produce not only perseverance and character but also hope (5:3–4); they reaffirm our hope in the future manifestation of the glory of God. This eschatological hope will not shame or disappoint us, because it is grounded in the love of God that we have experienced through the work of the Spirit (5:5). The possession of the Spirit strengthens Christian hope.

Paul develops these ideas a little more in 8:18–25, where he returns to the subject of suffering to establish that it cannot be compared at all with the glory that will eventually be revealed in us (8:18). The hope of glory empowers us to face the tribulations we go through at this present time. This does not mean that suffering is unreal, but rather that hope overcomes it. There is a cosmic yearning for the manifestation of the eschatological glory of God. The natural world is earnestly expecting this most radical event in order to be freed from the bondage of corruption and futility (8:19–20). But this liberation will not occur in isolation from the redemption of the children of God. We, too, live in expectation, eagerly awaiting the completeness of adoption and the redemption of our bodies (v. 23). When we were saved through the power of the gospel, we received this magnificent hope (v. 24). At the present time, both nature and humans groan, but we also rejoice in waiting for the manifestation of the glory of God. This wonderful hope should fill believers with joy (12:12) because it is grounded in the Scriptures (15:4) and is to be realized through Christ, the Messiah (15:12). It is deeply connected not only to Christ but also to the Father and to the Spirit, who make it possible for us to be filled with hope (15:13). Hope is the result of the work of the Trinity. The cross has enriched the life of believers by giving them a glorious hope: the manifestation of the glory of God that will consummate the saving power of the cross.

5. The Jews and the Messiah. In chapters 9–11, Paul confronts the Jewish rejection of the Messiah. Why did the majority of Israel fail to receive the righteousness that comes through faith, and how will God respond to their refusal? What happened to God's promised blessings to Israel? This conundrum was compounded by the widespread embrace of the gospel by non-Jews, who possessed none of the covenantal advantages of Israel. Paul discerned both human and divine factors at work. Israel tried to establish a right standing with God by keeping the law instead of accepting the righteousness that God bestows through faith in Christ, apart from human striving (9:30—10:4). Out of mercy for all humanity, God temporarily blinded part of Israel so that the gospel would be offered to the non-Jewish world (11:7–10). In time, the blessings of salvation among the Gentiles would incite Jewish envy, resulting in the salvation of "all Israel" (11:11–14, 26). In the meantime, the Gentile believers were not to look down on the nonbelieving Jews, lest this result in their being cut off from the people of God (11:17–24). All this is the outworking of God's confinement of all humanity in the prison of disobedience in order that He may show mercy to all humanity (11:32; cf. 1:18—3:31). So God's apparent partiality, first toward Israel before their rejection of the Messiah and then toward the Gentiles, turns out to be an expression of His impartial righteousness toward all humanity (1:16–17).

6. Sanctification Is a Communal Task. The last major section of the letter (chaps. 12–15) is not an afterthought. The arc of the letter's argument must reach to the heart of the worshiping community, which is nothing less than one body in Christ (12:5). While no sinner can rely on the righteousness of anyone other than Christ, no Christian is expected to advance spiritually apart from the nurture and encouragement of other believers. The renewing of the mind is a communal task (12:2). To accomplish that transformation, God has distributed gifts and abilities among the believers, who are to use them for one another's benefit (12:3–8). Nonetheless, the individual conscience of each believer must be respected (14:10–23), and the strong are to bear with the failings of those weaker in faith (15:1–2). Secondary issues and differences must not rend the fabric of faith that binds all together (14:17–20). God reserves the right to judge in those matters (14:5–12). Reserved for God also is any vengeance to be taken against the unjust actions of outsiders (12:17–20). Even pagan rulers are to be honored as God's appointed agents for order (13:1–7). In short, the faithful are not to "be overcome by evil" but rather to "overcome evil with good" (12:21). Harmony and sobriety are to characterize the faithful while they await the day of salvation (13:11–14).

Literary Features. Like the other letters of Paul, Romans contains, but is not constrained by, the conventional features of letters. The formal Hellenistic elements of sender, addressee, greeting, and thanksgiving are greatly expanded in 1:1–15 as Paul introduces his devotion to the gospel. The final greetings and blessing include the names of twenty-six people. Much of the letter is pervaded by passages from the OT that buttress his arguments and appeals. Throughout the letter, the readers are plied with questions that Paul then answers himself. He provides lengthy catalogs of sins (1:28–32) and eloquent lists of virtues (12:9–21). Paul devotes the first half of the letter to an unparalleled exposition of the gospel. The second part addresses more practical matters that flow from the theological section.

COMMENTARY

DIVINE INITIATIVE

In the first half of the letter, and after the introduction (1:1–17), Paul shows that only the gospel is the power of God that provides salvation for all believers (1:16); only the gospel can meet the desperate spiritual crises of both Jews and Gentiles (1:18—3:20). God has graciously taken the initiative through Jesus Christ to offer to all a righteousness available solely through faith in Christ (3:21—4:25). The enslaving powers of sin and death that came into the world through Adam have been overcome through Christ, the second Adam, bringing freedom to believers in Him (5:1–21). Consequently, those who have been baptized into Christ have emerged from the waters as new creatures no longer beholden to sin (6:1–23). But Paul also addresses the role of the law, because it has become an instrument of sin providing the occasion for sinning (7:8–25). The struggle with sin, as a dethroned king, will continue, but the presence, power, and intercession of the Holy Spirit can break the grip of the fallen nature in the lives of believers and permanently unite them to Christ and God (8:1–39).

1:1–15

Bringing God's Good News

Paul greatly expands the expected opening formalities of a letter to enlarge on the gospel, his own apostolic orders to the Gentiles, and the new identities of the Roman believers. He mentions his long-delayed plan to see them in person for their mutual encouragement and to preach the gospel in Rome. How he envisioned fulfilling this obligation is revealed at the end of the letter.

1:1–7. Salutation and Blessing. Paul's letters usually contain an expansion of the simple opening greetings that were characteristic of letter writing at that time to mention concerns or topics he intends to develop in the letters. In this case, Paul centers on "the gospel of God" (v. 1) and his desire to bring it to the nations. He introduces himself as a doulos (a "bond servant," "servant," "slave") of Jesus Christ who was called to be an apostle (v. 1). Like an imperial Roman slave who possessed immense power on behalf of the emperor but who was always under the absolute authority of the master, Paul writes as one fully conscious of his role as the slave of the Messiah, Jesus. Later, he will remind Roman believers that they are to see themselves as slaves or servants of God (6:22). Paul had previously been a Pharisee who was expected to avoid defiling contact with non-Jews. But Jesus Christ had called him to be an apostle to those very same people. The Roman believers, a largely Gentile body, were among those who had responded to the gospel call (cf. 1:6).

The gospel of God is literally the good news concerning God's Son that Paul was constrained to proclaim. It is identical to the Son's gospel (v. 9), "the gospel of Christ" (15:19), and "my gospel" (2:16; 16:25; cf. 1:15; 11:28; 15:20). The gospel is not a divine afterthought but the fulfillment of what God had previously promised through His prophets (1:2; cf. 1 Cor. 15:3, 4). Not surprisingly, scriptural quotations undergird Paul's argument and appear throughout the letter.

Romans 1:3 refers to Jesus's fulfillment of the prerequisite that the Messiah would be a descendant of David. The declaration of Jesus as the Son of God in power in this context refers to His resurrection and His ascension to "the right hand of God" (Rom. 8:34; cf. Eph. 1:19–21; Phil. 2:9). It is not that Jesus became the Son of God after the resurrection. Rather, this declaration confirms Jesus as the preincarnational Son of God, spoken of in Romans 5:10 and 8:3. Christ's entrance into human history as the messianic Son of David and His ascent as the empowered Son of God mark the greatest miracle of all.

Paul's commission as an apostle was to bring the Gentiles to an obedient faith (Rom. 1:5). For

Paul, faith involved the complete entrusting of oneself—including the past, the present, and the future—to the care of God. This verse captures the appropriate response to the gospel, namely, obedient faith (see 15:18; 16:19, 26). It probably refers to the life that is the consequence of the believer's faith, which consists in the renewing of the mind in accordance with God's perfect will (12:2).

The gospel had changed the status and identity of the Gentile believers. They were called by Jesus Christ (1:6) and had become the Messiah's own possession. The inconceivable had happened; the uncircumcised Gentiles had been appointed by God as hagiois ("saints," "holy people") set aside for a sacred purpose to lives of holiness. They were agapētois ("beloved," "loved"; v. 7)—a word God had used with regard to His chosen people, Israel (cf. Is. 5:1). Now, through Christ, God had poured out His love on all peoples (Rom. 5:5–8; cf. Col. 3:12; 1 Thess. 1:4; 2 Thess. 2:13). The Gentile converts had become Paul's brothers and sisters (Rom. 1:13). The abbreviated blessing of grace and peace from God the Father and Jesus Christ the Lord (v. 7) is best understood as a prayer. The priestly blessing (Num. 6:25–26) includes both grace and peace. Paul likely had this Jewish blessing in mind when he transformed the typical greeting used in Greek letters into a religious expression.

1:8–15. Longing to Preach in Rome. In nearly all of Paul's letters to the churches he founded, a thanksgiving section follows the opening salutation and blessing. In this letter, he thanks God that their faith was being proclaimed throughout the world (Rom. 1:8), that is, the Roman Empire. Their geographical location in Rome at the center of travel and communication in that empire gave the believers special prominence. The Greek noun for "faith," meaning "trust," was also used to mean "faithfulness" or "fidelity"; here it refers to the faith of the Roman believers (cf. 3:3; Gal. 5:22).

Usually, Paul's letters include an intercessory prayer, but this letter begins by acknowledging God as Paul's witness (Rom. 1:9) to assure the readers that they had long been on his prayer list. His prayer for the Romans includes a personal request that he might find a way to come to them according to God's will (v. 10) to impart a spiritual gift to them (v. 11) and to preach the gospel (v. 15). At the end of the letter (15:23–24), he reveals his further intention to evangelize Spain, for which the support of the Roman believers would be crucial. But here, lest they were to conclude that they were merely a means to accomplishing his real interest elsewhere (in Spain), he emphasizes his deep interest in their spiritual welfare. Paul spoke of his responsibilities to peoples who did not speak Greek (1:14; lit. "barbarians") and were considered by the Romans to be uncivilized and inherently inferior.

It had always been Paul's intention to preach the gospel where it had not yet been proclaimed (see 15:20). Why then had he been praying for the opportunity to preach to the Roman believers to have a fruitful harvest among them also (1:13)? The letter does not mention any basic theological heresy regarding the gospel that needed correction. In 15:14, he acknowledges that the believers in Rome were filled with goodness, knowledge, and the capacity to teach each other. Paul was probably thinking about adding new converts to the church through his missionary work while in Rome.

1:16–17

The Power of the Gospel

Paul's conception was that the gospel is the power of God that provides salvation for everyone who believes and that it is a revelation of the righteousness of God. These ideas receive further elaboration in 3:21–26 and 5:1–11. This short statement (1:16–17), supported by a scriptural reference to Habakkuk, catches the essence of the rest of the first half of the letter. Paul's declaration that he is not ashamed of the gospel (v. 16) expresses his pride and confidence in the gospel. The Christian message, which centered on a crucified Jew who was executed by the Romans as a criminal, naturally evoked scorn among many detractors. But Paul declares that such a message is the power of God, which provides salvation (v. 16; cf. 1 Cor. 1:17, 23–24). The present tense of the verbs in Romans 1:16–17 demonstrates that the gospel's power continues to be effective in the present despite being dependent on the past events of the death and resurrection of Christ. Through the preaching of the gospel by Paul and others, people were coming to a saving faith in Christ.

This passage refers to the gospel being presented first to the Jew, then also to the hellēni ("Greek," "Gentile"; Rom. 1:16; cf. 2:9–10; Acts 13:46, 28:25–30). This is an acknowledgment of the sequence of God's redemptive engagement with humanity. The central portion of the letter (Rom. 9–11) is devoted to the status of God's covenant promises with Israel in light of the fact that many Jews had rejected Jesus as Messiah. But first Paul establishes that in God's eyes there is no difference, because all have sinned (3:9).

Paul asserts that the righteousness of God is revealed through the gospel (1:16–17). The biblical understanding of righteousness as an attribute of God conveys more than a static aspect of God's holy character. The righteousness of God conveys a righteous God in action, with a disposition to make right what is wrong, to restore broken relationships, to act on behalf of His people—a God who is loyal to the covenant. In the context of the death of His Son, His righteousness is expressed in forgiveness.

English has no corresponding verbal form for "righteousness" that can convey the full range of possible meanings in the Greek language. The corresponding Greek verb conveying the meanings of "to rectify," "to right," or "to declare righteous" is typically rendered in English as "to justify." As conventional as this usage is, it is not without problems, since "justify" commonly means to give a reason or even to offer an excuse for a deed. There is no excuse for sin. In describing the gospel as the righteousness of God in action, Paul was seeking to show that God's surprising justification of sinners—that is, of reconciling sinners to Himself through the death of His Son—is a powerful expression of His righteousness (3:21–26; 5:8–10). This created for Paul a theological problem that he would address later, namely, that God justifies sinners, not the innocent.

God's righteousness is revealed and grounded in faith from beginning to end (1:17), and it leads to obedience that flows from faith (v. 5). Here (v. 17) Paul cites Habakkuk 2:4, the first explicit scriptural quotation in the letter, which serves to support the assertion that in the gospel God reveals His righteousness through faith (Rom. 1:17; see "Habakkuk 2:4 and the New Testament," p. 1125). Paul was using the passage to show that life is preserved only by faith (in Christ) in submission to the gospel message.

1:18–32

The Wrath of God Revealed

Before the gospel can be grasped as a compelling necessity, the desperate human need for it must be laid bare. Lest there be any doubt of the need for the gospel, Paul begins with an extended indictment of universal sinfulness and culpability, starting with the Gentile world (1:18—2:16) and then including the Jews (2:17—3:20).

While no ethnic group is identified in 1:18–32, Paul and the believers in Rome would have understood Gentiles or non-Jews to be the primary target of this opening section of his critique. Three times Paul declares that the wrath of God (v. 18) was revealed when He handed over the idolaters to moral impurity (v. 24), disgraceful passions (v. 26), and a corrupt mind (v. 28). Divine wrath reveals the human willingness to suppress the truth by humans' unrighteousness (v. 18). Paul then proceeds to explain his intention by pointing to the fact that God had manifested Himself to all. God's invisible attributes—His eternal power and deity—have been perceivable by all since Creation through what He created, leaving humans without excuse when they suppress the truth (vv. 19–20). Instead of giving glory and thanks to God the Creator, humans chose darkness and foolishness (vv. 21–22). Consequently, they worshiped images and other elements of creation and not the Creator (v. 23).

The passive verbs in vv. 21–22 (emataiōthēsan, eskotisthē, emōranthēsan) imply the action of God—the handing over (paredōken; v. 24)—as an act of God's wrath. But all is not lost, for in 8:32 the same Greek word appears, speaking of God as having handed over His own Son to death for us all. With both actions based on God's initiative, the second action brings deliverance from wrath to all who accept the gift of grace.

Paul assumed and built on accepted Jewish beliefs that the Gentiles' failure to honor God led to immorality. Fallen human nature needs no encouragement for the emergence of the perverse and pervasive sins cataloged in vv. 24–32. Sins of dishonor against the Creator lead inevitably to dishonor against humanity and one's own body. Same-gender sexual conduct became Paul's prime evidence of Gentile sinfulness (vv. 24–27). Unlike many in the Greek and Roman world who condoned and even praised same-gender sexual conduct, Jews with one voice considered such conduct to be against the natural order and God's will. Any suggestion that Paul, if writing today, would have tempered his words when confronted with a loving, monogamous, and faithful same-sex couple or with evidence of homosexual orientation as a genetic predisposition is groundless. The Levitical laws against same-gender sexual conduct, with one male taking the role of the female, confirmed his position (Lev. 18:22; 20:13; cf. Deut. 23:18; 1 Cor. 6:9–11; 1 Tim. 1:8–11; Jude 5–8). Paul's indictment in Romans 1 includes women engaged in unnatural same-gender sexual conduct, which was well known among Greeks. The focus of Paul's condemnation is on same-gender sexual conduct itself. Such conduct is the result of our sinful nature, which is always subject to temptation, whether momentary or chronic, and is always remedied by reliance on faith in Christ to resist and overcome sin.

Paul asserts that the unnatural and evil deeds of humans were to some extent their own punishment (Rom. 1:27). Humans degrade themselves by engaging in that which is degrading. Paul takes up at length the naming of the wicked fruits of a debased mind (vv. 28–32). All the varieties of sin and sinners are rooted in the same soil of a mindset determined to do what ought not to be done. The list of evil does not exhaust Paul's moral vocabulary (cf. Gal. 5:19–21; 1 Tim. 3:1–5). He places all humankind, practicing all manner of evil, under the sentence of divine judgment. The composite picture is bleak in the extreme—humans filled with all kinds of evil, envy, murder, strife, deceit, and maliciousness (Rom. 1:29). There is seemingly no room left for virtue and goodness. The litany closes with a rapid, hammer-like string of adjectives: "unwise," "untrustworthy," "unloving" (some manuscripts add "unforgiving"), and "unmerciful" (v. 31).

Adding insult to injury, the evildoers were persisting in their evil, knowing full well that those who practice such things are worthy of death (v. 32). What was the source of that knowledge? In 2:14–15, Paul points to the law of right and wrong written on the hearts of the Gentiles who lack direct knowledge of the Decalogue. Their brazen persistence in evil deeds was topped by their approval of others practicing them (v. 32), creating a community of wickedness with members applauding each other, drowning out the voice of conscience.

2:1–16

God's Just Judgment of All

Paul then addresses all those who would present themselves as morally superior because they condemned the evildoers portrayed in 1:18–32. The wide sweep of Paul's argument involves anyone who passes judgment (2:1), including those Gentiles who claimed a higher ethical standard than the mass of sinners as well as the religiously observant Jews. Both Jews and Greeks are explicitly mentioned in v. 9.

These critics stand in contrast to those offering open support and applauding evildoers (1:32). But their claim of moral superiority is a sham, because they are guilty of the same things they condemn in others (2:1). In spite of their agreement with God's standards, they can claim no higher moral ground. In fact, their condemnation of others only deepens their own guilt. Fallen human beings who see themselves as morally superior to others are apt to become unloving and unmerciful (1:31; cf. Luke 18:9–14). The list of sins in Romans 1:28–32 also includes the more easily concealed sins (e.g., envy and greed). The openly self-righteous are often able to preserve their reputation in the eyes of others (cf. Matt. 23:25–28; Luke 16:14). This recalls the all-too-familiar news of people who publicly oppose some aberrant practice, even to the point of sponsoring laws against that practice, but who turn out to be secret practitioners themselves.

The declaration that the judgment of God rightly falls on those who practice evil (Rom. 2:2) is not new to evildoers (cf. 1:32), but it is all too often set aside by those who presume that the kindness of God condones their complacent sinning. The goodness and kindness of God shown by the delay of the day of His wrath should lead the sinner to repentance (2:3–5). Only the fool interprets God's patience as weakness. Nothing short of contempt adequately describes the stubborn heart that confuses divine patience with indifference and refuses to repent (v. 5). Although the emphasis in presenting the gospel must be the love of God, when only medical intervention will save a careless patient's life, no physician would rightfully conceal the seriousness of the condition. Thus, Paul here uses the strongest language to warn the complacent and the self-satisfied of the dire consequences awaiting them (v. 5).

The mention of God's righteous judgment refers to the judicial decisions in the heavenly tribunal prior to the Second Coming of Christ, to be revealed on the day of His wrath (v. 5), based on human deeds (v. 6). This aspect of God's wrath differs from the wrath of God in 1:24, 26, 28, revealed when God turned idolaters over to the control of the sinful desires of their hearts. This permissive form of God's wrath does not replace but anticipates the more active expression of God's eschatological wrath against sin and sinners (2:5, 8–9). The suffering and shame humans endure when under the power of passion and an evil mind foreshadow the anger, trouble, and distress to come on every evildoer, whether Jew or Greek (2:8–9); by contrast, believers receive glory and honor and have the hope of immortality (v. 7).

The Pax Romana, the peace proclaimed as an achievement of imperial Rome, was imposed on the conquered territories and tribes, ensuring Roman domination under the guise of an enforced peace. In contrast, the promise of ultimate peace and security in God's presence (v. 10) is even now foreshadowed by the present inner peace from the God of peace (1:7). Believers "have peace with God" (5:1) because He has reconciled them to Himself through Jesus (2 Cor. 5:18).

There is no favoritism or partiality with God (Rom. 2:11). In the midst of the argument on universal sinfulness (chaps. 1–3), the constant is the absolute fairness of God, both in condemnation and in salvation (2:11–16). All are judged as falling short of the glory of God (3:23). Neither a Jew's knowledge of God's law nor a Gentile's ignorance of it will excuse either of them in the judgment (2:13–16). Paul states that the Gentiles have the law written on their hearts, and their conscience bears witness to their knowledge of the moral law (v. 15). The doers of the law will be justified (v. 13). The emphasis in 2:3–13 indicates that the justification in view was to come at the final judgment. Paul also speaks of a past justification (8:30; 1 Cor. 6:11; Titus 3:7). Through Christ we may be justified, be reconciled with God, and be confident in the judgment.

So far, Paul has sought to show access to moral standards not only for Jews but also for the non-Jews who know God but disregarded Him. Now, in Romans 2:14–16, Paul further unpacks his argument of Gentile culpability to include those Gentiles whose conscience either commends or corrects their conduct. Verse 14 can be translated and punctuated as: "For when Gentiles, who do not have the law by nature, do the things in the law, these, although not having the law, are the law for themselves." Gentiles, as such, do not naturally possess the revealed law given to the Jews. Nonetheless, at least sometimes they perform the deeds demanded by that law. Verses 14–16 need not be viewed as an exception to Paul's argument of the universal need for salvation through the grace of God apart from works. Instead, they further underscore the Gentiles' culpability when they at times do the requirements of the law. God has the moral requirements of the law written on their hearts (v. 15). Their own consciences confirm this when their minds affirm their good conduct or condemn their own evil deeds. But God's knowledge is not restricted to the outward deeds. So in the coming judgment, the inner thoughts, whether of conscience or evil secretly nurtured, will also be summoned to bear witness.

2:17–29

Claims for God's Favor Set Aside

In vv. 17–24, Paul argues that the Jews' knowledge of the law, which allowed them to excel as

Judgment by Works

How shall we square Paul's emphasis in 2:6–10 on a future judgment—when God is to reward everyone according to their deeds (v. 6; cf. Ps. 62:12; Prov. 24:12; Jer. 32:19)—with his denial of any justification based on human works (Rom. 3:20–24)? The declaration that God's judgment will be based on the deeds of the judged (2:6, 13) is uncontestable, since it is grounded in Scripture (e.g., Ps. 62:12; Prov. 24:12; cf. Matt. 7:21–27; 16:27; Phil. 1:9–11; 2:5–16; Rev. 22:12). What God calls for is heartfelt repentance, a personal turning away from evil (Rom. 2:4). Good deeds are the evidence of repentance (Acts 26:20) and the outgrowth of the fruit of the indwelling Spirit (cf. Rom. 8:8–11; Gal. 5:22–23). Believers who follow the Spirit will not be following the sinful desires of the flesh (Rom. 7:12–23). To the Galatians who were no longer under law but under grace, Paul categorically declared that those who would continue practicing the deeds of the flesh would not inherit the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:18–21; cf. Rom. 1:29–31; 1 Cor. 6:9–11). In contrast, those with the Spirit would bear fruit accordingly (Gal. 5:22–23). Righteous deeds are not the basis of salvation. But for Paul, they are the hallmarks of those who have died to sin in solidarity with Christ (Rom. 6:1–7). Paul describes in Romans 8 the life in the Spirit of Christ bestowed on believers. Empowered by the indwelling Spirit of Christ, though they struggle against the pull of sin, they are free from its dominion (8:1–2; cf. 6:14; 13:14; Gal. 5:24–25).

teachers, would not count in God's eyes if the righteous deeds demanded by the law were absent in their lives. In vv. 25–29, Paul addresses the value of circumcision, the identifying mark of male Jews. In both sections, the moral demands of the law override legal expertise and ritual obedience.

Paul addresses another imaginary interlocutor who bore a Jewish name, relied on the law, and boasted in God (v. 17). This person appeared to possess higher moral sensibilities than the previous one, who merely disapproved of evil while participating in it (vv. 1–5). This Jew heartily approved of that which was morally superior. He made a significant effort to know God's will revealed in the law (v. 18) and made himself available to instruct others he considered to be blind, in darkness, and foolish (vv. 19–20). Paul addresses such self-confident Jewish teachers with a series of questions about Jews' own conduct (vv. 21–23). Condemning stealing and adultery while practicing them is a tragic self-deception and a moral failure (vv. 21–22). When the Jews claimed to belong to God, the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles because of them (v. 24; cf. Is. 52:5; Ezek. 36:20–21). Perhaps from his years as a rabbinical student in Jerusalem (Acts 22:3), Paul had experienced and observed the pervasive human failure to carry out the mandates of the moral law among those who most loudly proclaimed the necessity of allegiance to its particulars (cf. Matt. 23:13–28). Lest this indictment serve to justify the anti-Semitism in the centuries that followed, it is important to recognize that Paul was a Jew who thoroughly identified with his fellow Jews (Rom. 9:1–4). His imaginary encounter with a skilled but hypocritical teacher raises a warning to every Christian educator who excels in the knowledge of Scripture.

Here the discussion in Romans shifts to the value of circumcision for Jews (Rom. 3:1–2). The question of whether Gentile converts needed to be circumcised was foremost in the earlier letter to the Galatians (Gal. 2:1–6; 5:1–12; 6:12–15; cf. 1 Cor. 7:18–19). The Jerusalem Council had determined that male Gentile converts did not need to undergo circumcision (Acts 15:23–29). Paul asserted that obedience to ritual circumcision when the circumcised one is a law-breaker was useless; the circumcision did not matter (Rom. 2:25). Indeed, the physically uncircumcised, if they fulfilled the law, would condemn the lawbreaking circumcised Jew in the judgment (cf. v. 26; Luke 11:32). But to the one keeping the law, circumcision was indeed valuable (Rom. 2:25). Paul did not elaborate here on that value (cf. 9:4–5), but law-abiding Jews would bring honor to God, in whose name they were circumcised.

But more important is the required inner circumcision of the heart (Deut. 30:6; Jer. 4:4, 9:25; cf. Acts 7:51), which points to a wholehearted devotion to God that is evident in righteous deeds. The outward circumcision points to the higher circumcision of the heart to be performed by the Spirit of God. Only one so circumcised could rightfully be called a Jew (Rom. 2:28–29). The mention of the Spirit (v. 29) is not a reference to the spiritual aspect of the person. It designates the Spirit of God, who in Ezekiel is connected to the circumcision of the heart (Ezek. 36:26–27). The gramma ("letter") refers to the written code of the law, which included the command of circumcision (cf. 1 Cor. 7:6; Gal. 5:3). A true Jew was one whose praise did not come from other people but from God (Rom. 2:29). In Paul's cultural world, receiving public recognition was considered a worthwhile achievement (cf. Matt. 6:2), but for the follower of Christ such recognition was not to be sought (cf. Rom. 13:3; 1 Cor. 11:17–22). Instead, the aim of life was to receive the approval and praise of God (Rom. 2:7, 10, 29).

Wrapping Up the Prosecution's Case

In Romans 3:1–20, Paul concludes the long indictment that began in 1:18, presenting all humanity, Jews and Gentiles alike, standing together as sinners facing the judgment of God. This universal condemnation lays the foundation for the proclamation of a universal solution for "all who believe" (3:21–26) in Jesus Christ. In 3:1–9, Paul voices several objections from an imaginary Jewish interlocutor, each of which he briefly counters. The prosecution ends in vv. 10–18 with a collage of scriptural quotations establishing that no one is righteous (v. 10). In vv. 19–20, Paul notes that the law cannot be an ally in averting God's judgment since it actually functions to make the world answerable to God (v. 19).

3:1–9. Objections Raised. Paul adopts a style of question and answer to address several objections to his conclusions. If Paul was right about circumcision, is there any value in being an observant Jew (vv. 1–2)? Will human unfaithfulness to the covenant cause God to abandon His promised blessings (v. 3)? Is God fair in condemning humanity (v. 5)? There is even the question of whether Paul's gospel actually fostered sin (vv. 7–8). Several of the issues and accusations in this section are repeated and refuted at greater length later in the letter. The absurd charge that Paul was advocating sinning to increase God's grace (v. 8) will be met head-on in 6:1–23.

The first objection rises naturally after Paul's declaration in 2:29. If one could become a follower of a Jewish Messiah without becoming a Jew and without following the ordinances of the Torah, what is the advantage of being a Jew? Paul's answer is that there are considerable advantages in many respects (v. 2). He then mentions the important advantage of having been trusted to receive God's logia ("words," "oracles"; v. 2b; cf. 2 Tim. 3:16). They possessed the very utterances of God as a treasure. Paul appears to have had in mind the whole of Scripture, including the covenant promises to the Jewish people, as suggested by the next question concerning whether their lack of faith could nullify God's promises (Rom. 3:3).

In light of the moral condemnation of Jews along with Gentiles, the question naturally arises regarding whether God would withdraw the blessings of the covenant from the descendants of Abraham. This would imply the conditional nature of the covenant that God made with Abraham and that was ratified at Sinai. Later (chaps. 9–11), Paul provides a full discussion of God's response to the unbelief or unfaithfulness of some of Paul's Jewish contemporaries. But here, his brief assertion anticipates the fuller discussion: mē genoito (lit. "May it not be!"). For even if everyone were a liar, God would still be true to His own righteous character (v. 4; cf. Ps. 116:11) in His dealings with the chosen people—indeed, with all humanity. Paul associated God's faithfulness (Rom. 3:3) with God's integrity (v. 4), which must not be compromised in His condemnation of sin and in His justifying of sinners. The quotation in v. 4 comes from Psalm 51, in which David acknowledged his sin and the fairness of God in dealing with his affair with Bathsheba.

Translations vary in regard to the end of Romans 3:4. Some have God being judged, while others suggest that it is God who is doing the judging. Both ideas have some linguistic and contextual warrant. In either case, the main point is that at the final judgment, God's justice will be recognized by all. In vv. 4–26, God's righteousness (v. 5), an attribute closely related to His faithfulness (v. 3) and integrity (v. 4), dominates the flow of thought. But the question now is, If our unrighteousness reveals that God is righteous, then is not God unjust when He inflicts wrath? Paul's answer is another emphatic mē genoito ("Absolutely not!"). There is no contradiction between the ideas that in the judgment God's justice is recognized and the wicked are condemned. This is what the final judgment is about; this is how God judges the world.

The charge in v. 5 is essentially repeated in v. 7: If my lie adds to God's glory, why should I be condemned? Paul then (almost sarcastically) raises the question of whether God should be pleased if we deliberately do evil, since the results will include the good (v. 8). Some, he clarifies, affirm that this is exactly what he was teaching, but he rejects the charge. His full answer will be developed in 6:1–23.

Paul returns to the question of the advantage for the Jews and clarifies that there is none (v. 9), which would appear to contradict what he said in v. 2. But the question here could be rephrased as follows: "Are we, as Jews, worse than the Gentiles?" One could answer that the Jews were worse in the sense that they were under greater condemnation because they had a greater knowledge of the will of God and yet disobeyed His will. Paul dismisses that possible answer by indicating that, as he had already shown, both Jews and Gentiles are equally under the power of sin (v. 9). Paul is indicating that God deals equally with Jews and Gentiles.

3:10–20. Universal Condemnation. In this concluding round, Paul takes the role of a teacher of the law to biblically establish God's indictment of all humanity. Based on Psalm 14:1–3, he demonstrates that there is no one who is righteous or who seeks God—not even one (Rom. 3:10–12). The assumption Paul shared with the Roman believers is that these words were not those of a pessimistic psalmist but God's considered judgment regarding humanity. The descriptive accusations that follow (vv. 13–18) assume this universal indictment. Drawn largely from the Psalms but also from Proverbs and Isaiah, they depict deceptive and blasphemous speech leading to murder, ruin, misery, and the end of peace. The descriptions of violence and verbal abuse record the consequences of these twin failures (vv. 13–17). The final line sums up the original sin of disrespect: "There is no fear of God before their eyes" (v. 18). This statement matches the earlier declaration that no one seeks God (v. 11). It is not natural for humans to acknowledge their moral failure and to seek after God. The hunger for holiness is an unseen and often unacknowledged gift from God (2:4; Acts 5:31; 11:18; 2 Tim. 2:25).

The declaration that "whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law" (Rom. 3:19) indicates that Paul understood the scriptural citations to be part of the law of God, albeit as divine indictments. The intention of the indictments is that all mouths will be silenced and the whole world is hypodikos ("answerable," "accountable"; some translations render it "guilty" because of the context). Those whose mouths will be stopped will be speechless in the sense of being left without defense, recognizing themselves as indeed accountable to God. Paul refers to all as awaiting the full force of the wrath of God. The conclusion is obvious that no one is justified (or acquitted as righteous, implying a final appearance before the throne of God for all humanity) in the sight of God by the deeds of the law.

These deeds of the law (v. 20) are the attempt to obey the law of God by means of human effort, a matter Paul addresses more fully in 7:14–24. The brief declaration that it is by the law that sin is known (3:20b; cf. 4:13) indicates that the law as a moral standard reveals the expression of sin in human behavior. The law condemns but cannot justify sinners. It cannot rectify what is wrong; it cannot atone for what has been done. (The role of the law in pointing out sin is discussed further in 7:7–12.)

Up to this point, Paul has shown that both Jews and Gentiles knew what was right, even though the Jews had the fuller understanding of the will of God. Both were accountable to God, who alone deserved their worship and respect (cf. 1:21–23). Both had failed to give God the appropriate response, both in their sinning and even their failure to repent (cf. 2:4). Both faced the coming judgment before God (2:3, 16). Both were unable on their own, by their own deeds, to obey the demands of the law—to be "justified" or declared right with God. Both stood before the bar of God condemned.

3:21—5:21

Revelation of God's Righteousness

Presuming that his audience members were now convinced of their condemnation, Paul next offers the divine prescription. The good news is that sinners can be restored to a saving relationship with the righteous Judge through the death of Jesus Christ on their behalf (3:21–26; 5:6–11). This justification, this reconciliation, comes wholly from God's initiative, apart from human achievement. Even Abraham was justified apart from his deeds, becoming the father of all who put their faith in Christ (4:1–16). The supreme achievement of Christ in bringing justification and eternal hope for all is far superior to the disastrous result of Adam's sin, which affects all people (5:12–21).

3:21–26. Revealed through the Faith of Jesus. Translators differ on the meaning of key words and phrases in this section. But the central point is clear: the righteousness of God and His integrity, faithfulness, and saving power have been upheld and even confirmed by His acquittal of sinners through the redemptive death of His Son. In the background lies the matter of the covenant between God and Abraham, extended to his descendants (cf. 9:4; 11:27). But first, Paul declares God's righteous resolution of the universal condition facing all humans.

In the original Greek, Romans 3:21–26 comprises a single complex sentence. One way Paul directed the flow of thought through this complex sentence is by the use of the Greek preposition dia, which is translated as "through" or "by means of." Its use shows that this is about the righteousness of God from beginning to end. The emphasis on righteousness is even more evident when the words sometimes translated as "justified" and "just" (vv. 24, 26) can equally be translated as "declared righteous" and "righteous," respectively, since they share the same Greek root as "righteousness." This emphasis, along with the stress on faith, faithfulness, and belief in Christ, should guide the interpretation of the passage.

Having established in 1:18—3:20 the utter futility of evading the wrath of God, Paul next announces the good news in 3:21–26: God provides a solution to the universal human predicament. All are acquitted and set right with God in the same way. The contrast is between God's righteousness and human sinfulness. The central concern is God's integrity and faithfulness in His dealing with sin "apart from the law" (v. 21). Can God's righteousness be upheld if He declares sinners to be justified even though they stand condemned by the law? The answer is yes, because in His righteous act, God sent forth His Son as a sacrifice to pay the price for human sinfulness (vv. 24–25). God's saving action through Jesus demonstrates that God is righteous when He justifies or rectifies sinners, declaring them righteous in Christ, restoring the broken relationship.

The Greek phrase tēn pistin tou theou, correctly translated as "the faithfulness of God" or "God's faithfulness" in 3:3, has led some interpreters to translate the parallel phrase in v. 22 (there usually rendered as "faith in Jesus Christ") as "the faithfulness of Jesus Christ." Understood in this way, the death of Christ as a willing act of faithfulness was in complete harmony with the faithfulness of the Father in offering His Son (8:32). This reading is possible, but the emphasis in Paul's writings on the importance of placing our faith in Christ (e.g., Gal. 2:16; Phil. 1:29) better supports the common translation. Paul clarifies his intention by adding that God's righteousness is for "all who believe" (Rom. 3:22). Faith, here, is embracing the saving power of God in Christ as the only way to be reconciled and justified before God.

Inserted in the middle of the long sentence (vv. 21–26) is a parenthetical statement (vv. 22b–24) that explains the emphasis on "all" in v. 22b. God's saving solution reaches beyond the covenant's privileges: there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles in the sense that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (v. 23). The choice of using the present verb tense "fall short" points to the ongoing failure of humans to realize the moral excellence God has intended for them. For this reason alone, a restored relationship with God cannot be based on human performance but must be based on being justified freely by His grace (v. 24).

Human righteousness cannot be restored through any legal system, even that proclaimed by God from Sinai. Neither can human sinfulness be ignored by a righteous God who in His forbearance had for a time not dealt with previous sins (v. 25). Paul may have had in mind here the sins committed before the coming of Christ. He declares that God's righteousness is definitively demonstrated through the death of His Son, Jesus Christ, whom God Himself set forth as the way of redemption. Instead of the typological reconciliation through animal sacrifices in the sanctuary services, God now offers all humanity redemption as a free gift to those who entrust themselves to Jesus Christ as the sacrificial victim.

Paul does not offer a detailed explanation of how the death of Christ is adequate to redeem all human sinners. Here he speaks of the redemption in and by Christ Jesus (v. 24) and a hilastēriov (variously translated "propitiation," "expiation," "sacrifice of atonement") through His blood or sacrificial death (v. 25). Redemption implies the previous enslavement of humans and their subsequent deliverance through Christ. A sacrifice removes the barrier of sin (expiation) and restores peace between God and humans (propitiation). In all of this, God's love is assumed because He Himself put forth His Son as a sacrifice that displayed God's righteous judgment against sin (cf. 8:3; 2 Cor. 5:21). The Greek word hilastēriov (Rom. 3:25) appears only one other time in the NT, in Hebrews 9:5, where it designates the mercy seat (some translations favor "atonement cover") or "propitiatory" of the ark of the covenant in the tabernacle. The Greek version of the OT uses the same word for the mercy seat (cf. Ex. 25:18–22). Linguistically, it would be correct to translate it as "mercy seat" or "propitiatory," but in this context it seems to be a forced image. It can be rendered contextually as "sacrifice of atonement."

It is evident that Paul understood God's righteousness to refer not only to His holy character but also to His gracious saving action that removes human sin and restores the right relationship with Him. The righteous judge in the OT was expected to condemn the guilty and to make sure that the wrong was righted. In some passages, God's righteousness is synonymous with His saving activity on behalf of His people, even when their condition was the result of their own unfaithfulness. The final phrase of Romans 3:26 refers to God being just as the One who justifies a person who has faith in Jesus. It means that it is essential that God be seen as righteous when He declares anyone who trusts in Jesus as righteous (cf. v. 4). While Paul expresses confidence in God's righteousness and fairness (vv. 3–6), the death of Jesus renders baseless any accusation against God's treatment of sinners (cf. Zech. 3:1–5; John 12:31–32; Rev. 12:9–11).

3:27–31. Justification Apart from Deeds of the Law. Paul returns to the human tendency to boast of one's inheritance or achievements. But here boasting is excluded because of the "law"—in this case perhaps more like a "principle"—of faith (Rom. 3:27). Any supposed advantage on the grounds of being a Jew vanishes in the presence of God, who impartially judges all as sinners and justifies by grace all who believe, whether Jew or Gentile, circumcised or uncircumcised (v. 30).

A person is justified by faith apart from the works of the law (v. 28). The means to attaining righteousness in God's sight, or being declared righteous before God, lies apart from human deeds. In his German translation, Martin Luther added the word "alone" in "by faith alone," which is not in the Greek text but which makes explicit what is implied, since all other human approaches to God are excluded. Furthermore, faith itself is not a basis for boasting, as if it were a saving work, for it is not the human trust in God that saves; it is God who saves the one who trusts Him.

Paul argues against any claim to justification based on keeping the law by referring to a central conviction of Jewish Scripture: there is one God (v. 30; cf. Deut. 6:4). As Creator of all humanity, He must also be the God of the Gentiles (Rom. 3:29). The covenant God made with Abraham intended to bless all the nations of the earth (Gal. 3:8). No one has an exclusive claim on God's love, for He is the God of all. Since there is only one God, there is also only one way of salvation.

Since justification is apart from the law, the imaginary Jewish interlocutor in Romans 3:31 responds by asking if we make void or nullify the law by faith. In the strongest terms, Paul emphatically insists mē genoito ("Definitely not!"). We establish and uphold the law through faith. In what sense is that so? The law is established or upheld because God's righteous condemnation of all human beings on the basis of the law has been affirmed, and the removal of this guilt has been accomplished by Christ's having taken the penalty of the law—death—on Himself on our behalf (Rom. 3:21–26; cf. 5:19; 2 Cor. 5:21). Later in the epistle, Paul explains further how the law of God is upheld even when sinners are acquitted by faith in Christ and not through obedience to the law. Through the love of the Spirit in the hearts of believers (Rom. 8:1–11), "the fulfillment of the law" is expressed (13:10; cf. Gal. 5:22—6:2). By the Holy Spirit, God pours His love into our hearts (Rom. 5:5) so that "the righteous requirement of the law" will be fulfilled or fully met in us, who do not live (lit. "walk") "according to the flesh but according to the Spirit" (8:4).

Father Abraham, the Star Witness

In the first three chapters, Paul establishes that all, whether Jew or Gentile, have sinned and that the wrath to come may be averted only through faith in Christ. Next, he presents his star witness: Abraham, whose trust in the promise of God to provide an heir for him is accounted by God as righteousness (Gen. 15:6; see also Gal. 3:6–18; Heb. 6:12–20; 11:8–10). He is the father of the "ungodly" (Rom. 4:5, 11). This is established by a chronological sequence: God counted Abraham's faith as righteousness years before He commanded Abraham to be circumcised (vv. 10–12). The fact that Abraham's and Sarah's bodies were as good as dead made it impossible for them to fulfill the promise through their works. Abraham simply trusted in God's promise (vv. 16–22). The promise God made him—that as father of many nations he would inherit the earth (v. 13; cf. Gen 15:7, 18–21)—included all those sharing in his faith. He is the spiritual father of Jews and Gentiles trusting in the God who raised Jesus from the dead for their justification (Rom. 4:24–25). Abraham, who had believed even when there seemed to be no reason for hope (v. 18), also became the believers' paradigm of enduring hope (cf. 5:2–5).

4:1–8. Faith Reckoned by God as Righteousness. In the inspired record of God's dealings with Abraham, Paul found a firm basis for his claim that God justifies the ungodly who entrust themselves to Him. God's reckoning of Abraham's faith for righteousness is the prototype of how God always justifies the ungodly (4:5). When Romans was written, Jewish writers were presenting Abraham as a paragon of perfection. Based on Genesis 26:5, they believed that he kept all of God's commandments, even those given at Sinai. His faith was considered a righteous work. But even Abraham was a sinner (Rom. 3:23). Paul is not suggesting that by trusting God to keep His promise Abraham deserved to have his faith elogisthē (from logizomai; "reckoned," "credited," "accounted") to him for righteousness (4:3). Otherwise, his faith would have ended up being another form of meritorious works, a payment for what was earned (v. 4). The divine reckoning was a gift, according to grace (v. 16; cf. v. 4). Father Abraham had no more grounds for boasting than anyone else (cf. 2:17, 23; 3:27).

Two witnesses were required by Mosaic law to establish truth (Deut. 19:15). Thus, Paul calls a second star witness: David (Rom. 4:7–8). In Psalm 32:1–2, David recites God's blessing on the person whose transgression is forgiven (Ps. 32:1; cf. Rom. 4:7) and whose sins are not taken into account (Ps. 32:2; cf. Rom. 4:8). Faith is counted as righteousness because the sin is forgiven, or not credited to the sinner. Paul's point was that it was credited to someone else: Jesus. This quotation from Psalms provides the only use of the specific Greek word for "forgiveness" in the book of Romans. Paul prefers instead to speak of God's grace (cf. Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14; 2:13). He emphasizes God's grace in the justification of the ungodly, by which He puts them in a right relationship with Himself. This He accomplishes by justifying them by faith in Christ. But by quoting Psalm 32:1–2, Paul shows that God's forgiveness is part of righteousness by faith. The justification of the ungodly is not a legal fiction. To be justified is, above all, to be put right with God by God, free from condemnation. It is a restored relationship with God through the sacrificial offering of His Son on behalf of sinners. It requires from sinners an acknowledgment of their sinful state, repentance, and unqualified trust in what God offers through His Son.

4:9–12. Abraham: Father of the Justified Uncircumcised. God's reckoning of Abraham's faith as righteousness (Gen. 15:6) predated by fourteen years his obedience to the command to circumcise (Gen. 17). Paul asserts that Abraham's subsequent circumcision was in fact a symbolic recognition that God had already reckoned his faith as righteousness (Rom. 4:11). Paul's contemporaries, whether Jew or Gentile, understood circumcision to be the external sign of an observant Jew and the rite that proselytes to Judaism were required to undergo to become part of the covenant people. But now the experience of Abraham was akin to that of uncircumcised Gentile Christian converts. Abraham became the father of both the circumcised and the uncircumcised who trusted in the Jewish Messiah. When God made an "everlasting covenant" with Abraham (Gen. 17:7, 13, 19), as part of the covenant requirements, He commanded him and the males in his family to undergo circumcision (Gen. 17:10). At the same time, God repeatedly promised Abraham that he would be a father of many nations (Gen. 17:4–6). Paul understood this promise to be fulfilled not with Jacob's large family but when non-Jews from many nations accepted the gospel that offered salvation through the Jewish Messiah, Jesus. Later, Paul addresses the status of these Gentile converts as if they were branches grafted on to an olive tree (Rom. 11:17–24). To place Abraham as the father of both the Jews and the Gentiles helped remove the long-standing barrier between them.

4:13–17. Righteousness Before and Apart from the Law. Even in the midst of the close-up on the life of Abraham from the viewpoint of faith, Paul underlines the limitations of the law from a chronological perspective. God made the promise about Abraham's descendants hundreds of years before giving the Ten Commandments at Sinai. Had God waited to make the promise until after giving the law, the condition for the promise's fulfillment would have been compliance with the law's demands. The promise would never have been realized, because the giving of the law unfortunately increased human transgression. The promise would have been an exclusive gift from God to the Jews. Paul took with utmost seriousness this sequence of Abraham's justification before the giving of the law, since it establishes an authoritative precedent for God's current work of justifying sinners through Jesus Christ apart from the law.

4:18–22. Abraham's Unwavering Faith. Paul next pursues the enduring nature of the faith of Abraham, who trusted God regardless of the fact that his age and that of Sarah would have made it impossible for them to have a child. For his fellow Christians, Paul drew an explicit comparison between Abraham's ostensibly dead body and Sarah's dead womb, from which God gave life, and Jesus's dead body, raised by God from the dead. In both cases, God's power brought life from death. Abraham's faith in God's promise was strengthened by God even as his body was as good as dead (v. 20; cf. 1:23). God is glorified when we do not waver in our trust in His promises, especially when circumstances seem to deny them.

4:23–25. Trust in God, Who Brings Life. Paul uses the case of Abraham to demonstrate that righteousness by faith had been God's way of salvation even before the law was given at Sinai. It is imputed to us who believe in Christ as the resurrected Savior, who through His death delivered us from our sins. He is the One who, by being raised, established the certainty of our justification. Christian faith stands on an even more certain footing: the truth of the death and resurrection of Jesus. The statement that Abraham's faith was counted as righteousness (v. 3) is for us a divine promise that is still alive and relevant, providing added assurance of our justification (v. 25) that will lead to our future glorification (cf. 5:2, 3; 8:17, 21, 30).

5:1–21

The Fruits of Justification for All

Chapter 5 is easily divided into two halves, the first celebrating the extravagant generosity of God's act of reconciliation through Jesus Christ (vv. 1–11) and the second highlighting Christ's achievement in more than restoring what was lost through Adam's sin (vv. 12–21). The chapter serves as a bridge between 3:21—4:25 and 6:1—8:39. The reconciliation with God achieved through the death of His Son, Jesus Christ (5:10–11), is a consequence of the righteousness of God revealed in the redemptive sacrifice of Christ (3:21–26). The believer's hope in God's promise of full restoration (5:5–6, 9–10) recalls Abraham's persistent hope that the promise of God would be fulfilled (4:18). Looking ahead, we see that the reign of sin and death introduced in 5:14, 17, and 21, figures large in chapters 6 and 7. Chapter 5 begins and ends with the dominion of grace through our Lord Jesus Christ (vv. 1–3, 21).

5:1–11. A Justified Boasting. The first result of justification is peace with God (v. 1). Knowing for sure that we were reconciled with the Almighty fortifies us against whatever anyone else may think about us. We can flourish in an atmosphere of grace while we await the return of our Lord. Even the experience of persecution strengthens that confident expectation (vv. 3–4). The certainty of God's love for us is based first on the fact that while we were still sinners, enemies of God, His Son died for us (vv. 8–10) and second on the fact that the Holy Spirit has been given to us (v. 5). Furthermore, we no longer fear the coming judgment of God against sin and sinners. Instead of bowing our heads in shame and fear, we exult—even boast—in this God who has embraced us in His love.

In 2:17 and 23, Paul accuses the Jew who boasts in God and in the law but dishonors Him by breaking the law. In 3:27, boasting is excluded, because the justifying of sinners is solely the work of God. Even Abraham was denied the right to boast (4:2). However, the same Greek word (kauchaomai) for boasting appears in 5:2–3 and 11. But here the context is different. In these instances, the spotlight is no longer on the wrongful boasting by sinful humans but on the Christian's hope and on the Giver of that hope. Admittedly, the Greek word translated as "boasting" has usually carried a negative flavor. Nonetheless, we must not miss the deliberate contrast Paul makes between what was forbidden and what is now demanded in response to the extravagant kindness of God. That is certainly something to celebrate. Earlier he had declared that he would "boast" in the cross of Christ (Gal. 6:14).

One can boast (or "exult" or "glory," as the word kauchaomai is sometimes translated) without reservation in the Christian hope of sharing the glory of God (Rom. 5:2) and ultimately in God, who has reconciled us to Himself (v. 11; cf. Jer. 9:24). But the idea that we would boast in suffering and tribulation (Rom. 5:2) seems beyond human reach, if not masochistic. The tribulation Paul had in mind included the unbelievers' mocking of the believers' faith in a crucified Jewish Messiah (cf. 2 Cor. 10–12). Here, in Romans 5, it is the experience of a common hostility shared by those who lived for Christ's sake (cf. 8:35–39). Tribulation can toughen the resolve to endure and strengthen one's character if taken in the spirit of Christ. Christians who live in a kinder age or a safer place than Paul's may glory in the burdens and setbacks of life if these are understood as being permitted by their Lord in order to keep alive their hope to share the promised glory of God (5:2; cf. 12:14–21).

Romans 5:5 presents a beautiful image of God's love. The biblical "heart" is the center of the person, including the will. Beyond the mental picture of a precious liquid being poured into an empty container, the metaphor serves as an introduction to the work of the Spirit of God in transforming the human heart (cf. 8:1–27).

Two of the most striking declarations in Scripture are that Christ died for the ungodly (5:6) "while we were still sinners" (v. 8) and that God justifies the ungodly (4:5). Paul moves from a generic "the ungodly" to include himself alongside his readers (by using the terms "us" and "we" in 5:8). The Christian message will never fall out of fashion with those who know themselves to be among the "ungodly." It manifests our needs and assures us of our rescue. The lack of apparent moral advance from a righteous person to a good person in v. 7 can be better understood if by "good" Paul is referring to a benefactor or patron whom one had promised to protect with one's life, as was the practice at that time.

God demonstrated His love for us in the death of His Son (v. 8). The emphasis on God's love is easy to overlook, especially if one holds the view of an angry God who is reluctant to save sinners and who has to be persuaded through the pleading of the Son to forgive them. His love for us was manifested on the cross while we were sinners. Given God's sacrificial offering of His Son, everything else is assured for us (8:39). The assurance of being justified or set right with God "through our Lord Jesus Christ" (5:1) is matched by the announcement in v. 10 of being reconciled to God through the death of His Son. Paul acknowledges the unfinished character of the realm of grace but points to the certain result of the reconciliation: we will be saved through His life (v. 10). This concept points to the ongoing ministry of mediation of Christ on behalf of His own, ensuring that nothing will ever be able to separate us from His love and the full realization of our salvation (8:31–39). In the end, justification and reconciliation are two sides of the same coin, for justification describes the action of God through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ that enables Him to restore authentic relationships with sinners who stand in His grace without pretense or fear and with full confidence of their future glory in His presence.

5:12–21. Grace's Triumphant Reign. At one level, this section is an extended paean to "Jesus Christ our Lord" (v. 21). Paul compares and contrasts the universal impact of "one man," Adam, with the One Man, Jesus Christ (vv. 12–19). With a single act, each changed the course of human history. One's disobedience led to universal disobedience and death. But the other's obedience led to the offer of acquittal for all. Christ's achievement soars above Adam's disastrous defeat. Through Him the ruptured relationship with God has been restored. Instead of condemnation, Christ's one righteous act brought justification (vv. 16–18). Humanity has been salvaged with a path toward moral wholeness.

These verses also introduce sin and death as if they were sovereign powers ruling over humanity since the sin of Adam (vv. 14, 17, 21). But they make their appearance here as powers already broken by the death of Jesus Christ, who ushered in the reign of grace (vv. 15, 17, 20–21). The contest between the two rival powers continues, but Paul asserts that sin will not rule us because we are not under law but under grace (6:14).

The whole section (5:12–21) is constructed as a chiasm and displays an intricate weaving of several rhetorical devices that compare and contrast the effects of Adam's and Christ's acts. The centerpiece of the chiasm is v. 17. The dramatic repetition of "much more" in vv. 9, 10, 15, and 17 ties the two halves of the chapter together. Paul presents the achievement of Christ in its eclipse of the devastation that entered with Adam. In the end, those who have welcomed the overflowing grace of God and His gift of righteousness through the One Man, Jesus Christ, will reign (v. 17).

Paul does not explain just how the sin of Adam infected his descendants. As all parents know, the self-centered and even willful nature of small children is a reminder of the subsequent struggle each human faces against an inclination toward sin and selfishness. In 7:9–24, Paul describes in vivid detail the power of the sinful nature that can be mastered only through the intervention of the Holy Spirit (8:1–5). There has been much discussion regarding the question of how to define "original sin." The Catholic understanding—which holds that a newborn is already sentenced for eternal punishment unless the taint of the original sin of Adam is cleansed by infant baptism—is to be rejected as lacking biblical basis. The biblical understanding of baptism requires personal faith in the saving work of Christ. As a result, children are not responsible for the sins of their ancestors. What Paul describes here in Romans is not the guilt of Adam's sin but a weakened human nature with a propensity to sin, which was introduced to humanity through Adam's rebellion and which humans, by themselves, cannot resist.

Paul uses "many" in 5:15–19 in some cases to mean "all," in the sense of every human being, and sometimes in the actual sense of "many." On the basis of the statement in v. 18b, some have concluded that Paul taught that everyone would eventually be saved. The statement in the original language can be translated as "there resulted justification of life to all people." In this view, Paul expected the hard-hearted and impenitent sinner to eventually repent through the overwhelming grace of God, if not in this life, then in some future one not mentioned elsewhere in Scripture. But the wicked who will be raised at the end of the Millennium will show no sign of repentance. Instead, they will rush to destroy the new Jerusalem (Rev. 20:7–10). The doctrine of universalism may be attractive to some, but the thin threads on which the doctrine hangs cannot bear the weight of Paul's own statements. Those who practice evil will not inherit eternal life (Rom. 2:5–12; cf. Gal. 5:19–21). It is only the recipients of God's abundant grace and gift of righteousness who will reign in life through Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:17). There is no mention of a second chance. Paul's point here is that the price has been paid. So the offer of eternal life is earnestly extended to all but, tragically, not accepted by all.

In vv. 13 and 20–21, the law emerges as a partner with sin and death in a devastating trio. The assertion that sin is not ellogeitai (from ellogeō; "imputed," "charged," "counted") when there is no law (v. 13; cf. 4:15) has puzzled interpreters. Paul could not have meant that humanity was sinless before the giving of the law, because "all sinned" and death spread to all people

(5:12). The word ellogeō here was used in the commercial world for the recording of a financial obligation (cf. Philem. 18). Paul appears to have been referring to a divine recording in the books of heaven (cf. Rev. 20:12). Though sin through death reigned before Sinai, the giving of the law with its specific commands against wrongdoing actually intensified the power of sin. The law also reveals sin, so that there would be an increased recognition of its dominion. The purpose of the law is to provide moral guidance (Ps. 19:7). The ironic effect of the law to incite sinners and deepen the hold of sin will be portrayed more fully in Romans 7:5–10.

6:1—7:6

If No Longer "under Sin," Then No Longer "in Sin"

What shall be the attitude and practice of the believer toward sin and sinning? The comparison between Adam and Christ in 5:12–19 concludes that the reign of sin has been overthrown by the reign of grace (5:20–21). Paul emphatically denies that there should be any compromise with or submission to sin (6:1–2, 15). He buttresses his arguments first from the believer's baptism in Christ (vv. 3–13), then from the not-unheard-of practice of voluntary enslavement (vv. 16–22), and finally with an illustration about marriage (7:1–6). Each section prepares for the next. Paul tightly connects the three sections.

6:1–14. Dead to Sin, Alive with Christ. Paul returns to refute an earlier charge hurled against him by opponents who claimed he taught that people should do evil in order to increase the good (3:8). To even suggest that continued sinning enhances the glory of God through the increase of His forgiving grace (6:1) misses the intended outcome of God's grace. The announcement of a generous forgiveness will never silence the call for righteousness in the life of the one forgiven.

Two closely related key truths emerge in this section. First, the death of Christ can be understood as His death to sin once and for all (v. 10). While Christ's death can be understood as the atonement for the sins of all humanity, His death points to the believer's death to sin. Having shown that sin brings death to all, for all have sinned (5:12–21), Paul turns the language of death on its head. Here he speaks not of our physical death but about death to sin through a union with the crucified Christ (6:2–3). The believer's old self is to be considered as dead, because having died to sin he or she simply cannot live under its rule. The reference to the "old" person describes the former way of life when the self was subservient to the power of sinful desires (v. 6; cf. Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9). Talk of a personal relationship with Jesus can be superficial and even self-serving unless it begins with the crucifixion of our old person, that is, our sinful self, with Christ.

When did we die to sin? The simple answer is at our conversion and baptism (Rom. 6:3), which Paul viewed as a single event. Through our baptism we were buried with Him (v. 4). In an earlier letter to the church at Corinth, Paul wrote that all died, if One died for all (2 Cor. 5:14). There is no contradiction here. Baptism signals our embrace of Jesus's death on our behalf, making His atoning sacrifice effective for our salvation. There is a clustering of words in Romans 6:4–8 that point to a profound relationship with Christ.

The second key concept in this section is that Christ's resurrection has decisively broken the power of death over Him (v. 9) and has resulted in a new life. Believers are called to live (lit. "walk" in) a new life (v. 4). As Christ now "lives to God" (v. 10), so believers are to consider themselves "alive to God in Christ Jesus" (v. 11), no longer under the reign of death-dealing sin. Their physical and mental aspects, formerly dedicated as weapons of wickedness, must now be dedicated as instruments or weapons of righteousness in the service of God (v. 13). Baptism into the death and resurrection of Christ has not freed believers from the reality of death in this present age. Nonetheless, their freedom from the reality of death is assured through the victory of Christ's resurrection (vv. 5, 22–23; cf. 1 Thess. 4:13–18). Admittedly, the struggle against the temptations of our sinful past will continue until our mortal bodies are transformed at the coming of the Lord. Otherwise, the appeal not to allow sin to reign in these bodies (Rom. 6:12) would be pointless.

In v. 14, Paul switches from the verbal imperatives of vv. 12–13 to the future tense of the verb "to rule": sin will not dominate as master (v. 14). Paul is implying that more than human effort is required, since believers are not under law but under grace. After exposing at length the impotence of mere human effort (7:14–25), Paul points to the empowering presence of the Spirit of God as enabling believers to kill the sinful practices of the body (8:1–17, especially v. 13). Thus, the promise that sin will not rule is fulfilled (6:14).

There is a clustering of words in vv. 4–8 that points to a relationship with Christ that endures beyond this present age. Our old self was crucified with Him (v. 6). Through baptism we were buried with Him (v. 4). Being united with Him in baptism in a manner similar to His death gives assurance that we will be united with Him in a resurrection like His (v. 5) and will live with Him forever (v. 8; cf. 1 Thess. 4:17).

Baptism announces that believers have died to sin as a way of life and have entered into solidarity with the crucified, buried, and risen Christ to a life directed toward righteousness. The phrase "into Christ" (Rom. 6:3) is unique to Paul (cf. Gal. 3:27). For the convert to Judaism, circumcision was a rite of passage into becoming part of the people who belonged to the covenant God made with Abraham and his descendants. Christians baptized into Christ become part of the one body in Christ (Rom. 12:5). The experience of baptism presupposes the crucifixion of Christ, who died for the redemption of the believers and in their place. Christ beckons them to consider themselves as crucified with Him (cf. 6:6). Paul's own confession was that he was "crucified with Christ," and that it was no longer he who lived, but Christ who lived in him (Gal. 2:20; cf. Gal. 5:24 and 6:14).

Paul's argument in Romans 6:3–4 presupposes the practice of baptism by total immersion and a level of understanding not possessed by infants, who are incapable of repentance (cf. Acts 2:38). Sprinkling or pouring water on the head of the person being baptized falls short of representing the believer's burial with Christ. For other passages that strongly support the practice of total immersion in the NT, see John 3:23 and Acts 8:38–39.

6:15–23. From Slaves of Sin to Slaves of God. Are we free to sin because we are under grace and not under law? Not at all (v. 15)! Being freed from the condemnation of the law could suggest that we can continue committing our favorite sins with impunity, given the abundance of grace. To use a comparison, the availability of powerful antibiotics is not an excuse for continuing risky sexual behavior. In his rebuttal to this dangerous presumption in vv. 15–23, Paul reinforces what he emphasized in 6:1–14 by expanding on the theme of slavery introduced in v. 6. Those under the power of a slave master do not have the right to offer their servitude to another. But since they were "crucified with" Christ, they died to sin and are free to serve Him (vv. 6–7).

In vv. 15–23, Paul deepens the appeal he made earlier in v. 13 with the language of voluntary enslavement—he encourages believers to present their members (parts of their bodies) as slaves of righteousness (v. 19), for they have become slaves of God (v. 22). The practice of human enslavement was a reality to his readers. It appears that a majority of believers in Rome may have been either slaves or former slaves (see commentary on Rom. 16:3–16). The practice of offering oneself to become the slave of another was common in the Roman world as a way to deal with debt, financial loss, and so on. We already live in servitude (6:19). Absolute autonomy is an illusion. On the physical level, our bodies depend on oxygen, water, and food for survival. Morally and spiritually, we are born with a corrupting tendency to evil and selfishness that marks our involuntary enslavement to sin (5:12). Only the power of God can set us free from the hold of sin and give us the power to live in a better way.

Through the proclamation of the gospel and the ministry of the Spirit of God, we can be freed from servitude to sin and enabled to serve Christ. In this voluntary servitude, obedience comes from the heart (6:17), that is, from the willing mind. Paul hastens to declare that servitude with God is not a demeaning enslavement but the way of freedom—freedom from a downward spiral of increasing wickedness and lawlessness (v. 19) leading to death (v. 21). We have become slaves of righteousness (v. 18) because we have enslaved ourselves to God (v. 22). We have the freedom to become holy, to be transformed through the renewing of our minds (vv. 19, 22; 12:2), and to receive the gift of everlasting life (6:22–23) when we choose God as our Master.

Whereas in v. 13 Paul appealed to the believers to present their members as instruments or weapons of righteousness to God, now he urges his hearers to complete their enslavement by presenting every part of themselves as slaves of righteousness for the purpose of holiness or sanctification (v. 19). No talent or ability, no part of the person, can be reserved for the pleasure of sin under the old master. The stark contrast in v. 23 between "death" and "the wages of sin" on the one hand and "eternal life" and the "gift of God" apart from works on the other shows that only fools remain in the service of sin.

7:1–6. A New Relationship After Death. After declaring the freedom from sin and death that comes from enslavement to God (6:15–23; cf. 7:6), Paul returns to the role of the law in the believer's life. He reaches out to address his fellow Jews, who should have recognized that their knowledge of that law had been linked with the reality of sin in their experience. Enslavement to sin in our fallen nature is ironically strengthened by our knowledge of the law's demands, thus deepening our condemnation. No longer enslaved to sin, we are free from the condemnation of the law. In this sense we have died to the law. The law remains, but the believer's primary focus is not on its prohibitions. Instead, the believer's mind is to be oriented toward Christ in a new life in the Spirit (v. 6; cf. 13:8–10; Matt. 22:37–40).

The line of thought in Romans 7:1–6 builds on Paul's earlier treatment of baptism as the burial of the crucified old sinful self (6:1–11), but here he emphasizes the corresponding freedom from the paradoxical effect of the law to increase the power of sin (7:5; cf. vv. 8–11). Paul uses an analogy from marriage to clarify the believer's changed relationship to the law. First, he lays down an obvious principle: The law has power over a person only as long as that person lives (v. 1). A married woman who lives with a man other than her husband is, according to the law, an adulteress. But this is true only as long as her husband lives. At his death, she is released from the law that connected her to him (v. 2) and is free to become another's wife without being charged with adultery. Similarly, believers who have died to the law (v. 4) are now to consider themselves bound to Christ as if entering into a new marriage. In this new union with Christ, they are released from the law as the instrument of condemnation in order to be fruitful in righteousness pleasing to God.

In the marital analogy, Paul identifies Christ as the new husband but does not identify the counterpart of the first husband who died. Pressing for a closure that Paul does not provide, interpreters have identified sin or even the law as the first husband. But Paul never said that the law had died. Instead, believers have become dead to the law (v. 4). Furthermore, the Moral Law does not disappear but remains to define an adulterous relationship and a morally acceptable one. Thus the law, which condemns adultery, remains even in the second marriage. What then is the role of the law in the Christian's walk with Christ? The law calls for righteous living in a holy relationship with God. But as an external guide to righteous living, the law itself is unable to produce righteousness within us while we are enslaved to sin (6:20). Knowing the law's demands while living in servitude to sin actually arouses sinful desire and rebellion within our fallen nature (7:5). But in the new marriage relationship with Christ, we serve Him as our marital Master in the new way of life in the Spirit (v. 6).

The crucial role of the Holy Spirit (v. 6) remains a central feature in virtually all of Paul's letters—and, for that matter, in the entire NT. Up to this point in Romans, Paul has only briefly mentioned the presence and work of the Holy Spirit. The effective inward circumcision of the heart is performed by the Spirit (2:29). Through the Spirit, the love of God has been poured out in our hearts (5:5; cf. 15:13). A fuller treatment of the vital role of the Spirit in believers' lives lies ahead (8:1–27; see also 9:1; 12:11; 14:17; 15:13, 15–19, 30). The cumulative witness in Romans and the rest of the NT reveals that the ministry of the Spirit is that of a Person rather than an impersonal influence.

Prelude to Victory: The Power of Sin through the Law

Later in the letter, Paul will devote his attention to this new life in Christ led by the Spirit (8:1–17). But first, he clarifies the distinction between the law and sin (7:7–12) and establishes that the law by itself is unable to free us from the power of sin (vv. 13–25).

7:7–12. Sin Takes Advantage of the Law of God. The law could appear to be abetting and increasing the force of sin. The law, with its commands against sin, deepens our awareness of it. Paul states that in pointing out what is sinful in the eyes of God, the law ironically became a vehicle for expanding his sense of sinfulness. The last of the Ten Commandments, "You shall not covet" (v. 7), moves from the external world of action to the internal world of desire. As a child, Paul was blind to the deeper hold of sin. In that sense he was alive without the law (v. 9). But because of his own fallen nature, Paul's introduction to the law's command against coveting spawned all kinds of evil coveting and desires in him (v. 8). In other words, sin, using the law against coveting as a subterfuge, deceived him and killed him (vv. 7, 11). However, insofar as it reveals the will of a holy God, the law remains holy, righteous (i.e., just), and good (v. 12).

7:13–25. Uneven Battle against the Sinful Self. Paul next expands on the basic point that the holy law of God is unable of itself to help us break the grip of sin, which grows even stronger under the condemnation of the law. Few passages in Romans have produced greater discussion and more proposals than the description of the power of sin in these verses. Who is the "I" in these verses? Was Paul speaking of his own experience as a Pharisee before meeting Christ? Since Paul used the present tense in vv. 14–25, was he speaking of an ongoing enslavement by his sinful nature even as a believer? Or was Paul speaking allegorically of the first Adam or of the Jewish people, unable to keep the covenant? Assuming that Paul was speaking for himself in vv. 9–11, possibly the best option would be to take the plainest reading of the rest of the chapter as autobiographical.

In recounting this uneven battle, Paul was not speaking solely about his own experience. He assumed that those who heard or read his words would recall a similar discovery of the power of sin twisting what is holy and good into an instrument of death. Paul diplomatically encourages his hearers to find themselves here as well. Notice how he begins: "We know that the law is spiritual" (v. 14); it is of divine origin. Then he shifts to the first person to indicate that he was sarkinos ("of the flesh," "carnal," "unspiritual"). While sin's power deepened because of an increased awareness of the law's demands, another impulse arose as well. Paul speaks of a desire, even a delight, in the law that he here explicitly refers to as the law of God (v. 22). He even says that he had the disposition to do what was right by the law. In speaking this way, Paul echoes the attitude enumerated at length in Psalm 119, where the psalmist repeatedly declares his love for the gift of the law (Ps. 119:47–48, 97, 113–119, 127, 163–167). Yet this desire to do what is commanded has proven powerless to break the pull of sin. The moral self is like a king under siege, holed up in his capital city while an enemy force dominates the rest of the kingdom.

Throughout the first half of the letter, the word "law" appears more than sixty times, always alone and without a modifier. Here, in Romans 7:22 and 25, Paul states the obvious truth that the law is in fact God's law (e.g., Ps. 119:1, 18, 29, 44), in which he delighted. The law is the recognized standard by which humans are judged and condemned. Paul acknowledges the law to be holy and good (Rom. 7:12), though fallen human nature subverts the good law. He makes it clear that the problem is not with the law of God but with the human mind, where fallen human nature exerts control over the bodily functions of speech and action, thus causing the helpless "I" to be a prisoner of sin (v. 23).

Some confusion about the law can arise when reading vv. 21–25. We speak of the law of gravity when referring to the way gravity exerts its inevitable force. Likewise, in v. 21, Paul speaks of the pull of sin on our fallen nature as the law of sin, an inescapable reality.

In the opening section of Romans, Paul shows that all humanity stands under the condemnation of the law, since all have sinned. Here he speaks of the power of the sinful nature in overwhelming even the desire to do what is right. The isolated "I" finds itself in an uneven and hopeless struggle that led Paul to declare his helpless wretchedness and need for deliverance (v. 24). The passage as a whole expresses in the most vivid language a view of human nature that distinguishes Christianity from other religions, in which the formula for transformation lies in reincarnation or meditation or even the fear of punishment. At the outset of the letter, Paul declares his loyalty to the gospel as the power of God for salvation to everyone who believes (1:16). Christian faith holds that only a Power beyond ourselves is able to save us from the condemnation of sin by breaking the power of sin in our lives, even when we are attracted to what is good and holy. Notice that throughout this tragic recital of impotence in the struggle against our fallen nature, there is no mention of Christ or the Spirit. This absence may be what makes it difficult to settle once and for all the identity of the "I" in the passage. But the truth is that the pull of our fallen nature continues in the Christian walk and that Paul was well aware of the believers' ongoing struggle with sin (12:2, 21; 13:13). But the way forward is hinted at in Paul's exclamation in the midst of apparent defeat: we can thank God that He delivers us through Jesus Christ our Lord (7:25). This path to victory is developed in 8:1–17.

Life Led by the Spirit

This wide-ranging chapter provides a dramatic and positive conclusion to the first half of the letter. It answers Paul's earlier cry about being a wretched man (7:24) by describing the Christian's life in the Spirit (8:1–13). This new life confirms our adoption into God's family (vv. 14–17) and infuses us with hope in the midst of affliction (vv. 18–25). Now the Spirit is interceding for us (vv. 26–27). In all of these changes, God has taken the initiative (vv. 28–30) and united us to Him in an unbreakable bond of love (vv. 31–39).

8:1–13. Life in the Spirit of Christ versus Life in the Flesh. In contrast to the condemnation of sin that falls on humanity (Rom. 5:18), there is "now no condemnation for [to] those who are in Christ Jesus" (8:1; cf. 3:24). Sin itself has been condemned through the incarnation and death of Christ. The phrase "in Christ Jesus" conveys a sense of security (cf. 8:35–39; John 10:28). The one who believes in Jesus Christ is placed "in Christ Jesus." Earlier, Paul described God's gift of salvation as "eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). Here in Romans 8:1–13, he adds that to be "in Christ" (v. 1) is also to be in the Spirit, because the Spirit of God dwells within us (vv. 9–10). Later on, Paul will note that the many believers form one body (12:5) and urges his hearers to clothe themselves with the Lord Jesus Christ (13:14). Collectively, these phrases point to the empowering union of believers with the Triune God and with one another that is the result of being "in Christ Jesus."

The unique formulation referring to the "law of the Spirit," which brings life and freedom through Christ (8:2), introduces the active role of the Holy Spirit described more fully in 8:1–17. Paul clearly did not mean that we are saved by the law. In this case, the Greek word translated as "law" could be referring to the ruling power of the Spirit, or more probably to the law of God used by the Spirit, in contradistinction to the law of God placed at the service of sin and death. In v. 3, Paul sums up the dismal portrayal of the impotence of the law of God discussed in 7:7–24. The law of God condemns the sins committed in the flesh, yet it remains helpless in enforcing its demands for righteous behavior within sinful beings. But God was not helpless. He gave up His own Son to break the hold of sin and death, showing that human nature was not irreversibly under the power of sin. The Greek term hamartias in the latter part of 8:3 can be translated "on account of [for] sin" or "as a sin offering" (cf. Ps. 40:6b, LXX).

Paul was careful to avoid saying that Christ was born with a sinful nature (cf. Heb. 4:15; 1 Pet. 2:22; 1 John 3:5). The goal of Jesus's sinless life and sacrificial death was to fulfill the righteous demands of the law of God in order that God's righteousness might be fulfilled in those who allow themselves to be led by God's will rather than their own desires (Rom. 8:4). Only the perfect life and the atoning death of Christ can fully meet the requirement, but Paul is also alluding to the law being fulfilled in "us," referring originally to himself and to the recipients of his letter. How is Christ's atoning death related to our fulfillment of the righteous requirement of the law? In 5:18–19, Christ's obedience, by which "many will be made righteous," can be understood as God's declaration that the sinner is forgiven and reconciled on the basis of Christ's sacrificial death. When believers are justified by faith and at peace with God through Jesus Christ, they also receive the gift of the Holy Spirit, through whom the love of God has been poured out in their hearts (5:5). The presence of the indwelling Spirit of God enables us to meet the demands of the law of God for a holy life; and yet, due to the innate sinfulness of our nature (the weakness of the flesh referred to in 8:3 as well as in the preceding chapter), it is only by constantly relying on Christ's sacrificial death that our obedience is acceptable to God.

Is the believer then an inactive vessel? No, indeed, for Paul goes on to point out the necessity of believers setting their minds on the way of the Spirit rather than on the way of the flesh (8:5). The result of that new focus is "life and peace" (v. 6) and personal transformation (12:1–21; cf. 13:13–14; see Col. 3:3). At the same time, believers will not dare claim absolute perfection or sinlessness. In fact, the closer their walk with God, the greater their awareness of personal imperfections.

Paul gives special attention to having a carnal mind, or a mind set on the flesh. In Romans 8:5–8, he refers to those living in conformity to the sinful desires of the flesh. God's will is expressed in the precepts of His law. As a result, their failure to be subject to God's will inevitably is acted out in rebellion against God's law (cf. 1 Cor. 7:32). So they tragically continue to live in the realm of death.

The close relationship among the members of the Trinity is evident from Paul's equating the Spirit of God with the Spirit of Christ. The Spirit is bestowed when Christ is acknowledged as Savior and Lord. The Greek words sometimes translated as "if indeed" or "if" (Rom. 8:9–11) do not suggest a doubt on Paul's part as to whether the "Spirit of Christ" was dwelling in the believers but instead strongly assumes that the Spirit was indeed dwelling in them.

The body of the believer is "dead," that is, doomed to die (v. 10). If all die, what is the ultimate difference between living in the Spirit and living in the flesh? Paul points to the resurrecting power of the Spirit of God, who raised up Jesus from the dead. In due time, the same Spirit will raise the Spirit-led believers and grant eternal life to their mortal bodies (v. 11). In the meantime, while their bodies are destined for the dust of death, the living Spirit imparts spiritual life and moral power by putting to death the immoral deeds of the body (v. 13; cf. 13:12–13).

8:14–17. The Spirit of Adoption. Separating Paul's stream of thought into discrete sections can mask the flow of his thought. But in vv. 14–17, he pauses to introduce the theme of believers as heirs through the power of the Spirit. Already Abraham's descendants, as heirs of the promise made to him, believers await their inheritance, "the world" (4:13). Here Paul is referring to all believers as children of God (8:14; cf. vv. 17, 21). Our present status as such is not based on the fact that we have been created by God but on our adoption (v. 15). The presence of the Spirit gives us assurance that we have indeed been adopted by God and so are entitled to the inheritance as joint heirs with Christ, the Son of God (v. 17). As God's adopted children, we are enabled by the Spirit to cry out, "Abba," which means "Father."

While "fear" is sometimes used by Paul in a positive sense (cf. Phil. 2:12), the fear mentioned in Romans 8:15 is the result of being enslaved to sin (cf. Rom. 6:17–20). Fear characterizes the condition of a slave who lives under the threat of punishment if the master is displeased. Even worse, the one enslaved to sin faces the wrath of God and the certainty of death (8:13; cf. 6:21–23). In contrast, those who live in Christ and are led by the Spirit have the assurance of eternal life (8:11; cf. 6:21–23). Those who are coheirs with Christ are given the ministry of suffering, as it were, with Christ, bearing the shame that comes from kinship with a crucified Messiah.

8:18–25. Present Afflictions. Paul stops to acknowledge the pain and suffering inflicted not only on the believers but also on the entire creation as a result of the Fall (Gen. 3:17–19) and to affirm that the Spirit sustains us in suffering. The personified groaning of all of creation captures the inescapable cycles of death and decay that dominate the present order. To restrict the "creation" to nonbelievers is to miss one of the rich metaphors of the Hebrew Bible. The psalmist depicts the meadows wearing flocks and the valleys covered with grain as shouting for joy and singing (Ps. 65:13). Conversely, Jeremiah warns that the earth would mourn because of the devastation of the judgment of God against the sins of His people (Jer. 4:28). Yet the effects of the entrance of sin through the disobedience of Adam and Eve were never intended to be final. Therefore, Paul personifies the whole creation as eagerly waiting for the children of God to be revealed (Rom. 8:19). The adoption is a present reality with a future aspect. In the final restoration, the adopted children of God will be fully and openly acknowledged as His own. In a similar vein, Jesus said, "Blessed are the peacemakers," for they will be called God's children (Matt. 5:9).

In the meantime, believers are called to hold on to the hope they were given when they first believed. Hope must be sustained while that for which they hope remains unseen (Rom. 8:24–25). And their hope is nurtured through a determined perseverance that takes up the tasks at hand. The Greek word commonly translated as "patience" or "perseverance" conveys the sense of persistence in maintaining one's hope in spite of the suffering that comes from being a follower of Christ in this present world.

The assurance of God's restoration of the present world from its degradation (vv. 20–21) cannot justify a further degradation or even a neglect of the earth and its resources. Nonetheless, attempts to develop biblically based environmental ethics would be better served by looking elsewhere in Scripture. There is no explicit reference here to stewardship. But Romans does declare that all human life is inextricably linked together, with all created beings sharing a common fate both here and in a future restoration that will transform the whole created order.

The reference to "the firstfruits of the Spirit" (v. 23, lit. the "firstfruit [singular] of the Spirit") is without parallel and should not be confused with the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22). The meaning seems to be that the Spirit is indeed the firstfruit, reinforcing the certainty that all the rest of the promised inheritance will be given. Paul has reversed the usual understanding of "firstfruits." It originally referred to the consecrated first portion of a crop that humans offered to God (Ex. 34:22, 26). Here Paul speaks of the Holy Spirit as God's offering to humans, reversing the usual direction of the firstfruits offering. Together, the gift of the indwelling Spirit and the gift of God's Son as a sacrifice on our behalf (Rom. 8:32) are the two witnesses attesting to the certain fulfillment of the divine promise.

8:26–27. Intercession of the Spirit. Paul next focuses his attention on the work of the Spirit on our behalf. In our weakness, our most pressing need is knowing what to pray for. It is the work of the Spirit to rephrase the ignorant specifics of our prayers to align them more accurately with the will of God and to our real needs. Paul expresses belief in the efficacy of prayer (15:30–32). It is God, after all, to whom we pray. To the questioning mind, prayer may seem unnecessary. Does God need to be encouraged by our words to carry out His will? Scripture does speak of the importance of humans asking God to carry out His will in their lives, but the circle of influence in intercessory prayer widens to include others (cf. Matt. 6:10). At their core, prayers of petition are appeals for alignment with the divine will, granting God access to the hearts and minds of the petitioners, which in turn transforms them. Attempts to explain the process and even the fairness of intercessory prayer must acknowledge our human limitations and the assurance that God's disposition toward those for whom Christ died is one of impartial love.

Alongside the groaning of the believers and of nature for redemption, the Spirit also groans in intercession (Rom. 8:22–23, 26). The wording conveys the Spirit's deep emotional engagement. Words are not necessary, for God knows the mind of the Spirit. One should be cautious to avoid pressing the imagery of intercession beyond what is biblically sound. Along with the Spirit, Christ, at the right hand of God, is also interceding (Rom. 8:34). Their joint ministry should not be construed as joining forces to overcome the resistance of the Father to love believers. Rather, the entire Godhead is united in earnest efforts on behalf of God's children.

8:28–30. Divine Initiative. What follows is a vivid restatement of what "we know" (v. 28). It is, in fact, a succinct summary of the message of the whole of Scripture. With the coming of Christ, there is a glorious new chapter in the old book. The long-announced goal of God to restore fallen creation takes a new expression. Now the goal toward which God is working for good through all events is the surrounding of His Son with many brothers and sisters, all conformed or shaped into His likeness (v. 29). Suffering cannot thwart God's plans for us, because He makes sure that the end result of our suffering is what is good. This audacious task of transforming sinners into legitimate children depends solely on God's decision. Paul continues with an emphasis on the inexorable results of the divine initiative to reconcile sinners to God. The work of justifying or setting humankind into a new relation with Himself through Christ has occupied much of the letter so far. But the sweep of the divine initiative is realized only when those who have been justified stand alongside the Son and share in God's glory.

The point of reference for the believer is the image of the Son. His sinless life and sacrificial death met and incarnated the righteous demands of the law, thus upholding the law and expressing its fullness in His self-sacrificing love. Paul speaks of the whole process of God's work of restoration—including the glorification of the believers—in the past tense, as if all has already been accomplished. Earlier, their glorification was described as a future hope (v. 17). How shall both statements stand together? Seen from the perspective of the certainty of God's promise, it is correct to speak of glorification in the past tense, as already completed (v. 30), even though its actualization remains in the future. From the viewpoint of divine certainty, consider it done (cf. Rev. 21:5–6). But from the perspective of time, the glorification of the children of God is still coming.

There are two possible subjects for the verb synergeō ("work together"; Rom. 8:28)—"all things" or "God." If the antecedent is "all things," Paul is not suggesting that things will work themselves out on their own. Paul did not believe in a self-regulating universe, a cosmic gyroscope able to right itself. Scripture does not hold a pantheistic view identifying God with the world. It is more likely that "God" should be taken as the subject in v. 28. This does not mean that He is the direct cause of all that happens but that in the complex interplay of multiple decisions and events God is able to work out His intention of blessing those who love Him. Rather than manipulating human decisions and actions like a cosmic puppeteer, God, in ways unseen but sometimes detected in the rearview mirror, picks up the shattered fragments from misguided human decisions and deeds to make something greater than the sum of their broken parts. From Joseph's brothers selling him into slavery for twenty shekels of silver to the betrayal of the Son of God for thirty pieces of silver, human treachery has often been the detestable currency by which God works to redeem and bless this broken world.

Human love toward God is a response to God's prior love toward us. Under the influence of the Spirit of God, divine love awakens love in the human heart. Some interpreters limit God's love to those predestined by God for salvation. The strict doctrine of double predestination, largely based on Romans 8:28–30 and 9:6–21, requires that God's sovereign and irresistible grace toward part of humanity must be matched by His inexplicable but sovereign decision not to extend that grace and love toward the rest of humanity, dooming certain people to eternal separation from Him. This teaching offers a reason why some have no interest in their spiritual condition. But the words of Scripture do not support such arbitrary limitation of God's love. He loves the world so much that He gave His only Son (John 3:16). It is instructive to note that in Romans 8:28–30 Paul does not speak of a divine decision to exclude people from salvation apart from their choice to reject His offer of salvation. It is a mistake to conclude from Paul's words that God has indiscriminately decided who shall be cut off from the real possibility of salvation. Paul's words here aim at encouraging beleaguered believers who are engaged in an inner struggle to trust God's ability to finish the work He began in them (see below, "Predestination").

Predestination

The topic of predestination has been discussed for centuries in the Christian church and continues to be a matter of disagreement. Its discussion raises questions related to human freedom and God's sovereignty and the relationship between these two. Some expositors, in order to preserve human freedom, limit God's sovereignty in some form. Others make a special effort to emphasize God's sovereignty and sacrifice human freedom. The teaching that God, in His mercy and power, predetermined from eternity who will be saved and who will be lost (double predestination), presupposes that God's grace is irresistible and immutable. This theological position needs some evaluation accompanied by a brief summary of the biblical understanding.

Unconditional Predestination

1. Misrepresentation of God. The doctrine of unconditional predestination—which usually includes the idea that God controls all things by His unilateral will—depicts God as an arbitrary and even tyrannical being who is more interested in His sovereignty than in displaying the fullness of His mercy and love. He arbitrarily predetermined—arbitrary in the sense that there is no reason to justify His decision—that He will show mercy and save some sinners, and He will let others burn in hell. He could have shown mercy to all, but He intentionally willed to let some suffer for unending ages.

What kind of God actually and effectively wills the destruction of humans? This explains why this doctrine has been extremely controversial in the history of Christian thought. Divine unconditional predestination involves such a strong emphasis on God's sovereignty that it logically leads to the conclusion that God wills the existence of sin, including, in some theologies, the fall of humans into sin. This involves projecting a concept of God that is cruel, even atrocious.

2. Grace Is Irresistible and Immutable. This doctrine correctly affirms that humans are by themselves incapable of responding to God's grace, but the solution it offers to that incapacity is theologically unsound. It states that for the objects of God's election, grace is irresistible, that is to say, they are absolutely unable either to accept or to reject the divine call. It is usually indicated that according to Paul, God prepared both vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy (see commentary on Rom. 9:14–29).

We find several problems in the concept of irresistible grace. First, it is argued that free will has been so damaged by sin that the only way for God to save humans is to force saving grace on them as a gift. This is certainly not the case. With respect to Romans 9–12, Paul is indeed emphasizing God's sovereignty through the use of the image of the potter and the description of the expression of His grace independent of human virtue, but in the process he is not denying that humans are indeed responsible for their actions. He made that very clear in Romans 1:18—3:20.

Paul also exhorts us to listen to the word of God, implying that God's grace, manifested in the Word and through the influence of the Holy Spirit, enables people to use their rational abilities and their will to decide for or against Christ (10:8–14). This has been referred to as "prevenient grace"—the grace that precedes. It is the idea that God reaches out in various ways to all human beings through His Spirit, word, and providence in order to cause them to see their need of repentance and salvation through the gospel (e.g., Rom. 10:13–21; John 1:9; 12:32; Acts 17:24–31; Titus 2:11). In fact, humans will be judged according to their works, something that presupposes responsibility for responding or not responding to God's grace (Matt. 25:34–36, 41–43; 2 Cor. 5:10). The emphasis on irresistible grace denies that free will is still God's gift to humans (cf. Gen. 2:17) and fosters the notion that one divine gift destroys a previous one. Free will has undoubtedly been damaged by sin, but it still continues to define us as humans. In other words, the doctrine of predestination tends to dehumanize us as beings created in the image of God by, at least in the area of salvation, deactivating or ignoring the exercise of free will.

Second, defining grace as immutable asseverates that those chosen by God to be objects of His grace will never fall from grace. In other words, some are to be saved no matter what and others will perish no matter what. Such an understanding of grace makes irrelevant the constant exhortations that we find in the NT to persevere in the faith (e.g., Eph. 4:1; Heb. 4:11; 2 Pet. 1:10). Many other passages in the Bible make it clear that believers can fall from grace (e.g., Heb. 6:4–6).

Third, such an understanding of divine grace makes the proclamation of the gospel totally unnecessary. If people all over the world have already been chosen for salvation or perdition, independent of their will, and will unquestionably be saved or lost, why must we still proclaim the gospel to them? The gospel would no longer confront us with a choice for or against Christ, meaning that the offer of the gospel would not be a genuine offer to the non-elect.

Fourth, such an understanding of grace places divine election and justification by faith in tension. Justification by faith requires acknowledging our spiritual condition, finding in Christ the only solution, and placing our faith in Him. The appropriation of justification requires the presence of free will at some point in the process of salvation.

Fifth, irresistible and immutable grace could easily excuse human sin. Those who are lost could excuse themselves by arguing that God did not give them the possibility of salvation and that therefore they are incapable of doing anything else but continuing in their sins. They were never the objects of God's love.

3. Limited Atonement. The doctrine of unconditional predestination teaches that Christ died to save only the elect. If God unilaterally limited the gift of His saving grace to a fraction of humanity, then the sacrificial death of Christ was not intended to deal with the sins of the world (John 1:29) but only with the sins of some of the people in the world. This seems to imply that the problem of sin itself has not been totally solved. The Bible at times speaks about Christ dying for a particular group (in the sense that these are the people who receive the full benefits of Christ's death), but it also makes clear that He died on behalf of all (e.g., 2 Cor. 5:14; 1 Tim. 2:4–6; Heb. 2:9). One of the most fundamental theological messages flowing from the cross of Jesus is that the divine will to save is not restricted to any particular group. God's saving perspective has always been global (Gen. 12:1–3; Eph. 1:9–10; 1 Tim. 2:4; Rev. 14:6–7).

4. Spirit and Predestination. The doctrine of predestination is based on the human incapacity to respond to God's grace and is based on divine sovereignty: God makes for humans the decision that they cannot make and forces it on them. The picture we find in the NT is significantly different from this particular approach. The corruption of human nature is affirmed (e.g., Rom. 3:9–20; 8:7), but the solution is the work of the Holy Spirit in the human heart as the Spirit calls people to surrender to the Lord, synchronizing the human will with the divine will in an act of freedom (e.g., John 16:7–10; cf. Matt. 26:39). The Spirit places in the heart the desire to be reconciled with God and frees humans from the power of sin in order for them to become willing servants or slaves of the Lord (Rom. 6:17–18).

Predestination in the Bible

What we have said so far does not deny that the Bible speaks about predestination and that we do need to listen to what it has to say about this topic. Here we offer a brief summary of some of the biblical elements associated with it.

1. The Term "Predestination." The noun "predestination" is not used at all in the NT; instead we find the verb "to predestine" (Gr.

proorizō, "to decide on beforehand"), having God as the subject and humans as the object. We also read about God's foreknowledge and election of humans (see "Divine Election," p. 1594). There are passages that do not contain the terminology itself and yet contain the concept. The question is how we should approach this topic. We suggest paying close attention to the passages and not going beyond what they say—avoiding any speculation about divine sovereignty that sets very specific limits on God's gracious love.

2. God's Act of Predestination. The divine decision to save was not an afterthought but something done by God in eternity (1 Cor. 2:7). This is explicitly reiterated in Ephesians 1:4, which indicates that God chose us in Christ before the world was created. The implication is that the pre-Creation divine decision was not influenced by human activity, good or bad, because humans had not yet been created. Unquestionably, the emphasis is on God's sovereign power and love toward His creatures and on what God was willing to do for them in a world that would be damaged by sin. Divine sovereignty is clearly inseparable from the fullness of divine grace and love.

3. Predestination Presupposes God's Plan. What God predetermined was not the result of accidental or isolated decisions. God had a plan, a design for His creation, and what He predestined to happen was an intrinsic part of it. When the divine events occur within human history, they happen according to God's plan (Eph. 1:11). This purpose or plan is conceived in the divine mind, willed by God, and worked out in history according to His will. The foundation and motivating force of the plan was God's love (Eph. 1:4–5). This indicates that the plan was intended to be for the benefit of His creatures and not for their destruction.

4. Predestination and Christ. What Jesus experienced at the hands of Herod, Pilate, the Gentiles, and the people of Israel was what God had determined in advance (Acts 4:28). Notice that God did not predetermine the evil actions of His enemies but the suffering of His Son at their hands. God does not have to move people to do evil, because it is natural for sinners to practice evil. Moreover, because He knows all the specific evil actions people will do in certain situations, He can and does use even these evil actions to further His plan of salvation (Rom. 8:28; Gen. 50:20). Romans 8:29 suggests that Jesus was also predestined by God to be the first-born among many brothers and sisters. The incarnation of the Son of God is part of the divine plan configured in eternity. He was going to be one of us and in the process would make us His brothers and sisters.

5. Predestination and Believers. There are certain specific things that God predetermined for His people. For example, He decreed that His wisdom, revealed in the person of Christ, would be "for our glory" (1 Cor. 2:7). This is not something that God will perhaps do for us but rather something that He has determined to do for us. We will be glorified through Christ. God has also predestined us to be adopted as His children only through Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:5). For God, this is not negotiable. He acted unilaterally, creating a way for our adoption into the heavenly family before we existed. In addition, the plan includes God's intention to conform us to the image of His Son (Rom. 8:29). This is His plan for those who love Him (8:28). Our Lord's predetermined plan is to transform those who believe into the likeness of His Son.

6. God Predetermined Everything Related to Salvation. With respect to the salvation of His people, God did not leave anything to chance. Based on His foreknowledge, once predestination was put into effect, we are called for salvation. The acceptance of the call leads to justification and to our final glorification at the Second Coming (8:30). No power on earth can alter God's plan for us except our rejection of it. Notice that the language of predestination is always associated with those who believe. God has unilaterally determined that those who believe in Christ will be saved and those who reject the abundance of His grace will perish, but He has allowed us the freedom to accept or reject His grace and His offer of eternal salvation.

"Predestination" is a good word, but we should not attempt to construct with it a doctrine of unconditional double predestination. The usage of the verb indicates that it designates God's unalterable plan for the salvation of His people through the incarnation and death of our Savior. At the heart of divine predestination we find the unfathomable depths of God's eternal love.

8:31–39. The Unshakable Love of God. Placed at the halfway point in the letter, this hymnic section lifts up the spirits of believers as it did those of the original audience. Christians have constantly turned to these words for comfort and strength in times of tragedy and confusion. God's redemptive love will triumph over all hostility and every obstacle. In these few poetic lines, Paul also displays his absolute confidence in the unbreakable grip of God's love before leading us into the complex argumentation in chapters 9–11.

The section rests on two theological certainties. The first is couched in a question at the beginning—"If God is for us, who can be against us?" (8:31)—which expects the response "No one!"

Paul is responding to the questions and doubts that can haunt the believer under siege in a hostile world. Is suffering for the sake of Christ really worth it? If one succeeds in enduring the trials of the present world, will the promises really be fulfilled? Or do our present sufferings show we are already adrift from the favor of God? Paul assures us that although circumstances can give the impression that we have been abandoned by God, we are now and for all time will be embraced by God's unbreakable and all-conquering love. After all, God has already given the most precious gift of all—His Son, Jesus Christ. He will surely keep His word in bestowing the promised inheritance. But it is not enough simply to declare the certainty of the triumph of God's love. Paul proceeds to name all the enemies of faith—first in a parade of seven (v. 35), followed by another ten (vv. 38–39), real and potential—before declaring all of them impotent in the face of God's fierce protective love.

By leading with the question of what should be said (v. 31), Paul draws the listeners into a response. Only in Romans does he use this approach (6:1; 7:7; 8:31; 9:14; 9:30). Listeners would understand the succinct question "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (8:31) to mean "If God is on our side, who would dare to go up against God, and, if daring to try, who would have any chance of effectively overthrowing His support of us?" As indicated, the ongoing intercession of Christ (v. 34; cf. Heb. 7:25), alongside the intercession of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:26–27), does not presume a hardness on the part of God. Paul does not here specify the content of the intercession. But when Satan (whose name means "the accuser"; cf. Rev. 12:10) contests the worthiness of the believers, his charges are more than countered by the united ministry of the Godhead. The intercessory ministry of Christ is no mere assignment but springs from His everlasting love for those redeemed through His death on the cross, His supreme act of love (Rom. 8:34–35).

In considering what could conceivably separate us from Christ's love, Paul recites a sevenfold list of hardships (v. 35), all of which he had already personally endured for the sake of Christ, except for the last, the sword (cf. 1 Cor. 4:10-13; 2 Cor. 6:4–5; 11:23–27). How could such things separate us from God? First, persecution and suffering tend to discourage and to create a feeling of abandonment in believers who experience them. How can this be happening to us when we have put ourselves into God's care? Second, enemies can taunt, suggesting that God would surely take better care of us if we were truly His children (Matt. 27:43). But the truth points in the opposite direction. Earlier, in Romans 8:17, we are reminded that sharing in the sufferings of Christ is actually a necessary prelude to sharing in His glory (cf. Matt. 5:11–12; Phil. 1:29; 3:10–11). The quotation in Romans 8:36 from Psalm 44:22 points out that suffering for God's sake in a hostile world has long been an experience of those loyal to Him. Suffering for Christ's sake is therefore not evidence of His abandonment, as some might suggest, but of a deep fellowship of suffering with Him.

With a note of defiance, Paul declares that in the midst of hardships we are overwhelmingly victorious (Rom. 8:37). Tribulation, distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, the sword—we rise above them all, not merely surviving but surpassing them, overcoming them and the temptations they bring, thus becoming super-overcomers. Even the sharp edge of the sword cannot separate us from God's love, decisively demonstrated in the death of His Son. This triumph comes not by heroic human endurance but through the One who loved us, because nothing can break the grip of the Godhead's sacrificial love.

The Greek pepeismai (v. 38) has been translated as "I am persuaded" or "I am sure," but it can also be understood as "I have become convinced," which would imply a conviction settled in the past and enduring into the present. The substance of the first half of the letter provides the basis for that unshakable conviction. In a final declaration, Paul contends that all conceivable entities and forces, present and future, human and supernatural, are utterly powerless to "separate us from the love of God" (v. 39), which is evident through Christ. This love is itself the core of God's being (1 John 4:8). The ten entities are placed in paired opposites, except for two. The effort of interpreters to specify in what sense every item can be a means of separation from a loving God may be misguided. The point is that nothing at all—nothing anywhere or everywhere in the entire universe—has or will have the power to separate us from God's love. Period! Let there be no mistake: the ultimate triumph of God's all-encompassing love was magnificently displayed for all through the cross, the resurrection, and the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9:1—11:36

RESPONDING TO ISRAEL'S REJECTION OF JESUS

Chapters 9–11 constitute a distinct section of Romans. Here Paul grapples with the paradox that many of his fellow Jews had rejected the promised Jewish Messiah while many Gentiles were embracing Him. Repeatedly during his missionary travels, Paul's appeals to fellow Jews resulted in many accepting Jesus as the Christ. But others turned against him and persecuted him. Beyond his personal pain, Paul saw that this rejection of the Messiah would appear to some to invalidate the promises God made to Abraham: that his descendants would be as the sand on the seashore (Gen. 22:17; cf. Gen. 13:16; 15:5). In this section of Romans, Paul addresses this and other concerns.

Throughout chapters 9–11, Paul quotes heavily from Jewish Scripture, often discerning fresh applications to show that his contemporaries' rejection of the Messiah had not caught God by surprise. The overall direction of Paul's thought in chapters 9–11 is readily discernible. Care must be taken to read individual statements within the context of those chapters, within the whole of Romans, and within the whole sweep of Scripture.

Divine Election

Paul shares with the readers his anguish at witnessing the experience of Israel (vv. 1–5) and goes on to discuss the question of rejection and selection (vv. 6–13) and that of rejection and the power of God (vv. 14–29). From the beginning, in His dealings with His people, God has been free to choose who will receive the promised blessing and free to use the resistance of those who oppose Him (e.g., the Egyptian pharaoh of Ex. 7–12) to further His sovereign purposes. When reading this section, one ought to keep in mind Paul's conclusion at the end of chapter 11: God's ultimate purpose in all His dealings with Jews and Gentiles is that He might have mercy on everyone (11:32).

9:1–5. Paul's Anguish over Israel. Unlike Paul, a significant number of his fellow Jews were not embracing Jesus as the Messiah. This caused

Christian Anti-Semitism and Romans 9–11

The modern reader of Romans 9–11 cannot avoid addressing the chasm between Paul's resolute solidarity with his fellow Jews and the facts of nearly two thousand years of Christian anti-Semitism. For centuries, Jews in Christianized Europe and elsewhere lived under the threat of violence as "God-killers," for the role of some of their ancestors in securing the execution of Jesus. Refusing to convert and accept the Christian faith, they were denounced as agents of Satan and as the cause of plagues and natural catastrophes. Even those Jews who converted under pressure faced the scrutiny of the Inquisition in Portugal, Spain, and Italy. It was Luther's discovery that "the just shall live by faith" that gave a powerful impetus to the Protestant Reformation. Later, in 1543, he wrote of Jews who did not respond to the message of the Reformation as "venomous serpents and devil's children." He advised that all their synagogues, schools, and homes be destroyed, and that they should be expelled from Christian Europe to free it from their diabolical and blasphemous sins. Luther's outburst against unbelieving Jews, repeated and echoed for centuries, flies in the face of Paul's resolute solidarity with his fellow Jews, evident in the latter half of the book of Romans. It is tragic that Romans 9–11 was employed to support the horrors of the Holocaust as the most recent instrument of anti-Jewish genocide. We should study these chapters in the context of the church in the NT.

Paul much sorrow (9:2). His deep anguish was not assuaged by his successful mission among the Gentiles. His concern for his fellow Jews led him during his missionary travels to first engage them in the local synagogue (Acts 13:5, 14; 14:1; 16:13; 17:1–2, 10; 18:4). There he would engage in dialogue and, when invited, present his understanding of the prophecies of Scripture about the suffering Messiah and His resurrection to those present, including God-fearing Gentiles. Only when denied access to the synagogue would he reach out more directly to a non-Jewish audience in other facilities (Acts 18:6–7).

Having just said that nothing can "separate us from the love of God" (Rom. 8:38–39), Paul nonetheless wishes that he were cursed (9:3) if it would bring his people to faith in their Messiah, Jesus (cf. Ex. 32:31–32). Paul was willing to be eternally lost to save his unbelieving countrymen (Rom. 9:3). Then he lists the spiritual endowments or gifts the Jews had received in a succinct sevenfold list in v. 4.

First, Paul writes that his countrymen were Israelites. Instead of using the generic ethnic word "Jew," he selected the nation's name for descendants of the patriarch Jacob, whom God renamed Israel (Gen. 32:28). In his use of the present tense, Paul emphasizes that his people were still Israelites, the people of the promised blessings, in spite of their resistance to their Messiah. He uses the term "Israel" to refer both to the physical descendants of Abraham and to the faithful covenant people or remnant within those physical descendants.

The second blessing, "adoption," refers to God's identification of Israel as His son (Ex. 4:22). The third blessing, related to "glory," is otherwise unattested in Scripture. But "glory" itself is widely used in Scripture to speak of God's radiant presence that accompanied the Israelites after the Exodus (Ex. 16:7, 10; 24:16–17) and took up residence in the sanctuary (Ex. 29:43). Paul has already spoken at length of God's glory remaining to be "revealed in us" (Rom. 8:18).

The fourth endowment, "the covenants," can refer to all the covenants made with Israel, starting with Abraham (e.g., Gen. 15:18; Lev. 26:42; Jer. 31:31–34). The fifth privilege, "the law," can refer both to the Ten Commandments given by God at Sinai (Ex. 20) and to the collected laws from God throughout the Pentateuch. Paul's high estimate of the intrinsic value of the law is evident (Rom. 7:12). The sixth endowment, latreia, sometimes translated as "service," can also be translated as "worship" and can refer to the whole system of Israel's worship as instructed in detail by God in the Torah.

The final gift on the list, and therefore of particular importance, is "the promises," referring to the promises made by God to Israel, often couched as blessings, starting with Abraham and repeated to each generation, on which Paul will draw his arguments in Romans 9–11. In a summary statement, Paul avers that Christ became a Servant of the Jewish people (lit. "the circumcision") in order to confirm the promises made to the patriarchs (15:8). It is important to recall the content of the covenant promises: Abraham's descendants were to possess the promised land and become a great, even innumerable nation (Gen. 12:2, 7; 13:14–17; 15:5, 18; 17:8; 22:17; cf. 28:13–14). In Genesis 17:4–6, Abraham was promised that he would be the "father of many nations." Three times God promised that through his descendants (and ultimately through Christ; Gal. 3:16) all peoples of the earth would be blessed (Gen. 12:3; 22:18; 28:14; cf. Gal. 3:7–8).

In Romans 9:5, Paul links the patriarchs with the previous promises and adds that (from the perspective of His human ancestry) Jesus came through their lineage—from the lineage of David (1:3). Paul extends Jesus's lineage back to the promises given the patriarchs, starting with Abraham. The Greek word christos is the linguistic equivalent of the Hebrew word mashiakh; both words refer to an anointed one. Thus, here in 9:5, Paul refers to Jesus as the Messiah of the promise.

9:6–13. Israel's Rejection and God's Selection. The minor break in thought between the "amen" in v. 5 and what follows in v. 6 can be bridged by seeing Paul as resuming his thoughts on Israel's failure (started in vv. 1–3). Paul's concern was with the integrity of God's promises made in the past and the present. The widespread rejection by Paul's countrymen of the crucified Jesus as the Messiah and the conversion of non-Jews could appear to expose God's covenant promises to Israel as hollow. For if God could not fulfill His promises to Israel, especially when the promised Messiah appeared, what assurance was there that God would fulfill the promises of salvation through faith in Christ that Paul was proclaiming to Gentiles?

Paul asserts that God's promises to Israel had not failed—but it was not that the word of God had taken no effect (v. 6). First, notice to whom the promises apply: Not all who are biologically descended from Israel are actually Israel in the fullest sense, that is to say, part of the faithful Israel. Only the children of the promise are considered to be the true descendants (v. 8), that is, the legitimate inheritors of the promised blessing of the covenant. Paul offers two examples: Isaac and Jacob. Abraham received the covenant, but this did not mean that all of his biological descendants were included in those covenantal promises; only Isaac was included, as clarified by a further promise made by God before the birth of Isaac (Gen. 17:19–21). Ishmael, the older son of Abraham, was blessed by God (Gen. 17:20) but still set aside, while Isaac, the younger son, became the carrier of the covenant promises (Gen. 17:21). In turn, Isaac fathered twin sons, Esau and Jacob, but only one was selected by God as the child of the promise (Gen. 25:23).

The important point is that before either child was born, God selected the younger son, Jacob, in contradistinction to the usual laws of primogeniture. Both examples show that God's freedom was present before Jacob was renamed Israel (Gen. 32:28). Paul assumed God's freedom to select who will be the children of promise, even among the descendants of the patriarch. Paul says that God made His selection when the twins were not yet born, before they had done any good or evil (Rom. 9:11), and therefore did not base it on either son's works. As a matter of course, the moral conduct of both sons left a great deal to regret. The divine decision shows that God's selection of Jacob was not a matter of human works (v. 11)—yet another reminder that the grace of God is not a reward for moral achievement. Mere biological descent does not, and even good works do not, create an obligation on God. The narratives of Genesis demonstrate that Jacob, despite his many flaws and failures, had faith and trust in God while apparently Esau did not; he was a bebēlos ("worldly," "godless," "profane") person (Heb. 12:16). Although twins raised in exactly the same environment, they were unique and had the freedom to choose their own way. God foreknew which brother would respond in faith to His call.

What does Scripture mean by the language of hate in regard to Esau (Rom. 9:13; Mal. 1:2–3)? It certainly does not carry the usual English sense of a strong negative emotional state. The intended meaning of hate in this context is to choose one person for something and not the other. Jacob was "loved" in terms of being chosen by God as the depository of the promises, while Esau was not chosen. In a similar vein, Jesus spoke of the necessity to "hate" one's parents and even one's own life by choosing to follow Him (Luke 14:26). Paul does not address Esau's personal eternal destiny.

9:14–29. Rejection and God's Power. What Paul says next about God's election can raise

Romans 9:5 and the Deity of Christ

Scholars have given much attention to the second half of this verse. Punctuation is typically missing in the Greek manuscripts and must be supplied in the translation. The word order in the original language without punctuation is "the Christ [Messiah] according to the flesh the One being over all God blessed forever amen." In this case, there are two main punctuation choices for translators—one places a period after "according to the flesh," while the other uses a comma. In the first option, the sovereign God "over all" is the One who is "blessed forever." But the placement of "blessed" after "God" is not characteristic if Paul's intention was to say "Blessed be God." In the case of the comma after "according to the flesh," "the Christ" is being further described as God "over all" and the blessing would refer to Him. On grounds of normal Greek language usage, this second option is preferred, though not without objection (see 2 Cor. 11:31). In Romans 1:3–4, Paul had already placed the human and the divine aspects of Jesus side by side. Note that Paul also speaks of Christ as God in Titus 2:13, similarly in Philippians 2:6 and possibly Galatians 2:20. In Romans 10:9, Jesus is called Lord, and in 10:12 the reference to the Lord being over all is contextually applicable to Jesus. This is also the case in 10:13, where it is stated that anyone who calls on the Lord's name will be saved. This phrase translates the Hebrew word for the God of Israel, Yahweh, in Joel 2:32 as "Lord." Paul knew that seeking salvation from any human being would be blasphemous. Of course, the divinity of the Messiah, as well as His shameful death, was difficult for Paul's Jewish contemporaries to accept. Paul's encounter with the resurrected Christ convinced him on both counts.

moral hackles and appears to contradict what he earlier asserted, namely, that there is no favoritism or partiality with God (Rom. 2:11). Here he quickly answers the question that there is no unrighteousness with God (9:14). In other words, is God unrighteous in rejecting, or not choosing, Ishmael and Esau? A negative answer suggests God's mercy at work behind this decision. In a sense, mercy does not exist on the basis of fairness. When we ask for mercy, we are not asking for what we deserve. In fact, the scriptural citation from Exodus 33:19 in Romans 9:15 comes from a dialogue between God and Moses after the Israelites worshiped the golden calf, thus breaking the covenant. The dramatic dialogue between Moses and the people and between Moses and God resulted in God changing the sentence, but the divine change did not ultimately come even from Moses's intercession. God was not beholden to Moses, because it is not from desire or effort that mercy is earned (9:16). His mercy is extended to the unworthy—a central theme in the book of Romans (e.g., 5:6–8).

In Romans 9:17, Paul introduces the matter of the hardening of Pharaoh as an illustration (on the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, see commentary on Ex. 4:18–31). God raised up Pharaoh as ruler knowing that when confronted his heart would harden. God did this in order to display His mercy to the whole world, seen in the deliverance of the enslaved Israelites (Rom. 9:15, 18). The point for Paul in this passage is that in order to exercise His mercy, God chose to raise up a man He foreknew would harden against Him. Later on, Paul returns to the hardening of Israel's heart (11:7–10, 25). Even more than in the case of Pharaoh, the result of that hardening would be seen as the outpouring of God's mercy on all (11:32). If God raised up Pharaoh for the purpose of showing His power in all the earth, how much more was God's election of Israel intended to result in the worldwide recognition of His name.

The promise to Abraham was that through his descendants all the nations of the world would be blessed (Gen. 12:3; cf. 22:8). While that promise began to be realized through the coming of the Messiah, Israel itself had a role in God's plan for the nations. The prophets foresaw the coming of the Gentiles to Israel to learn the way of the Lord (Is. 2:1–4; 60:3; Mic. 4:1–5). The tragic exile of the Jews to Babylon led Nebuchadnezzar to praise the King of heaven (Dan. 4:37). Jesus extended this expectation to His Jewish listeners in saying, "You are the light of the world," indicating that others might see their good deeds and glorify God (Matt. 5:14, 16). It is that role of Israel that Paul saw as jeopardized.

In Romans 9:19, Paul takes up a more specific version of the charge of injustice. If God's will is irresistible, then how can the wrongdoer be held accountable by God? The assumption here is that Pharaoh and other objects of God's hardening did what was wrong as a direct result of the divine will. Lurking unstated in the background is the issue of the accountability of Jews who rejected their Messiah. Paul first rises in indignation, declaring that the accusation of God being the cause of evil is a charge against God (Rom. 9:20). In chapters 1–2, Paul had already given his negative assessment of human nature, including Jews and Gentiles, based in part on Scripture. His conclusion included those who are rebellious and hateful toward God—full of disobedience and arrogance (1:28–32). Paul rephrases the charge of Isaiah 29:16 when he questions if the one formed has the right to ask why he or she was made "like this" (Rom. 9:20). Paul responds by drawing attention to the potter's right to decide the purpose of each pot he makes, whether as an object of beauty or as a chamber pot. In his rebuttal of the accusation of injustice, Paul stands firmly in the company of the prophets (see Is. 45:9; Jer. 18:1–11). Paul was not denying the possibility of repentance.

The summary in Romans 9:30–31 provides a fitting conclusion. Paul divides humans into two groups—those of wrath and those of mercy. Saying that God was patient with those of wrath (Rom. 9:22) serves to answer the accusation against God's justice voiced in v. 19. The purpose of God's enduring patience in delaying the execution of His wrath is to make the riches of His glory known to those to whom He shows mercy (v. 23; cf. 2:5–9). Notice that the text says that God had "prepared" in advance those of mercy "for glory" (9:23). Concerning those of wrath, the text only says that they are "prepared for destruction" (v. 22)—the action is not explicitly or implicitly attributed only to God.

In Paul's analogy of the two categories of people, he does not identify those of wrath, that is, those destined to experience God's active wrath. Later he asserts that his unbelieving countrymen could be seen as "enemies" of God, but he hastens to describe them also as those loved by God (11:28). Who, then, are those of mercy prepared for glory (9:23; cf. 1:7)? Paul includes himself and his Roman readers, both Jews and Gentiles, whom God called. The modern reader may prematurely conclude that God unilaterally predetermined who would be saved and who would be lost. While Paul would agree that God as Creator has that right, he also shows throughout this section of the letter (as well as elsewhere) that God has independently determined the conditions of salvation—it involves a free human response to God's grace, a grace that enables the will to accept or reject His call to secure the work of Christ on one's behalf (9:30–31; 10:3–4, 9, 10–21; 11:20–23). It has always been God's intention to have mercy on everyone (11:32; cf. 1 Tim. 2:3–4; 2 Pet. 3:9).

Paul quotes the words of God spoken by Hosea, originally directed toward the rebellious Northern Kingdom of Israel, whom God had declared were not His people (Rom. 9:25–26; cf. Hos. 1:8–9). But God also promised to call them His people if they would repent (Hos. 2:23). The Northern Kingdom as an entity was never reconstituted after being scattered throughout the Assyrian empire in 722 B.C. So here Paul saw a fulfillment of this promise in God calling the Gentiles, who had previously not been God's people, to conversion (cf. Eph. 2:12–13). In His mercy, God granted them the status of being His people, His children (Rom. 9:26; cf. 8:14, 19).

Returning to the painful rejection of the Messiah by many of Paul's Jewish countrymen, Paul draws on the words of Isaiah to show that this rejection was predicted (Is. 10:22–23). While God had promised Abraham that his descendants would be like the sands of the sea (Gen. 22:17), Isaiah cried out that "a remnant" would be saved (Is. 10:22; cf. Rom. 9:27). Isaiah did not say that "only" a remnant would be saved, and neither does Paul, at least not at this point. The remnant Paul refers to here are the Jews with faith in Jesus—the "called" (v. 24). He will return to the matter of the remnant in 11:5. For Paul, the important thing is the grace of God, who removes sin and its punishment and restores the promised blessing. So God's word has not failed (9:6), and Paul expresses confidence in the Lord to complete His work speedily and decisively (v. 28). The context suggests that Paul was referring to the advancement of the proclamation of the gospel.

9:30—10:21

Israel's Rejection of the Righteousness of God

In accounting for the disturbing response of Israel to the gospel, Paul pays attention to the sovereign freedom of God to show mercy to whomever He chooses, even if it means hardening those who harden their own hearts to achieve that end (9:6–29). Paul next takes up Israel's responsibility in this failure. Jews as well as Gentiles needed righteousness (9:30–33), but Paul proclaims it as available only through Christ (10:1–13), making it necessary for the gospel to be proclaimed to all (vv. 5–13), for faith comes only through hearing the word of God (vv. 14–17). Finally, Paul answers a number of questions (vv. 18–21).

9:30–33. Pursuing Righteousness. Paul was visualizing Jews and Gentiles as runners in pursuit of righteousness. The Gentiles had effortlessly reached the goal of righteousness, being in a right relationship with God through faith, even though they did not pursue righteousness in the manner of the Jews, by works of the law. The other runner, the Jews, strenuously had pursued the law as a means of righteousness (v. 31) but stumbled and so failed to reach the goal. In referring to this law, Paul probably meant that the law had the purpose of producing righteousness, but the Jews had desired to pursue righteousness by works (v. 32), thus tripping over the "stumbling stone" (vv. 32–33; cf. 1 Pet. 2:6–8). Later Paul asks if all have irrevocably fallen (without the possibility of repentance) and answers negatively (Rom. 11:11). Paul does not specifically identify here (9:32–33) who or what the stone is (although he does later in 10:9–11). He crafts the statement in 9:33 by combining two separate metaphors drawn from Isaiah 8:14 and 28:16. The foundation stone (Is. 28:16) becomes the stone that causes stumbling (Is. 8:14). By this juxtaposition, Paul draws attention to Israel's rejection of the Messiah, who should have been received as their foundation stone but who became a rock on which many Jews tripped (Rom. 9:33). In Isaiah 28:16, both the speaker and the stone are identified as God, thus supporting the earlier reading in Romans 9:5 of Christ as God.

The promise that those who believe in Him will not be put to shame (9:33; cf. 10:11) returns the reader to the primacy of faith. Modern Western readers may not catch the power of the threat of shame in the biblical world (see Job 30–31; Jer. 20:7–18). Paul did not mean to say that the follower of Christ would be protected from the ridicule coming from nonbelievers (Rom. 8:35–39; cf. Matt. 5:10–12). Instead, the followers of Christ were taught to overlook the dishonor of believing in a crucified Messiah, looking forward instead to the praise of their Father, the supreme God, at the final review, when eternal honor and shame will be meted out.

10:1–4. Christ the Righteousness of God. For a second time, Paul expresses his heart's desire for the salvation of his fellow Jews who had rejected the Messiah, Jesus. (On the practice of prayer in Paul's life on behalf of fellow Christians, see 1:9.) Here in 10:1, Paul reveals his practice of praying for those who considered him an enemy. Given Paul's own persecution of Jesus (Acts 9:5; cf. Gal. 1:14, 16; Phil. 3:6), he shows his awareness of the danger of a misplaced zeal based on a misunderstanding of God's righteousness (Rom. 10:3), that is, God's saving action through Jesus Christ. In this case, ignorance is not excusable, as Paul shows in the rest of the chapter. His reference to his fellow Jews' desire to establish their own righteousness suggests that they saw their standing with God as far superior to that of the idolatrous Gentiles. This mindset contrasts with God's single plan of salvation through Christ, which embraces all.

The Greek verb hypotassō used at the end of v. 3 for the Jews' lack of submission points to a failure to respond at a specific point in time either to Jesus's message of the kingdom of God or to the post-resurrection proclamation of the gospel. What Paul meant by the righteousness of God (v. 3) is first taken up in the succinct and almost cryptic sentence in v. 4 and then unpacked through vv. 5–13. Short as it is, the sentence in v. 4 needs to be read in its entirety. In the last part of the sentence, Paul makes room for the Gentiles who through Christ achieve right standing with God.

Understanding what Paul meant by stating that Christ was the telos—the "end," or "culmination," of the law (v. 4)—must begin with the usage of the Greek word telos. The word can mean either "termination" (cf. 6:21–22) or "purpose." Obviously, Paul did not mean that Christ abolished the law. Note Paul's own high value of the law (7:12; 9:4). In 6:21–22, Paul speaks of death as the telos of enslavement to sin and eternal life as the telos of enslavement to God. The initial position of telos in the sequence of Greek words suggests that Paul was emphasizing the purpose, the goal, of the law. Christ is the "goal" of the law in that it witnesses or points to Him as the only one through whom God's righteousness and the restoration of one's relationship with God are available.

10:5–13. The Scriptures and the Gospel for All. In this section, Paul explains the meaning of his declaration in v. 4 that the goal of the law is to point to a righteousness available to all who put their trust in Christ. He references the words of Moses and the prophets and interprets them in light of the reality of Christ. At the same time, Paul continued undercutting any excuse for his countrymen who had not believed. What did Paul intend in quoting Moses from Leviticus 18:5 regarding the righteousness from the law, that those who do the things in the law will "live by them" (Rom. 10:5; cf. Luke 10:25–28)? Earlier Paul spoke of the commandment that was intended to bring life but led to death (Rom. 7:10–11) because in their weakness and sin, human beings could not attain to life by the law (8:3). While the law could point out the benefits of a life lived by its principles in a general sense, it could not provide eternal life unless it were kept without any deviation whatsoever—something no human being (except the God-Man Jesus) has ever done (3:19–20).

In his next verses (10:6–8), Paul quotes the words originally spoken by Moses in reference to the conditions for a renewed prosperity and security in the land to be given to the Israelites if, after being exiled for disobedience, they would return to obeying God (Deut. 30:12–14, cf. 30:1–11). Paul applies these words to the person who hears the gospel. The basic idea is that God took the initiative in coming to the aid of His people. Moses removed any excuse for Israel's failure to heed the words of the Lord, for they were near at hand, even on the lips of those who recited them. Likewise, as Paul shows, there is no excuse for Israel when the word of the Lord regarding the death and resurrection of the Messiah, or Christ, is proclaimed, offering salvation to those whose lips confess faith from the heart. If the law's commands, as God's words, were accessible to Israel, even more so is the proclamation of Jesus's resurrection (Rom. 10:7; cf. v. 9).

In Romans 10:9–10, Paul restates his argument in the plainest language to those who heard the preaching of the gospel. Saving faith in Jesus rests on the confidence that God has raised Him from the dead and must lead to confessing Him as Lord (v. 9; cf. Matt. 10:32). The assertion that belief in the heart leads to the righteousness of justification (Rom. 10:10) brings us back to the matter of a saving righteousness raised in vv. 3–4. In other words, the believer is justified or declared righteous at the moment there is a personal, faith-filled response to the content of the gospel that announces salvation only by faith in Christ; justification is not on the basis of efforts to keep the commandments.

In 3:21–22, Paul speaks of the righteousness from God, apart from the law, to which the Law and the Prophets testify as available to all who believe. In 10:5–8, Paul draws on words of Scripture to underscore God's offer of a righteousness realized through faith in God's Messiah. Here Paul summons from Israel's prophets the assurances that the gospel of Christ is for all who believe. Isaiah affirms that whoever believes will not be put to shame (Rom. 10:11; Is. 28:16; cf. Rom. 9:33). The reference to all believers points to the impartiality of God, who is Lord of all (10:11–13; cf. vv. 4 and 18). The promise from Joel 2:32 recorded in Romans 10:13 is a call to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ to avert the coming wrath (cf. 5:9). Since Paul refers to Jesus as Lord (10:9), most likely the underlying thought is of Jesus as Lord of all, the One who shares His riches with all who call on Him (vv. 12–13). Paul was intent on demonstrating that salvation, as promised by God in Israel's Scripture, is to be given without national distinction (v. 12; cf. 11:32).

10:14–21. Faith and the Preaching of Christ. In his indictment of Israel (vv. 14–15), Paul raises four unanswered questions, expecting the listeners to supply the answer: "They cannot." The problem lies with disbelief. The first question suggests that, logically, a person must believe in the Lord before calling on the Lord. The second question points to the importance of hearing. This hints at an important truth not yet stated. The third question begins to explain that truth. Christ was active and present in Paul's preaching. Paul knew that Christ must be the point of the preaching. But it is in the fourth question that the truth becomes most clear. God, or Christ, offers the gospel invitation through the words of the preacher (v. 15; cf. v. 17; 2 Cor. 5:20; 1 Thess. 2:13). God sends the preacher to preach about Christ so that people can hear thoughts they have never before contemplated, resulting in belief and salvation. As a result, the one who is sent is doubly blessed. In the quotation from Isaiah 52:7 quoted in Romans 10:15, the synecdoche of "feet" refers to the messengers who bring the gospel. The good news offered is so gracious that it is considered "beautiful" or "timely." The good news of Christ arrived at an appropriate time (cf. Rom. 5:6 and Gal. 4:4–5)—another reason to expect an appropriate response.

Paul's mission was to bring about the obedience connected with faith (Rom. 1:5; 16:26). Failure to respond to the gospel with belief is a form of disobedience (10:16). The problem of disbelief did not arise with the preaching of the gospel, as if there were some defect in the message. Paul cites the opening line of the messianic poem of the Suffering Servant by asking who has believed the report or message (v. 16; quoting Is. 53:1). The believing that is necessary for salvation is dependent on the preaching of Christ (Rom. 10:17).

Paul raises two key questions regarding the cause of the Jewish rejection of Jesus that are worded in a way that anticipates a negative answer. The English equivalents would be "They did not hear, did they?" and "They did not understand, did they?" But both questions are resoundingly answered in the positive. Paul draws on the words of Psalm 19:4—which refers to the spread of God's revelation going to the ends of the world—to illustrate the scope of the preaching of the gospel to the Jews scattered throughout the Roman Empire. The second question—which can be rendered as "Israel did not know, did they?"—receives a more extensive rebuttal. Both Moses and Isaiah are named as witnesses. The quotation from Deuteronomy 32:21 in Romans 10:19 introduces the thought of jealousy, which Paul develops later in 11:11–16: God desired to use the jealousy of the Jews regarding His favor of the Gentiles to provoke them to reconsider their rejection of Christ. The words of God referring to His being found by those who did not seek Him on the one hand and His holding out mercy to rebellious and disobedient people on the other (10:20–21; from Is. 65:1–2) describe the surprising Gentile response (cf. Rom. 9:30) and the persisting disobedient unbelief of Paul's countrymen (cf. 9:31). But there is hope: we are left with the picture of God still holding out His hands for a response from His people.

11:1–36

Israel in the Plan of God

Paul next clarifies the present and future status of his countrymen. The rejection of the Messiah had been partial (vv. 1–15) and not final (vv. 16–24). In the meantime, Gentiles had been the beneficiaries of God's mercy, but they needed to avoid any arrogance (vv. 11–24), because with respect to Israel God would work in a mysterious way (vv. 25–32). The section closes with a doxology (vv. 33–36).

11:1–10. Israel's Hardening Is Not Total. Paul emphatically denies that God had apōsato (from apōtheomai; "cast away," "rejected," "repudiated") His people, whom He foreknew (vv. 1–2).

"Even though Israel rejected His Son, God did not reject them" (AA 375). While some did not submit to the gospel, many Jews, including Paul, embraced the gospel of salvation through Jesus, the promised Messiah. Paul identified himself as an Israelite of the tribe of Benjamin. Only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin remained loyal to the house of David when the kingdom was divided. Paul then compared the believing Jews of his time with the seven thousand in the time of Elijah who had "not bowed the knee to Baal" (Rom. 11:4; cf. 1 Kin. 19:18). When questioned by God, Elijah claimed that he was the last surviving prophet. Paul quotes God's counter-assessment that there were many others who had not abandoned the Lord. Paul also characterized himself and the other believing Jews as being a remnant chosen by grace (Rom. 11:5), their election resting not on human merit but on God's grace (see below, "Divine Election").

Divine Election

The subject of God's election is mentioned several times in Romans 9–11 and therefore deserves more attention in the light of the rest of the NT.

1. Election of Some. In the Bible, election is the act of choosing from a group. For instance, God elected Israel from among the nations of the earth (Deut. 7:6–7), He elected Christ to be our Savior (Luke 9:35), and He chose Paul as a missionary to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15), just as Jesus elected twelve disciples (John 6:70). In His sovereign will, God chooses some individuals and not others to perform a particular task (Rom. 9:14–24). When people are described as the chosen or elect in the NT, the designation always refers to those who place their faith in Christ, those people chosen by God for a particular purpose. Election could designate the individual believer (Acts 1:24) or collectively the church (Titus 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1), but it never applies to the world in general independent of a faith relationship with the Lord.

In the context of Ephesians 1:4, an important text on election, Paul makes clear that the chosen are the "saints" or "holy people," the "faithful" (Eph. 1:1), those who put their hope in Christ or trust in Him (Eph. 1:12), and so forth. He is unmistakably referring to believers. When he says that God "chose us," he is describing the experience of believers and not the situation of the sinful world. From Paul's time perspective, the Christ event was to have a universal impact, because through Him God purposes to unite all things, both in heaven and on earth (Eph. 1:10). Although this was not yet a reality in Paul's day, evidence of it was observable in the union of Jews and Gentiles in the church (Eph. 3:6). Election is universal only in the sense of God's choice not only of Jews but also of Gentiles through the preaching of the gospel and the work of the Spirit (1 Thess. 1:4–5). Jesus said that many are called or invited but "few are chosen" (Matt. 22:14). The chosen are those who accept the call. God is doing all He can to move everyone to accept the call and be saved, but saving grace is not forced on anyone (cf. 1 Tim. 2:3–4).

2. Pretemporal Election. Paul states that God chose us before the world existed (Eph. 1:4). Election is grounded in God Himself and not our intervention; He took the initiative. This decision took place before we existed—before the creation of the world. The text is not stating that we preexisted, but rather it is affirming the preexistence of Christ. It is the decision to elect us that occurred before the creation of the world. The certainty of our election is expressed through the use of the verb in the past tense (He "chose"). God's intention for us is not ambivalent but firm.

We are in reality discussing God's pre-Creation plan for us, what He had predetermined to do on behalf of His people. That plan was revealed to us in Christ. This is what we find in 2 Timothy 1:9–10. Here Paul is saying that at some point in the past eternity, God entrusted His purpose and grace to His Son and that by giving it to Christ, God was giving it to those who accept Him as Savior—a salvation not based on works. God called us with a holy calling through a plan crafted in eternity past. Paul uses similar ideas in Titus 1:2–3. In this case, instead of speaking about God's predetermined plan, Paul writes about what God had promised before time began—that is to say, in His eternal purpose—and what had been manifested in Christ. This wonderful gift, from God to Christ for us, manifested itself in human history with the coming of Christ, thus becoming effective in our salvation.

3. Election in Christ. In God's purpose and sovereign will, He predetermined our election to take place exclusively in Christ (Eph. 1:4). That is to say, our election is a reality through and in union with Christ. He is the Person, the sphere within which election occurs. Therefore, election is the mystery of God's work for us in His Son. What God granted to His Son in eternity (His plan and grace) is for those who are "in Him," for believers. In fact, salvation and all its benefits belong to those who are "in Christ," to everyone who has put their faith in Him. He continues to be the sphere of divine activity on our behalf and our call and election are ours in Him.

4. Activation of Election. The realization of election does not take place outside human history but in the Incarnated One, in Christ (Eph. 1:4); it presupposes the incarnation. This historical election expresses itself in a holy life: we have been chosen to be holy and without blame (Eph. 1:4). Such a life cannot be separated from election without robbing election of its meaning, content, and actuality. The passages dealing with God's election are not texts about double predestination or about the pretemporal election of all humanity outside history. Paul is assuring believers that their election is rooted in God's inscrutable purpose for them in Christ. Paul does not even examine, when dealing with election, the connection between free will and election but assumes that the actualization of election requires God's grace to free the bound human will by His Word and Spirit so that a decision can be made. What is usually stressed is God's prior action on our behalf. This action is further defined in Ephesians 1:5 as our foreordination (proorizō, "to predetermine," "decide on beforehand") to adoption (see "Predestination," p. 1583).

It would be appropriate to conclude that "those who respond to the drawing of Christ, through the sovereign mercy of God, are elected to be saved as the obedient children of God. Upon them is manifested the free grace of God, the great love wherewith He hath loved us. The Father sets his love upon his elect people, who live in the midst of men, because they accept the redemption which Christ has purchased for them by his own precious blood" (Messenger, April 12, 1893, par. 5).

In Romans 11:2–4, Paul again picks up the concept of the remnant first mentioned in 9:27 in the quotation from Isaiah 10:22–23, in which the remnant that will be saved refers to a smaller portion of the whole of Israel. The preservation of the remnant provides credibility and substance to the promises God made to the patriarchs (cf. Rom. 4:13). Even in the apostasy of nearly all Israel in the time of Elijah, God preserved a faithful remnant. The concept of the remnant pervades the prophetic writings. Paul is the only NT writer to draw expressly on the remnant concept to deal with the anomaly of Israel's rejection of the Messiah.

The Jews who rejected the gospel were blinded or hardened in a spiritual sense (11:7–8). The Scriptures testify about the ongoing role of God in the blinding of Israel from the beginning to "this very day" (11:8; cf. Deut. 29:4; Ps. 69:22–23). Does this mean they bear absolutely no responsibility for their condition? Paul did not draw that conclusion. In fact, he exhorted the Gentile Christians to continue in God's chrēstotēs ("kindness," "goodness"; Rom. 11:22). If salvation can be lost, then God's grace can be resisted. Paul envisioned that Jews who were cut off would be grafted in again if they did not remain in unbelief (11:23). To make saving grace irresistible for some while extending an offer of the gospel to all would be untenable, because it would result in a final judgment based on unjust principles. To claim that a person's rejection of the offer of salvation is an inevitable consequence of God's prior decision to withhold salvation from that person runs directly counter to the assertion of Scripture that Jesus "died for all" (2 Cor. 5:15; cf. Rom. 5:18; 1 Tim. 2:6).

11:11–15. Israel's Hardening Is Not Final. Paul offers the image of someone stumbling badly, but not necessarily falling, to describe the prospects of the unbelieving Jews. He argues that since the Jewish failure brought blessing to the Gentiles, how much more could be anticipated when they responded fully to the gospel? In the plan of God, the conversion of Gentiles through Jesus Christ, which brought glory to God, was to incite jealousy on the part of the Jews still zealous for God (cf. Acts 22:3). Earlier, Paul cited Moses's words saying that God would make Israel jealous (Rom. 10:19; Deut. 32:21), anticipating his more extended assertions in Romans 11:11, 14. In a brief aside directed to the Gentiles (Rom. 11:12–13), he points to his own ministry, which was designed to provoke his fellow Jews to jealousy and would result in the salvation of some of them (vv. 13–14). This does not mean that the only or even the main reason Paul preached to the Gentiles was to convert Jews (cf. Acts 13:44–48; 19:8–10; 28:17–31).

In Romans 11:15, Paul discusses how the future acceptance of the Messiah by the Jews would be of benefit to the Gentile world. He speaks of apobolē ("rejection," "being cast away") followed by a future acceptance resulting in life from the dead. He anticipated that many Jews would embrace Jesus as the Messiah before His Second Coming. The reference is not to the general resurrection, because the phrase "life from the dead" is not used elsewhere for that meaning. The best way to understand the phrase is in terms of a movement from spiritual death to spiritual life prior to the Second Coming (see Eph. 2:1, 5; Col. 2:13).

11:16–24. Warnings against Arrogance. In quick succession, Paul offers two illustrations. The first is based on the offering of the firstfruits from a small portion of dough, which results in the whole being holy (v. 16a; cf. Num. 15:19–21). The firstfruits represented Paul's Jewish contemporaries who believed in Christ while the lump of dough represented the Jewish people as a whole, still set aside for a holy purpose in the eyes of God. The idea is that the future influx of Jewish believers would result in a rich blessing for the world (Rom. 11:12–15).

In the second illustration (v. 16b), Paul's emphasis is on the branches of an olive tree nourished by the root. Paul does not explicitly identify who or what the root or the tree represents. The prophets and poets of the OT compared Israel to various species of trees and to the grapevine. The olive tree appears less frequently as a metaphor for Israel (cf. Jer. 11:16; Hos. 14:5–6). The tree cannot simply be all ethnic Jews for at least two reasons. First, many natural branches had been broken off in their failure to acknowledge the Messiah, even though they could trace their ancestry back to the patriarchs. Second, the Gentiles who had entrusted themselves to the Jewish Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth, represented by the branches from the wild olive tree (Rom. 11:17), had been grafted on to the olive tree. The idea that the olive tree represents the Christian church that had replaced the Jewish nation goes beyond Paul's intention, because the remaining natural branches represent a Jewish remnant (v. 5). Though accepting Jesus as their Messiah, they did not cease to be Jews but remained as natural branches. The most natural conclusion is that Paul assumes the olive tree to be the faithful Israel or the Israel of faith on to which the Gentiles who put their faith in the Messiah, Christ, are grafted.

The aim of Paul's remarks in this section is clear: Gentiles who had accepted Jesus as the promised Messiah were not to look down on those Jews who had not accepted Him. What had happened so far in both instances was actually part of God's plan to have mercy on all (v. 32) through a mystery that Paul was partially disclosing. Throughout vv. 13–32, Paul explicitly directs his comments to the Gentiles listening to his letter (v. 13). What Paul said about Israel's hardening came out of his concern about Gentile Christians who were condescending (v. 18) and prideful (v. 20) toward Jews who had not accepted the gospel and perhaps even toward those Jews who had. In addressing his Gentile audience, Paul reverts in Greek to the singular pronoun "you" (vv. 18–24), as if directing his message to each individual Gentile believer facing a serious spiritual risk from any attitude of superiority.

The notion of natural branches being broken off and branches from a wild olive tree being grafted on to a cultivated olive tree fits well into Paul's view that God had been actively involved both in the Gentile conversions and in the Jewish resistance (vv. 17–24). Yet Paul is clear that the branches were broken off because of unbelief (v. 20); the grafted Gentiles are secure only through an abiding faith in God's chrēstotēs ("kindness," "goodness"; vv. 20–22). Earlier, Paul had written about boasting being excluded from matters of the law (3:27). He had previously warned against Jewish boasting (2:17–23), and now he was warning against Gentile boasting (11:17–18). A sense of superiority and boasting would indeed be sufficient cause for being cut off (v. 22).

11:25–32. Threefold Mystery. Throughout vv. 25–31, Paul addresses the Gentile believers as a whole, using the Greek plural pronoun ("you"), as he outlines God's mystery and reminds them not to think too highly of themselves (v. 25). Paul presents a threefold mystery that had been revealed to him. First, a partial hardening or blinding had happened to Israel (implying again that God had not rejected Israel); second, this hardening would remain until the fullness of the Gentiles would come in; third, all Israel would be saved. The extent of the blindness was "in part"—meaning either part of Israel had been blinded or that the blindness was partial. The former meaning is to be preferred, since part of Israel, the believing remnant, was not blinded. Paul understood the hardening or blinding to involve more than willful resistance on the part of his countrymen who rejected the Messiah. God's role in their unbelief was the basis for the assurance that the hardening would not be permanent. The duration of the hardening is tied to the success of the Gentile mission. The reference to the plērōma—"fullness"—can be understood as a predetermined number, known only to God, or to the completion of the gospel proclamation to the whole world (cf. Matt. 24:14). The reference to the Gentiles coming in designates either the ongoing fruits of evangelism among the Gentiles and their acceptance of the Jewish Messiah or the grafting of Gentiles on to the olive tree. The Gentile believers had been engrafted through their faith and thus had become part of the faithful Israel.

The first part of Romans 11:26 is one of the most contested sentences in Romans. Several proposals for understanding Paul's declaration regarding the salvation of "Israel" have been offered. One is that, according to Paul, God will save every ethnic Jew who has ever lived, even apart from a decision regarding Christ. This interpretation flies in the face of Paul's own preaching.

A second proposal imagines a massive conversion at or after the return of Christ, when all deceased Jews are resurrected and confronted with the returning Christ. Jesus predicted the resurrection at His Second Coming of those complicit in His death (Matt. 26:64). But evidence of a massive conversion of Jews at that time does not appear in the NT.

A third position views the Christian church as the true Israel, replacing the Jewish people, with a new covenant of grace replacing the old covenant. It draws on the words of Jesus to the Jewish religious leaders that the kingdom of God would be taken away from them and given to a nation that would bear fruit (Matt. 21:43; cf. 8:11–12; Mark 12:9; Luke 20:16). So "all Israel" in Romans 11:26 becomes the equivalent of a nation producing fruits of the kingdom of heaven. Though widely held, this position is not without difficulty. While Paul was speaking of cutting off individual Jewish branches and grafting on Gentile branches (Rom. 11:19–20), he never even suggested that the olive tree itself had been replaced.

A fourth option revisits the term "Israel" in light of the metaphor of the olive tree and calls for an inclusive sense that embraces all, Jew or Gentile, who through faith, especially faith in Christ, have become children of Abraham (4:11). This position presumes that for Paul the olive tree represented the faithful Israel, the true people of God in the OT and NT, on to which Gentiles could be grafted. Paul's warning to the Gentiles who had been grafted on to the olive tree that they could be removed as well (11:20–22) shows the Gentiles to be part of the Israel of faith (cf. 2:29).

In 11:32, Paul sums up his line of thought. God's ultimate goal in consigning all to disobedience is to have mercy on all. The context indicates that all humanity is in view in both halves of the sentence. Paul foresaw a time beyond the writing of Romans when there would be among Jews a renewed openness to the gospel. Their future (11:12) would match that of the Gentiles' acceptance of the gospel (11:25). Their future acceptance of the resurrected Christ would be "life from the dead" (11:15). God's covenant promise of forgiveness (11:6, 27; cf. Is. 27:9; 59:20) would be realized in that future grafting of Jews as "natural" branches on to the olive tree (Rom. 11:24). This would happen shortly before the coming of Christ. "There are among them [the Jews] many who will come to the light, and who will proclaim the immutability of the law of God with wonderful power. The Lord God will work. He will do wonderful things in righteousness" (Ev 578).

11:33–36. Doxology. Paul concludes his unveiling of God's plan for Israel with a hymn in which he invites his hearers, then and now, to join him in worship as he praises the unfathomable riches and wisdom and knowledge of God. The hymn captures Paul's amazement at God's plan for showing mercy on all the human family, including his temporarily hardened fellow Jews; he expresses his awe at the depth of the riches of God's wisdom and knowledge (v. 33). The hymn makes clear that the ways in which God expresses His grace are unfathomable. It is a fitting response of gratitude to God's mercy.

The quotations Paul cites in vv. 34–35 raise three questions that relate in reverse order to the exclamations about the "riches," "wisdom," and "knowledge" of God (v. 33). The questions are rhetorical, anticipating the answer—"No one!"—to be supplied by the attentive reader. God's sovereignty is unquestionable: God owes no one anything (v. 35). This conviction lies at the foundation of Paul's thoughts in Romans. We cannot put God in our debt because He does not owe us anything. Even the covenant between God and Israel was an expression of God's gracious initiative. There is nothing we can give God that is not already in His possession, except worship freely expressed from a grateful heart.

The hymn's last word is "amen." This is not the only "amen" in Romans (cf. 1:25; 9:5; 15:33; 16:27). On the basis of Paul's comment in 1 Corinthians 14:16 regarding the need for words of praise in worship to be intelligible so others can respond with "amen," we can assume that the "amen" here (11:36), as elsewhere in Romans, comes from Paul's intent to engage the listeners by drawing from them a responsive "amen" to the doxology. Responsive readers of Romans ever since have added their own "amen."

RESPONDING TO THE MERCIES OF GOD

In the first eleven chapters, Paul laid out the plan of a holy God to offer sinners the gospel, which is the power of God that provides salvation for all who believe (1:16), as the only path to escape condemnation and death. In spite of human defiance, including the Jews' tragic rejection of their Messiah, God has been working unceasingly for the good of His creation. Next, Paul considers the appropriate human response to the mercies of God. It would be a grave mistake to conclude that the practical guidance in chapters 12–15 is a perfunctory afterthought. The section can sensibly be divided into three parts: 12:1—13:14, which explains how a Christian community, including the Roman believers, ought to live together; 14:1—15:6, which deals with divisive attitudes over matters of dietary scruples; and 15:7–13, which is an appeal for the believers to accept each other, whether Jew or Gentile, and to live in hope.

12:1—13:14

How Christians Should Live Together

In this section, Paul sets the foundations for the believers' communal life in a world hostile to God. It is necessary that an inner transformation of the mind attuned to the will of God replace conformity to that world. He writes of the differing gifts bestowed by God for Christians' mutual benefit, not as grounds for self-importance but as obligations for service to one another out of a genuine love (12:3–9). Regarding their relationships with nonbelievers, Paul enjoins them to bless their persecutors, leaving revenge in God's hands, and so overcome evil with good (vv. 14–21). Since God appoints civil authorities, Paul directs believers to submit to them as God's servants, even in the payment of taxes (13:1–7). Genuine love fulfills the law and serves as the gold standard against which all is measured (vv. 8–10). Paul teaches that all are to live as if the day of salvation were at hand (vv. 11–14).

12:1–2. The Living Sacrifice. Before launching into more specific counsel, Paul appeals to believers to present their bodies as a living sacrifice by the mercy of God (cf. 15:30 and 16:17). "Therefore" indicates that the advice that follows flows naturally out of what Paul had already written, including but not limited to the previous doxology (11:33–36). The reference to God's mercy is a reminder of God's aim to have mercy on all (11:30–32, cf. 9:16).

Human sacrifices were forbidden in Scripture (Mic. 6:6–8). Paul's call here is for something quite different—"a living sacrifice," a voluntary and continuous dedication to God as the fitting act of worship. The term "bodies" does not limit the sacrifice to the purely physical aspect. The call for the renewing of the mind (Rom. 12:2) shows that the whole person is in view here. The use of the plural "bodies" followed by the singular "living sacrifice" means that Paul was telling the whole community to offer itself up as a single living sacrifice. Paul deals in this section with communal issues and attitudes, aiming at motivating believers to live holy lives and to be witnesses in the present evil world. In other words, believers are to glorify God with their unified speech and thinking (15:6). The collective witness of different personalities and dispositions living together in harmony is a marvel to behold, a miracle of God's grace. The service or worship is to be offered in light of who God is and what Christ has done, and it is to be logikos (12:1). This word has been rendered as "reasonable" or "proper" but can also carry the nuance of "spiritual." The only fitting response is to live a holy communal life, acceptable or pleasing to God.

The use of the present tense of the verbs here suggests an ongoing process—we are to continually resist being conformed to the values and outlook of the world that is often at odds with the good, acceptable or pleasing, and perfect will of God (v. 2). We are to keep on being transformed through the renewing of our minds. For example, rivalry and self-assertiveness were valued in Roman times, as today. But the competitive and combative instincts of human nature can easily destroy the harmony and holiness of a community of believers. Instead, Paul's message states the importance of giving preference to one another (cf. Phil. 2:3).

The agent of transformation cannot be the human self, as the passive tense of the imperative verb "be transformed" indicates. It is the Spirit's renewing of our minds (cf. Rom. 8:4–11) that allows us to discern and concur with the will of God. Yet there is a role for the human subject in this transformation, since Paul urges readers to continue being transformed (12:2). We must respond to the promptings of the Spirit. In contrast, since the unregenerate do not retain the knowledge of God, God gives them over to minds that are adokimos (lit. "not passing the test," "rejected" [translated as "depraved" or "debased"]) which in turn leads to behavior of the same sort (1:28–32). Paul uses the word euarestos ("pleasing," "acceptable") to describe the "living sacrifice" (12:1) as well as the believers who, with transformed minds, are able to discern God's perfect will. God does not ask us to act out of character, but in character—His character.

12:3–8. Exercising One's Gift. In v. 3, Paul confronts the human tendency toward inflated self-assessment, especially when comparing oneself with others. Surveys repeatedly reveal that most people rate themselves as above average compared to others. Paul exhorts all of them to engage in a sober self-assessment. How does a person make a proper self-assessment? Paul's answer to this implied question starts with the examples in vv. 4–8. Believers must not only recognize the gifts bestowed by God on each but must actually apply themselves in exercising the gifts given for the blessing of others (vv. 6–8).

The grace given to Paul refers to Paul's apostleship (v. 3; cf. 1:5; 15:15–16). All have been gifted through the grace of God, though in differing ways (v. 6; cf. Eph. 4:7). Paul avoided ranking the gifts in importance or prestige, though he begins with the gift of prophecy, which is listed second in the other enumerations of spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11). The meaning of Paul's statement about faith in Romans 12:3 remains unclear. It could mean that faith is the measure or that faith refers here to faithfulness in the exercising of the gift. It probably means that each believer has received the gift of faith.

The human body, with its various members, illustrates the unity in diversity appropriate among believers (Rom. 12:4–5). Elsewhere, Paul describes the believers as making up "the body of Christ," that is, the possession of Christ, with Christ as the head (1 Cor. 12:27; Eph. 4:12, 15; Col. 1:24). Here in Romans, believers are one body in Christ and offer one "living sacrifice" (Rom. 12:1). Instead of being an assortment of autonomous individuals, they all belong as members of each other so that they and their gifts belong to each other (v. 5).

The list of seven gifts is not exhaustive; however, it illustrates not only the variety of the gifts but also the necessity of exercising them with a proper attitude—all of which can aid in the self-examination urged on each believer in deciding whether one is thinking soberly of oneself according to the measure of faith (v. 3). The Greek construction, not readily translated into smooth English, indicates that our identity is expressed by the spiritual gift we have received. The first item (dealing with prophecy) refers to the exercise of the gift in accordance with the proportion of faith (v. 6). Whatever Paul had in mind must be consistent with the meaning of the proportion of faith mentioned in v. 3; and it would not lead to unfavorable comparisons among the faithful, as if the gift of prophecy implied spiritual superiority. The next three items seem to state the obvious—the gift bestowed is to be exercised, whether in ministry or service, in teaching, or in exhortation or encouragement (vv. 7–8). The gifts of philanthropy, leadership, and showing mercy are to be exercised, like any other gift, with liberality or generosity, diligence, and cheerfulness (v. 8b).

12:9–21. Transformed Community. The varied directives and appeals that make up this section describe how a transformed community should live according to the will of God (v. 2). The first section applies more directly to the relationships among the believers (vv. 10–13), while the latter portion (vv. 14, 17–21) describes a blessed assertiveness toward outsiders. The use of plural nouns and verb forms in these verses shows that Paul is describing the true love that must characterize the whole community of believers (cf. 1 Cor. 13).

In the original language, the opening line in Romans 12:9a serves as a heading for the long string of participles found in vv. 9–13 that flesh out the expression of genuine Christian love.

Love can be sincere and devoid of hypocrisy only when we turn away from what is evil and cling to what is good (Rom. 12:9b). Good and evil reappear at the end of the section in the dramatic imperative: "Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good" (v. 21). All the directives that Paul gave in vv. 10–20 are summed up as the overcoming of evil with good.

Paul's admonition to philostorgos—"devoted love" (variously translated "brotherly love," "love one another deeply as brothers and sisters," or "love each other like the members of your family"; v. 10)—conveys the idea that there should be familial love in the Christian family created through faith in Jesus the Messiah. In a society where honor and recognition were prized, Paul was urging believers to take the lead in showing honor to each other (v. 10). The Greek phrase pneumati zeontes could refer either to spiritual fervor or to being fervent (lit. "hot") in the Holy Spirit. In either case, this state of earnestness should coincide with "serving the Lord" (v. 11). Hope in the Lord's return and constant prayer enable perseverance in the midst of trials (v. 12). The material needs of fellow believers are not to be ignored. Paul urges Christians to extend hospitality to all believers (v. 13), a practice that was especially vital in his day since public facilities for the traveler were notorious for their immorality. The NT is replete with admonitions to extend hospitality (Heb. 13:2; 1 Pet. 4:9; 2 John 10; 3 John 5–8; cf. Acts 16:15; 1 Tim. 3:2; 2 John 10).

The followers of a crucified Lord lived with hostility ranging from scorn and harassment to physical harm. The words of the curser typically invoked supernatural powers to wreak harm on the person cursed. Conversely, the believers' words of blessing, uttered in response to cursing directed at them, called on God to deal kindly with their persecutors (Rom. 12:14). Invoking the power of the Almighty on behalf of one's enemies is the most assertive expression of overcoming evil with good (v. 21; cf. Matt. 5:44; Luke 6:28).

To share rejoicing with others (Rom. 12:15a) involves setting aside any feelings of envy over the blessings others enjoy (cf. 1 Cor. 12:26). To share grief with others (Rom. 12:15b), one must take the time to embrace the mourner's loss rather than secretly congratulating oneself for escaping the calamity that befell another. Paul also encourages harmony with one's associates and the treating of each and all equally without regard to position. He also speaks against the human tendency to be proud because of social standing or to wish to associate solely or primarily with those seen as socially higher. Instead, believers are to associate with people of low or humble positions (v. 16b) while maintaining a modest self-assessment (cf. v. 3).

After the brief imperative on responding to persecution with blessing and not cursing (v. 14), Paul next provides a fuller treatment of the Christian response to persecution and hostility (vv. 17–21). The NT writers with one voice categorically forbid the wronged believer to seek revenge (cf. Matt. 5:38–44; 1 Pet. 3:9). Returning evil for evil gives added life to the initial wrongdoing (cf. Prov. 17:13; 1 Thess. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9). Instead of focusing on retaliating, one should take the initiative in pursuing what is recognized as good even by the nonbelievers (Rom. 12:17b). Not all social norms of the nonbelievers are wrong, and Christians ought at least to maintain the moral standards of their communities. As one who suffered persecution, Paul knew it is not always possible to be at peace with everyone (v. 18). But all efforts should be made to be at peace, certainly within the circle of faith, but ideally outside it as well (cf. Matt. 5:16, 21–48).

In Romans 12:19, Paul turns to the topic of the pursuit of vengeance—taking matters into one's own hands. Instead of taking vengeance, one is to allow room for the wrath of God to deal with wrongdoers. Many translations supply the words "of God" (or "God's wrath") because the second half of the verse quotes God's claim that vengeance belongs to Him (quoting Deut. 32:35; cf. Jer. 5:9; 23:2; Hos. 4:9; Joel 3:21; Nah. 1:2; Heb. 10:30). Linked with the hope of salvation is the confidence in God to carry out a comprehensive and complete work of justice against evildoers (Luke 18:1–8; 2 Thess. 1:6–8; Rev. 6:9–10). But Paul in the next section of the letter (Rom. 13:1–7) goes on to note that the civil ruler could also be God's appointed servant to visit wrath or punishment on the evildoer.

Our human desire to inflict on others the pain they have inflicted on us is a strong instinct. It is also the basis for the widening and reciprocal cycle of revenge that plagues the relationships between tribes and nations, leading to the horrific slaughter of innocent people. For an individual believer or even a group of believers to pursue vengeance is to take the matter out of God's hands. It shows a lack of faith or confidence in the Lord's ability or intent to deal thoroughly with evil. As God's beloved children, we can rest in the assurance that God will deal justly with those who wrong us rather than take a fallible vengeance with our own puny hands.

The vivid picture of putting coals of fire on the head of a hungry or thirsty enemy by caring for that person's needs (12:20) comes from Proverbs 25:21–22. Heaping hot coals on the head could refer to an experience resulting in a change of behavior. In other words, showing kindness to an enemy could destroy evil (cf. Rom. 12:21; 2 Kin. 6:18–23). Paul's concluding command serves as a summary of the whole section. The passive imperative not to be overcome by evil is followed by the active imperative to overcome evil with good. The means by which one does not allow evil to overcome is often a matter of attitudes and responses to matters outside of one's control. Yet Paul calls for an active response because love cannot be passive or even merely reactive—it requires assertiveness. In reality, we do not often completely overcome evil in the world. The oppressors continue to thrive, but ultimate victory belongs to God. In a lesser sense here, on our street where we live, as evil and evildoers engage us, we are to respond proactively in such a way as to assist God in breaking the power of evil in the lives of others. We are to use the active methods mentioned in the previous verses: never flagging in prayer, invoking the blessing of God on behalf of evildoers in their presence, openly and intentionally pursuing the general good, taking the initiative in pursuing peace, avoiding any personal retaliation, and providing for the enemy's needs. All the while we are to recall that we are the beloved friends of God (Rom. 12:19) and that He is the One who will provide the complete and final resolution to evil. We look forward in hope to God's final resolution.

13:1–7. Obeying the Secular Servants of God. Prior to the final resolution, God also appoints civil authorities as His servants to exercise His wrath against evildoers. The call for submission to secular rulers as servants of God parallels Paul's call elsewhere for believers to submit to each other within their relationship with God (Eph. 5:21). Paul's directive that everyone should be subject to the governing authorities out of respect for God's authority (Rom. 13:1) rests on the assumption that all authority ultimately issues from God (cf. Dan. 2:20–21, 37–38; 4:17).

The vagueness of the term "governing authorities" suggests a wide application. Perhaps this would range from the ruling authority of the emperor down to local authorities appointed by God to carry out His will for order and justice (see "Submission to Governing Authorities," p. 1602). As those who serve God as His ministers, a concept repeated three times for emphasis (Rom. 13:4–6), Paul says that civil authorities are to be obeyed. The punishment of evildoers by civil authorities anticipates the final exercise of God's wrath (2:16; 3:6). The advice Paul gives is parallel to that in 1 Peter 2:13–17, though there it is stated without the explicit insistence that the authorities are ordained by God. The phrase "bear the sword" (Rom. 13:4) has been understood by some to entail the propriety of capital punishment, while others suggest that the phrase may refer to the authority of the office, symbolized by the sword.

In v. 5, Paul summarizes the reasons for submitting to the authorities: first, to avoid being punished, and second, to follow our consciences, by which Paul means the commitment to submit to the will of God. He acknowledged that the Roman Christians were already paying taxes to the secular authorities (v. 6). In fact, all those in authority are to be paid what they are owed, whether taxes, other fees, honor, or respect (v. 7). Believers are to give preference to others in honoring them (12:10). The believer's obligation of submission, respect, and honor extends to the unbelieving world as well (cf. 1 Sam. 24:1–11; 26:5–23; Acts 23:1–5; 1 Pet. 2:17). This respect does not extend to expressions of worship, which would amount to idolatry.

13:8–10. Love Fulfills Law. Paul identifies believers' one perpetual obligation: love one another. After dominating much of the first half of the letter, the law makes its last appearances in this passage. Paul declares that those who love others have fulfilled the law, especially as exemplified in the prohibitions in the second half of the Decalogue against murder, adultery, theft, lying, and covetousness (Rom. 13:9; see Ex. 20:13–17). The aims of love and of the divinely ordered law are the same: the welfare of everyone. Jesus placed Moses's command to "love your neighbor as yourself" (Matt. 22:37–40; cf. Lev. 19:18) alongside the command for a wholehearted love for God as the summary of all the teachings of Scripture. In Romans, Paul speaks only of the love toward one's neighbor as fulfilling the law. In general, instead of speaking of loving God, Paul preferred to speak of the believer's faith in God (but see Rom. 8:28). If the believers could not develop a communal life together as brothers and sisters under the lordship of Christ, the gospel would be a public mockery. Yet the great truth that love fulfills the law can legitimately be extended to the Christian's relationships with unbelievers. Paul's telling choice of ton heteron ("others," "another") in 13:8b implies an otherness outside of the circle of faith (cf. Lev. 19:34).

Paul gives no basis for setting aside the Decalogue. Christ "condemned sin in the flesh" (Rom. 8:3), making it possible for "the righteous requirement of the law" (8:4) to be fulfilled in us through the power of the Spirit. Strictly speaking, the negative commands in the Decalogue describe how love does not act. But Christian love goes beyond the avoidance of wrongdoing. Love must recast the negative commands into positive actions. Thus, love more than fulfills the limited demands of a narrow reading of the Decalogue.

13:11–14. Putting Aside the Works of Darkness. The new day of our salvation is the fast-approaching Second Coming of Christ, the Christian hope. Now believers must wake up, take off the nightclothes—the works of darkness—put on the armor of light, and walk properly, uprightly, as one does in the daytime. Believers are to live holy lives now as if the day of their deliverance were about to arrive. Paul was not suggesting that he himself and the Roman believers were enveloped in the deeds of darkness. In 15:14, he expresses his confidence in their goodness, knowledge, and capacity to teach each other. But for the honest-hearted follower of Christ, conversion is not a distant event in the past. It involves a daily recommitment to Christ, a daily putting on of the armor of Christ in the continual battle against the sinful nature.

Paul provides a short list of the deeds of darkness, ending with an emphasis on avoiding eris ("strife," "dissension") and zēlos ("envy," "jealousy"; 13:13), which may anticipate the long section on the conflict between two factions in the church that follows in 14:1—15:7. The invitation to put on the protective "armor of light" (13:12) really means to clothe ourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ (14:14a; cf. Gal. 3:27; Col. 3:10–12). This dramatic expression of total submission to the lordship of Christ may refer to a literal changing of clothes during baptism. We allow room for the desires of the flesh (14:14b) by dwelling on the possibility of evil. Resisting temptations involves guarding our immediate environment—what we see, hear, and think about (Rom. 12:1–2; Matt. 5:28; 15:18–19). For example, keeping certain foods out of the cupboard and refrigerator strengthens the decision to lose weight. Also, Jesus pointed out that whoever views another person with lustful intent has already committed adultery.

Submission to Governing Authorities

Modern interpreters have questioned Paul's call for submission to governing authorities without apparently considering whether they are worthy of support (Rom. 13:3–4). The use of Paul's words by Adolf Hitler and others to quell any Christian opposition to abhorrent government policies has sensitized modern readers not to take Paul's words as calling for passivity in the face of evil. A host of believers from a large part of the world once under the domination of colonial powers bring their bitter history to the reading of Romans 13.

1. Experience of Christians. Paul and the Roman believers knew from wide experience that punishment by civil authorities was not always limited to evildoers. Paul dictated these words with scars on his body from receiving thirty-nine lashes five times at the command of Jewish authorities and three beatings with rods from Roman authorities (2 Cor. 11:24–25) in misguided efforts to preserve the public peace and political stability (cf. Acts 16:22–23). Paul finally arrived in Rome after spending two years in prison in Caesarea because the Roman governor, Felix, was waiting in vain for a ransom before releasing him (Acts 24:26–27). Yet civil and military authorities also intervened several times to save his life and those of others from mobs intent on lynching them (e.g., Acts 19:35–41; 21:31–36; 23:10).

The already marginalized believers lived with the suspicion of their neighbors and already experienced persecution. Earlier in the letter, Paul wrote of the harsh realities that Christians face, including persecution, even as he denied that such realities could separate them from Christ (Rom. 8:35–36). Noting that such unfair treatment of those claiming the name of Christ is not new, in Romans 8:36, he quotes Psalm 44:22. Nonetheless, Paul could declare that "in all these things we are more than conquerors" through the

One who loves us (Rom. 8:37). After all, Paul reminds his hearers that in all things God is working for the ultimate well-being of those who love God (8:28).

2. Reasons for the Counsel. In trying to understand Paul, we should first keep in mind that Paul and the Roman Christians believed that Jesus Christ was enthroned as Lord and would be returning to establish an everlasting kingdom that would replace the kingdoms of this earth. This belief could have been a starting point for a spirit of disrespect to the present rulers, soon to be replaced, and that could have led to disastrous consequences.

Second, Paul wrote this letter to the Romans expecting it to be shared in the various house churches in Rome. He knew this letter could be intercepted or heard by someone engaged in surveillance of the Christian community, whether officially or unofficially. Therefore, anything that could be construed as a call to rebellion against civil authority would have created problems for the Christian community in Rome. This was the experience of Jesus when the Jewish leaders accused Him of being a politically dangerous person threatening the rule of Rome (John 19:12; cf. Acts 17:7; 1 Cor. 1:23). Paul himself was a figure who drew suspicion from within and without the Christian community, accused of causing disturbances all over the known world (Acts 17:6).

Third, it would be going too far to claim that in Romans 13:1–7 Paul was disingenuously seeking to improve both his and the Roman believers' relationship with the governing authorities. But it is also true that in Romans Paul did not write anything that could be construed as antigovernment beyond his assertion that the Roman rulers were servants of the Jewish-Christian God, appointed to carry out justice to evildoers. Because he was a recognized leader in the movement, Paul's words could have helped allay suspicions.

Fourth, Paul did not say everything he could have said on the subject of the authorities, Jewish or pagan. He restricted their power to punish evildoers, but he did not deal with the misuse of that power when oppressing believers for doing good in the service of God.

3. Relevance of Paul's Counsel. How then shall the counsels of Paul be read and used by believers today? First, read them in the context of the whole Bible, which contains stories of individuals, such as John the Baptist, who were called by God to confront governmental evil, as well as the speeches of the prophets calling on rulers for reform and justice. Second, respect government as ordained by God to protect the public welfare. This means Christians ought to be law-abiding citizens who pay their taxes and obey the laws of the land. Third, if one lives in a country where there are opportunities to vote on issues and elect individuals to public office, one should consider those opportunities as obligations just as binding as that of obedience to the laws. Fourth, if Christians are to submit to the governing authority because of their conscience (Rom. 13:5), they should also obey God rather than humans because of their conscience whenever the demands of the state conflict with the will of God (Acts 5:29).

14:1—15:7

Threats to Faith

While this part of the letter may appear to begin abruptly in translation, a more precise rendering of the original language in 14:1 would be: "So then receive the one who is weak in faith." Paul had laid the groundwork for dealing with this delicate matter in 13:8–10 with his emphasis on love. Disputes over secondary matters can destroy the bonds between believers and even threaten their individual spiritual survival. Paul had learned of a deep division among the Roman believers over food and days. At risk was that vital unity that would allow them to "glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (15:6).

Nowhere in his handling of the controversy does Paul urge the divided parties to come to complete agreement, even though he was clearly agreeing with one side. Walking or acting in love (14:15) does not depend on settling all differences of opinion. Paul was confronting the destructive attitudes of both groups toward one another. All disputes must be measured in light of the gospel and the precious unity of the church in Christ. Secondary matters assume a false importance when we lose sight of the greater truths of salvation.

14:1–4. Acceptance without Condemnation or Condescension. From some source now unknown, Paul had received news that the believers in Rome were divided over issues involving food and days. He offered a directive to those likely making up the majority of the believers. They were to welcome those whose faith was weak. To describe what they should avoid in this process, Paul uses the word diakrisis, which can mean "the ability to pass judgment" but can also mean "quarrel." Quarreling over dialogismōn ("doubtful things," "disputable matters," "opinions") should be avoided (v. 1). It is unlikely that those weak in faith would have described themselves in these terms. The expression may have been Paul's own choice, since later on he points out that the weak in faith are particularly liable to stumble due to lack of faith (v. 23). Not all possess a faith as robust as Abraham's (4:17–25).

Because they did not have church buildings, believers in the first century met and worshiped in private homes, often eating together and celebrating the Lord's Supper (Acts 2:46; cf. 1 Cor. 11:17–22). Imagine being invited to someone's home and discovering they had purposely prepared food you consider forbidden. Those who were characterized by Paul as weak in faith witnessed their Christian brothers and sisters eating what they considered forbidden and were therefore deeply offended. Their counterparts were prone to look down on the less enlightened, those believers weak in faith abstaining from what they considered good food. Hospitality should not be an occasion for disputes over unimportant matters (Rom. 14:1).

Paul selected what may have been the extreme positions in his characterization of the two sides: one person eating only vegetables or greens and another believing it was permissible to eat anything (v. 2). It is not clear why a believer would make it a matter of principle to eat only vegetables. The eating of some animals and fish was allowed in Leviticus 11. Jewish food laws did not promote vegetarianism, though the original diet given humans did not include animal flesh (Gen. 1:29; cf. 9:3). Those who believed themselves to be permitted to eat all things might in good conscience eat all food healthful for the body. Weakening one's body by consuming what one knows to be harmful would be a violation of stewardship.

It was necessary for the more scrupulous believers to remember that God had already received and accepted the less scrupulous (Rom. 14:3), that is, He had extended the hospitality of salvation to them. Paul compares the believer's relationship to God to that of master and servant (a household slave), in which the servant's work must pass the master's scrutiny (v. 4). God has not given one servant in His household the task of passing judgment on another servant. To do so would usurp His authority as Master and Judge (cf. 2:1; James 4:11–12). Paul acknowledges that all will eventually come before the judgment seat of God, who has access to that which is concealed from human eyes and understanding (Rom. 3:6; 14:10; Heb. 9:27). Fortunately, God is more than our Judge. Like a dedicated teacher fully able to prepare students to pass the final examination, the gracious Master is willing and able to make His household servants stand without accusation in that final inspection (Rom. 14:4; cf. Eph. 3:20; Jude 24). The assurance of God's enabling does not reduce the seriousness of the coming judgment, but it removes the need for believers to condemn one another.

14:5–9. Living for the Lord. Paul takes up a second point of contention: the issue of viewing certain days as more important than others (v. 5a). Regardless of the difference in viewpoint, it is necessary for each person to recognize that no one can be the conscience of another person. While all must be done with an eye to the approval of God, believers are directly responsible to God for being fully convinced in their own minds and then acting accordingly. What both parties should have in common in their differences over days or food is their determination to honor the Lord and to offer heartfelt words of thanks to God. We ought to live all of our days to the Lord (v. 6). Even on our deathbed we entrust ourselves to the Lord. Throughout our existence we are in the Lord's care, never simply serving our own interests, never abandoned, even if we are without human support. We are the Lord's (v. 8; cf. 8:38–39).

In the midst of this context of what Christians ought to eat there is a brief shift in 14:5–6 regarding when to eat and when to abstain. The assumption that the issue was over the day to worship is extremely unlikely. It is more likely that Paul had in mind days of fasting—an important matter for Jews and Christians in the first century (see Matt. 6:16–18; Luke 18:12). During the second century, Christians were advised to fast on Wednesday and Friday, instead of Tuesday and Thursday with the Jews.

Many interpreters have assumed that Paul was referring to the weekly Sabbath in Romans

14:5–6. This is unlikely for several reasons. First, the context throughout chapter 14 is about food. Second, directions in the OT regarding the observance of the Sabbath make no mention of foods to be eaten or avoided altogether. Third, the brevity of Paul's treatment of "days" indicates that he was not referring to a dispute among believers about whether the Sabbath was to be observed. If Paul intended his readers to conclude from his brief remarks in vv. 5–6b that the observance of the Sabbath, commanded by God in the Decalogue, had now become optional, he would have had to mount a more sustained argument. It would have been an extremely important matter. Fourth, Paul would not have taught the abolition of Sabbath for the sake of Christ, because he was aware of the gospel stories according to which Jesus went to great lengths to show how to keep the Sabbath rather than to abolish it (Matt. 12:1–12; Luke 13:10–17).

Paul indicates that in matters of conduct where clear guidance from the Lord has not been provided and where differences in conviction threaten unity, we are to remember the common aim to bring honor to God in all that we do (cf. 1 Cor. 10:31). We must acknowledge the sincerity of those with whom we disagree and uphold their responsibility to follow their own convictions. In Romans 14:13–21, Paul lays out another principle that must be balanced with that of individual responsibility.

In the midst of his treatment of secondary matters, Paul directs our attention to what really matters: Christ who died and rose again, resulting in His installation as "Lord of both the dead and the living" (v. 9). Throughout vv. 4–14, Paul uses "Lord" to refer to the "Lord Jesus Christ" (cf. 13:14; 14:14). The title implies a mandate for the believer to submit to the authority of Christ in all matters and under all circumstances, even in the face of death. The best antidote to getting caught up in secondary matters is to stay focused on the central truths of the gospel.

14:10–12. Standing in Judgment. Paul returns to the divisive scorning and judging that threatens the unity of believers, this time with a stern reminder. Each of us will someday stand before the judgment seat of Christ (v. 10; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10), who will demand an accounting of our attitudes and words, including those that contributed to the spiritual death of others. Regarding Paul's immediate audience, unstated but implied is how unimportant the disputes over food and days would then appear, except for the damage they had caused. While we ought to care for one another out of love for Christ's sake, Paul does not hesitate to point out the sober and certain reality of the judgment. This strong warning must be put alongside his earlier assertion that the divine Master is able to ensure the safe passage of those who acknowledge His lordship in all they do and say (Rom. 14:4).

The surviving manuscripts differ as to whether the original reading in Romans 14:10 was the judgment seat of God or Christ. Nonetheless, Paul speaks of everyone having to give an account of himself or herself "to God" (v. 12). Previously, Paul spoke of the day when God would judge the secrets of all people through Jesus Christ (2:16; cf. Acts 17:31). Paul backs up his assertion of the coming judgment by Christ with a solemn oath from the Greek version of Isaiah 45:23: every knee will bow to the Lord (Rom. 14:11). The emphasis here and in Philippians 2:8–11 is on the universal acknowledgment of the lordship of Christ.

14:13–21. Do Not Make Brothers or Sisters Stumble. What excuse could possibly be acceptable in the judgment if one's behavior or attitude on a secondary matter contributes to the spiritual ruin of another person for whom Christ died (cf. Matt. 18:5–6)? If there is to be any judging, everyone should resolve (Gr. "judge") not to place stumbling blocks in the way of other believers (Rom. 14:13). Whatever the issue, determine never to be party to another's destruction (v. 15). Judging is done by people who consider others to be inferior in understanding God's will. Those who condemn others over their sincerely held views imagine themselves to be on God's judgment seat. Arrogant condescension by the strong can lead to weak believers' dismissal of the gospel itself. Exercising one's so-called rights in a manner that injures a fellow believer puts both parties in spiritual jeopardy, because it is a failure to act (lit. "walk") in love (Rom. 14:15). The rights of one person do not include the right to harm another. The principle of restraint in exercising one's rights to avoid another's disastrous spiritual harm applies in every age and congregation.

Most interpreters understand that Paul's view in v. 14 that nothing is "unclean" amounts to a blanket dismissal of the food laws found in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14. In addition, translators usually render the Greek word differently here. In most other cases, they translate it as "common" but here (Rom. 14:14) as "unclean." The evidence for this conclusion with the resulting translation deserves closer scrutiny, however. The specific difference in 14:2 was whether eating only vegetables was the best way to honor God. Paul did not have the Levitical laws regarding unclean meat in mind when speaking of food as not common (see commentary on Acts 10:9–16).

Paul was widening the horizons of significance by pointing out the danger of having that which is good spoken of as evil (Rom. 14:16). Division among believers over secondary matters would inevitably seep outside, leaving them and the gospel open to ridicule. The communal life of believers in the crowded cities of the empire could not be hidden from the scrutiny of pagan neighbors. The gathered believers were outposts of the kingdom of God where Christ was even now Lord and their life together bore witness to the power of the gospel. The power of the gospel must not be contradicted by contentions that come to the attention of critics (cf. 1 Cor. 6).

Contentions over secondary ritual matters by both the weak and the strong endanger the very hallmarks of the kingdom of God—righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit (Rom. 14:17). Indeed, finding agreement over what are secondary matters in any generation will prove elusive unless the primary matters are kept in sight. Earlier, Paul noted the changed relationship with God we enjoy when we are reckoned as righteous by faith and live at peace with God. Through Christ, we rejoice in the hope of the coming glory of God (5:1–2). But the results of this restored vertical relation with God must be seen inside the circles of faith where Christ is now Lord. In spite of irreconcilable differences over secondary matters, we are called to live at peace with one another, upright in our dealings and filled with joy as we contemplate the glorious future. The one who lives this way is accepted by God and approved by people (14:18). This is the "living sacrifice" that is pleasing to God (12:1). Outsiders will notice and admire the unusual harmony enjoyed by believers, especially if their conduct toward nonbelievers is above reproach. The brief but telling mention of the Holy Spirit reminds us that all of this is achieved through the presence of the Holy Spirit (cf. 8:1–16).

How then should we act toward one another? Paul provides two permanent standards. First, consider what makes for peace and edification (14:19). The pursuit of peace must not compromise the core values of the kingdom, and any effort to promote the spiritual and moral growth of another cannot be done in the spirit of superiority. Whoever seeks to exercise moral surgery on another must win that person's consent and must give priority to the delicate and ongoing workings of the Holy Spirit on the conscience. Second, our actions, including what we eat or drink (v. 21), must not weaken a brother's or sister's confidence in the gospel. The real danger from secondary disputes, beyond distraction, is the destruction of the work of God (v. 20)—whether it be the unity of the believers or faith in the heart of the weak.

14:22–23. Avoid Sinning against Convictions. Some versions translate v. 22a so that it seems to say we are to keep our faith to ourselves. Other versions are clearer in saying that it is what we believe about these things (the points of contention) that we are to keep between ourselves and God. As noted in 14:1, conversation for the purpose of disputes is off the table. The aspect of faith in view in vv. 22 and 23b would best be understood as one's personal convictions. The blessing from God referred to in v. 22b applies when one's true convictions are the same as what is openly supported. Those with scruples over food ought not to succumb to social pressure to participate in what the voice of conscience, based on sincere convictions, tells them is wrong. Their acquiescence would be sin until the full implication of the gospel becomes clear to them.

The beatitude of v. 22b warns believers in every age against allowing cultural pressures or authoritative voices to lead them to do what they believe is wrong. The tragic collaboration of ordinary people in following orders during the Holocaust demonstrates how naturally vulnerable we are to cave in to authority and conform to the unethical demands of employers or governmental officials or even powerful voices in the church. In some matters, there will be differences of understanding regarding precisely what God's will requires. In all matters, the integrity of one's conscience must be preserved and the right of others to act according to their conscience over disputed matters must be upheld. This principle does not protect an unexamined position or an uninformed conscience. If by God's grace we have entrusted ourselves as sinners to God's mercy and received the assurance of forgiveness, all our convictions and beliefs, habits, and practices need to be examined in the penetrating light of divine love flowing from the cross.

15:1–7. The Obligation to Follow Christ's Example. The example of the Lord Jesus Christ makes clear that the strong are under obligation to wholeheartedly accommodate the scruples of the weak rather than to please themselves (v. 1). Acceding to the needs of the weaker serves the larger goal of the edification (v. 2) or "building up" of the community, making it possible for them to glorify God with unified thought and speech (v. 6).

For the first and only time in Romans, Paul here uses the term "strong," and only with the obligation to bear the weaknesses of the weak (v. 1). By using the word "we," he openly identifies himself with the strong, which is not surprising in light of his declaration in 14:14. An obligation can seem to stifle the motivation of love. But there is a place for obligation in the Christian life in light of what Christ our Lord has endured for us (15:3). Paul found it necessary to draw the connection between the believers' obligation to one another and their gratitude to Christ. Their obligation was rooted in the soil of gratitude. Christ, who suffered the shameful death reserved for slaves and state criminals, overturned the prevailing Roman ideal that the weak conform to the wishes of the strong or powerful. The enduring force of this upheaval ought not to be missed by the modern reader. Note Paul's personal obligation to the Greeks and non-Greeks (sometimes translated "barbarians"; 1:14), and the believers' obligation to be led by the Spirit and not by the flesh (8:12–13).

In an aside in 15:4, Paul reminds us that the Scriptures are a divinely bestowed resource for encouraging us to endure difficulties and for sustaining our hope of the coming redemption of all things. He applied the words of David (v. 3) in Psalm 69 (a psalm related to Christ a number of times in the NT; Rom. 11:9–10; Matt. 27:27–30, 34; John 2:17; 15:25; Acts 1:20) to Christ's experience of being insulted for the sake of God's purposes and implicitly encourages us to do the same by not pleasing ourselves (Ps. 69:9). Romans 15:4 conveys the idea that the Scriptures are a source of encouragement, aiding believers in an unwavering commitment nurtured by a steady hope in the promises of God.

Then Paul appeals to God to provide those same blessings—hypomonē ("patience," "endurance") and paraklēsis ("encouragement," "comfort")—to lead the believers to a oneness in their acceptance of each other (Rom. 15:5–6). If they would accept and receive each other, just as Christ had accepted them (v. 7), then God would be glorified. The sharp differences over the secondary matters of diet and days would fade into insignificance when, like a chorus of singers, their harmonious voices would declare to those on earth and in heaven the glory of the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 6). Paul refers to the glory of God, the public acknowledgment of God's sovereign rule shown through the words and deeds of the believers, including the widening circle of praise from Gentiles drawn to faith in Christ (vv. 9–11; cf. Matt. 5:16; 1 Cor. 10:21; 2 Cor. 4:15).

Paul begins Romans 14:1–4 with a command to receive those weak in faith. Now he widens it to include "one another," that is, to accept one another as full-fledged members of the family of God, as Christ has received and accepted us (Rom. 15:7). Christ's saving acceptance is not merely the example for accepting one another but is its actual basis.

Conversion of Gentiles

The focus moves beyond disputes over scruples in matters of diet and days to the larger canvass of God's inclusive mercy toward the Gentiles, reminiscent of the theme of chapters 9–11. Paul declares that Jesus Christ became a servant to the Jews (lit. "the circumcision") for the purpose of fulfilling the truth of God (15:8). That is, Christ had established the truthfulness of God's covenant promises made to Abraham. Paul immediately adds that this was also done so that the Gentiles could glorify God because of His mercy (v. 9). God's merciful inclusion of the Gentiles lies at the heart of those Jewish promises. They, too, would join the Jewish voices in giving glory to God. The cascade of scriptural quotations that follows (vv. 9–12) has one word in common: "Gentiles," which indicates that the inclusion of Gentiles was not a divine afterthought. Their placement at the climax of the body of the letter shows Paul's determination to root the gospel and his mission to the Gentiles in the prophetic word of God.

The first biblical quotation, cited in v. 9, comes from Psalm 18:49, in which God is praised among the Gentiles. Commentators have suggested that the "I" used in the text is a reference to Christ, perhaps through the ministry of Paul to the Gentiles, taking up and fulfilling the desires of the psalmist. The second quotation is from the Song of Moses, calling Gentiles to rejoice with God's people, that is, the Israelites (Rom. 15:10; Deut. 32:43). The third quotation extends a universal call for all the Gentiles and all the peoples, including the Jews, to praise the Lord (Rom. 15:11; Ps. 117:1). The proclamation of the gospel to the whole world will fulfill this appeal. Finally, Paul cites Isaiah 11:10 as a messianic prophecy fulfilled in Jesus, who as the Root of Jesse, a descendant of David, was to reign over the Gentiles, who were to place their hope in Him (Rom. 15:12; cf. Phil. 2:9–11). Paul and his listeners knew that wherever Jews and Gentiles gathered together to acknowledge Him as their Lord, Christ's messianic reign had already begun. Paul closes with a warm prayer of blessing centered on the confident hope in what God has promised (Rom. 15:13).

Paul's Plans

The formal teachings and exhortations of the letter are finished. After expressing his sense of satisfaction in planting the gospel throughout the eastern Mediterranean, Paul speaks openly of his plans to take the gospel to Spain on the western edge of the Mediterranean after a short visit with the believers in Rome. He reminds them of important matters (vv. 14–16), informing them about his mission to the east (vv. 17–21) and his future visits to Rome (22–24) and Jerusalem (vv. 24–29), closing with an appeal for prayers (vv. 30–33).

15:14–16. Bold Reminders. While Paul acknowledged the spiritual maturity of the Roman believers who were fit to instruct one another, and while he was not the one who brought them the gospel and so would not be expected to be responsible for their spiritual life, he had nonetheless been impelled to write boldly to them about some points (v. 15). It is doubtful that Paul was speaking ironically when he credits them as being filled with all knowledge and able to instruct or admonish each other (v. 14). But having credited them so generously, Paul was carefully construing his bold words as simply reminding them (v. 15) of some points they already knew. He does not enumerate which matters in the letter were written to remind his readers of what they were at least at risk of forgetting. Doubtless among those reminders are the direct and personal warnings in 11:17–24 against individual Gentiles boasting of their apparent replacement of the broken-off Jewish branches and the lengthy appeal in 14:1—15:6 for unity between the strong members inclined to belittle and the weak ones inclined to judge. While Paul tactfully refrained from itemizing his hearers' needs, he points to himself and to the impetus that had compelled his frank words, namely, the grace given to him by God, that is, his apostolic commission especially to the Gentiles (15:15–16; cf. 1:5; 12:3), which included the bulk of Roman believers. Dramatically, he presents himself as a minister of Christ making a priestly offering to God. Instead of animals to be slaughtered for sacrifice, he was offering his Gentile converts won to the gospel and made holy by the Holy Spirit (15:16). Paul foresaw presenting his converts to Christ at the Parousia (2 Cor. 11:2; Col. 1:21–29).

15:17–21. Mission Accomplished in the East. The word kauchēsin in v. 17 can be translated as "glory" or "boasting." Paul found pride in his ministry to win obedience from the Gentiles because Christ had accomplished it through him, in word and deed, accompanied by the power of the Spirit of God marked with mighty signs and wonders for the Gentiles' obedience and faith (Rom. 15:18–19; cf. 1:5; 16:19, 26). Paul's method of operation had been to present the claims of Christ to those who had never heard the gospel, rather than building on someone else's foundation (15:20–21). The prophecy from Isaiah 52:15, cited in Romans 15:21, serves as a motto for Paul's commission to proclaim Christ to those who had never heard of Him.

Is there a contradiction between Paul's determination not to build on someone else's foundation and this lengthy letter to the Roman Christians, to be followed by a visit that would allow him to impart a spiritual gift to them (Rom. 1:11)? Not in Paul's mind. After all, he was seeking the vital support of these Roman believers for the pioneering evangelism he was planning farther west in Spain (15:24, 28). Any suspicion they might have had about his understanding of the gospel or any division among them over how the gospel should be lived out would have weakened their wholehearted support.

The powerful signs and wonders referred to in v. 19 meant that the evidence of miracles often accompanied the apostolic preaching of the gospel and thus confirmed its supernatural origin. Though Paul's letters provide no specific instances of miracles, he shared in the apostolic power of healing promised by Jesus (Acts 14:3; 15:12; 19:11–12; 2 Cor. 12:12; Gal. 3:5; cf. Matt. 10:7–8; Acts 1:8; 2:22; Heb. 2:4). Not all apparent miracles originate with God (2 Thess. 2:9; Rev. 16:14), nor must all preaching of the gospel be legitimized by physical miracles. Still, the effectiveness of prayer for healing and other miracles continues to open prejudiced minds to reconsider the gospel even today.

15:22–24. Rome at Last, but Not for Long. Paul explains his long delay in coming to Rome as due to his having been hindered from coming to them (Rom. 15:22) because of the demands of his mission to plant churches in the major cities of the northeastern Mediterranean regions. For many years, the commission to proclaim the gospel took precedence over his longing to visit them (v. 23). Establishing mature congregations able to withstand persecution and other threats to their survival was no simple task. In v. 23, Paul mentions that he had planted the gospel in the major cities of the region and thus now felt ready to fulfill his longing to visit the believers in Rome. For the first time, Paul reveals his true destination—Spain, to the west, at the edge of Roman rule. He hoped to be aided by the Roman Christians on his way there (v. 24). The wording (propempō) implies financial support (cf. 2 Cor. 1:16; Tit. 3:13). Paul may have needed assistance in other ways as well in dealing with the languages and customs of Spain and in recruiting coworkers. There is no evidence in the NT that Paul's plans to embark on a new Spanish mission ever materialized. For at least four years after his arrest in Jerusalem, he languished in prison, first in Caesarea and then in Rome, before his release (Acts 21:30–33; 24:27; 28:30–31). Taking the pastoral letters 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus as written by an older Paul after his release in Rome, the vision of Spain appears to have faded completely from his horizon. He returned to labor in the eastern Mediterranean until a second arrest and imprisonment, implied in 2 Timothy, from which he was not released before his death.

15:25–29. Service for the Saints in Jerusalem. Before making the long-anticipated trip to Rome, Paul planned to travel to Jerusalem, accompanied by representatives from Gentile congregations from Achaia (Asia Minor) and Macedonia, to offer financial aid to the poor believers in Jerusalem (see 2 Cor. 8–9). According to Galatians 2:10, the idea of the support of the poor in Jerusalem originated with Jewish Christian leaders in Jerusalem during Paul's earlier visit there. In the world of Paul, it was the duty of the family, the synagogue, or the guild, rather than the state, to care for the indigent. But faith in Jesus Christ could often result in being cut off from the support of one's immediate family or synagogue. Thus, very early in the history of Christianity, the believers found it incumbent to care for brothers and sisters in the faith who were in need (Acts 6:1; 9:39; 1 Tim. 5:3–16). But the importance of the collection went beyond relieving the poor believers in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26). Paul saw the gifts from the Gentile believers, who had been grafted like a wild olive tree shoot on to the fruit-bearing olive tree root (11:17), as the material expression of the faith now shared between Jew and Gentile. Their collection was offered as a karpon—variously translated in this context, but in its most literal sense a "fruit" (15:28). The Gentiles had shared the spiritual blessings of the Jews, so now they were obligated to share their material blessings with them (v. 27). Elsewhere, Paul speaks of the offering as an acknowledgment of the gospel of Christ that would result in thanksgiving to God and prayers because of God's grace being manifested in generosity (2 Cor. 9:12–15). Success in the mission to Jerusalem would signal for Paul that he would arrive in Rome in the full blessing of the gospel of Christ (Rom. 15:29). Not until v. 31 does Paul raise the possibility of failure.

15:30–33. Appeal to Strive Together in Prayer. Next, Paul lays bare the two risks he would be taking. He pleads with his Roman hearers to strive with him in prayer that he might be delivered from unbelievers in Judea (v. 31). His fear was well founded. According to Acts 20:3, Paul found it necessary to alter his plans to travel from Achaia to Jerusalem to avoid a plot on his life on the way there. A riot in the temple area erupted over a false report that he had defiled the temple by bringing in an uncircumcised Gentile (Acts 21:27–30). After Roman soldiers arrested him (Acts 21:31–36), two further plots to kill him were uncovered (Acts 23:12–30; 25:1–5).

Paul's second prayer request was that the gifts brought to Jerusalem would be approved of and accepted by the believers there (Rom. 15:31). He had in mind the generous and sacrificial gift of money from the Gentile churches he had raised up. Any resistance to accepting the gift would imply continued suspicion, if not rejection, of Paul's ministry and the full inclusion of the uncircumcised Gentile believers. Even if the money were accepted on behalf of the needy poor, his hope of strengthening the fellowship between Jew and Gentile still might not be fully realized. Paul's urgent request that the Romans strive together with him in prayer to God on his behalf need not imply a lack of faith or a reluctance on God's part. Jesus repeatedly called for His disciples to persevere in prayer (Luke 11:5–9; 18:1–8). Love, joy, and peace are woven into the prayer request (Rom. 15:30, 32–33). The impulse of self-sacrificing love is a fruit bestowed by the indwelling Spirit of God. Peace and joy are also fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). The "amen" at the end calls for a responsive "amen" from the listeners (Rom. 15:33).

Final Greetings

After commending Phoebe, the probable carrier of the letter, Paul requests that greetings be given to nearly thirty people in Rome, usually by name, along with those associated with them. The extended list of greetings is unique among all the letters of Paul. Some have questioned whether the list was originally part of the letter to the Romans, since Paul had never been to Rome and some surviving manuscripts of the letter do not include chapter 16. But scholars in general agree that the chapter was indeed part of the original letter. Presumably, the omission occurred as a scribal decision when the letter was copied for wider circulation to people who would not have been acquainted with those being greeted.

Interpreters have long wondered why Paul asked the believers to personally greet by name so many people he knew. Surely those named would share their positive memories of their association with him in various mission endeavors and thus lay the groundwork for supporting him in the mission to Spain after his trip to Jerusalem (15:23–24, 28). Paul also included personal greetings from eight members of the church he had founded in Corinth, where he wrote the letter. Both lists give us a glimpse of the rich and sustaining web of relationships among the believers in the early church.

16:1–2. Phoebe Our Sister. Scholars judge that Phoebe is the most likely person responsible for carrying and delivering the letter. Whether she was asked to read the letter and explain its contents is less likely, though plausible. The title diakonon (v. 1) indicates that she served as a deacon among the believers in Cenchrea (also Cenchreae). The Greek word prostatis ("benefactor," "helper"; v. 2) indicates that, as a person of some means, she provided financial support to Paul and many other believers who passed through that port city. Her spirit of generosity entitled her to assistance from the Roman believers for her needs to a degree worthy of God's holy people (v. 2). What her needs may have been and whether the purpose of her visit to Rome was to prepare for the mission to Spain remain matters of speculation.

16:3–16. Many Greetings. Paul was not directly greeting the people named but was asking the assembled saints to greet them in his absence. Most of the twenty-six names are not mentioned elsewhere in the NT. Of those that are used elsewhere, we cannot always be sure they refer to the same people. Two of those named, Aristobulus and Narcissus, may have been unbelievers owning Christian slaves (vv. 10–11). It is unlikely that all these people had immigrated to Rome and that all had met Paul in other places in the empire, though Paul's description indicates this to be the case with some.

A careful reading of the greetings gives us precious glimpses into these early believers. Obviously, Paul was not unique among believers in his use of Roman roads and the seas for travel and in his commitment to spread the gospel. Many of the names in the list were commonly given to slaves, suggesting that many of the Roman believers were either slaves or freed slaves. Paul's observation to the Corinthian believers that not many of them were influential or of noble birth (1 Cor. 1:26) could also be said of the Roman believers. The prominent role of women is evident from the fact that seven of the twelve names commended for their service were women.

In the greetings, priority and therefore special recognition is given to Priscilla and Aquila, with Paul expressing gratitude because they risked their own lives (lit. "their necks") for his life (Rom. 16:4). He does not reveal the specific nature of their intervention. A comparison of Paul's troubles in Acts with his list of ordeals in 2 Corinthians 11:24–26 reminds us that a number of dark chapters in Paul's life remain unknown to us. As fellow workers with Paul, Priscilla and Aquila shared his evangelistic mission and outlook. The gratitude from all the churches of the Gentiles (Rom. 16:4) grew out of their far-ranging ministry. Evicted from Rome with other Jews in A.D. 49, they first met Paul in Corinth. He stayed with them for eighteen months, working alongside them as tentmakers (Acts 18:1–3, 11). They accompanied Paul to Ephesus, where in his absence they gave the eloquent Apollos a thorough grounding in "the way of God" and hosted a church in their home (Acts 18:24–28; 1 Cor. 16:19). By the time of Paul's writing, they had returned to Rome, where they again provided leadership. The unusual placement of Priscilla's name ahead of her husband's implies a primacy of some sort, whether of social standing or of prominence in ministry.

Paul was sending greetings to the church in Priscilla and Aquila's house (Rom. 16:5); their home was characteristically a home church (see 1 Cor. 16:19). Based on the clustering of names in the greetings, there is evidence for five or more groups of believers. Where these others met for worship remains uncertain, though it is unlikely that all were able to gather in the home of Priscilla and Aquila.

Epaenetus (Rom. 16:5; lit. "praiseworthy") was the aparchē (lit. "firstfruits"), the first convert in the Roman province of Asia (sometimes translated as "Achaia"), now known as western Greece on the Peloponnese peninsula (see Acts 18:12–18). Presumably, Epaenetus had become a believer as a result of the efforts of Priscilla and Aquila and joined them on their return to Rome. (On the significance of the firstfruits offering to God, see Rom. 11:16; Deut. 18:4; Ezek. 44:30.)

Adronicus and Junia are commended as people of note, or outstanding among the apostles (Rom. 16:7). Whether Paul identified both of them as apostles is a matter of debate but is highly probable. The title "apostle" was not limited to the original twelve. Barnabas, Paul's fellow worker, was also described as an apostle (Acts 14:14; cf. 2 Cor. 11:13). Matthias replaced Judas (Acts 1:26), and Paul calls himself the least of the apostles (1 Cor. 15:9). Perhaps Paul uses the term "apostle" in recognition of their ministry and the fact that they had been followers of Christ before him.

The name Junia has been found in more than 250 inscriptions as a proper Latin name for a woman, while the male form is unattested. The weight of evidence points in favor of understanding these two Jews, who suffered imprisonment along with Paul, to be a husband-and-wife team, like Priscilla and Aquila, committed to evangelism. Paul sent greetings to Rufus and his unnamed mother, who in some sense cared for Paul (Rom. 16:13). This mothering, as Paul affectionately terms it, would have taken place before the mother and son arrived in Rome. Much has been made of the name shared by Rufus, son of Simon of Cyrene, who carried Jesus's cross (Mark 15:21), and this recipient of Paul's greeting. The unusual mention of the names of two sons, Alexander and Rufus, when their father's deed is pointed out by the writer of Mark, suggests that the original readers knew them. This, combined with the early tradition that the Gospel of Mark was written for a Roman audience, gives support to the view that Paul was greeting the son of the man who carried Jesus's cross.

Finally, after naming people he knew or knew about, Paul urged his Roman hearers to greet one another with a holy kiss (Rom. 16:16). This was a recommendation of Paul elsewhere in two of his troubled churches (1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; cf. 1 Pet. 5:14). The kiss was acceptable between family members of the same gender (Gen. 27:26; Ruth 1:9; Luke 15:20). The elders from Ephesus, recognizing they might never see Paul again, wept and kissed him farewell (Acts 20:37). The family language variously rendered as "brethren" or "brothers and sisters" appears throughout the letter (Rom. 1:13; 7:1; 15:14–15, 30; "sister," 16:1, 15). Paul shared with Christians in Rome and elsewhere the awareness that their common bond in Christ had created a new kinship that would endure for eternity. The holy kiss between the members of the Christian family (v. 16) would fulfill the earlier instruction to show familial love and devotion to each other (12:10).

16:17–20. Warnings against Predators. Paul here reminded his hearers that they needed to avoid some people who were causing division and hindrances (v. 17). At first glance, this section appears to be an interruption of, if not an intrusion into, the flow of thought with a change of tone. But we find similar warnings throughout the NT against unlimited hospitality and reciprocity (e.g., 2 John 10–11) and false prophets (Matt. 7:15–20). Paul provided several tests for discernment beyond smooth talking and flattering words (Rom. 16:18). Did the smooth talkers uphold the gospel that the believers—whose obedience had become widely known (v. 19)—had already embraced? Were the fruits of their ministry peace and the building up of the believers, or did their influence threaten the unity they were enjoying in Christ? Was their influence used to serve their own cravings to fulfill selfish or even sensual ends? These three standards remain useful to the present day. Whether Paul had any specific group in mind when speaking of skandala ("causes of stumbling," "offenses," "traps," "hindrances") in v. 17 is pure speculation.

Paul warns against deceivers of the akakōn, a word variously rendered as "simple," "innocent," "naive," or "unsuspecting." In v. 19, he admonishes all to be akeraious (a related word; "innocent" or "pure," lit. "unmixed") in regard to evil. Eve accepted Satan's offer of the knowledge of good and evil with disastrous results (Gen. 3:4–6). To be wise concerning what is good is to possess a deep yet practical understanding of what is good, and this would be the best preparation for detecting what is counterfeit.

Satan is the ultimate source of dissension and the disseminator of discord (Rom. 16:17). The image of crushing Satan underfoot arises from Genesis 3:15 (see also Ps. 91:13; Is. 66:24; Mal. 4:3). Depictions of conquerors stepping on their defeated foes were characteristic of royal propaganda. But Paul was careful to modify the imagery so as to avoid misuse. Using this passage as a pretext for hunting down and killing heretics is a serious mistake. The crushing is done by God, not by believers; and the crushed is Satan, not the congregational predators. After all, Paul earlier urged the believers to avoid any revenge or retaliation (Rom. 12:17–21). Instead, the believers were to avoid those skilled at dividing the saints and seducing the innocent. Paul's counsel becomes even more credible when one has encountered those whose toxic behavior has destroyed congregations. The destruction of Satan is to happen shortly. In the meantime, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ sustains us.

16:21–24. Greetings from Paul's Companions. Though the letter's salutation came from Paul alone, his companions added their greetings at the end, starting with Timothy, his closest coworker, whose name is found beside Paul's at the beginning of five of Paul's letters. The three kinsmen Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater (v. 21) were fellow Jews who may be identified respectively as Luke, Paul's traveling companion in Acts; Jason, Paul's host in Thessalonica (Acts 17:1–9); and Sopater from Berea, who with others accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Tertius wrote down Paul's dictation (Rom. 16:22). His name literally means "third," pointing to his standing as a slave. But Paul allowed him to add his own greetings "in the Lord," whose gift of salvation levels the distinction between slave and free (Gal. 3:28). Gaius, in whose home Paul dictated the letter (Rom. 16:23) and who had a reputation for providing hospitality for the whole church, would later accompany Paul on the journey to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4).

Including the greeting from Erastus, a well-placed citizen who openly embraced the Christian faith, imparts a sense of respectability to Paul's mission. An inscription has been recovered from the site of ancient Corinth honoring a certain Erastus, whose administrative post was comparable to the title used by Paul: oikonomos (variously translated "treasurer," "director of public works," "chamberlain") of the city (Rom. 16:23). Paul's fellow Christian was most likely the same wealthy freedman and Roman citizen.

16:25–27. Doxology. As the opening words of the letter signal the important matters to be addressed, the closing words remind us of the essential truths covered in the letter. The doxology is addressed to Him "who is able to establish you" (v. 25; cf. 1:11). The assurance of Paul's gospel message (16:25; cf. 1:15–16) offers salvation to sinners apart from human effort. Thus, the fear of the coming wrath has been replaced by a confidence in both God's ability and His disposition to preserve struggling believers. The gospel came as a revelation of the mystery (16:25; cf. Col. 1:26, 27) but in hindsight can be seen to have been foretold in prophetic writings of the Scriptures (Rom. 16:26; cf. 1:2). Paul's commission to bring all nations to an obedience related to faith (16:26) first emerged in Paul's opening salutation (1:5). All peoples, Jews and Gentiles, are summoned to entrust themselves to Jesus, through whom God is glorified forever (16:27). This doxology sums up the aim of Paul's ministry and the standard of conduct for every believer (cf. 11:36; Matt. 5:16; 1 Cor. 10:31).

Paul has taken his readers through the way of salvation offered to us by Christ, who found us in a state of hopelessness and offered us a hope that is solidly rooted in His sacrificial death. It is through Him that we are by faith justified before God and empowered to live the Christian life in total peace with God. The future that Christ has offered us in the present is accessible only through hope. It consists of the future manifestation of the glory of God, when humans and creation itself will be rescued from decaying bondage and ushered into the glorious freedom of the children of God (Rom. 8:21).

1 CORINTHIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Like all of Paul's Epistles, this letter to the believers in the city of Corinth did not originally have a title attached to it. As Paul's letters began to be copied and shared with other congregations, titles were added to help separate and distinguish one text from another in the larger collection of Paul's letters. "To the Corinthians A" is the title found in the oldest extant manuscript of the epistle. Based on the information in the opening salutation, later scribes identified Paul as the author, with some describing him further as an "apostle" and/or as "holy." Over the centuries, other scribes added further descriptions, even including in the subscript their thoughts on where they believed the letter had been written, often Ephesus, with others erroneously suggesting Philippi. While there is some variety among the titles, all the manuscripts identify this epistle as either "Corinthians A" or "First Corinthians," indicating that this was not the only epistle that Paul wrote to the Corinthians.

Few scholars dispute the fact that Paul wrote 1 Corinthians. He identifies himself as the author in the opening verses of the letter along with Sosthenes, a ministerial colleague. Sosthenes is likely mentioned because he was known to the Corinthians and may have helped Paul in some way with the letter as a scribe. Whatever the case, throughout the letter Paul clearly reveals his role as the primary writer. While confronting some of the problems the Corinthians faced, he refers to his specific actions among them (1 Cor. 1:13–15). He even refers to himself as the one addressing them in the letter (4:14).

Date. Paul appears to have written 1 Corinthians around A.D. 55 while residing in the city of Ephesus during his third missionary journey. After founding the church in Corinth during his second missionary journey, Paul left the city to return to Antioch in Syria (Acts 18:1–11, 18). A brief, but positive, stop in Ephesus along the way prompted him to return to Ephesus (Acts 18:19–21). It was during that time that news reached Paul regarding some challenges facing the church in Corinth. First Corinthians was written in response to those problems. At the end of the letter, Paul revealed his circumstances at the time of his writing by telling the Corinthians that his plans at the moment were to stay in Ephesus until Pentecost, because a significant door for effective work was open and there were many who opposed him (1 Cor. 16:8–9).

Backgrounds. The city of Corinth known to Paul was not the fabled city-state of Greek history, but the city that Julius Caesar refounded as a Roman colony in 44 B.C. The armies of Rome destroyed the earlier city in 146 B.C., and it was abandoned for more than a hundred years. Due to its strategic location on the narrow land bridge connecting mainland Greece with the Peloponnese peninsula, it did not take long for Roman Corinth to quickly reestablish itself as a major center of trade in the ancient Mediterranean. It not only controlled the trade routes running north and south, but with two harbors—the port of Cenchreae in the east and Lechaeum in the west—it also controlled the east-west trade route connecting the Aegean and Ionian Seas. Rather than risk transporting their cargo around the notoriously dangerous southern tip of the Peloponnesus, merchants preferred to pay the necessary costs to transfer their goods from one port to another in Corinth instead.

The opportunity of financial prosperity, and with it the possibility of upward social mobility, attracted all sorts and nationalities of people to Corinth. It quickly became a diverse melting pot of retired veterans, Romans, Greeks, artisans, freedmen, slaves, and even a large number of Jews. By the time Paul visited the city, the population had grown to around a hundred thousand people, making it one of the larger and more important cities in the Roman Empire.

The economic revival of the city brought other benefits that increased its significance even more. Rome rewarded the city by designating it the capital of the province of Achaea. This made Corinth important politically. It also meant that the Roman governor and his attendants would reside in the city. The Isthmian Games, the Panhellenic athletic festival second only to the Olympics in importance, also returned to Corinth. These games, which were held once every two years, attracted large crowds of foreigners and generated yet another source of revenue for the city.

As a relatively new city, Corinth was far more welcoming of the presence of foreigners and open to new ideas than most of the much older tradition-conscious cities across the Mediterranean. This made Corinth a promising location for the message of the risen Christ to find a receptive audience among the city's population, as is evident in Paul's evangelistic work in the city. At the same time, however, the openness to diversity in Corinth also had its challenges for the work of the gospel. It meant that some of the Gentiles who had come to faith in Christ in Corinth might have also been more open and accepting of other ideas and practices that were not in harmony with the gospel. It is evident in Paul's correspondence with the Corinthians that he experienced both of these circumstances during his ministry in Corinth.

According to the book of Acts, Paul first visited Corinth during his second missionary journey (Acts 18:1–18). Rather than traveling with Barnabas, this time Paul was accompanied by Silas as they revisited the churches which Paul had founded on his previous journey. Timothy joined the missionary team in Lystra, and Luke appears to have done the same in Troas. After responding to a vision urging him to come to Macedonia, Paul and his colleagues traveled to Philippi and Thessalonica, where they founded churches. Due to difficulties that arose in response to his evangelistic efforts, Paul ultimately was forced to leave both of these cities. After brief stays in Berea and Athens, he finally arrived in the city of Corinth.

On arriving in Corinth, Paul met Aquila and Priscilla, a Jewish couple who had themselves just recently arrived in the city from Rome because of a decree issued by Emperor Claudius in A.D. 49. The decree had banished all Jews from the capital. Aquila and Priscilla were tentmakers by trade and had set up a shop in the city. Since Paul was of the same trade, he ended up staying and working with them (Acts 18:1–3). During this time, Paul attended the synagogue and powerfully proclaimed that Jesus was the promised Messiah/Christ (Acts 18:4–5). While some accepted his message, other Jews rose up in strong opposition. In response, Paul turned to the Gentiles and many Corinthians believed and were baptized.

Hoping to end Paul's evangelistic efforts, local Jews attempted to bring legal charges against Paul before the governor, a man named Gallio. Ancient records indicate that Gallio, who was the younger brother of the famous Roman Stoic philosopher Seneca, held this position from July A.D. 51 to July A.D. 52. This indicates that Paul would have been in Corinth during that time. The charges leveled against Paul likely occurred in the early stages of Gallio's proconsulship. Much to the chagrin of the Jews, however, Gallio dismissed the case. It appeared to him to be merely a religious dispute among Jews with no bearing on Roman civil law (Acts 18:12–16). Paul ended up spending eighteen months in the city (Acts 18:11) before ultimately heading back to Antioch in Syria. Since he stayed on for many days after his acquittal, he may have left in the spring of A.D. 52 (Acts 18:18).

On his way to Syria, Paul briefly stopped in Ephesus. Since the initial response of the Jews to the gospel message was positive, Paul promised to return once he settled his business in Syria (Acts 18:19–21). True to this word, he returned to the city during this third missionary journey. The opportunity in Ephesus was apparently so promising that Paul remained there for nearly three years, until A.D. 55 (Acts 19:8, 10; 20:31).

Several problems had arisen among the believers in Corinth during Paul's absence. Although it is uncertain how Paul first learned of these problems, it is clear that he responded by writing them a letter. Paul refers to this earlier letter in 1 Corinthians 5:9, but unfortunately it no longer exists. Sometime after that, Paul received a report from a group of individuals identified as people associated with Chloe (1:11). Some commentators and translators take this as a reference to Chloe's household, while others refer to them more generically as "Chloe's people." The Greek simply has a genitive article followed by Chloe's name. They had apparently traveled to Ephesus on business in her behalf. They informed Paul that during his absence dissension had arisen among the believers and a spirit of factionalism was undermining the church (1:12–15; 11:18). At about that same time, three official delegates from the church also arrived in Ephesus sharing their own perspective on the situation in Corinth (16:17–18). They also brought a letter from the church asking for Paul's advice on several issues (cf. 7:1). It is in response to these circumstances that Paul wrote a second letter to the Corinthians, the letter now known as 1 Corinthians. For a fuller discussion of Paul's correspondence with the Corinthians, see 2 Corinthians: Introduction.

Theology and Purpose. In 1 Corinthians we learn about the experience of a community of Christian believers living in a Roman pagan city under the influence of its idolatry, immorality, and a deep interest in human wisdom. As we examine the letter, it becomes clear that Paul's primary interest was on instructing believers how to live the Christian life in such a setting. The emphasis throughout the letter is on the biblical understanding of the church of Christ. It is the body of Christ, a spiritual community united in love to the Lord and to each other, grounded in the work of God, Christ, and the Spirit.

1. The Church and the Trinity. The church is the result of the saving activity of God and is His most valuable possession on earth (2:7). It is the result of the wisdom of God brought to fruition through the work of the Father and the crucified Christ (1:18–25), and it is revealed to believers through the work of the Spirit (2:10). The divine plan included the redemption of humanity through Christ, our Passover who was sacrificed (5:7; cf. 6:20; 7:23) and "died for our sins" (15:3). The natural human inability to grasp and understand the wisdom or mystery of God in Christ is overcome through the Spirit of God (2:12).

Those who believe constitute the church of Christ or the body of Christ and they are washed, sanctified, and justified in "the name of the Lord Jesus" and "by the Spirit of our God" (6:11)—the three members of the Godhead are personally and directly involved in the salvation of sinners. The church is the result of the majestic work of God through Christ and the effective work of the Spirit in the human heart. It is the depository of the wisdom of God. The members of Christ's body have been joined together through the work of the Father, the Messiah, and the Spirit who gives gifts that contribute to the building up of the church. Any attempt to damage the church is considered a frontal attack on God (3:16–17).

2. Unity of the Church. The unity of the church sets it apart as a unique phenomenon from God in a society characterized by a host of contradictory expressions of human wisdom and false gods—an ideological market of confusion and darkness. The church is a body within which ethnic, social, and gender superiority is overcome through the work of the Father, Christ, and the Spirit. In order to preserve such oneness, vigilance and constant instruction are required. In 1 Corinthians, Paul addresses some of the main threats to the unity of the church, providing the guidance needed as we face similar challenges today.

At the heart of the unity of the church is the message of the cross of Christ. For Paul, this was so important that he unequivocally stated that Jesus Christ crucified was the all-pervasive focus of his message (2:2). This message went against the thought of a pagan society and was considered foolishness by the Greeks and a stumbling block by the Jews. And yet it puts to shame human wisdom (1:21–25). Human wisdom is unable to know the true God (1:21); it only fills humans with pride and arrogance and is consequently unable to free them from their existential predicament. If such a way of thinking comes into the church, as it did among some of the Corinthians, it will cause divisions and contentions that damage the unit of the church.

If the cross of Christ is at the center of the life of the church, division and contention are out of place. Yet, in Corinth some were claiming to have been so impressed by the wisdom of some of their preachers and instructors that they created loyalty clans (1:12). In this exaltation of individuals and their human skills, Paul saw the inroad of human wisdom within the church threatening the oneness of Christ and His church. Paul emphatically stated that the role of the preachers of the gospel is to be servants of Christ and His church (4:1–3). All are baptized in the name of Jesus and they all belong to Him (1:13). Jesus shamed human wisdom by revealing to the world that God used humility, the weakness of the cross, and not pride and arrogance as the means of redeeming humans from the plight of sin (1:16–21). What human wisdom could not accomplish, the humbleness of divine wisdom accomplished for all. This divine achievement is now visible in the oneness of the church and in the hope of the resurrection, which was also being questioned by some of the Corinthians (15:12).

The church is united in the worship of the one God. This monotheistic understanding of God makes it possible for believers to place their absolute loyalty in the only true God without having to be concerned about pleasing the multiplicity of pagan deities. The result is spiritual peace through Christ. The Corinthians believed in the one Christian God (8:4–6), and because of this some were willing to eat meat offered to idols—gods who did not exist—in pagan temples (8:10). In doing this they were exposing themselves to demonic powers that were active behind the mask of false gods (10:20). Fellowship with demons, directly or indirectly (through loyalty to the spirits of the ancestors or to exposure to the occult or spiritualism) is incompatible with the church's fellowship with the risen Lord (cf. 10:20–21). It could pull believers apart, even resulting in their abandoning the Lord.

But God is to be worshiped in a way that builds up the church. Paul used, as an example, the worship service that expresses in a unique way the union of the church with the resurrected Lord Jesus Christ, namely, the Lord's Supper (11:23–26). This is a memorial of the death of Christ on our behalf, a most sacred moment. It points back to the oneness made possible through the cross of Christ and also to the future coming of Christ that will perpetuate forever a union with Him and with all the redeemed ones. Yet, for some of the Corinthians, this was a moment of gluttony and disdain toward the less fortunate members of the church (11:17–22). Instead of being a time for expressing unity and love toward God and each other, the Lord's Supper was pulling believers apart because they were partaking of the food in the way it was done at some pagan meals. Worship must bring honor to God and express the unity of the church. The principles that Paul used and promoted are propriety and order (14:40).

Worship should also be done in a way that respects Christian values and does not damage the reputation of the church in its cultural setting. The role of women in the worship service is something that was important for Paul. He established that when praying and prophesying in church they should do it in a proper way. In such cases, it was important for women to cover their heads (11:2–16) in order to show respect to their husbands and thus protect the reputation of the church in the pagan environment. Paul also addressed controversies during worship, requesting different groups to be quiet (14:28, 32), including women who were apparently involved in controversial issues (14:34–35). The church should be a place where God is glorified and believers show their submission and gratitude to Him as Savior and Lord. The oneness in Christ and His message should unite them in true worship. At the heart of that worship is the cross of Christ (2:2).

The church is united by the power of the Spirit that sanctifies it. Immorality within the community of believers breaks its union with the Lord and brings it into oneness with the world. Wrong theology can lead to immoral behavior (cf. 5:1–2). Some of the Corinthians appear to have accepted the pagan idea that the body, being composed of matter, is by nature evil and irredeemable. Therefore, whatever was done with it could not damage the spiritual dimension of the person. The exalted spiritual condition of the person transcended the body and could not be damaged by its actions. Not so according to the Scriptures. The body, created by God, is good and will experience redemption through Christ (cf. Rom. 8:23). Though it dies, it will be resurrected and transformed at the Second Coming of Christ and will be free from its corruptibility and mortality (15:52–53). It is the whole person in spirit, mind, and body that is united to Christ through baptism. Consequently, Paul said that believers were to glorify God in their bodies (6:20). The holiness of the church is grounded in the work and power of the Spirit who dwells in each believer (6:19) and in the church as the temple of God (3:16–17). He constitutes it in the body of Christ.

Holiness of life is compatible with a Christian marriage. Paul's instructions about marriage are to some extent connected with his concern for holiness in the church (chap. 7). Human sexuality is to be satisfied within the boundaries of the holiness of a Christian marriage and not with prostitutes (7:20). The body of the wife is under the authority of the husband and that of the husband under the authority of the wife (7:4). The couple submits to each other in love and respect; they have equal rights. This particular insight went against pagan practices. The immorality of the pagan world, tolerated by some believers at Corinth, was incompatible with the holiness of a church joined by faith and love with Christ (6:15–17). This is so important that Paul required the church to act immediately against those members living immoral lives (5:3–5).

The unity of the church is also based on submission to Christ. Before conversion, believers were enslaved to sin, living in the way pagans lived (6:9–10). But now they had become the property of God, had been delivered from the power of sin, and were living in submission to Christ. The use of the new freedom in Christ was a matter of serious concern for Paul. Some of the Corinthians were misusing their freedom to achieve their own personal interests. There was little concern for how their conduct was impacting those who disagreed with them on, for instance, the matter of eating meat sacrificed to idols (8:9). Paul called them to control themselves for the good of others. Christians are to be oriented toward the well-being of others, even if this requires abstaining from something that they feel is their right to do (8:11–13; cf. 6:7). Paul illustrated his argument with his personal practice of abstaining from his right to receive financial benefits for his work as an apostle. He did not want people to accuse him of abusing his authority in the gospel (9:15–18). What people do can help or damage others. Consequently, we should be vigilant in all we do. Otherwise, we may be controlled by our selfish hearts. In order to assist the Corinthians in overcoming selfishness, Paul invited them to participate in the collection for the poor in the church in Jerusalem (16:1–4).

The foundation of this type of behavior—undivided concern for the goodness of others—is the love of God. Paul had much to say about love (chap. 13). According to him, anything we do detached from God's love is simply useless noise—a wasted and truly unproductive action (13:1, 3). Human wisdom or knowledge inflates pride (lit. "puffs up"), but love edifies (lit. "builds up"; 8:1); it creates the context within which all can work together as one to edify the church. In fact, the proper use of Christian freedom finds its true expression in love (13:5); toward the end of his letter, Paul returns to the role of love in the Christian life (16:14).

The gifts of the Spirit contribute to the unity of the church (12:4). The Spirit distributes the gifts in order to build up the church; that is to say, gifts are given to each church member for the benefit of the community of believers (12:7–11). These are not private gifts given for the exclusive benefit of the person. The diversity of the gifts shows the complexity of the church and its multiple needs (cf. 12:4–11); nevertheless, the many members who receive the gifts constitute one body (12:20). They all need each other and are to be at the service of others. Believers, gifted by the Spirit, constitute the "body of Christ" (12:27). The metaphor expresses the deep unity that exists between believers and Christ and serves to identify the church as the place in which Christ is particularly active through the presence and influence of the Spirit of God.

The misuse of gifts can result in division and conflict within the church. Some of the Corinthians believed that the most important gifts were the gifts of tongues and prophecy, but they assigned to tongues a higher spiritual significance. They thought that to have this gift meant to enjoy a higher spiritual experience than the rest of the believers, and thus they were becoming filled with pride. They also assigned the gift a predominant role during worship, and this was transforming the worship act into an unintelligible, noisy, and disorderly activity (14:6–12). They had privatized the gift and used it for their own glorification. It was no longer building up the church. For Paul, the purpose of any gift was to edify the church and consequently he rejected the misuse of the gift by the Corinthians and gave priority to the gift of intelligible and church-edifying prophecy (14:4–5). The basic theological concept is that of proper order during the worship service and the orderly use of the gifts to edify the church. Any gift of the Spirit that is used to exalt the person is a misuse of it and damages the unity of the church. Through the gifts, the Spirit uses us for the glory of God and the benefit of the church.

3. Hope and Christ. The Christian hope plays a central role in 1 Corinthians and, as in the rest of the NT, it is directly related to the work of Jesus. It is an indissoluble part of the gospel that Paul was preaching to the Corinthians. He specified that what he was delivering to them was what he had received, namely, that Christ had died for their sins, was buried, and was raised up on the third day (15:3–4). To this we should add the promise of Christ's Second Coming, kept fresh in the minds of believers by their participation in the Lord's Supper (11:26) and for which they are eagerly waiting (1:7). This hope defines the nature of the church as the body of believers living in expectation of the coming of Christ. Paul emphasizes in 1 Corinthians the resurrection of Christ and of those who died while waiting for Him. In fact, the hope of the resurrection from the dead is dependent on the resurrection of Jesus. Paul states that as God raised up the Lord from the dead, so He will also raise us up through His power (6:14).

For some reason, a group of believers at Corinth concluded that there would not be a resurrection of the dead (15:12; see commentary on 1 Cor. 15:1–58). They believed that the resurrection of Christ was enough for them. For Paul the death of Jesus and His resurrection were necessary, even indispensable, in order for Christians to be resurrected. Therefore, to believe that there is no resurrection of the dead means in fact that Christ would not have had to die and be resurrected. We cannot have one without the other. It is there that our hope is located; for if Christ did not come back to life, then the Christian faith is futile and we are still under the power of sin and without hope in this world (15:13–19). Christ was the "firstfruits" of the resurrection, and at the Second Coming those who belong to Him will experience the resurrection (15:23). The wicked will be resurrected at the end, after the Millennium, for the final judgment. Paul expressed his belief that Christians will judge the world and fallen angels and used this eschatological expectation to oppose Christians taking other believers to secular courts (6:1–6).

For Paul, the resurrection is the moment when death itself will be permanently defeated and God's people will be finally delivered from its power (15:54–55). The resurrected ones as well as the faithful ones alive at the Second Coming will both be transformed. Their new real bodies will be free from mortality and from the corruption of a sinful human nature (15:52–53). Meanwhile, the church exists on earth as the community of the forgiven ones, moving forward while proclaiming the gospel of salvation and looking at the horizon in anticipation of the realization of their hope in Christ.

COMMENTARY

Introduction

Paul showed a mastery of both Greek and Jewish customs by utilizing and amending the standard Greek epistle format to include not only a theologically packed greeting (1:1–3) but also a profound statement of thanksgiving for the difficult Corinthian congregation (vv. 4–9). The introduction alludes to the problems that Paul intended to address, and the level of restraint and goodwill with which he expressed himself is a testament to his commitment to the gospel message of peace.

1:1–3. Greeting. Paul opens with the assertion that he was an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God (1:1). In stating his apostolic credentials, Paul was making it clear to the Corinthians that he was writing to them as one who bore the authority of God (cf. 14:37–38). He was called to spread the gospel and establish churches. Sosthenes is also mentioned as the co-sender of the letter. As already noted, Sosthenes's role in the letter was limited at most to some sort of scribal activity, perhaps as Paul's amanuensis (cf. Rom. 16:22). He was most likely mentioned because he was known to the Corinthians; otherwise Paul would not have identified him only as "our brother" (1 Cor. 1:1). Sosthenes may be the same person mentioned in Acts 18:17. If so, he would have become a Christian sometime after that event.

In referring to the Corinthian church as "the church of God" (1 Cor. 1:2), Paul may have been intimating that the church did not belong to any local leader—neither to its wealthy patrons nor to those members who had a variety of gifts and considered themselves spiritually superior. Instead, he suggested that the church belonged to the larger network of believers in all places. This reflects Paul's concerted effort to remind the Corinthians of their affiliation not only with him but with the universal body of Christ. Paul further emphasized his point with reference to believers everywhere who call on the name of Jesus—He is Lord of all believers (v. 2). Paul's call to holiness applies to everyone who calls on the name of the Lord (Joel 2:32; cf. Ps. 99:6; Acts 2:21; Rom. 10:13)—a call that will be repeated in 1 Corinthians 6:9–11. He concludes his greeting with the blessing of grace and peace from "God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (1:3). The blessing points to the saving grace of God that through faith in Christ reconciles believers with God. These gifts flow from God and are not the result of human achievements.

1:4–9. Thanksgiving for God's Grace. Although Paul was anxious to address the problems undermining the gospel in Corinth, he first paused to give thanks to God for the grace He had given to the Corinthians through Christ. It is remarkable that Paul includes in his thanksgiving the gifts of speech or utterance (Gr. logos) and knowledge with which they had been enriched. As will become clear later in the letter, it is the abuse of these two gifts that was part of the problem in Corinth (cf. 1:17–18; 2:1–4; 13:1—14:25). In thanking God for these gifts, Paul makes it clear that the problem was not the gifts themselves but the attitude of the Corinthians toward them. He addresses the proper attitude and use of these gifts later in the letter.

Although the Corinthians were enriched with these gifts, Paul subtly reminded them that they had not yet arrived since they still were eagerly waiting for the Lord Jesus Christ to be revealed (1:7). The "revelation" (apokalypsis) of which Paul speaks is the hope of the Second Coming. Waiting for the coming of the Lord in a world still suffering under the power of sin is not easy. The Corinthians did not need to despair, however. They could rest in the fact that Christ would confirm or establish them in the end (1:30; 6:11; cf. Rom. 3:21–26; 5:17–21) so that they would be blameless in the day of the Lord (1 Cor. 1:8). The certainty of this hope was not rooted in the spiritual condition of the Corinthians; they were anything but blameless in their own experience. It was based solely on the fact that God is faithful to His covenant promises. And He had called them into the fellowship of His Son (v. 9).

1:10—4:21

Division and Dissension in the Church

News that the Corinthians had aligned themselves with certain spiritual leaders, who they were exalting over and against others, made it clear to Paul that the believers in Corinth had forgotten the centrality of Jesus. He was warning them that their behavior was undermining the very gospel they claimed to follow and the unity of the church. Paul begins with a call to unity (1:10–17) centered on the cross of Christ and not on human wisdom (vv. 18–31). He argues that unity is centered in the message of Jesus (2:1–9) and on His revelation through the Spirit of wisdom (vv. 10–16). Division in the church demonstrates a spiritual immaturity (3:1–9) that makes it almost impossible for believers to work together to build up the temple of God (vv. 10–17). Part of the problem with dissensions is a wrong self-perception that leads to pride. Instead, the Corinthians were to see themselves as servants of God and of His church (3:18—4:5). In fact, they were to be willing to see themselves as fools for Christ (4:6–13). Paul closes his discussion on the unity of the church with a call to imitate him as a servant of God and His church (4:14–21).

1:10–17. Paul's Exhortation for Unity. Paul begins his discussion on the unity of the church by avoiding authoritarian language. He appeals to his readers and exhorts them to agree with each other in their speaking (lit. "speak the same"; v. 10a). Since the church is connected as the body of Christ, there should be no divisions (Gr. schisma) among them (1:10b; cf. v. 12). The word schisma, often used to describe a rift or tear to be mended, indicates that these problems could cause separation within a once-healthy congregation. The picture is that of a body being torn limb from limb and destroyed (cf. chap. 12).

The reason for Paul's concern was the report he had received from people associated with Chloe that there were rivalries among them (1:11). Although Chloe was a woman well known to the Corinthians, we know little about her since she is mentioned only here. While the exact nature of the situation is unknown to us, it appears that instead of being united together, the believers in Corinth were divided into various opposing groups, each attached to the wisdom of their favorite teacher. Some claimed to be followers of Paul, others of Apollos or of Cephas (the Aramaic form of the name Peter), and others of Christ (v. 12). This does not necessarily mean that Paul, Peter, and Apollos were in doctrinal conflict—otherwise, Paul would have rebuked them for it—but rather that their would-be "followers" were. These factions appear to not only have had disagreements but also to have fallen into childish or immature rivalries trying to increase their own prestige and power at the expense of others in the congregation (cf. 4:6). Paul was rebuking this partisan mentality as complete foolishness, including those who championed his name. It was reflecting the wisdom of the world, and it had no place among God's people.

To illustrate the foolishness of their partisan spirit, Paul asked the Corinthians three rhetorical questions (1:13). The first question is the most difficult to understand: Is Christ divided? It could mean, "Has Christ been divided up into bits and pieces?" If so, then Christ would no longer be the One holding the church together. Or, since one of the groups appears to have designated themselves as the "Christ party," it may have the meaning "to apportion out": "Has Christ been apportioned out so He belongs to only one group?" Whatever sense Paul had in mind, his obvious answer was an emphatic no. Christ is not divided and neither should the church be divided.

Paul next asks his readers if he was crucified for them, or if they were baptized in his name (v. 13). Of course not! Paul was arguing that he was not the leader of any particular group, because the Corinthians were united to Christ through baptism and not to him. The Corinthians were overlooking the very foundation of the message of the gospel itself—the centrality of the cross of Christ. No other person could accomplish what Christ did in our behalf at Calvary.

Even those who were baptized by Paul were not to boast. In fact, he expresses thankfulness that he did not baptize many in Corinth (v. 14). Paul was not disparaging the rite of baptism itself (cf. Rom. 6:3–4; Gal. 3:27), but he was using the fact that he baptized so few in Corinth to show that he was not seeking to bind people to himself, but to Christ. He did baptize a few individuals in Corinth, specifically Crispus and Gaius (v. 14). Crispus was likely the ruler of the synagogue in Corinth who quickly became a follower of Christ (Acts 18:8). Since Paul identified Gaius as his host in Corinth (Rom. 16:23), it is possible that he was to be identified with another early convert, Titius Justus, a worshiper of God also mentioned as Paul's host in Corinth (Acts 18:7). His full Roman name would have been Gaius Titius Justus. Then Paul remembered that he had also baptized the household of Stephanas (1 Cor. 1:16; see 16:15, 17). None of them were baptized in Paul's name but in Christ's.

The apostle's primary function was to preach the gospel in such a way that its saving power would be revealed to the audience. Merely human wisdom makes the gospel ineffective. When the Corinthians had emphasized the wisdom of a particular preacher and had aligned themselves with one of them, they had lost sight of the gospel itself. Mere human eloquence may attract a crowd and cause people to admire the abilities of the speaker, but exalting this feature makes the cross of Christ void of its power (1:17). Genuine gospel preaching does not exalt the preacher; it exalts Christ.

1:18–31. The Cross and Human Wisdom. Paul strengthened the contrast between the message of the cross and the wisdom of the world. In Roman culture, the notion of crucifixion was deplorable, and coupled with the strict separation of divine and human realms in Greco-Roman thinking, the idea of the God-man Jesus dying on the cross was beyond comprehension; just foolishness. Paul exhorted believers to concentrate on Christ as the wisdom of God and not on human wisdom. Quoting Isaiah 29:14, he points out that God had promised to destroy the wisdom of the wise and had done so through the gospel. Paul asks a series of rhetorical questions (1 Cor. 1:20a) to show that God had confounded the most cherished ideas in the world through an act of weakness, the cross of Christ. God had demonstrated that the wisdom of the world is foolishness. After all, it was through the foolishness of the proclamation (v. 21) that the Corinthians were drawn to become followers of Christ.

Human wisdom cannot lead to a true saving knowledge of God, which is only available through the foolishness of the gospel (v. 21). While the world requires signs and wisdom, Paul boldly preached Christ crucified, who is a stumbling block to the Jews and foolishness to the Gentiles (some manuscripts and translations have "Greeks"; v. 23b). It was this point of contention for Jews and Gentiles that bridged the gap between them and made them one body. What unites people is not human wisdom but Christ crucified. To reinforce his argument, Paul reminded the Corinthians of their calling to the gospel (v. 26), emphasizing that they were not called on the basis of their wisdom or abilities but by God's loving and providential will. The gospel message defies all human expectations and logic as God uses the things which are not to negate the things that are (v. 28). Consequently, no one should glory or boast before the Lord, because everything we have comes through Jesus who is our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification/holiness, and redemption (v. 30). What matters is the wisdom of God through which we are justified, sanctified, and redeemed. Consequently, the one who boasts (or "glories") should do so in the Lord (v. 31; Jer. 9:24). Pride divides, but Christ unifies.

2:1–9. One Message: Christ. Paul condemned division in the church by reminding believers that when he came to them he did not speak to them about himself but about the crucified Lord. In fact, the persuasiveness of his message was a demonstration not of his oratorical skills but of the power of the Spirit. While Paul may not have been a master of rhetoric, his message had far more substance than any skilled speaker for he had declared to the Corinthians the mystērion of God (2:1b) The word mystērion refers to a revealed mystery that had previously been unrevealed. Here it has sometimes been translated more generically as "testimony." In either case, the content of this proclamation involved as its major focus the crucified Christ (v. 2b). Although Paul had appeared to the Corinthians in weakness, fear, and trembling (v. 3), his confidence was not in himself but in God and in the gospel message. The life and ministry of Paul testified that we should not trust in human wisdom but in the power of God (v. 5).

Paul did not eliminate the need for human reason, but merely subjected it to God. This is evident in his affirmation that he was speaking with wisdom among the mature (v. 6). The wisdom of God is not found in the different human sources of wisdom. It is a mystery (v. 7a); that is to say, it is the hidden wisdom of God or His eternal plan of salvation through His Son that is revealed to those who believe. This God has done for our glory (v. 7b). The darkness of sin is such that none of the rulers in Christ's time (v. 8a) understood God's wisdom; otherwise, "they would not have crucified the Lord of glory" (v. 8b). The title "Lord of glory" emphasizes His transcendence and preeminence over all things. To support his point, Paul offers a loose paraphrase of Isaiah 64:4, perhaps combining it with Isaiah 65:17 (1 Cor. 2:9). It is important to note that Paul does not say that God prepared all these things for those who know Him but rather those who love Him. Love is the key to unlock God's divinely prepared revelation. Paul was telling the Corinthians that what truly matters is love and not human wisdom.

2:10–16. One Revelation through the Spirit. The Spirit is mentioned six times in vv. 10–14. The wisdom of the cross, which was once hidden from humanity, is revealed by the Spirit of God, for only the Spirit understands the deep things of God (v. 10). Paul explains this through the use of an analogy. In the same way that a person's spirit is the only viable source of what is in his or her own mind (v. 11), so also only the Spirit of God knows God's plans and purposes (v. 12; notice that although the spirit of a person is in him or her, the Spirit of God is not in God because He is a different Person). The Spirit of the Lord is not the divisive spirit of the world. On the contrary, the Spirit unites around God's gift to humanity (v. 12). That revealed truth should be passed to others untouched by mere human wisdom but as it was received by us from the Spirit (v. 13). The Greek phrase used at the end of v. 13—pneumatikois pneumatika synkrinontes—has been rendered variously. Some translations have "comparing spiritual things with spiritual," while others specify the meaning on the basis of the context to "explaining spiritual realities with Spirit-taught words," or alternatively, "interpreting [or explaining] spiritual truths to spiritual people." The important points to notice are that the first term (pneumatikois) refers to what had just been mentioned—what is taught by the Spirit—and the second term (pneumatika) refers to either the content of this teaching—contextually, the "words" mentioned at the beginning of the verse—or to the spiritual nature of the person being taught, the emphasis of the following verse. Both interpretations thus have contextual warrant. Due to the pursuit of worldly knowledge, humans are unable to discern truth from error, but those in Christ are able to discern the failure of human understanding with the true spiritual wisdom of God (vv. 14–15).

Paul concludes his argument by quoting Isaiah 40:13 in v. 16. No one knows the mind of the Lord so completely as to instruct Him. Paul had noted that the Spirit of God knows the mind of God, so those who have the Spirit can know what the Spirit reveals. For this reason, Paul states that we have the mind of Christ. In this verse, we have another example of the way in which the early church took texts that spoke of God and applied them to Christ. Since v. 16 is the only place in the NT where we find the phrase "the mind of Christ," the question is what exactly Paul meant by this statement. Usually this expression is related to what Paul said in Philippians 1:27 and 2:5 about humility and unity in the church. But Paul may also have been including the idea that, by possessing the mind of Christ, Christians are now equipped in some sense or in some ways to see the world as God sees it. And it is only through the cross of Christ that the depths of God's love for humanity can truly be understood. Thus, the unity of the church is established and preserved.

3:1–9. Division and Immaturity. Growing disputes within the Corinthian church undermined the effectiveness of members' ability to comprehend the cross of Christ. Their boasting and desire for power had created a mundane and worldly or carnal (Gr. sarkinos, "of the flesh") status among the members. The controversies within the church over human authority and the divisions among believers were indications that the believers were, spiritually speaking, still infants. They were not acting like mature adult Christians (v. 1). They had to grow to participate fully in the mystery of God. Their current condition meant that they needed to be fed milk, that is to say, baby food (v. 2). This condition of spiritual immaturity was revealed through jealousy and strife (some manuscripts add "divisions" in v. 3) and by members claiming allegiance to Paul or Apollos (vv. 3–4). When a teacher of philosophy and rhetoric, known as a sophist, arrived in a Greek city, he would announce his arrival and people would gather to hear him. If people liked the new teacher, elite families would send their sons to be his disciples. Sophists were well paid if they proved themselves to be able teachers. Apparently, the believers in Corinth understood the itinerant Christian preachers as some kind of sophists. Some preferred Apollos because his oratory and bodily presence were better than Paul's. Some rallied behind Paul because he was the first Christian teacher with whom they had come into contact.

Paul chastised the Corinthians, because in acting in this way they were acting (lit. "walking") like ordinary human beings (v. 3) rather than as followers of Christ.

Paul placed himself and Apollos in their proper roles: both servants of Christ (v. 5) involved in the same work and not in competition with each other. Paul planted, Apollos watered, but God provided the growth (v. 6). This agrarian analogy makes God the legitimate owner of the field and, therefore, the ultimate benefactor of any fruit. Paul and Apollos were mere servants (Gr. diakonos) planting and sustaining healthy crops in God's field. Ultimately the success of the harvest was dependent on God and not on Paul or Apollos (v. 7). The servants had to work unitedly—one planting and the other watering—and were to be rewarded accordingly. Paul then applies the illustration to the situation in Corinth (v. 9). Paul and Apollos were coworkers while the church stood as God's field or building. Paul introduces the analogy of the building as a transition to his next and preferred example of the church: the sacred or holy building. There is one field and one building.

3:10–17. The Dwelling Place of God. Paul next equates the church with a building (cf. 2 Cor. 5:1; Eph. 2:21). He asserts that as the founder of the church in Corinth, he was the one who laid the foundation (3:10) on which others had built. The foundation of the church is Jesus Christ (v. 11), and the main message of the church is the gospel of Him crucified (cf. 1:23; 2:2; 15:1–9). For this reason, Paul desired that believers take heed of how they built on that foundation. They were to evaluate their ministry to make sure that their real intentions were not merely the pursuit of power and position (3:12–13). For just as the quality of a building in the ancient world was ultimately seen in its ability to survive a fire, so also the work done in the church in the name of Christ was to be revealed by fire (v. 13), that is, the fire of divine judgment (2 Thess. 1:7; Rev. 18:8). On that day, each worker in the cause of Christ will be held accountable for his or her work. What matters is the quality of the work (cf. Matt. 7:21–22). Paul describes three types of builders. The first is the individual whose work survives because it is built with gold, silver, and costly stones—this is someone who has faithfully proclaimed the gospel. God will reward the faithful laborers for the work done (1 Cor. 3:14). The second builder is the person who builds with the inferior supplies of wood, hay, and straw (v. 12b). Although such individuals may have good intentions, their work does not focus on the matters of most importance—and therefore it will not last. This is the case of an incompetent worker, not an evildoer. God, out of His mercy, will still save this individual to His kingdom (v. 15). It is also possible to find in v. 12 a reference to a single builder, representative of some teachers in the church. Such teachers had both valuable building materials of gold, silver, and costly stones as well as areas of ignorance or mistakes represented by wood, hay, and straw. Thus, the final judgment will reveal which teachings and work were essentially good and correct and which were less valuable, incomplete, or unintentionally misleading or negligent.

What we are calling the third builder, described in v. 17, however, is an entirely different situation. It is the case of a builder who is destructive and profanes the temple of God. Paul explains the illustration: the church is God's temple and the Spirit of God dwells in it (3:16). The use of the second-person plural in Greek ("you all") indicates that Paul is referring to the entire body of Christ, the church. The church is the place where the Spirit of God dwells in a special way. Therefore, God will destroy those who destroy His temple (v. 17). Paul here is describing the fate of any church members who through dissension undermine the unity of the church. Instead of building up the church, they divide it in an attempt to create their own followers. Those who cause destruction will themselves be destroyed.

3:18—4:5. Unity and Self-Perception. The primary danger the Corinthians needed to face was that of self-deception. They believed that what they were doing was good and that they were wise. Yet in order to be wise, they needed to see themselves as foolish. On account of sin, our natural self-perception is skewed. It has to be set right by God's Spirit. Paul cites two passages from the OT to support his point: Job 5:13, which indicates that humans often get trapped in their own schemes, and Psalm 94:11, which states that God knows that the thoughts of humans are futile. To illustrate just how distorted the views of the Corinthians were regarding the various factions within the church, Paul notes that the believers in Corinth did not belong to any of the apostles. On the contrary, the apostles belonged to them. The apostles were God's gifts to minister to the needs of the church. The believers belonged only to Christ, and Christ to God (1 Cor. 3:21–23).

If the apostles were gifts from God to the church, how were the Corinthians to understand Christian leadership? Paul urged them to consider Apollos, Cephas, and himself not as mighty rulers who imposed their will on others but rather as servants of Christ and trustees of God's mysteries, which were being revealed (4:1). Both of the terms Paul uses to describe true Christian ministry involve servanthood (cf. Matt. 23:8–12; Mark 9:35; 10:42–45)—a concept foreign to the Corinthians' idea of leadership. The Greek word translated as "servants" is hypēretēs, and it refers to an assistant whose task was to follow the instructions of another. The Greek word oikonomos—"steward" or "trustee"—was used of individuals who managed the affairs of another (e.g., the manager of a household). Like an assistant, a steward also had to give an account to his master. The main quality desired of such individuals was not wisdom or eloquence but faithfulness. The same is true of Christian ministers.

Since Paul was called to be a faithful servant to the Lord Jesus, he was not worried about what the Corinthians thought of him or his ministry (1 Cor. 4:3). As an apostle, he was accountable not to them but to God alone. Moreover, the Corinthians had no right to sit in judgment of him or his ministry. The only person who could pass judgment on him was God, the One who knows everything and is able to judge all (v. 4). No one should pass judgment on others (v. 5). His admonition not to judge others is another way of avoiding the mentality that had led to the factions within the church who were interested in power and control.

4:6–13. Fools for Christ's Sake. Paul explains that the point of his discussion of the relationship between Apollos and himself had not been to criticize Apollos. The point was to make it clear that the Corinthians were not to exaggerate the importance of any teacher within their midst. They needed to realize that ministers were not working against each other but with each other, in order to lift up Christ. So, it made no sense to form cliques around church leaders. They were to learn an important principle of not going beyond what is written (v. 6), that is, what God had revealed. Paul was admonishing the congregation to remain close to the Scriptures so that they would not become conceited in their advocacy of one person against another (v. 6).

Paul equated the current power struggle within the church with arrogance and offered a set of rhetorical questions to emphasize the absurdity of the divisions (v. 7). As all members received their gifts from above, there was no room for boasting. No one was superior to another, given the wealth of divinely distributed gifts to the whole church. To undermine the misplaced boasting of the Corinthians, Paul found in their arrogance evidence of their pride in absolute spiritual achievements (v. 8). He contrasted that attitude with the experience of the apostles who, rather than reigning as kings, had been made a spectacle to the kosmos, which can mean "world" but here is more broadly defined because Paul mentions angels. Thus, the rendering "universe" is also appropriate in this context (v. 9). The apostles were like captured slaves paraded through the streets of Rome after a military victory and destined to die in the arena. Paul then notes the contrast with three ironic antitheses, which juxtapose the pride and notoriety of the Corinthian factions with the humility and disparaging of the apostles (v. 10).

Paul continues the contrast by describing the sacrifices the apostles had willingly endured to share God's revelations with the world (vv. 11–12a; cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–29; see "A Profile of Paul's Ministry" p. 1670). The gospel, when properly shared, will inevitably bring difficulties, but these challenges must be met in a manner consistent with Christ's methods. In the midst of the trials, Paul blessed, endured, and entreated (1 Cor. 4:12b–13a). He ends this section of reversals by demonstrating and comparing the growing disparity between the works of those promoting factions in Corinth and the ministers of Christ. Instead of seeking positions of authority or prestige, those who disseminate the mysteries of God willingly become the lowest of the low (v. 13b). They are indeed servants of God and of His church.

4:14–21. Imitate Paul in Christ. Paul had presented a series of strong reproaches, but his admonition was far from over. It was necessary that the church continue to grow in the power of Christ (cf. 1:4–9), and to achieve this goal Paul would warn the members as his cherished children (4:14). The church required not only severe language but also reminders of Paul's love for it. He reminded the believers of the difference between an instructor and a father; his concern for their welfare went beyond that of just a faithful worker; it was fatherly in nature (v. 15). As their spiritual father, Paul encouraged the Corinthians to become imitators of him (v. 16), referring to what he had just told them about his ministry and his self-perception as a servant of God and the church.

Since Paul was unable to go to the Corinthians at that time, He was sending Timothy to remind them of his way of life in Christ Jesus, that is, his lifestyle as a believer and as an apostle. While some in Corinth were continuing in their pride as though Paul would never return, he promised that, God willing, he would visit them (vv. 18–19). And then it would be clear that what really matters is not just eloquent words but power—the power that characterizes the kingdom of God, that is, God's rule over the lives of the believers (v. 20). Those who were using wisdom and words to secure their authority had no real power compared to the power of God. If they would repent of their behavior, Paul would come in a spirit of love and gentleness; but if they remained unrepentant, he would have no other recourse than to deal with the problem. The choice belonged to them (v. 21): church members either work to build up the church or receive the results of dividing it.

Immorality in the Church

Having addressed the problem with the various factions within the church, Paul next turns his attention to three issues among the believers in Corinth that were undermining their calling as Christians and tarnishing their reputation with outsiders: an incestuous relationship (5:1–13), lawsuits among believers (6:1–11), and consorting with prostitutes (6:12–20). The fact that Paul did not address the individuals involved directly but reprimanded the church as a whole suggests that he was building on his previous instruction regarding the church as a holy temple. Apparently, while boasting about their heightened state of spiritual knowledge (cf. 4:6–8; 5:6), the church members had developed a lax attitude toward morality. Their emphasis on the primacy of knowledge gave the impression that behavior was not as important. Paul condemned the immoral behavior and warned that publicly known sins should be addressed for the sake of unity. He therefore urged the church to turn away from such ungodly behavior and to pursue the holiness to which they were called.

5:1–8. Immorality and Discipline. News had reached Paul, perhaps from Chloe's people (1:11), that there was sexual immortality within the church. The Greek word Paul uses (porneia) is a broad term that can refer to any form of forbidden sexual intercourse. In this case, the particular offense was that a man was having sexual relations with his father's wife. The verb echō (lit. "has," "hold") here is a euphemism for sexual intercourse. The terminology Paul uses suggests that the woman was not the man's biological mother (cf. Lev. 20:11; Deut. 22:30; 27:20), though that hardly makes the situation better. The woman apparently was not a believer, and therefore no judgment was passed on her conduct (1 Cor. 5:12).

We do not know if the man's father was still alive or had divorced the woman. Regardless, Paul makes it clear that the relationship was illicit. The relationship was not only prohibited by Levitical law (Lev. 20:11; Deut. 22:30; 27:20), but Paul notes that even the Gentiles, who themselves tolerated all sorts of sexual behavior, found this situation repulsive. What Paul found most troubling, however, was the indifference of the church toward the situation. The willingness of the church to overlook the situation suggests that the man was likely a person of influence in the church, either through wealth or a position of leadership in the community. If he were a patron of some sort, then those indebted to him would have been hesitant to do anything. Whatever the case may have been, Paul states that the church should have mourned and made sure that this person was removed from among them (1 Cor. 5:2).

Since the church members had failed to act, Paul had to intervene. His statement about not being physically present (lit. "in body") but present in spirit does not mean that his spirit would travel to Corinth. He was merely asking them to judge the case rightly, as if he were present in their midst and in agreement with his counsel. He had judged the case as if he were actually present among them. The man's bold defiance of God's law called for immediate and drastic action. The punishment of delivering the man to Satan for the destruction of the flesh (v. 5) does not refer to the death of the individual; it is a metaphor that refers to his expulsion from the church. Since by his actions he had chosen to enter the realm of Satan, the decision of the church was to confirm his choice. He would be left to suffer the consequences of his evil actions. The action of the church, however, was not intended to be only punitive but also redemptive. Paul wanted the man to recognize where his actions had taken him—outside of the body of Christ. In turn, he hoped this decision would ultimately result in the destruction of the man's flesh, that is, his sinful inclinations. If this would occur, the man would receive the gift of salvation at the return of Jesus.

5:6–13. Do Not Associate with Corrupted Members. Paul again addresses the pride of the Corinthians (v. 6). While Jesus used a parable of leaven to teach the good influence of the kingdom (Matt. 13:33), Paul employs it here to teach the bad influence of immorality. The tolerance of immorality within the church would influence the community as leaven or yeast ferments the whole dough. Therefore, Paul instructed them to clean out the old yeast (1 Cor. 5:7). Paul was using terminology associated with the Passover to emphasize the need to purify the community (Deut. 16:4). For their purity, Christ sacrificed Himself as the Passover lamb. Only through the sacrifice of Christ could the community of faith stand as a morally pure entity. In this context, Paul's invitation to keep the feast (1 Cor. 5:8) without the old yeast of malice and wickedness was an invitation to live Christlike lives of moral purity in light of His sacrifice on our behalf, commemorated in the Communion service (which Paul discusses in chap. 11)—something that replaced Passover. Just as ancient Israel was to clean out the leaven from their homes in light of Passover, so should Christians clean out the leaven of malice and evil in light of Christ's atoning sacrifice celebrated in Communion.

In an earlier letter, which Paul had written before he wrote 1 Corinthians but which no longer exists (see 1 Corinthians: Introduction), Paul had warned the church not to associate with sexually immoral people. He here expands the list in vv. 9–11 to include other sinful behaviors (v. 11). Paul clarifies that he was not referring to those who practice these sorts of behavior outside the church. That would be absurd since in that case believers could not even live in this world (v. 10). Christians were supposed to be active in society in order to save as many as possible. When Paul instructed them not to associate with such people, he was referring to those who practiced such things within the church. They were not to associate with such people or even eat with them (v. 11).

To some modern ears, Paul's instructions may sound narrow and harsh. However, it is important to realize that eating with a person in the first century involved much more than just a shared meal. It was an event that created a social bond and symbolized the acceptance of the other person—including his or her behavior. Since the individuals Paul had in mind were those living blatantly immoral lives, he did not want anyone to conclude that their conduct was representative of what it means to be a Christian. If Christians are seen to be no different than those in the world, the entire mission of the church to reach the lost will be jeopardized.

Paul made it clear that his main concern for the church was the spiritual health of its members and not the state of affairs of the world (vv. 12–13). While the church must trust and allow God to deal with the world, it cannot overlook blatantly immoral acts committed within the church. In those cases, the church must take action. It is the task of the church to judge insiders. To support his instructions, Paul quoted the Torah (v. 13; cf. Deut. 19:19). His counsels and warnings against the defiant sinful actions of some in the church were not something that he invented. They were an application of the basic disciplinary standards in Deuteronomy that required exclusion from the community of Israel (cf. Deut. 22:21–22, 30; 13:1–5; 17:2–7; 19:16–19; 21:18–21; 24:7). Paul clearly saw continuity between the word of God that was given to guide God's people in the OT and the belief and practices of the emerging Christian church.

6:1–11. Lawsuits between Believers. The congregation not only had a problem with open sin, but growing discord had caused some within the church to file lawsuits against other members. Paul saw this action as evidence of additional division and the failure of the church to be what God intended it to be. Paul saw the Corinthians' inability to deal with their internal disputes as ironic. How could they boast about their wisdom and gifts, yet there was no one among them with the gift of wisdom and judgment? This is even more surprising in light of the fact that in the final judgment believers will judge the world and even fallen angels (vv. 2–3).

The concept of God's elect having a part in the judgment of the world was not new. Jesus also touched on this issue in connection to the prophecy of Daniel about the saints of the Most High possessing the kingdom (Dan. 7:22; Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:30; cf. Rev. 3:21; 20:4). Jesus taught that at the last day the elect will "sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28). Although Paul did not indicate precisely how or when Christians will be involved in the end-time judgment, in Revelation we are told that this will take place during the Millennium after the Second Coming of Christ (Rev. 20:4). Since God's followers will be involved in such great matters of eternal destiny, Paul saw no reason why the church thought itself incapable of judging even the least significant cases (1 Cor. 6:2).

Verse 4 has been understood in different ways. Some interpret the exouthenēmenous ("the despised ones") as referring to those outside of the church. The appointing or asking for a ruling (lit. "to sit") in this case would apply to the situation of the Corinthian Christians presenting their cases to secular courts to judge. This is unlikely because the Corinthian believers had no say in the appointment of the secular judges who would hear their cases. It makes more sense to consider the "despised ones" as those of little importance in the church, and to then read v. 4 as a command: "If then you have judgments concerning things pertaining to this life, appoint those who are least esteemed by the church to judge!" Not only does this make better sense, but it also agrees with the way Paul uses the word exoutheneō ("despised") elsewhere in his letters to the Corinthians. It is always used in connection to members of the church, not to outsiders (1:28; 6:4; 16:11; 2 Cor. 10:10). This would then be another example of the way God uses those in His service who are despised by the world (cf. 1 Cor. 1:28).

Paul was shocked by the situation in Corinth (6:5). He seems to be asking how it is that those who boast of being full of wisdom rely on the secular powers to resolve their internal disputes. It is not that secular courts have no role to play in human society. Paul made it clear in Romans that in criminal matters God has appointed earthly magistrates to restrain and punish evil (Rom. 13:1–5). His concern was that in turning to the courts to decide issues of civil law between fellow believers, the divisions within the Corinthian church would only become greater. The Roman legal system was quite corrupt and the wealthy always had an advantage. In such matters, the poor were always at a disadvantage.

Paul condemned the entire situation (1 Cor. 6:7). Regardless of the outcome in these sorts of internal disagreements, there is no winner; all lose spiritually. For in the process not only is the fellowship of brothers and sisters in Christ lost, but the church fails in witnessing to the secular world the transforming power of Christ in the lives of His followers. In such trivial disputes, it is better to be wronged and cheated for the cause of Christ. For in doing so, we follow the example of Jesus, who not only taught us to turn the other cheek (Matt. 5:39), but who Himself unjustly suffered wrong at the hands of others.

To impress on the Corinthians how serious it is to wrong and cheat their fellow believers (1 Cor. 6:8), Paul reminded them that their actions mattered to God (vv. 9–10). If they were to persist in their wayward behavior, they would find themselves in danger of divine judgment. Paul provides a list of the kind of people who will not be part of God's kingdom. The behaviors he describes are cases of open rebellion against God. The list includes six types of sinners who Paul had mentioned earlier (5:10–11): the sexually immoral, idolaters, covetous, drunkards, slanderers, and extortioners. He adds four more to the list. Adulterers are those involved in sex outside of marriage. The Greek word malakos (sometimes translated as "homosexuals") means "soft" and was used in a pejorative sense specifically to describe effeminate men, often young boys, who assumed the role of the passive partner in a male same-sex relationship. The Greek word arsenokoitēs, which literally means "bedders of men," describes the active partner in a homosexual relationship. The final term, kleptēs, is someone who steals from another (cf. "kleptomaniac").

Paul contrasts the lives of the believers before and after they accepted Jesus, demonstrating that they had more in common with each other than with the world (v. 11). In theologically rich language, he affirms the status of the believers in the kingdom of God. When they repented, they began a transforming journey. The power of the gospel washed, sanctified, and justified them. Their salvation was three-dimensional. They were washed from the filth of their former lives; they were sanctified, set apart by God for holy purposes; and they were justified, so that they might be right with God. Paul wanted believers to remember what Jesus had already done for them so they would act accordingly within the church.

6:12–20. Glorify God in Body and Spirit. Some scholars consider this section new and unrelated to the previous verses, but this is not necessarily so. This section can be read as the consequences and continuation of the mentality of some within the church who openly engaged in immoral sexual behavior as a result of a misinterpretation of their freedom in Christ. The reference to all things being lawful or permissible (6:12; 10:23) may have been a slogan of some in Corinth, or alternatively one from Paul that they may have been misusing. They argued that their spiritual freedom allowed them to do whatever they wanted with respect to sexuality. Paul contradicted this argument by pointing out the weakness of being subject to any power, because not everything is beneficial. Their supposed freedom was nothing more than slavery.

Paul quotes another slogan, again possibly used by the Corinthians to justify their sexual freedom: food(s) for the stomach and the stomach for food(s) (6:13a). They reasoned that just as it was not wrong to provide for the body's need of physical food, neither was it wrong to satisfy the body's need of sexual intimacy. Paul offered a counterargument: the body is not for the purpose of sexual immorality but rather for the Lord; and the Lord is for the body. Paul was not only challenging the premise of their argument but he was also emphasizing the deepening connection between God and the believers. When the Corinthians accepted the gospel and joined the Lord, the Lord also joined them to the point that His resurrection was assuring their resurrection (v. 14). The future did not point to death but to life. Paul's argument presents continuity between this life and the life to come. What we do with our physical bodies in this life will impact our future, and therefore we should take proper care of our bodies. Some in Corinth had adhered to a dualistic view of the body, in which the new life did not apply to the body. They believed that what they did with the body did not matter, since God would destroy it in the end. Paul pointed out, however, that the body would be resurrected, thus placing a significant value on the whole person.

What is significant here is that Paul was not pointing to any individual in particular as the body of Christ but rather was admonishing the entire Corinthian church. Their lives were intimately bonded with Jesus, and any sexual immorality would damage that connection (v. 15). Once again, in making this argument, Paul linked the present body with the future body, something he expands on in chapter 15. He left no room for licentiousness (6:16) and even connected the present life with the creative intention of God by referring to the marriage of Adam and Eve. Paul equated the acceptance of the gospel to a marriage contract and thus equated doing anything contrary to the Scriptures with spiritual adultery.

Paul concludes with an exegetical insight concerning the marriage of Adam and Eve. Their relationship was not just physical but spiritual as well; therefore, the Corinthians also were to enjoy a spiritual union with Jesus (v. 17) manifested in moral purity. To deepen the gravity of sexual sin, Paul placed it on a different level (v. 18)—sexual sin is sinning against one's own body. This may be taken literally or as referring to the church and Christ. It is likely that Paul meant both possibilities and that he saw sexual sin and the replacement of healthy intimacy as damaging both to one's physical and spiritual lives.

All of the personal pronouns in v. 19 are plural. For Paul, the singular act of sexual immorality affects the entire church body in the deepest, most intimate way possible. The Corinthian believers collectively made up the temple of the Holy Spirit; one error in this construction marred the entire structure. As a body, the church stood within a physical-spiritual marriage contract and thus was subject to God (cf. 11:3). The marriage contract between God and believers did not come cheaply, but at an infinite cost, the redeeming death of Christ (6:20). For this reason, both the physical (body) and spiritual (spirit) were to be wholly consecrated to God.

7:1–40

Questions Related to Marriage

Having addressed the reports he had heard about the church in Corinth, Paul next turns his attention in the rest of the epistle (chaps. 7–16) to a number of issues that the Corinthians apparently raised in their most recent letter to him (cf. 7:1; see 1 Corinthians: Introduction). The questions deal with a wide range of items, including marriage and divorce (chap. 7), food offered to idols (8:1—11:1), church at worship (11:1—14:40), the resurrection from the dead (chap. 15), and an offering for the believers in Jerusalem (16:1–4). The first issue is related to matters of marriage (chap. 7).

Considering the strong marital image employed in chapter 6, Paul first addresses the questions related to marriage he had received from the Corinthians. Since Paul's counsel is in response to specific questions about marriage, it is important to recognize that his response here does not represent a systematic account of all of his views on marriage. He had much to say about husbands and wives in Ephesians, for example, that is not found here.

7:1–7. Advice for the Married. Notice that the second half of v. 1 is not a statement from Paul. He was merely quoting a statement from the letter the Corinthians had written to him. The verb haptō ("to touch") is used here as a euphemism referring to sexual intercourse. Thus, it is not a question about marriage in general, but about whether it is good to abstain from sex. In an extreme response to the issue of sexual immorality, some had come to believe that all sexual activity should be avoided, including sex within marriage.

Although Paul had chosen to live a life of celibacy himself, he recognized the danger of this position for those already married (v. 2). Concerned that a vow of celibacy might cause one marriage partner to be drawn into sexual immorality, Paul insisted that married couples regularly provide for the sexual needs of their partners (v. 3). In accordance with social practices at the time, it was natural to expect that the wife would provide for her husband's need for sexual intimacy. Husbands, however, were under no similar obligation. Paul counteracted the normal customs by advocating for the equal worth and responsibility between husbands and wives. While he wrote that the husband has authority over the wife's body, he also stated that the wife has authority over the husband's body (v. 4). In other words, the marriage relationship should be characterized by mutual submissiveness.

Although sexual abstinence is not to be the norm in a marriage, Paul did allow for it in one specific instance, but only for a limited time (v. 5). The only time when spouses should deprive themselves of sexual intimacy is when both agree to do so for the sake of prayer—but Paul did not say why this would even be necessary. He did not see a moment when the lack of agreement should guide a spouse to act against the wishes of the other. All this highlights the importance of conjugal intimacy and the need to walk as equal partners. The discussion does not support a marital hierarchy.

The concession (v. 6) of which Paul speaks did not refer to marriage in general, but to the immediate context of the previous verse, namely, the temporary abstinence from sexual relations in marriage by mutual consent during special times of prayer (vv. 6–7). Although Paul embraced a life of celibacy, he did not want married couples in Corinth to conclude that his comments about temporary abstinence were a divine command. Marriage, and the sexual intimacy it involves, is a gift from God. Marriage provides a pathway for a meaningful and mutual sexual satisfaction that minimizes the temptation of sexual immorality and deepens the intimacy and unity of husband and wife. Paul's preference for celibacy emerged as a sacrifice for the gospel, but he acknowledged that not all are called to serve Christ in this manner (v. 7).

7:8–9. Advice for the Formerly Married. Having addressed married couples, Paul next turns his attention to another group within the church: the unmarried and the widows. By "unmarried" (agamos), Paul was most likely referring to widowers (regarding those who never married, see vv. 25–38). Since Paul dealt with the situation of both men and women in the groups addressed in this chapter, it makes sense that the male counterpart to "widows" in v. 8 would be "widowers." To those bereaved of their married partner, Paul advised that it would be good for them to remain single, that is, as Paul was. However, this should be done only if they had mastered self-control (v. 9). Once again, Paul did not mandate celibacy. He only recommended it when a person was not bound by marriage and was also able to control his or her sexual desires. If that was not possible, he recommended marriage.

7:10–11. Divorce and Christian Marriages. Paul firmly believed that Christians should not divorce their believing spouses. Unlike his previous counsel, this is not merely his advice, but a command from the Lord Jesus (v. 10). Paul was clearly aware of the teachings of Jesus against divorce—and he saw them as authoritative for the Christian (Matt. 5:31–32; 19:3–12; Mark 10:2–12; Luke 16:18). So, although he acknowledged that while a wife had the legal right under Roman law to leave her husband, he urged her not to exercise that option. At the same time, Paul recognized that people do not always follow God's principles. So, if a wife did depart from her husband, he said she should remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband (v. 11). What is expected of a Christian wife is also expected of the Christian husband (v. 11). Like Jesus, Paul viewed marriage as a permanent relationship. While difficulties will arise, divorce should never be viewed as a solution to the problem.

7:12–16. Divorce and Mixed Marriages. What about those situations when one partner in a marriage becomes a Christian, while the other spouse remains an unbeliever? Is this a legitimate reason for divorce? Should a Christian divorce his or her spouse in order to marry another Christian? Since Jesus did not address this situation, Paul had no word from the Lord to share with the Corinthians. Nevertheless, he considered his advice as consistent with the divinely revealed principles concerning mixed marriages (cf. 7:40). Paul clarifies that believing spouses are not bound to a marriage if their partner persists in divorcing them (vv. 12–13).

However, he urges believers to practice patience and grace toward their unbelieving spouses, striving to remain if the partner is willing.

Instead of the pure becoming defiled by coming into contact with the unclean, which was a common belief in the ancient world, Paul argues that it is just the opposite in a married relationship (v. 14); the blessing of one impacts the other. As long as a marriage is maintained, the presence of God in the life of a believing spouse can have a transforming influence on all the individuals in a home. In this way, the unconverted spouse and the children are influenced by the Christian behavior of the spouse—the children can be "holy" (v. 14b). In other words, the probabilities of conversion diminish if the believing spouse leaves the relationship. What is the believer to do, however, if an unbelieving spouse pursues a divorce? In the case of abandonment, the believing partner is free to marry again (v. 15). At the same time, Paul encourages the believing spouse not to easily give up on the marriage (v. 16). As demonstrated in Paul's own life, God can work in the lives of people in ways we would never imagine.

7:17–24. Serve God Where We Are. Paul pauses momentarily from his specific instructions regarding Christians and marriage to reflect on the general principles behind his advice. Three times in this section he emphasizes the point that Christians are not to make it their primary purpose to change their position in society (vv. 17, 20, 24). Their focus should be on serving God to the utmost of their ability no matter where they find themselves. While the immediate social situation Paul had in mind was the marital status of a believer, he uses two other social settings as illustrative analogies to highlight his point: circumcision and slavery.

Circumcision was a controversial topic in the early church. It had become such an important mark of identity in Judaism that some Jewish Christians insisted that Gentile converts needed to be circumcised to become Christians. Paul strongly disagreed. He argued that insisting on circumcision as a prerequisite for becoming a Christian amounted to the rejection of the exclusive role of Christ as Savior. Here the question is not theological. Paul was referring to circumcision as a mark of ethnic identity—whether a person was a Jew or a Gentile. Paul was saying that these sorts of distinctions between humans do not ultimately matter to God. Jews who responded to God's call in Jesus did not need to become Gentiles, nor did Gentiles need to become Jews to follow Jesus (v. 18). The gospel transcends and eliminates ethnic distinctions (Gal. 3:28). Our true identity is found in Christ, under the new creation. Therefore, circumcision and uncircumcision were nothing—keeping God's commands was more important (1 Cor. 7:19). It is not that our lives should not change. They should. The call to follow God requires that we put God and His will first in our lives and that we allow Him to transform us. But it does not require us to change our race, gender, or social status—or, as in the case of the Corinthians, our marital status. No matter our situation in life, our primary goal should be to follow Christ. Therefore, Paul's conclusion to this matter is that people should each remain in the condition in which they were when God called them (v. 20).

With this understanding in mind, Paul's statement about slavery not only illustrates his overall point even more but it also provides a stunning message of freedom (v. 21). Paul was not justifying the perpetuation of slavery. Although he did not openly condemn the institution of slavery, throughout his letters he redefines the role of slavery within a church dedicated to the gospel (see commentary on Philem. 1:1–25). Paul's promotion of manumission along with his stunning calls for humble masters (cf. Eph. 3:6, 9; Col. 4:1; 1 Tim. 6:2) denied the traditional roles of master and slave. In this passage, Paul wanted Christians who found themselves as slaves to recognize that their status as slaves need not define them. If they could obtain their freedom, he encouraged them to do so; but free or not, they could still serve God.

Paul explains that the slave who becomes a follower of Christ belongs to Christ. A Christian slave is the Lord's free person, and a free Christian is Christ's slave (1 Cor. 7:22). Although a freed person was a former slave who had been released from slavery, the former slave was not entirely free. In return for their freedom, freed slaves were legally obligated to serve their former masters whenever needed for the rest of their lives. At the same time, however, the former master became their patron. He was obligated to look after their welfare. Thus, in the same way that freed persons benefited from the status and honor of their patron, so Paul notes that as Christians our status is not determined by our own position in society—whether free or slave—but on the basis of our position in the household of Christ. Therefore, since we now belong to Christ, we should not allow the values of the world to determine our sense of worth and importance. We were bought at a price; therefore, we should not become slaves of people (v. 23). Paul ends his counsel by repeating the advice he stated earlier (v. 24).

7:25–38. Advice for the Engaged. Having addressed the situation of married persons and those bereaved of their spouses, Paul next turns his attention to a group within the church described as virgins (parthenos). Although the term can refer in a broad sense to both unmarried women and men (cf. vv. 28, 34, 36, 37, 38; Rev. 14:4), the context suggests that here it refers to betrothed young women within the church (1 Cor. 7:36; cf. Matt. 1:18, 23; Luke 1:27; 2 Cor. 11:2). There was apparently some question about whether these women should go ahead and marry.

Regarding this specific situation, Paul told the Corinthians that he had no commandment from the Lord (v. 25). As in the case of those who were married to pagan spouses, Jesus never addressed this question in His ministry. Nevertheless, Paul's counsel should not be taken lightly. After all, he was one who by the Lord's mercy was reliable (v. 25). In light of what he said in the previous section (vv. 17–24), his advice should not come as a surprise; Paul encouraged them to remain single. Paul's use of the word distress (anankē; v. 26) can be taken to refer to a local, present, temporal persecution, or it can be a warning of future persecutions to come. Paul recognized the current problems of the church and saw them as signs of the future troubles the church would face at the end of time. For Paul, the expectation of Jesus's return was always seen as imminent. The advice of Paul is quite simple and pragmatic: There is nothing wrong with being married or with remaining single (v. 27). Making either decision is not a violation of the will of God. The "trouble" mentioned in v. 28 probably refers to the problems that families could face when the church would encounter social conflicts and persecutions.

In v. 29, Paul is not advocating that married couples should adopt a life of celibacy. He argues for just the opposite in vv. 1–7. What he means is that those who are married should live in recognition that the things of this world are only temporary (v. 31). Ultimate reality lies in the future world made new. Our duty, therefore, is not to depart from the world but to participate meaningfully in life with the understanding that everything is incomplete. Paul is emphasizing the continuity of relationships within society but with a changed mindset centered on the hope of the Second Coming of Jesus Christ.

Paul did not believe that the proclamation of the gospel should be limited to men; he made it clear that women also have an important role to play in the cause of Christ. Yet while men and women are both called to share the gospel, Paul believed that single persons have an advantage since they are not distracted by the cares of family life (vv. 34–35). His final comments (vv. 36–37) have been understood in very different ways. The difficulty centers on the ambiguity of the expression that begins v. 36 (lit. "if anyone"). Who did Paul have in mind? Some claim that Paul was referring to the dilemma a father faces in deciding if he should marry off a daughter who has reached marriageable age. According to this scenario, if the father feels it is improper to keep his daughter at home, he has the right to arrange for her to marry. On the other hand, if the father is determined that his daughter should remain single, Paul affirmed his decision to keep her at home. Since Paul said nothing specifically about fathers in this entire passage, this interpretation seems unlikely. Moreover, it is hard to believe that Paul would actually commend a father who destined his daughter to a life of celibacy.

Another view claims that Paul addressed couples who had legally married but had not consummated the relationship, since they had taken a vow of sexual chastity. In this scenario, the man was having a difficult time restraining his sexual desires. The question was whether he would be committing a sin if he broke his vow and consummated the marriage. While Paul would not condemn him for his actions, he believed it would be better if he did not. This can hardly be right, for it contradicts Paul's earlier counsel that married couples should maintain sexual relations (vv. 2–7).

The most likely scenario is that Paul is addressing engaged couples throughout this entire section. While Paul had argued that it was better in his opinion that engaged couples remain single, he acknowledged that decision is not for everyone. So, if the man is struggling to restrain his sexual drive, it is not a sin to marry. In fact, it is better to marry instead of acting inappropriately in regard to his betrothed virgin (v. 36). Of course, if sexual desire could be restrained, Paul would still have preferred they not marry. This is, in effect, the same counsel he gave to those who were married but whose spouse had passed away (vv. 8–9).

7:39–40. Concluding Advice for Wives and Widows. Paul concludes his counsel on marriage with a final reminder about the permanence of the marriage union (v. 39a). At the same time, Paul emphasizes that if a husband dies, his widow is free to marry again. He does, however, qualify a statement (v. 39b), suggesting that her new husband should be a Christian. Yet once again, Paul believed she would be happier if she were to remain single (v. 40). Paul does not say why. He merely acknowledges that he had the help of the Spirit of God in making his judgments.

8:1—11:1

Questions Regarding Food Dedicated to Idols

Paul next turns his attention to another issue that the Corinthians had raised in the letter they had written to him (see 7:1): the question of whether it was permissible to eat food that had been dedicated to idols. One group within the church had no qualms about the legitimacy of eating idol meat, while others were seriously opposed to it. The discussion of this topic is applied to several aspects in the life of the church.

8:1–13. Knowledge versus Love. Paul begins his discussion on idol meat by noting the knowledge that all Christians have. Some scholars believe that Paul is quoting a slogan of the Corinthians here, but this is not certain. Paul had previously addressed a group within the church who were identified as "arrogant" or "puffed up" (4:6, 18–19), the ones who acted like they were kings (4:8). Their exalted view of themselves led them to believe that they possessed a far greater knowledge about spiritual things than others in the church—and particularly about food offered to idols.

While Paul did not contest their knowledge, he noted that mere knowledge itself is not sufficient. Knowledge itself can lead to arrogance, while disinterested love (agapē) edifies (8:1–2). Paul disqualified their claim about having superior knowledge. In effect, he was saying, "You think that you know something—perhaps you do; but this is not real knowledge." True knowledge does not emerge from mere information; it is always based on relationships. The knowledge of God that is part of the Christian experience is not a set of facts that we possess based on our own understanding. God is the One who took the initiative in drawing us to Himself because of His love for us. Thus, the entire Christian life is really only a response to God's love for us. So, it is foolish to boast about our knowledge of God and the things related to His kingdom.

To better understand the relationship of Paul's argument to the question of food sacrificed to idols, it is important to recognize that a pagan temple functioned not only as a place of worship and sacrifice, but also as a sort of restaurant. After an animal had been dedicated

Food Dedicated to Idols

The importance of the topic of food offered to idols is to some extent related to the fact that the church needed instruction on how to relate to other pagan practices that predominated in its social context. The fact that Paul spends some time discussing the topic reveals that this issue had the potential to split the church.

1. Two Groups. One group of believers not only saw nothing wrong with eating meat that had been part of a sacrifice offered in a pagan temple but they also saw nothing wrong with eating the meat in a pagan temple (8:10). After all, the pagan gods were not real—every Christian would have known that (cf. 8:1, 4). Moreover, Paul had not barred Christians from fellowshiping with nonbelievers. So, where was the harm in attending a wedding feast or funeral for a friend that was held in a pagan temple, as they regularly were, or in participating in social or business activities that would have required joining in a meal being hosted at one of the many temples in Corinth? Overly confident in their own wisdom, these individuals looked down on those with different opinions as spiritually naive.

Those who were opposed to eating idol meat saw the situation in a very different light. Although they also believed in the existence of only one almighty God, they were extremely uncomfortable with having anything to do with idolatry. They recognized that the pagan cult was very dangerous. No matter what anyone said, they wanted nothing to do with meat offered to idols, whether it was eaten in a temple or even bought in a local market. Paul refers to these individuals as the "weak," since their consciences would not allow them to eat meat sacrificed to idols (cf. 8:9–12). The practice of those in the church who had no problem with eating food offered to idols, however, put the "weak" in a difficult position. They not only had to deal with the pressure from their fellow Christians within the church but they also faced the social pressure from outside the church as they struggled to explain why they refused to join in public celebrations at pagan temples, while other Christians had no problem in doing so. As is often the case in these sorts of interpersonal problems, the "weak" apparently responded by condemning the "strong" for claiming the freedom to eat idol meat (10:29–30).

2. Paul's Approach. Since the Jerusalem Council in Acts 15 had already reached a decision about the question of food offered to idols (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25), Paul could have responded to the situation in Corinth by requiring them to comply with that decision. But he did not even mention it. Paul recognized that the believers in Corinth needed far more than just another rule. The church had deeper issues that needed to be addressed. They were not struggling with a lack of information but with the failure to see how that information should affect the way they lived the Christian life. He wanted to address the situation in a way that would help the Corinthians to develop a more mature level of obedience in response to the work of Christ.

It is also important to note that Paul chose not to take a particular side on the issue. At first glance, his appeal to the "strong" (chap. 8) to discontinue eating meat in an idol's temple for the sake of the "weak" (vv. 7–13) appears to place Paul in the camp of those opposed to idol meat. His warning against idolatry (chap. 10) also gives the same appearance. Yet just when it seems that Paul is taking the side of the "weak," he turns around and says that believers should eat whatever they can buy in the meat market (10:25). This certainly was not the position of the "weak." Not only did Paul not see a problem with Christians purchasing and eating meat offered in the meat market, wherever its source, he added that when invited to the house of an unbeliever they should also eat whatever food was served to them without worrying about whether it had been offered to an idol (v. 27).

3. Paul's Goal. Paul's ultimate goal in trying to stay above the fray was so he could solve the problem by reframing it around the issue of love. He wanted the "strong" to look at the issue from a larger perspective than just themselves. He wanted them to consider the issue from the standpoint of unity. How would their actions affect the church as a whole and its mission? What impact would their actions have on the spiritual life of others within the community of faith and on those they worked to attract to Christ? Paul's exposition aimed at answering these questions.

and sacrificed to a temple's god or goddess, a portion of the sacrificial meat would often be cooked and then served to the worshiper and family as part of a celebratory meal in one of the many banqueting rooms within a temple complex. Such celebrations were notorious for leading to other forms of unseemly behavior, particularly sexual immorality. With few public spaces large enough to accommodate significant events, temples were a popular place to gather for celebratory events involving a meal.

It is within this context that Paul first affirms that an idol has no real existence (v. 4). Christians recognize that there is one God (v. 6). So, there is a sense in which those in Corinth who had argued that it did not matter whether food had been dedicated to an idol or not were correct—either way, it was just food. Yet at the same time, Paul wanted them to realize that there were others in the congregation who did not possess that knowledge (v. 7). It was this group within the church who had a difficult time separating the eating of food dedicated to an idol with participation in the pagan cult itself. This group likely included individuals who had been caught up in pagan idolatry before becoming Christians. For them, eating idol food had always been an act of worship.

Anticipating the response of some within Corinth, and perhaps even quoting a statement from the letter they had written to him, Paul acknowledged that it was true that the food offered to idols that they ate, would, in general, not make them better or worse before God (v. 8). However, the Corinthians also had to realize that they needed to be careful that insisting on their right of eating idol meat would not become a stumbling block to the weak (v. 9). The "stumbling" Paul had in mind here was not that other Christians might be offended by seeing them eating in pagan temples (v. 10). It was that a "weak" brother or sister might conclude that idolatry and Christianity are compatible and thus be drawn back into the evils of paganism, which could lead to those for whom Christ died being eternally lost (v. 11).

Paul presents the consequences as tragic. The arrogant believers were not only committing a sin against their own brothers and sisters in Christ but they also were committing sin against Christ Himself (v. 12). Then Paul declared that he would never again eat meat if it would make his brother or sister stumble (v. 13). Instead of commanding "the strong" to surrender their rights, Paul explained, in chapter 9, how his own ministry was not based on getting what rightfully belonged to him, whether familial or financial rights (9:5–12a), but in living a life of self-denial for the benefit of others (vv. 12, 15–23).

9:1–14. Paul's Apostolic Right of Support. Paul asked a number of rhetorical questions about his status as an apostle (v. 1). Responding to those who might question his authority, Paul stated that at the very least, he was an apostle to them (v. 2a; cf. 4:15). He then affirmed with confidence that they were the seal of his apostleship in the Lord (v. 2b); their conversion demonstrated that he was called to be an apostle.

In vv. 4–11, Paul asks another set of rhetorical questions, demonstrating that as an apostle he was aware of his rights to receive financial support in return for his ministerial work. In fact, if he were married like the other apostles, he could also have received support for a wife (vv. 4–5). Paul then provides other examples drawn from everyday life of people receiving compensation for their work (v. 7). But even more than that, the right of compensation was not merely a human practice but a divine command (v. 9; cf. Deut. 25:4). Although the letter of the law applies to animals, the same principle applies even more so to humans. Whether it is the beast or the human who threshes the grain, each has a right to the grain. If this is true of grain, it is just as true in regard to the proclamation of the gospel. Paul also uses the example of those serving in the temple receiving tithe in the OT (v. 13). The implication is that gospel workers should benefit from the tithe of the church (v. 14); the church should provide for their needs.

9:15–23. Paul's Rejection of His Rights. Although Paul had the right to receive compensation for his ministerial work, he had chosen to waive that right (v. 15). He could not even entertain the idea of making a living off the gospel (v. 15b). To understand Paul's practice, we should remember the dramatic encounter he had with Christ on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1–22). At that moment the grace of God had forgiven his sin against the Lord and His church, which he was persecuting. Equally important was the grace of the Lord that had transformed him and called him to be an apostle of the Lord. Everything Paul had received from God was a gift of grace, and his grateful response was to show the same grace in the preaching of the gospel by abstaining from receiving the material provisions that the Lord Himself commanded for the ministers of the gospel (1 Cor. 9:9–14; Luke 10:7). Proclaiming the gospel free of charge gave Paul the privilege of boasting in God's grace and to some extent contributed to disarming those who opposed his apostleship (v. 18).

In vv. 19–22, Paul notes that everything he did was done for the sake of spreading the gospel. This led him to make three statements about the fundamental nature of his ministry. Although he was free from all people, he willingly made himself a servant to all (v. 19). His claim about being free harkens back to the question in v. 1, "Am I not free?" Instead of demanding his rights as an apostle, Paul willingly laid them down so he could become the slave of all. Instead of conducting his ministry from a position of power, he did it through weakness—a ministry rooted in the foolishness of the cross. He did this so that he might win more people to the cause of Christ (v. 19). The Greek word translated "win" (kerdainō) belongs to the field of business, merchandise, and profit (cf. vv. 19, 20 [2x], 21, 22; Phil. 3:8). The profit that Paul gained was bringing both Jews and Gentiles to Christ, doing so by adapting his methods to reach them (vv. 20–22). By appearing in some sense as one who was literally speaking "lawlessness," Paul was not actually promoting lawlessness, for he immediately clarified his status as being under the law of Christ, that is to say, the law as interpreted by Christ (Matt. 5:17–32; 2 Cor. 3:12–16; Gal.

6:2). His becoming all things to all people had an evangelistic emphasis (v. 22).

The implication here is that in the same way that Paul adapted his ministry to meet the needs of the people he was seeking to win for Christ, he wanted the "strong" in Corinth to be sensitive to the needs of the "weak." The "strong" must love the "weak" in order to win them for the proclamation of the gospel, even if it means that they must waive their rights in matters of food. Since Paul would later request that he be used as an example (11:1), it is clear that he was expecting some changes in the behavior of both groups within the church in order to maintain the unity of the church.

9:24–27. Analogy of the Isthmian Games. To illustrate that Christians should not live a life of self-indulgence but of self-restraint, Paul compared the Christian life with the disciplined life of an athlete preparing for a race. The imagery the apostle draws from is likely from the Isthmian Games, which the city of Corinth hosted every two years. Since the Isthmian Games were second in importance only to the Olympics, Paul would have experienced them in one way or another when they were held in Corinth in the spring of A.D. 51. Visitors and athletes from all across Greece would have flooded the city for the festivities. Like modern-day sponsors, wealthy patrons provided the food for banquets throughout the city. The stadium, theater, and hippodrome would have been packed with spectators who had come from far and near to watch the contests: footraces, wrestling, boxing, discus and javelin throwing, chariot racing, and more.

With these sorts of competitions in mind, Paul was reminding the Corinthians that although many athletes compete in a race, only one receives the prize (9:24). Since there is no prize for second place, those who run the race should do everything they can to make sure they win. How does an athlete do that? By being disciplined and self-controlled in all things (v. 25). In order to participate in the events, athletes had to agree in advance to undergo ten months of rigorous training. Although such training was difficult, athletes were willing to do it just to have the opportunity of gaining the temporary honor associated with winning a perishable crown—a victory wreath that at the Isthmian Games was quite often made of withered celery.

If athletes are willing to undergo a life of self-restraint simply to win a crown representing temporary honor, how much more, Paul says, should Christians be willing to live a life of self-restraint to obtain the honor of receiving a reward from God that will last forever (v. 25). Applying this teaching to the previous issue of eating food offered to idols, which may not be a sin in and of itself, Paul was wanting the Corinthians to practice self-restraint for the greater good instead of insisting on the "right" they had to eat. He called the Corinthians to run the race in order to win collectively instead of individually.

Since Paul wanted the Corinthians to imitate his manner of life (11:1), he explained to them that this was how he lived the Christian life. There was no hesitation in Paul's commitment (9:26). He was no shadow boxer who merely threw punches at the air. Paul would do whatever it took for the cause of Christ to be triumphant. And he would do so by subjecting himself to a life of restraint (v. 27). The bringing of the body into submission of which Paul spoke is not self-flagellation. He was talking in a symbolic sense of his athlete-like willingness to forgo some rights for the sake of a greater goal. He was willing to deny himself in order to save others. He was doing what he was calling on others to do.

10:1–13. A Warning from the Example of Israel. Paul continues to address the situation in Corinth regarding food offered to idols by issuing another warning to the "strong" in Corinth. In response to the claim that eating idol meat involved no spiritual danger, since they knew that there was only one true God, Paul had appealed to them to consider that such behavior did, however, endanger the faith of the "weak" (8:10–13). Previously, Paul had used his own example of setting aside his apostolic rights for the sake of the gospel as an indirect model of how he hoped the Corinthians would themselves stop insisting on their rights at the expense of others in the church. Next, Paul warned the Corinthians that an uncompromising attitude might lead to their own spiritual downfall, as it did to the generation of Israelites who left Egypt under Moses and who failed to enter the promised land.

As Paul began to recount the story of Israel's exodus from Egypt, he referred to the Israelites inclusively as their ancestors. Although this may sound like a surprise since the congregation in Corinth was largely Gentile, it reveals Paul's understanding of the church. The history of Israel was the shared history of Gentile believers, because by faith they had become part of God's covenant people, part of the Israel of faith (Rom. 11:17–24; Gal. 6:16). This was the eschatological fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham that all families of the earth would be blessed through his offspring (Acts 3:25). Thus, the story of the Exodus belonged not only to the Jews but also to the Gentiles who had accepted the God of the OT.

As Paul recounts the story, he first emphasizes the inclusive nature of the events through the repeated use of the adjective "all." Paul was not quoting directly from the Septuagint (the Greek text) or the Masoretic text (the Hebrew text). He was doing a loose commentary on the story that explored questions of ethics and theology. Although Paul did not directly state the point he was trying to emphasize, it appears to be connected with the change of the adjective "all" (vv. 1–4) to "some" (vv. 7–10). He likely saw in this contrast a reflection of the situation in Corinth, where although "all" had responded to the call of Christ, "some" were in grave danger of losing their way, just as many of the Israelites who left Egypt did.

In order to highlight the connection Paul saw between the Israel of old and the followers of Christ, the apostle describes events from Israel's past with terminology that reflects Christian practices. For example, the expression in v. 2 clearly draws from the imagery of baptism, where believers are baptized "into Christ" (Gal. 3:27; cf. Rom. 6:3). Paul portrays Moses as a type of Christ who brought redemption for the people of God. Thus, in terms of their experience, both groups have shared deliverance through a kind of baptismal event at the beginnings of their spiritual journeys.

Paul continues to highlight these sorts of parallel events with references to the "spiritual food" (10:3) and "spiritual drink" (v. 4) of which the Israelites partook in the wilderness. The reference is to the manna and water that God provided for the Israelites. For Paul, the food and drink were analogous to the bread and the wine of the Lord's Supper (10:16; cf. John 6:55). Paul will later explain the symbolism and function of the emblems of the Lord's Supper as an example of the mutual acceptance among members. One of his concerns here was to establish a connection that would later serve as a critique of the idolatrous participation of the "strong" who were openly consuming idol meat served in pagan temples.

The statement that the Israelites drank from a spiritual Rock that was with them, and that that Rock was Christ (1 Cor. 10:4), is significant. The biblical text states that God provided water twice for the Israelites—once at Rephidim in the Wilderness of Sin at the beginning of their desert pilgrimage (Ex. 17:6) and once again at the end in Kadesh (Num. 20:8–11). But what did the Israelites do for water between those two miracles? Some ancient readers believed that the two rocks were one and the same. So, the rock must have followed them through the desert. Paul's point is not about an actual rock or the water it provided. He was thinking of "Rock" being used as a title for God in the Song of Moses (Deut. 32:4, 15, 18, 30, 31), which he connects to Jesus. The rock therefore serves as a metaphor for the divine source behind the water, the presence of God, who graciously provided for the needs of His people and accompanied them in the wilderness.

Yet in spite of God's abundant blessing, the Rock of salvation became a stumbling block for others (Rom. 9:33). The tragic history of Israel is that many disdained the Rock of their salvation (Deut. 32:15) and became recipients of God's judgment. Although they all experienced God's deliverance from Egypt, not all of them made it to the promised land (1 Cor. 10:5). They became idolaters (v. 7), they practiced sexual immorality (v. 8), and because of their tempting of the Lord they were destroyed by serpents (v. 9). Paul's purpose with these examples was twofold: to point out to the believers in Corinth that they also craved evil things (v. 6) and to remind them that the stories from history were written as a warning (v. 11).

The stories Paul referenced from Israel's past outline four transgressions that were to function as a warning to the Corinthians: idolatry (v. 7), immorality (v. 8), putting Christ to the test (v. 9), and complaining (v. 10). One of Paul's concerns through this section is related to the issue of idolatry. He refers first to the experience of Israel connected to the worship of the golden calf (Ex. 32). Instead of mentioning the golden calf explicitly, Paul quotes the part of the story that involved the people eating and drinking in its presence—a clear connection to the practice of the Corinthians in eating meat in an idol's temple. Paul's point seems clear: eating and drinking in the presence of idols is dangerous, for, as the Israelites discovered, it often leads to immoral behavior.

What is implied in the people's revelry is made explicit in Paul's second example (1 Cor. 10:8). The reference here is to the tragic events that occurred thirty-eight years later at Baal-Peor (Num. 25:1–9). After being drawn into sexual immorality with the women of Moab, the Israelites were led into idolatry. They ate and bowed down to the gods of Moab (Num. 25:2). The story connects Israel's idolatry with eating the sacrifices offered to the pagan gods—another clear warning to the Corinthians of the danger connected to eating meat in an idol's temple. As a result of Israel's rebellion, a plague fell on the nation and twenty-three thousand people died in a single day (1 Cor. 10:8).

The mention of "twenty-three thousand" who died in single day (v. 8) has puzzled interpreters, because the number given for the dead in Numbers 25:9 is twenty-four thousand. Why is there a difference of one thousand people? Scholars have suggested several different solutions. For some, this is a simple lapse of memory on Paul's part, while others claim that Paul may have confused the number with the twenty-three thousand male Levites from the census of the people taken after the plague (Num. 26:62). Perhaps Paul was saying that in one day only twenty-three thousand died, while the other thousand may have died subsequently. While it is impossible to know for certain why Paul mentions twenty-three instead of twenty-four thousand, it does not undermine his main point about the danger of idolatry.

Paul returns to another story from Israel's past connected to food—the story of the deadly serpents (1 Cor. 10:9; cf. Num. 21:4–9). The children of Israel were angry with having to eat manna instead of regular food, and they "spoke against God and against Moses" (Num. 21:5). Although the account in Numbers does not mention the people "tempting" or "testing" God, that concept does appear in Psalm 78 when the story is retold (Ps. 78:18; cf. Num. 21:6). In referring to "Christ" (1 Cor. 10:9) instead of "the Lord," Paul may have been again tying the story of the Corinthians to the history of the Israelites. As the cravings of the Israelites for the food they liked and wanted ultimately led to their rebellion against God, so the interest of the Corinthians in food offered to idols could also place them in danger of doing the same.

The final story in 10:5 most likely refers to Israel's opposition to Moses recorded in Numbers 14 after the spies reported that the promised land was filled with giants (Num. 13:31–33). In response to such outright rebellion, the Lord stated that all Israelites who were twenty years old and older were doomed to die in the desert, except for Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14:27–30; 1 Cor. 10:5). Although the original account does not refer to them dying at the hand of the destroyer (such as an angel), it appears that Paul was drawing on the language of the "destroyer" from Exodus 12:23 to refer to the nature of the divine judgment (1 Cor. 10:10). Paul likely was referring to this story because he saw in the attitude of the Israelites toward the leadership of Moses a parallel with the attitude of the Corinthians toward him. He wanted the Corinthians to be aware that in opposing him they were also opposing God.

In concluding his remarks about God's judgment on Israel in the wilderness, Paul makes explicit the basis on which he made connections between Israel's history and the experience of the Corinthians (v. 11). While Jewish believers would have understood this basic principle, it would not have been as familiar to the largely Gentile church in Corinth. The story of Israel is not just history. It is applicable for God's people today, that is, those who live in light of Christ's fulfillment of the promises made to earlier generations. As Christians, we can find in God's prior dealings with His people some examples that can guide and direct us in our own circumstances or, just as in the case of the Corinthians, even serve as a warning for us.

Temptations and trials come to all people, but God in His faithfulness will not allow us to be tempted beyond what we are able to bear (v. 13). Not only that, but God will also provide an alternative escape so that we can endure. This does not mean that as Christians we will not experience difficult circumstances. We will. The point is that God will give us the strength needed to endure those times.

10:14–22. Prohibition against Feasting at Pagan Temples. In light of his discussion of the rights of a believer (chap. 9) and the warnings against idolatry in the OT, Paul finally returns to his long argument against feasting in pagan temples that began in 8:1. While he initially approached the issue by addressing the detrimental effect such behavior had on "weaker" believers, here he addresses the danger that such practices pose for Christians who engage in such things themselves.

Following on the heels of the warnings against idolatry, Paul reaffirms the conclusion he had reached earlier about eating meat in an idol's temple: all were to flee from idolatry (10:14). Since the "strong" in Corinth prided themselves on their wisdom, Paul addressed them as wise and sensible people and asked them to consider the evidence for themselves (v. 15). On the basis of their own experience in celebrating the Lord's Supper, he reminded them that those who partake of the emblems of the cup and the bread, which symbolize Christ's blood and body (v. 16), become one body, for they all share from the same bread (v. 17). The same principle was true with the peace offerings in the Jewish temple (Lev. 3). Not only did the priests receive a portion of the offerings but the people also received a portion as well—and by eating of the same sacrificial food, the two groups became connected to the same altar (v. 18); they enjoyed a communion meal in the presence of the Lord. Thus, Paul's point is simple: the sacred meal that Christians and Jews shared among themselves in the presence of God created a bond with the One being worshiped.

Before applying the situation to the Corinthians partaking of idol meat in pagan temples, Paul recognized that the Corinthians might object to his line of reasoning by claiming that his logic was faulty because they knew that there is only one true God—so eating in an idol temple was not a problem. Although Paul agreed that idols have no real existence (cf. 1 Cor. 8:4), there are other spiritual forces at work in this world arrayed against God, namely, demons. And it is those demonic forces that were connected to what went on in pagan temples (10:19–20). Since the Gentiles were sacrificing to demons and not to God, Paul wanted the Corinthians to not participate in fellowship with demons (v. 20). They could not have it both ways. It was impossible to share both in the fellowship with the evil powers connected to the pagan cult and in fellowship with God. Either they were one body in fellowship with Jesus through the Lord's Supper or not. God demands absolute loyalty (v. 21). So, while idol meat may not have been harmful in and of itself, Christians could not eat idol meat in connection with pagan temples without being negatively influenced. Paul reminded them that they were not stronger than God and should not arouse His jealousy (v. 22).

10:23—11:1. Regarding Food Purchased in the Market. Having already stated his position on the question of eating food in an idol's temple, Paul next draws the entire topic to a close by providing the Corinthians with some practical advice on how they were to exercise their freedom in Christ in relation to others. While his advice is related to the current issue of eating food, the principle behind it is applicable to the entire Christian life.

Paul begins by entering into an imaginary conversation with the Corinthians on the issue of Christian freedom. He does this by restating the misused principle and possible slogan of the Corinthians mentioned earlier in 1 Corinthians 6:12—that all things (in regard to these types of issues) are lawful or permissible. Yes, that may be true in these cases, but all of these things are not of benefit or edifying in their import (10:23). The Corinthians believed that they had the right to express their freedom without regard to anyone. This sort of mentality indicates that they believed that the essence of the Christian life was found in knowledge and rights. The problem with this sort of perspective is that it leads only to pride and selfish behavior. Paul argues that the true essence of the Christian life is rooted in love. For it is only love for God and others that builds up the church and encourages believers to exercise their freedom for the benefit of others. Therefore, Paul admonished the Corinthians to not seek only their own good, but that of others (v. 24).

A life lived for the well-being of others means that the freedom and rights of a believer must always be subservient to the needs of others (8:1; 13:5; 15:2; Rom. 14:7; Gal. 6:2; Phil. 2:1–4). Paul wanted the Corinthians to think about what is best for the body of Christ instead of merely thinking about themselves and their own interests.

To illustrate this point, Paul provides two examples related to the issue of food offered to idols. The first involves food offered for sale in the marketplace. Since meat was a delicacy in the ancient world, much of the meat in a Gentile market was surplus meat that had been originally offered as part of a sacrifice in one of the local temples. In such circumstances, Paul said the Christian had the right to purchase the meat and to eat it without worrying about whether it had been dedicated to an idol at some earlier point (10:25–26). Instead of asking the seller where the meat came from, Christians were to thank the Lord for providing them with food. So, while Paul was opposed to eating meat in an idol's temple, he was not concerned about eating the meat itself.

Paul's second example concerns an invitation for a Christian to attend a private meal in the home of an unbeliever. How should a Christian respond? Paul said that if believers were to accept such invitations, which Paul did not discourage, they were to eat whatever was presented to them without asking questions of conscience about it (v. 27). Paul's point here was the same as buying meat in the marketplace (v. 25). Since an idol is really nothing, the believer should not embarrass the host by asking whether the meat had come from a temple. After all, accepting such invitations was a wonderful way for Christians to build relationships and to share the gospel with nonbelievers.

Paul did, however, make one exception. If the visiting believers were specifically told that the food had been offered to idols, they were not to eat it for the sake of the one who told them about the source of the meat and that other person's conscience (vv. 28–29). Who is the person who might have provided this information? Some have suggested that it is a reference to the host, while others have believed it to be a pagan guest or another Christian guest or slave present at the meal. If it is the host or a pagan guest, Paul may have had in mind some sort of announcement about the food that honored or indicated allegiance to the pagan gods to whom the food had been dedicated. In that case, the Christian should not eat, since eating would have been an act of religious compromise. Another possibility would be that of the host or a pagan guest, as a courtesy, informing the Christian that the meat had been offered to a pagan god. The host may have been thinking that the Christian would not want to eat it because of its connections to paganism. Paul's counsel was that in such a case the believer should not eat the meat. If the Christian were to eat the meat, it might indicate to the unbelievers that Christians had no objections to paganism.

On the other hand, if the person announcing that the food had been offered to idols was a fellow Christian, perhaps another guest or a household slave, then Paul had in mind one of the "weaker" believers fearing that eating the food would be an act of religious compromise. In this case, Paul also said that the believer should not eat the meat. Eating meat offered to idols would create a moral dilemma for the "weaker" believer that could destroy his or her faith. In referring to the conscience of the person who might announce that the food had been offered to idols (v. 29), Paul was stating his main principle about how Christians should exercise their freedom. It is not only what the Christian knows that matters; what others believe should also be considered. A Christian's freedom in Christ should always take into account the interests of others.

Having digressed from his main point about the Christian being at liberty to eat food purchased in the marketplace or to accept an invitation to eat at the house of an unbeliever, Paul next explains why a believer has the right to eat what is offered to him or her (vv. 27, 29–30). Unless someone announces that food has been offered to idols, a Christian has the freedom to eat that food. Christians should eat in a prayerful spirit of thanksgiving to God and not feel condemned.

Paul again restates the basic principle that he was longing for the Corinthians to follow: Christians should not insist on their rights without considering others. In the area of eating and drinking, we should thoughtfully avoid causing offense to others by our actions. And in this matter, Paul offered himself as an example (v. 33). Paul desired that the Corinthians would imitate him, just as he also imitated Christ (11:1).

11:2—14:40

The Church at Worship

The next major section of Corinthians deals with a variety of issues connected to the worship practices of the community of believers in Corinth. Paul first addresses cultural issues related to the proper decorum of men and women during public worship (11:2–16). He then responds to troubling reports about divisions within the church manifested in the celebration of the Lord's Supper (11:17–34) and addresses questions that the Corinthians appear to have raised regarding the manifestation of the Spirit in worship (12:1—14:40).

The entire section needs to be read in continuity with Paul's advice in 10:23. In each of the situations Paul addressed, his concern was that the Corinthians would learn not to seek only their own good, but that of others (v. 24). This should especially be the case for the church when gathering together for public worship as the body of Christ. Worship should be conducted in an orderly and dignified manner and within an atmosphere of mutual love and respect.

11:2–16. Communal Worship and Head Coverings. In their letter to Paul, the Corinthians appear to have affirmed their loyalty to the traditions and practices they had received from Paul. While the apostle praised them for remembering him (11:2), he did not approve of the practice of women no longer wearing head coverings in public worship.

Although there was nothing intrinsically wrong with women not covering their heads, it was a problem culturally. A woman who did not cover her head in public in the Greco-Roman world was seen as immodest. As such, these women were causing a distraction during worship that was bringing shame on the Christian community and was also dishonoring their husbands. Paul addressed the issue on three levels: the order of creation; the customs and social practices of propriety in the Greco-Roman world; and the basic principles of nature.

In appealing to these women to change their ways, Paul was arguing that their actions with their own heads had huge implications for their metaphorical head, that is, their husbands (v. 3). Paul based his argument on the pattern of relationships he saw in the creation order of men and women (cf. Gen. 2:18–25; 1 Cor. 11:8) and in reference to Christ. Some commentators understand Paul's metaphorical use of "head" (kephalē) in a hierarchical sense, indicating "authority." Understood in this way, Paul's argument was that a man or husband has authority over the woman or wife. "Head" could be also understood in a metaphorical sense to mean "the source of existence," as in the source or head of a river. Although this is not a common meaning elsewhere, the context in which a word is used matters most. But perhaps what makes this view more reasonably valid is that this is the way Paul explains his reasoning in 11:12 about the sources of men and women. Thus, the three illustrative relationships Paul had in mind in v. 3 are: (1) Christ as the source encompassing all of humankind (as in Eph. 4:13); (2) the man, Adam, as the source of the woman, Eve (Gen. 2:21–23); and (3) God as the source, in relation to Christ (the Messiah), in sending Him to redeem humankind (cf. Luke 1:31–32).

In 1 Corinthians 11:4–6, Paul describes the problem that was occurring in the church. The issue had to do with cultural expectations for men and women within the Greco-Roman world regarding the wearing of a head covering. His specific concern was that the actions of believers in this regard were bringing dishonor rather than honor on their heads (vv. 4–5). The specific reference to praying or prophesying indicates that the discussion was in regard to the worship customs of the community of believers. Paul did not express concern about women's involvement or noninvolvement in praying or prophesying (cf. 14:1–5) in public, but rather the way in which women attired themselves in that setting.

Paul's comments in 11:6 emerge from the belief at that time that a woman who did not cover her head was in danger of being considered a prostitute. Thus, the practice of some women to worship without covering their heads would have been scandalous (v. 16). In order to explain why men should not wear a head covering and women should, Paul drew again on the Creation account of men and women in Genesis 2. In 1 Corinthians 11:7–9, Paul did not deny that the woman was created in God's image and as man's equal partner, but he argued that the fact that the first woman was created from Adam's side indicates that a wife also brings glory and honor to her husband. The behavior of women in Corinth was doing just the opposite. Rather than shame their husbands, they were to cover their heads and bring honor to them, for in doing that all honor and glory during worship would be given to God.

But it is important to note that Paul does not stop there (vv. 11–12). The honor in marriage of which Paul speaks is not a one-way street. Although the woman was originally created from man, today men also come from women. This means that neither the husband nor the wife should do anything that would offend the other or damage the influence of the gospel.

Verse 10 is one of the most puzzling verses in the NT. The difficulty revolves around two issues: the identity of the angels and what Paul meant by the references to "head," "authority," and "angels." Who are the angels? Some commentators have suggested that Paul was thinking of evil angels. They have argued that Paul wanted women to protect themselves from the lustful desires of evil angels, like those who, in the opinion of some, cohabited with humans before the Flood (cf. Gen. 6:1ff.). It is more likely, however, that Paul had in mind holy angels, who veil their own faces in the presence of God (Is. 6:2). Thus, women in church should also dress with propriety for worshiping God. In his first letter to Timothy, Paul also acknowledges that our actions are not only visible to God but also to the "the elect angels" (1 Tim. 5:21; cf. 1 Pet. 1:12).

According to some, Paul was saying in 1 Corinthians 11:10 that a head covering is a symbol of the authority under which a woman has been placed. Thus, by choosing to wear a head covering, a woman was acknowledging her subjection to a man. If this is the case, however, it seems strange that Paul would use the word "authority" and not the word "subjection" itself. Others claim that the head covering is not an indication of a woman's subjection to a man but rather a symbol of her authority or freedom to pray and prophesy in public worship. In this case, the head covering gives her the authority to fulfill a role she otherwise could not have performed before. One of the main difficulties with both of these views is that the word "symbol" is not actually in the text. Some translators have added it in an attempt to help the reader make sense of the passage.

The text literally reads, "a woman ought to have authority over her head." In other words, it is the woman, not anyone else, who has authority over her own head. Understood from this perspective, Paul is simply saying that the woman has the authority (i.e., the freedom to choose) to do as she pleases with her own head. She has the authority to decide whether she should wear a head covering. In light of his earlier remarks about honor and dishonor, and in light of the presence of the holy angels during worship, Paul desired that women should exercise their authority by wearing a head covering. In choosing to wear it, the women would honor their husbands and maintain their dignity.

Paul concludes his appeal with a final reason drawn from nature regarding why women should cover their heads, that is, from what society believed was natural. It was natural for men to have short hair and for women to have long hair (vv. 14–15). In the Greco-Roman world, hair length was an indication of gender distinction. Men kept their hair short, while women kept their hair long. Since long hair was believed to be sign of effeminacy, long hair on a man was seen as a mark of gender confusion—and thus unnatural. Paul's comments should not be understood as a divine endorsement of the cultural views of the Roman world. He was simply drawing on the prevailing customs to make a point his audience could identify with. In this case, it is simply that in the same way long hair provides a woman with a natural covering, a head covering during worship reaffirms that which is natural.

How should modern Christians relate to Paul's counsel regarding head coverings? While his counsel has been applied in a variety of different ways, there are three main views that should be noted. The first is that Paul's views are so firmly rooted in the culture of his day that they simply do not apply to Christians living in a very different world. Paul's remarks are merely descriptive of the cultural values of his day and Christians, therefore, need not concern themselves with Paul's counsel. The second view argues the exact opposite. Paul's instructions transcend human culture and should therefore be taken literally. This conviction is then applied to Christians in all cultures and at all times. Although it is not as common in the Western world, the influence of this viewpoint can be seen in various Christian traditions around the world where women cover their heads in church. A third view falls between the two just mentioned. While Paul's instructions are certainly related to the cultural conditions in which they were written, they nevertheless contain general principles that apply to all ages and cultures. In this case, Paul's main point was not head coverings in and of themselves but the more fundamental issue of the distinction between men and women that is ultimately rooted in the Creation account. Christians should not seek to blur the lines of distinction between men and women. While various cultures may express that distinction through different types of clothing and outward forms of expression, Christians should not seek to eradicate those distinctions. Attempting to do so will only bring shame on the Christian community.

In addition, although Paul affirmed a clear distinction between men and women, he did not use that distinction to prohibit women from participating and speaking in public worship. On the contrary, he argued for the functional equality of both men and women in worship. Men and women are to pray and prophesy in church—they just need to do so in a manner that does not bring shame on their spouses, themselves, or the community. Since cultures vary around the world, the application of this principle will also vary.

Paul ends this section with a final appeal in v. 16. The word usually translated as "contentious" (Gr. philoneikos) means to be fond of strife. Paul probably had in mind some in the church who still may have had a defiant attitude about the importance of a woman wearing a head covering. If that is the case, Paul was reminding them that what he had said reflects the common custom of "the churches of God" (v. 16).

11:17–34. The Celebration of the Lord's Supper. The discussion and instructions on the appropriate attitudes in corporate worship continue. In this section, Paul directs his attention to problems related to the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Though Paul began the chapter by praising the Corinthians for maintaining the traditions he had delivered to them (v. 3), in this section he offers them no such praise. In fact, he specifically mentions his lack of praise twice (vv. 17, 22). Paul had been informed that during the church gathering there were divisions among the members (v. 18).

Since church buildings did not emerge until the second half of the third century, Christians gathered together in homes that were large enough to accommodate their needs. Modern archaeological excavations in Corinth have revealed the existence of Roman villas with a main dining space, known as a triclinium, with four or five adjacent rooms with an entrance to an atrium or a colonnade place in the center around a pool to collect rainwater. These Roman villas could accommodate between thirty and fifty people. The most important, honored people (around nine or ten) would gather together with the host in the triclinium and partake of the best food. Next in importance were the second-class guests and friends, who would gather in the adjacent rooms. Those of least importance, the poor and slaves, would meet around the atrium and would be served the worst of the food. It was a gathering of believers in a home similar to this one that Paul had in mind.

Early Christians celebrated the Lord's Supper in connection to a meal known as an agapē ("love") feast. The combined service served as a commemoration of the Passover meal Jesus celebrated with His disciples on the night He was betrayed. Individual members contributed food to the meal and the community then ate the meal together. It was a symbolic expression of the love and acceptance that characterized the life of the church. The church was not a place where people were divided by caste or social status; they were one in Christ. The practice of sharing a meal in connection to the Lord's Supper continued until about the fourth century, when churches became too large to celebrate a common meal together in this manner. At that time, the Lord's Supper became a separate service.

In Corinth, however, instead of members partaking of a meal together and then sharing in the Lord's Supper, some were eating before others so that some remained hungry and others got drunk (11:21). The most likely explanation for the divisions surrounding the Lord's Supper is the different economic statuses of the members of the community. As a result, the congregation had divided into first- and second-class believers, or, as the Greek indicates, the "haves" and the "have-nots." While this type of behavior was common in a private home, it was not appropriate for a community of Christians gathered together to celebrate the Lord's Supper. Paul found the entire situation shameful (v. 22).

To make his point, Paul reminded the Corinthians of the tradition regarding the Lord's Supper. Since Paul's letter likely predates the four Gospels, this may be the earliest recorded recollection in early Christianity of an oral tradition about the practice of the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Paul reminded the Corinthians of what Jesus said regarding those who were to partake of the emblems of the Lord's Supper: they were to do so in remembrance of Him. The broken bread symbolizes Christ's perfect life that was broken for us, while the cup symbolizes His blood shed for us. As we eat the bread and drink from the cup, we are called to reflect on the substitutionary death of Jesus on our behalf. In the same way that physical food gives life to the human body, so the repentant, believing sinner derives spiritual life from Jesus. The new covenant was made possible through the blood of Christ (v. 25). This new covenant is the fulfillment of the covenant promises of God in the OT (Jer. 31:31–34). The promise of forgiveness portrayed in the sacrificial system in the OT is now a reality.

Paul also connected the Lord's Supper with the Christian hope of Christ's coming. It helps the participants to look back on the death of Jesus and forward to His coming. Therefore, the Lord's Supper is a bridge that connects the two most important events in redemptive history. Since the Lord's Supper was such a significant event, Paul warned the Corinthians that anyone who ate of the bread and drank from the cup of the Lord "in an unworthy manner" would become guilty of the body and blood of the Lord (v. 27). In fact, the warning is so important that Paul states it twice within just three verses (v. 29). What does it mean to participate in "an unworthy manner"? Unfortunately, many have mistakenly understood this to mean that a person must be worthy enough to participate. Nothing, however, could be further from the truth. The Lord's Supper is, after all, a reminder that we are not worthy. We are all sinners in need of Christ's forgiveness.

Contextually, Paul was talking about the unworthy manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper. The Corinthians were partaking of the table in an irreverent way. They were not only treating it like a regular meal, with some people even getting drunk, but they did not even eat the meal together. They were divided up into different groups based on their socioeconomic positions within society without regard for the needs of others. It is in this sense that they were not discerning Christ's body (v. 29), that is, the true nature of the community of believers that make up the church, the body of Christ. Instead of caring for others within the church, they were acting in a selfish manner, focusing on their own spiritual life and their social privileges. In the very act that defined the church as one body in Christ, the Corinthians were acting like anything but a church.

Instead of experiencing God's grace in connection with the Lord's Supper, the Corinthians were experiencing judgment. While the suffering and death of some of the believers in Corinth may have been a consequence of their drunken and gluttonous behavior, to Paul it also was the evidence of God's judgment (v. 30). He wanted this to be a warning to the church. If the Corinthians did not want to fall under God's judgment, they were to take the time to evaluate their own behavior (v. 31). Paul desired that they would heed his advice so that the next time they came together to eat, they would wait for each other so they could eat together (v. 33). And if anyone was hungry, they were admonished to eat at home first. Paul had other issues he wanted to deal with in Corinth, but he did not say what those were. Whatever they were, he wanted to deal with those circumstances in person (v. 34).

12:1–11. Many Gifts but One Spirit. Chapter 12 is part of the larger section that stretches from 11:2 to 14:40 and deals with issues connected to the church at worship. The specific issue in chapters 12–14 revolves around the proper use of spiritual gifts. Here Paul sets the stage by describing the role of the various gifts within the church (12:1–31a). This chapter is followed by the famous passage on love (chap. 13). The subject of love is actually the fundamental basis on which Paul wanted the use of spiritual gifts to be expressed. It is in chapter 14 that we discover one of the reasons for the entire discussion of spiritual gifts: the abuse of the gifts of tongues and prophecy in church.

The first words of 12:1 signal the introduction of a new topic (cf. 7:1; 7:25; 8:1; 16:1, 12). While most Bibles prefer to translate the Greek word pneumatikōn as "spiritual gifts," it is possible to translate the term as "spiritual persons." While spiritual gifts are discussed in the chapter, Paul's ultimate concern was with the individuals who regarded themselves as "spiritual" (cf. 14:37). There was a danger—and in some cases a reality—of people claiming that they had a higher spiritual status within the community, which created disparity among the believers. Paul rejected this kind of mentality and explained that those who supposedly had inferior gifts were just as needed and valuable as anyone else (12:22).

In vv. 2–3, Paul emphasizes that the first gift of the Spirit is the confession of faith that "Jesus is Lord." This confession is a clear mark of the presence and activity of the Spirit. It constitutes a fundamental point of unity that distinguishes those who speak by the Spirit from those who do not. Faith begins with the gift of the Spirit. The most basic gift of the Spirit is faith in Jesus. This gift sets Christians apart from non-Christians and is the basis of Christian unity.

Within the Christian community there is diversity, which is manifested not only in the different spiritual gifts the members have received but also in the ministries and activities. Paul sought unity amid this diversity. The word "unity" presupposes diversity. Gifts are diverse, but the recipients of those gifts recognize the Holy Spirit as the sole Giver of the gifts (v. 4). In Him we are united. While highlighting the gifts of the Spirit, Paul did not ignore the functions of God and the Lord. He mentions each member of the Godhead: "the same Spirit" (v. 4); "the same Lord," that is, Jesus Christ, the Son (v. 5); and "the same God"—in this case a reference to the Father (v. 6). The order, however, is not Father-Son-Spirit, but Spirit-Son-Father. In the same way that the Godhead is one, so believers can experience unity in the midst of a diversity of gifts, ministries, and activities. All these diverse gifts, ministries, and activities are from the Triune God and strengthen the unity of the church. Paul's listing of knowledge, wisdom, and faith as being spiritual gifts does not imply that only some members have access to these gifts. Clearly these are important for all members (1:5; 2–3; 2:5). If this is the case, he would be saying that some members have special gifts in wisdom and knowledge, particularly in "word" or "message" (logos), and that some have special gifts of faith, particularly as it is manifested in healing, miracles, and prophecy, and that some have special gifts regarding tongues and their interpretation.

Paul explains that the gifts of the Holy Spirit are given for the benefit of the entire church (12:7). In vv. 8–10, he provides a list of some of the gifts of the Spirit while in v. 28 he provides a list of the various ministries in which these gifts are manifest. The word or message of wisdom (v. 8) referred to here is not of the world (1:17—2:16) but of the Spirit. It does not refer to an esoteric kind of human wisdom that some of the Corinthians valued but rather to the message of Christ crucified as the true wisdom of God (1:24, 30; 2:7). In the OT book of Proverbs, wisdom refers to the righteous application of knowledge and understanding to one's life. Here Paul clarifies that this righteous application (wisdom) should be guided by the knowledge and understanding of Christ's crucifixion. In other words, what we know and believe should find real manifestation in what we do and how we do it. The word or message of knowledge (12:8) should be understood as informing the word or message of wisdom.

Since the faith (v. 9) Paul mentions is not the faith given to everyone, it must refer to a special manifestation of supernatural faith connected to miracles—the kind that can move mountains (13:2). Gifts of healings (12:9) were manifested in the ministries of Jesus and the apostles. This gift does not enable a person to heal everyone at any given time. It is a gift that is given in a specific instance when God uses someone as an instrument through which His healing power is manifest. Miracles (v. 10) may include all other kinds of supernatural activities beyond the healing of the sick.

The gift of prophecy (v. 10) is a declaration from God that is given to His prophets for His people. While this can at times include the disclosure of future events (i.e., "foretelling"), it is primarily a proclamation of God's will for the present (i.e., "forth-Telling"). In the Christian church, prophecy was a gift that Paul wished all could have (14:1).

The discerning or distinguishing of spirits (12:10) is literally "discernments of spirits." This gift tests whether spirits are from God, and at the same time it is used particularly in judging prophecies (cf. 1 John 4:1–3). This gift immediately follows prophecy in the order of gifts listed. The gift of tongues (1 Cor. 12:10) was and is controversial. It was the favorite gift among some of the Corinthians. It is likely for this reason that Paul lists it near the bottom. Paul never forgot to mention its companion, that is, interpretation (v. 10). This is given because of the unintelligibility of the tongues. It could be something like translation. It is a Spirit-inspired gift of utterance, and it may be given either to the tongues speaker or to another. Paul concludes by reminding the Corinthians that one and the same Spirit is in charge of all the diversities of gifts (v. 11).

12:12–31. The Church and the Analogy of the Body. In order to make his point clearer, Paul uses an analogy that compares the church to a human body with many parts representing unity in diversity. Although the church has many members, they all constitute the one body of Christ. The body does not need only eyes but also ears and a nose. God created the human body in such a way that all these different organs are needed. If there were no diversity, there would be no body. Otherwise, it would just be an eye, an ear, a nose, or a foot.

In the same way that the human body has many individual parts that work together for the overall good of the body, so the church is made up of different members who are called to work together to represent Christ in the world. The church crosses boundaries of gender, social status, class, and ethnic origins: men and women, rich and poor, slave and free, Jews and Gentiles (vv. 12–13; cf. Gal. 3:28–29). It is only in this oneness in diversity that Christ can be fully represented to the world. So, no member of the body of Christ should ever say to another member that he or she is not needed (v. 21). To make his point, Paul focused on how valuable those parts of the body are that are often thought to be weaker (v. 22), less honorable, and unpresentable (v. 23). Everyone is necessary and, since we are all connected together as one body, there should be no divisions in the community.

To prevent the Corinthians from getting caught up in the pursuit of the gifts they believed were the most spectacular, personally gratifying, and bestowed on them the greatest honor, Paul told them that there is a more excellent way. Indeed, as the Greek can and has been rendered, it is the most excellent way (v. 31). He had in mind those gifts that work to comfort, encourage, and edify the body of Christ. And the basis of all those gifts is love. Love is not one gift among many. It is the means through which all of the gifts reach their ultimate purpose. And it is to this gift of the Spirit that Paul next turns his attention.

13:1–13. Love: The More Excellent Way. Paul's discourse about love is not a digression. It plays a critical role in the discussion about spiritual gifts. Genuine love for others, which is a gift of the Spirit (Rom. 5:5; Gal. 5:22), was what the Corinthians desperately needed to replace their tendency toward self-centered spirituality. Paul begins by noting that the gifts of tongues, knowledge, and prophecy, which the Corinthians highly valued, are useless if they are devoid of love (1 Cor. 13:1–3). Without love, speaking in tongues is no better than a clanking chunk of brass; it is just noise. The same is true of the gift of prophecy and the ability to comprehend all mysteries and all knowledge (v. 2). As important as that kind of revealed knowledge can be, without love it is just meaningless information (cf. 8:1–3). Since God is love (cf. 1 John 4:8, 16), He can be fully known only through love. For this reason, love is even greater than the supernatural faith that can move mountains. Without love we cannot know God, and without God we are nothing (1 Cor. 13:2).

Verse 3 may seem surprising at first because providing for the poor and submitting to affliction appear to be examples of self-sacrifice for the sake of others. Such things, however, are not always what they appear to be. Outward actions, no matter how impressive, do not always reveal the true motivations of the human heart. As Jesus often noted, religious behavior can often be done for one's own glory (cf. Matt. 6:1). This appears to be Paul's point as well. He is saying that even acts involving self-sacrifice are meaningless if they are not motivated out of love.

In vv. 4–8a, Paul explains the nature of love—what love is and what it is not. In describing love, Paul does not use adjectives to define the nature of love. He uses sixteen different verbs because love involves action; love is something we do. There are nine verbs with a negative or destructive value and seven with a positive or constructive value:

Positive Qualities	Negative Qualities
Love is patient (v. 4)	Love does not envy (v. 4)
Love is kind (v. 4)	Love does not boast (v. 4)
Love rejoices in the truth (v. 6)	Love is not arrogant (v. 4)
Love endures/protects all things (v. 7)	Love is not rude/disrespectful (v. 5)
Love believes all things, or always trusts (v. 7)	Love is not self-seeking (v. 5)
Love hopes all things (v. 7)	Love is not easily angered (v. 5)
Love endures all things, or always perseveres (v. 8)	Love does not keep a record of wrongs and thinks no evil (v. 5)
	Love does not delight in evil (v. 6)
	Love never fails (v. 8)

Love involves a patient response to others and is kind in its immediate response (v. 4). The following eight verbs express what love is not. The Greek word for envy (zēloō; v. 4) can be used in either a negative or positive sense. Negatively, it can refer to feelings of jealousy because of another's achievements. It was this sort of envy that was behind the division and strife among the Corinthians. It can be used in a positive sense to refer to an "earnest desire" for something (cf. 12:31; 14:1, 39). The desire the Corinthians had for spiritual gifts (14:12) may have led to the envy they had of others.

Love does not boast or parade itself. It literally means to "behave as a braggart," or to "be a windbag." People with such characteristics desire to call attention to themselves. Paul may have been alluding to the boastful mentality that seems to have characterized some of the Corinthians. Closely related to boasting is the idea of being puffed up or arrogant (v. 4). The Corinthians who stood against Paul were described as being proud or puffed up (4:6, 18–19; 5:2; 8:1).

Love does not behave rudely or dishonorably (v. 5). The Greek verb aschēmoneō may not only refer to shameful behavior in general but it may also have sexual overtones. If it does, Paul may not only have had in mind the shameful behavior of the women in worship and of the church in connection to the celebration of the Lord's Supper (chap. 11) but also the immoral behavior of some of the believers in Corinth (cf. 5:1–2; 6:15). Love is also not self-seeking (13:5). Paul identified yet another one of the faults of the Corinthians. Love does not put its own interests above that of others, whether it is for self-gain, self-justification, or self-worth. To the contrary, it seeks the good of others, neighbor or enemy alike. Accordingly, it is not provoked (v. 5) easily to anger by others, nor does it think evil. The word logizomai literally means to "reckon." In other words, love does not keep a record of the wrongs it has experienced with the goal of inflicting vengeance in return.

In v. 6, the first clause is balanced by the second clause. One who has love rejoices in the truth, over every victory gained, every forgiveness offered, and every kind act received. It does not rejoice in wickedness, the evils of war, the oppression of the poor, or the fall of a brother or sister. Verse 7 includes four action verbs preceded with the adjective "all" (or perhaps "always") to describe an all-inclusive and unlimited love. The word stegō is usually translated as "bears" or "endures," but it also can be and has been rendered as "protects." Its literal meaning conveys the idea of covering. In describing a love without limits, Paul was contrasting true love with the four negatives characteristic of verse five.

In the conclusion of this section, Paul compares the permanence of love with the spiritual gifts so prized by the Corinthians—prophecy, tongues, and knowledge. No matter how impressive these spiritual gifts may appear to be in this present age, love is superior because love never fails (v. 8). Spiritual gifts, on the other hand, are limited, partial, and temporary. They belong to an age when things are only conceived and understood in part as we await the fullness of God's presence. Thus, even at their best, the gifts of tongues and prophecy are merely indirect ways of knowing and communicating with God (vv. 9–10). Just as childish things are left behind when a person becomes an adult (v. 11), so spiritual gifts will no longer be necessary when Christ returns. Then all the indirect ways of communicating with God will become obsolete, because we will communicate with God face-to-face (v. 12).

Paul concludes his discussion by noting that not only is love superior to spiritual gifts but also to the triad of virtues that should define the Christian life now and in the age to come. It was love—the greatest of the three enduring virtues of faith, hope, and love (v. 13)—that the Corinthians were to seek above all else (14:1a).

14:1–5. Prophecy and the Gift of Tongues. Paul was ready to deal with the misuse of the gift of tongues among the Corinthians and to regulate its use and that of the gift of prophecy in the church. He intended to show the superiority of prophecy without undermining the gift of tongues. Many have argued that speaking in tongues here does not refer to human languages but to a spiritual language. Paul's reference to human languages (vv. 10–11), however, suggests that the gift is about human languages. This is supported by the fact that in Acts 2, the gift enabled the apostles to speak other languages (see "Speaking in Tongues," p. 1475).

Paul agreed with the Corinthians that it was good to desire the gifts of the Spirit, but he would have liked for them to have desired more the gift of prophecy (cf. 12:31). He gave priority to prophecy without disparaging the gift of tongues. In vv. 2–5, Paul contrasts the two gifts. Since speaking in tongues is not intelligible to the congregation (the person is speaking only to God), it benefits only the individual to whom the Spirit is revealing mysteries. The word "mysteries" does not necessarily refer to hidden or incomprehensible things but to things revealed through Christ by the Spirit (cf. 2:1, 7; 4:1; 13:2; 14:2; 15:51).

Concerning the gift of prophecy, it expresses itself through upbuilding, encouragement, and comfort. In this passage, prophecy is not mentioned in the context of being a prediction of future events, because the emphasis is on the present experience of the congregation. The noun oikodomē ("edification," "strengthening") and the related verb oikodomeō ("to build," "to build up," "to strengthen") indicate that one of the primary purposes of the gift of prophecy is to build up the church. The latter two—exhortation or encouragement and comfort—point to the pastoral side of the gift. The basic distinction between the gifts of tongues and prophecy is that tongues edify the person while prophecy edifies the congregation. Therefore, Paul considered prophecy preferable to tongues. The gift of tongues can meet the criterion of building up the church if the message is translated. Community building remains at the heart of Paul's discussion of the gift of tongues.

14:6–12. Intelligibility in Worship. Paul then proceeds to develop the importance of intelligibility during church worship. He uses himself to illustrate his point. Whenever he would visit them, it would be better for them to hear him speaking by revelation (a revelation God gave him), by knowledge (a gift of the Spirit; 12:8), by prophecy (inspired utterances in church; 14:3), or by teaching (a gift; 12:29), for such things edify the church or are ōpheleō ("be of use, benefit" or "good") for them. Paul also uses musical instruments as an illustration (the flute or pipe, the harp, and the trumpet). The sound they emit should be precise enough for the listener to know what is being played. In the case of the trumpet, the call for battle should be clear enough for the soldiers to know what to do. The illustrations are applied to the life of the church. In order for the church to know what is being said, it is necessary for the language to be easy to understand; otherwise, it would be like speaking into the air (14:9). He adds another illustration. All languages communicate meaning, but if we do not know the language of the speaker we will both be like barbaros ("foreigner," a person speaking a different language) to each other (v. 11). Paul concludes the section with an appeal, encouraging the Corinthians, who were eager to receive spiritual gifts (Gr. pneumatōn, "spirits," or spiritual things; perhaps the gift of tongues), to strive to excel in those gifts that edify the church (v. 12).

14:13–25. Interpreting Tongues. The apostle returns to the need to interpret the utterances of the gift of tongues (vv. 13–25). He uses the rhetorical "I" to illustrate what takes place inside the person who speaks in tongues when praying during worship. In such cases, Paul's inner being (his spirit) was praying, but the intelligibility of what was being communicated was useless or unfruitful, having no profit for the congregation (v. 14). Therefore, it is better to pray and sing in such a way that the congregation grows in understanding. Since worship is to some extent interactive, understanding is important; otherwise, when the speaker blesses the congregation or gives thanks while speaking in tongues (in the spirit), the church would not be able to properly respond by saying, "Amen!" (v. 16). Paul specifically calls the person who does not understand an idiōtēs, that is, an untrained person. This could perhaps refer to someone who attends church but who, by being unable to understand what is said, appears to be unskilled. In order to reaffirm the importance of intelligibility in worship, Paul adds an autobiographical note. He spoke in tongues more than all the Corinthians, but he would rather speak a few intelligible words in church than thousands in tongues (v. 19).

This discussion is followed by an exhortation in which Paul appealed to the Corinthians to be like mature adults in their thinking and not to behave like children, requiring constant correction and discipline (v. 20). With respect to the evil of malice, it was fine for them to be babes (nēpios, children that were not yet able to speak), that is, not to experientially know about it. The reference to kakia ("wickedness," "depravity," "malice") is not accidental, because the only other place Paul uses it in 1 Corinthians is in 5:8, where it designates the immorality found in the church. Though many Corinthians prided themselves as being spiritually superior, they had not been able to deal correctly with the problem of sin in the church.

The role of the paraphrased quotation from Isaiah 28:11 in 1 Corinthians 14:21 is difficult to establish. Notice that the term for "law" (Gr. nomos) designates here the OT as a whole. The intention of the quotation is not entirely clear, but perhaps it is used to suggest that speaking in foreign tongues does not make the message of God accessible to others but in fact blocks it. This is illustrated by describing the impact that speaking in tongues would have on unbelievers present in a congregation. The lack of intelligibility in worship would cause the uninformed or unbelievers—that is to say, those knowing little about the gospel or non-Christians—to conclude that Christianity was like some of the Roman religions in which ecstatic religious experiences resulted in irrational behavior or mainomai ("to rage," "to be insane"). In such cases of unintelligibility, speaking in tongues would be a negative sign of irrationality instead of a positive sign as it was intended if interpretation were provided (v. 22). If all were prophesying, it could happen that an unbeliever would be convicted by the Spirit when listening to the message and join believers in the worship of God. In fact, that person would testify that God was truly among them (v. 25) and that the church is the temple of God (cf. 3:9, 16–17).

14:26–40. Order in Worship and Appeals. The last section of the chapter consists of instructions about order in worship accompanied by some appeals (vv. 26–40). When coming to church, it is appropriate to bring something to share with others, be it a psalm (a hymn), a teaching (instructions on matters of faith), a tongue (a manifestation of the gift), a revelation (a message from God), or an interpretation of tongues (v. 26). Paul provides a general principle: everything done during worship should contribute to the edification of the church. Order in worship is necessary because it facilitates the building up of the church. Concerning the gift of tongues, Paul indicates that no more than three people should speak, that they should not speak at the same time, and that there should be an interpreter (v. 27). In the absence of an interpreter, such persons should worship in silence (v. 28). This indicates that the gift of tongues was not an ecstatic experience during which the person lost self-consciousness or self-control.

Concerning the gift of prophecy, Paul required that no more than two or three speak, and the others were to evaluate what was being said (v. 29). The "others" could have been the whole congregation, but this may have been impractical. The reference could be to other prophets sitting in the congregation or those having the gift of discernment (12:10). In any case, the task would be to evaluate whether the teaching was from the Lord, and in a sense it could be an evaluation of the prophetic claim itself. The text does not explain how this was to be done, but it would have included harmony with the apostolic teaching (1 Cor. 4:6; 7:10; 15:3; Rom. 12:6; 2 Thess. 2:15). A further regulation stipulates that if a prophet were speaking and another prophet in the congregation had a revelation from the Lord, then the previous prophet should be silent and permit this person to speak. This regulation allowed for all prophets to speak in an orderly way to instruct and encourage the church. Paul rejected the idea that prophets are unable to control themselves and comments that the spirits of the prophets (the inner spiritual experience) are subject to the prophets (1 Cor. 14:32). He anchors orderly worship to the theological conviction that peace and harmony come from a God who is not the originator of confusion. Order characterizes the universal church of God (cf. v. 33).

Paul returns to the topic of the participation of women in worship (vv. 34–35), which was addressed before in 11:2–16. Some Greek manuscripts place vv. 34–35 after v. 40 and this, among other reasons, has led a number of scholars to argue that these verses are a later interpolation by a copyist. This argument is not enough to prove the case because most ancient documents going back to about the second century have the passage in its current position. It states that women are to keep silent (they are not permitted to speak) in church and to be submissive. If they want to learn something, they are to ask questions of their own husbands at home. Two reasons are given for these regulations: submission is based on the law (most probably Gen. 3:16) and it is shameful for women to speak in church (v. 35), that is, it is not a socially acceptable practice for women to speak in public.

There are two things that we can affirm about these regulations with a high level of certainty. First, this is not an absolute prohibition against women speaking in church. Paul had already regulated the circumstances under which a woman could pray and prophesy in church (prophesying includes edifying, exhorting, and comforting the church; 14:3; see also 11:2–16). Second, the context of 14:34–35 is about confusion, disorder, and lack of intelligibility in worship (cf. 1 Tim. 2:11–12). The implication is that some women were somehow involved in that situation and Paul wanted it to stop. Through their conduct, they were damaging the reputation of the church. Another possibility would be that Paul was dealing with husband-wife relationships. The Greek word used here for "women" (gynē) is the same one used for "wives." Moreover, the text specifically refers to these women asking their husbands at home. According to this line of interpretation, it could be speculated that some of the wives were evaluating the prophecy of their husbands in an inappropriate way, such that their actions were a violation of the principle of marital submission cited from the "law" and confirmed in other Pauline passages (Gen. 3:16; cf. Eph. 5:22–31; 1 Tim. 2:8–11; 1 Pet. 3:1–7), which had to do with wives, not all women in general. Other suggestions could be made to explain why Paul asked women to be silent, but they will be inferences drawn from the text and from social practices. We should also remember that Paul had already ordered some others to also keep silent during worship (14:28, 30).

At the end of the chapter (vv. 36–40), the apostle was speaking directly to the Corinthians with respect to the authority of his instructions. The two rhetorical questions addressed to the Corinthians intended to make clear that they had no authority to do what they were doing; the Lord was not guiding them. Paul provided a test for those claiming to be prophets (to have the gift of prophecy) or spiritual (to have the gift of tongues): it was necessary that they acknowledge his instructions for the church as commands from the Lord (cf. Col. 4:10). This statement indicates that Paul considered what he wrote to be an authoritative revelation from God. He concludes with words of judgment against those who would not listen to him (v. 38). Paul appealed to the Corinthians as brothers and sisters to desire earnestly the gift of prophecy without forbidding speaking in tongues under the guidelines he provided in these verses. The general principle is reaffirmed: in the church of Christ, everything should be done in an appropriate and orderly way (v. 40).

The Gift of Prophecy

Among the many gifts given by the Spirit to the church, the gift of prophecy is considered to be of major importance for the people of God. In fact, the Bible itself is the result of the work of the Spirit through humans, called prophets, who were endowed with the gift. Paul exhorts believers to engage in love and desire spiritual gifts, especially that of prophecy (1 Cor. 14:1).

1. Prophetic Experience. The gift of prophecy is in some ways unique. The prophets and prophetesses sometimes received messages from God that were predictive, but most of the time they were not. In such cases, the aim was to encourage, provide guidance, or call God's people to repentance and consecration to Him. The message received from God was called a revelation and would reach the prophets through dreams, visions, and auditions (see "Introduction to the Old Testament Historical Books," p. 350 and "Introduction to the Prophetic Books," p. 820).

During the reception of the message, the prophets sometimes went through unique experiences. They found themselves in a state in which they were able to see what God wanted them to see or receive. Sometimes those around them could not see what they were seeing (Dan. 10:7). Other times the prophets fell down (Num. 24:4) and their strength left them (Dan. 10:8). Daniel fell into a deep sleep (10:9). John fell at Christ's feet as though dead (Rev. 1:17), that is to say, he was unable to breathe. Even after a vision, prophets sometimes experienced physical trauma: Paul was blind (Acts 9:8); Zechariah could not speak (Luke 1:20); and Daniel was exhausted and sick for a number of days (8:27). These experiences were not always present in the life of the prophet. While under the power of the Spirit, prophets at times had conversations with angels (e.g., Luke 1:8–20). The message received was delivered orally (in forms such as discourse, narratives, parables, and poetry) or in written form.

2. Testing the Prophets. The OT testifies about the constant conflict between false prophets and the prophets of the Lord. Distinguishing between them was at times difficult, but the task was unavoidable. The Israelites asked the Lord how they could recognize whether the Lord was speaking through a prophet (Deut. 18:21). John counseled the church to test the spirits because of false prophets (1 John 4:1). The OT provides at least two cases in which the decision was crucial—Micaiah (1 Kin. 22) and Jeremiah in his encounter with Hananiah (Jer. 28). Since the topic is very important, the Scriptures provide some guidance.

First, the prediction of the prophet must be fulfilled (Deut. 18:22; cf. Jer. 28:8–9). This is a negative test—what was predicted did not take place—and apparently a clear one. Yet, it is very difficult to apply. It cannot always be immediately determined whether someone is a true prophet. It can be applied only when it is obvious that the prophecy was not fulfilled. In order to assist their audiences, sometimes a prophet gave, within a long-term prophecy, a short-term one that was immediately fulfilled (Jer. 28:16–17), thus demonstrating that he or she was a true prophet. Also, in some cases, the predictions of a false prophet could also be fulfilled (Deut. 13:1–2). This implies that this criterion is not self-sufficient.

Second, the messages of the prophets must agree with the messages of previous true prophets. This criterion presupposes that the prophetic messages could be used to evaluate new claims of prophetic revelations (Deut. 13:2; cf. Is. 30:8). Those listening to the new revelation would need a deep knowledge of the Word of the Lord. In the NT, the revelation of God through Jesus becomes the central criterion in conjunction with the written word (John 17:17; 1 John 4:2–3). This criterion is more difficult to falsify, but it can be falsified by evil forces masquerading as instruments of God (2 Cor. 11:13–14). Nevertheless, knowing the truth as it is in Jesus will protect God's people.

Third, true prophets will be faithful to the Lord and their lives will demonstrate it. False prophets will not live up to the covenant stipulations and will not condemn sin (Ezek. 13:22). They are described as arrogant (2 Pet. 2:18), deceitful (Acts 13:6–10), and often motivated by greed (2 Pet. 2:3, 13). This is a good test, but some people can give the impression of being holy while dressed in sheep's clothing (Matt. 7:15), in an attempt to validate their messages.

Fourth, the result of the ministry of a true prophet should be a blessing to God's people. Their fruits should be good (Matt. 7:16–17). This criterion is closely related to the previous one but goes beyond it by examining the end results of the ministries of those who claim to be prophets. The application of this criterion will require time. This long-term criterion will be difficult to falsify because deception sooner or later reveals itself for what it is.

Based on the previous biblical information we can conclude, first, that we should be open to the possibility that God may speak to us through a prophet. Second, in order to identify a true prophet, we must have a solid knowledge of and be firmly grounded in Scripture. We should use the holy Scriptures to evaluate the teachings and ministry of anyone claiming to be a prophet (1 Cor. 14:29). Finally, we should not hastily accept somebody's claim to the prophetic ministry. We must allow time for the fruits to manifest themselves. Testing the spirits takes time and requires prayer and knowledge of what God has already revealed to us.

3. Perpetuity of the Gift. Paul establishes that the gifts of the Spirit are to remain in the church to the very end (Eph. 4:12–13) and connects them to the Second Coming of Christ. He told the Corinthians that they were not lacking any gift as they were waiting for the revelation of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 1:7; 13:9–10). The perpetuity of the gift of prophecy has been a topic of debate among Christians.

4. Jesus: The Ultimate Prophet. In the OT, the prophetic ministry pointed to the coming of the Prophet, Jesus Christ, the prophet like Moses (cf. Deut. 18:15). In the OT, Moses is a unique prophet. The Lord did not communicate with him through visions and dreams, but directly (Num. 12:7–8), yet the revelation of God to him was partial. In order for God to fully reveal Himself, the instrument of revelation must be divine. The Son of God became human in order to reveal the Father to us (John 1:14). His communication with the Father was direct and unmediated; we are never told that Jesus had visions or dreams. He was a prophet like Moses yet superior to Moses. The revelation and the message Jesus brought to us from the Father was final and complete; no other revelation can add to His self-revelation. Through the Spirit, this most glorious revelation has been expounded and preserved for us by the apostles and constitutes what we now call the New Testament.

If this reasoning is correct, then a question must be raised: Is post-apostolic prophecy needed? What would be its purpose if all that we need was brought to us by the greatest Prophet known on earth, the Son of God? Many Protestants believe that since we find in Christ all the truth necessary for salvation, a post-apostolic prophet is not only unnecessary but irrelevant. They believe that the gift of prophecy came to an end after the apostles died. This idea is rejected by many others who believe in the perpetuity of the gift of prophecy. Post-apostolic prophecy is not foundational for the church, but it aims to edify the church and provide comfort to believers by ministering to their spiritual needs. Through it the people of God are called to faithfulness to the Lord and to study and embrace biblical truth. God's people are to contribute to the building up of the church while at the same time remain subservient to the Scriptures.

15:1–58

The Resurrection of the Body

Up to this point in his letter, Paul has spent most of his time addressing the troubling behavior of the Corinthians. In chapter 15, however, he turns his attention to their beliefs about one of the most basic, fundamental truths of Christianity—the resurrection of the dead, the Christian hope. Although this section of the letter may at first seem to be completely unrelated to his previous instructions, they appear to have been closely related in Paul's mind. The aberrant behavior of the Corinthians was not an isolated issue. It was an outward indication that they had failed to understand fully the significance and implications of the apostolic proclamation of Christ's death and resurrection. The bodily resurrection of Christ from the dead affirms the value and importance of the body. It is also the basis of the Christian hope that the dead in Christ will be raised in bodily form at the return of Jesus. This reality stands in stark contrast to the negative view of the body commonly expressed in the Greco-Roman world. Accordingly, what Christians do with their bodies matters. It testifies to the transforming power of Christ in this world—the body will itself be transformed into a glorious body when Christ returns. Viewed from this perspective, Paul's discussion of the resurrection is the glorious foundation on which his entire letter is built, and it is the basis on which the Corinthians were to evaluate their lives.

15:1–11. The Gospel and the Certainty of Christ's Resurrection. Paul begins his discussion of the nature of the resurrection by reminding the Corinthians that the death and resurrection of Jesus are the very heart of the gospel (v. 1) he had proclaimed to them and that had changed their lives when they received it (v. 2). He starts to establish an area of mutual agreement from which he could then help them understand the implications of the resurrection of Christ that they had failed to recognize. This was so important that Paul reminded them again of his instruction to them about the centrality of Christ's death and resurrection (vv. 3–4).

The terminology of "delivering" or "receiving" (v. 3) indicates that Paul was passing along a tradition that predated his own conversion. The death and resurrection of Christ were the foundation on which the church originated. The way in which Paul states the tradition he received suggests to many that he drew from terminology from an early Christian creed, a confession of faith, or even perhaps a portion of an early hymn. That tradition was rooted in the belief that Christ's death was not simply a miscarriage of justice. It was part of God's divine will and served as an atoning sacrifice for our sins (v. 3). Moreover, although Christ was buried, He was resurrected on the third day (v. 4). Paul notes that this belief among early Christians was not simply wishful thinking; it was according to the Scriptures.

Although Paul does not indicate what particular passages of Scripture he had in mind, they would likely have included passages such as Isaiah 52:13—53:12 in connection to Christ's death and allusions to Christ's resurrection that Christians saw in passages like Psalm 16:9–11 (cf. Acts 2:24–32), perhaps combined with other passages that speak of God's deliverance on the third day (i.e., Hos. 6:2; Jon. 1:17; cf. Matt. 12:40). The Scriptures played such a pivotal role in the church's understanding of Christ that they are not only mentioned twice in 1 Corinthians 15:3–4, but Paul even places the testimony of the Scriptures before the list of eyewitnesses who saw Christ after His resurrection (vv. 5–11).

Paul continues proclaiming the death and resurrection of Jesus by reminding the Corinthians of the accounts of Christ's appearances to others after His death and resurrection. Since the Corinthians were familiar with the events he was describing, Paul did not provide the circumstances or details concerning these appearances. In a seemingly hierarchical sequence marked by adverbs such as "then," "at once" or "at the same time," and "last of all," he lists several resurrection appearances. Paul uses the passive form of the verb "was seen" (Gr. ōphthē) to indicate that Jesus took the initiative in the appearances (cf. Gen. 12:7; 26:24; 35:1, 7; Ex. 3:14–16). The list of eyewitnesses at the resurrection of Christ begins with Cephas, the Aramaic name which Paul normally uses for Peter (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; Gal. 1:18; 2:9, 11, 14). Next is a reference to the twelve, a term Paul uses as an official designation of the apostolic group of Jesus's disciples. Paul likely had in mind the first appearance of Jesus to the disciples when Thomas was not there (John 20:24). There is no account in the NT about Christ's special appearance to more than five hundred people in one gathering (1 Cor. 15:6). The book of Acts mentions the meeting of about 120 disciples in the upper room (Acts 1:15), but since the appearance that Paul mentions occurred to more than five hundred disciples simultaneously, it must have happened somewhere else, perhaps in Galilee (cf. Matt. 28:10, 16).

Jesus was then seen by James, the brother of Jesus, and then by "all the apostles" (1 Cor. 15:7). Although the appearance to "all the apostles" may refer to Christ's final appearance to the Twelve at the time of His ascension to heaven (Acts 1:2–12), Paul seems to have had a different group in mind. Since he regarded James, the brother of Jesus, as an apostle (Gal. 1:19), the word "apostles" here is most likely being used in a more general sense to refer to a larger group of witnesses who had seen the risen Lord and who had been commissioned by Him to proclaim the gospel (cf. Rom. 16:7).

Paul concludes his list of witnesses to the resurrected Christ with his own experience (v. 8). Paul mentions that he had been ektrōma, which has been rendered as "born out of due time" or "abnormally born." This should not be understood to mean that Paul merely lived after the time of Jesus and the apostles. This Greek verb is used only here in the NT and three times in the Septuagint (cf. Num. 12:12; Job 3:16; Eccl. 6:3), and it refers to a birth that does not follow a normal pregnancy, whether it be due to an abortion, a premature birth, or a miscarriage. Thus Paul is saying that in comparison to the other disciples, he was no better than a stillborn child. He did not have the privilege of growing in his faith as did the disciples during Jesus's earthly ministry. He was suddenly and dramatically changed from a persecutor to an apostle. He may also be expressing his sense of unworthiness to be numbered among the apostles because of the ways in which he had persecuted the church (cf. 1 Cor. 15:9–10; 1 Tim. 1:12–15).

15:12–19. The Consequences of Denying the Resurrection. Now that Paul had reminded the Corinthians of the historical basis of Christ's resurrection, he set out to show how illogical it was that some of the believers in Corinth denied the idea of a general resurrection of the dead. This may sound shocking, but it is not really all that surprising in light of the common beliefs at the time. There were two main ideas about the nature of death in the Greco-Roman world. The first view, known as annihilationism, states that death is simply the end of life; there is no life beyond the grave. Based on the Platonic idea of the immortality of the soul, the second view indicates that death frees the soul from the material limits of a physical body to go on living in a disembodied state. Just as modern culture influences people today, some of the new believers in Corinth were likely still holding on to some of the views of the society around them. They appeared to have embraced the miraculous resurrection of a hero like Jesus, but a general resurrection did not fit with their view of reality. To help them see the illogical nature of their view, Paul listed the negative results that would follow if there were no general resurrection (vv. 13–19).

According to Paul, denying the possibility of a general resurrection would result in the collapse of Christianity itself: (1) Christ would not have been resurrected (v. 13); (2) Paul's preaching would have been useless (v. 14); (3) the faith of the Corinthians would be futile—a good-for-nothing sham (v. 17); (4) preachers like Paul would be false witnesses (v. 15); (5) the Corinthians would be enslaved in their sins with no hope of inheriting the kingdom of God (v. 17); (6) fellow believers who died would be lost for all eternity (v. 18); and (7) if life in this world is all there is, Christians would be the most miserable people, since they would have suffered so much for nothing (v. 19).

15:20–28. Implications of Christ's Bodily Resurrection. Since the Corinthians agreed that Christ had indeed risen from the dead, Paul explains that thus they logically must accept the hope of the general resurrection of believers. His first argument states that on account of His resurrection, Christ became "the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep" (v. 20). Christ is the beginning of the resurrection, not the end. The firstfruits indicates that there is much more produce to come soon. The future harvest still to come is the resurrection of the dead who are described as "those who have fallen asleep" (v. 20). Death is not the end; it is just a temporary state similar to sleep, and the resurrection is the awakening of the dead (cf. Job 3:11–17; Dan. 12:2; John 11:11–14; 1 Thess. 4:15–17).

In explaining the process of death and resurrection, Paul refers to "all" of humanity twice. All die in Adam, and all will be made alive in Christ (v. 22). The first "all" is easily understood, but in what sense will all be made alive in Christ? Paul was not arguing here for some sort of universal salvation of both the righteous and the wicked. Although his focus in chapter 15 is on the resurrection of believers, his terminology here is general enough to point to the final resurrection that will result in eternal life for those who have followed God and the resurrection of condemnation for those who have not (cf. John 5:28–29). In 1 Corinthians 15:23–24, Paul reveals the order of resurrection: Looking through the lens of the Apocalypse, the resurrection of the wicked and their final judgment will occur at the end of the Millennium (Rev. 20:1–15). The complete restoration of the kingdom of God will be accomplished only after Christ's defeat of all the forces of evil arrayed against God, represented here as dominion, rulership, authority, and power (v. 24), and finally His destruction of even death itself—the last enemy (v. 26). When that day comes, Christ will then deliver the kingdom to God the Father (v. 24). The world will once again be subjected to God. Nothing will ever again challenge God's rule.

Perhaps surprisingly, Paul notes that on the day when Christ will have forever conquered the power of sin and death in this world, He will hand this world back to the Father, so that "God may be all in all" (v. 28). Verse 28 has led to much discussion regarding the relationship of the Father and the Son. Some have mistakenly interpreted Christ's submission to the Father to reflect an eternal functional role in both nature and being. While this passage indicates that Christ clearly subjects Himself to the Father, it says nothing about Christ being by nature inferior—an idea expressed in the early Christian heresy known as Arianism. Nor does it teach that Christ has been eternally submissive from eternity past. The language Paul uses here is functional, referring to Christ's work of redemption. It is a continuation of Christ's voluntary submission to the Father when He took humanity on Himself for all eternity (Phil. 2:6–11). In relation to His divine nature, however, Christ will never be inferior to God. Thus, Paul's purpose in 1 Corinthians 15 is to demonstrate the magnificent reality of Christ's continued solidarity with resurrected humans in God's restored kingdom.

15:29–34. If the Resurrection Were Not True. To help the Corinthians recognize how foolish it was for them to continue to deny the resurrection of the dead, Paul points out two additional negative consequences of their denial (cf. vv. 12–19). The first example is the foolishness of the practice of baptism for the dead, if there is no resurrection (v. 29). The second is drawn from Paul's own sufferings for the gospel (vv. 30–32). Paul's basic point is clear. Since baptism is itself a symbol of a believer's union with Christ in His death and resurrection (cf. Rom. 6:3–4; Col. 2:12), it makes no sense to deny the reality of the resurrection. What would be the purpose of baptism if there were no resurrection? What is difficult to grasp, however, is what Paul meant by the expression "baptized for the dead" (1 Cor. 15:29). Different suggestions have been offered, but it is better to interpret the expression as referring to the decision of some to be baptized so that they would be able to be reunited with dead loved ones at the resurrection. It could also be that the decision to be baptized was a response to the exemplary life of those who had died in Christ. This case would refer to people not being baptized in place of the dead but because of the dead. The lives of faithful Christians who have died in the faith have motivated others to be united to Christ. Why would these people be baptized if there were no future resurrection? This view makes sense of Paul's terminology, and it does not involve a baptismal practice that is contrary to the Scriptures.

Paul's second and last argument was drawn from his own personal experience (v. 30). He and the other apostles had constantly faced difficulties and hardship on account of their commitment to proclaim the gospel. The threat of danger was so real that Paul declared that he was confronted with death every day (lit. "I die daily"; v. 31). Paul is not speaking metaphorically here but about real death. The word he uses (apothnēskō) is the same one he used earlier to refer to death in a literal sense (cf. 8:11; 9:15). If there is no resurrection, Paul's entire ministry was for no purpose. Why would he risk his life on a daily basis if life in this world were all there was?

Writing from the city of Ephesus, Paul illustrates his point by referring to the real dangers he faced in Ephesus from those who opposed the gospel (v. 32). It is unlikely that Paul was claiming to have actually been thrown to the wild beasts in an arena in Ephesus. Barring a miracle, Paul would not have survived that event. And if God had intervened to save his life, Paul would have certainly mentioned it in the list of missionary hardships he recounts in 2 Corinthians 11:23–28. The beasts are more likely a metaphor for the enemies he faced in Ephesus, such as Demetrius (Acts 19:23—20:1). The challenges in Asia were so difficult that, in his second letter to the Corinthians, Paul states that he despaired even of life itself (2 Cor. 1:8). The only thing that sustained him was his belief in God, who raises the dead (2 Cor. 1:9).

Beginning with a well-known quotation taken from the Greek playwright Menander (1 Cor. 15:33–34), Paul called the Corinthians to awake to righteousness and avoid the sins of corruption by bad company and willful ignorance of God while they were waiting for Jesus's coming, when all things would be subject to His rule (cf. 15:28). Paul had reprimanded the Corinthians for acting like immature infants (3:1). Now here, in response to their denial of the resurrection, he even more shockingly declared that some did not know God (15:43). In spite of all their claims to be spiritually enlightened and to possess "knowledge" (8:1), many of the Corinthians were actually no better than the pagans who did not know God.

15:35–49. The Physicality of the Resurrection. Paul continues his discussion of the resurrection by addressing two related questions about the nature of the resurrected body (v. 35). He answers these questions with three analogies (vv. 36–41) and then applies them to the resurrection (vv. 42–44). He begins by chiding the Corinthians for failing to recognize that the body is like a seed sown in the ground. Although it goes into the ground in the form of a seed, it comes forth as a plant. He reminds them that, for this transformation to take place, the sown seed must die (v. 36). While modern science has proven that a seed does not actually die, the point is still the same. For a seed to become a plant, it must cease to be a seed. How this occurs is a mystery, but it is God who provides the new body according to His plan (v. 38). By way of analogy, the same is true of the human body. The dead body that is buried in the ground will, by a miraculous act of God, come forth as a resurrected human body. This leads Paul to his second and third analogies (vv. 39–41).

Building on the analogy of the seed, Paul points out to the Corinthians that there are different types of flesh in the world God has created (v. 39). While the word "flesh" (sarx) is used in a wide variety of ways in the NT, here it simply refers to the outward appearance of the physical body. Humans, animals, birds, and fish each have a different type of body that is appropriate for the earthly realm in which they live. At the same time, Paul notes that this is true not only of the bodies in the terrestrial world but also of the bodies in the celestial (epouranios) or heavenly world. Paul adds another element, an important difference. The "glory" (doxa) or "splendor" of the bodies in the earthly world is not only different from the heavenly bodies but the heavenly bodies also differ from one another (v. 41).

The point behind these two analogies is simple: in the same way that God has fitted the created order with the appropriate kind of body for the sphere of its existence, so God will provide a new form of existence for the resurrected human body. The "glory" of the resurrected body, however, will be far more glorious than the body that was buried. It is on this point that Paul elaborates in more detail in the conclusion to his argument.

All the analogies Paul has employed lead to one fundamental point regarding the resurrection from the dead (v. 42). While there is a level of continuity between the human body that dies and the resurrected body, the body that will come forth from the grave will be far more than just a recycled human corpse. Paul highlights these differences with four antitheses (vv. 42–44).

Paul is indeed defending a bodily existence in the resurrection. The resurrection will entail a transition from bodies of "flesh" to glorified spiritual bodies. To illustrate his point, Paul uses Adam and the resurrected Christ as examples of these two types of bodies. Adam is an example of the "natural" (psychikos) body that is fit for existence in this world. It is a body that is subject to the limitations of temporal existence in this world. Christ, as the second Adam, is an example of the "spiritual" (pneumatikos) or glorified body necessary for existence in the world to come. Although it is a "spiritual" body, it will still be a real body. Jesus demonstrated the physical reality of His resurrected body when He appeared to His disciples and even ate in their presence (cf. Luke 24:39, 43; John 20:17, 27). Adam became "a living being," and Christ became "a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45). Thus, in the same way that everyone born into this world has a body that is subject to death, so those united to Christ receive a new life in Christ now and will receive a glorified immortal body at the resurrection. They will bear the image of the heavenly Man (v. 49). This transformation must take place for humans to inherit the kingdom of God (v. 50).

Paul notes, however, that the natural precedes the spiritual (v. 46). In other words, the resurrection will be an experience after death and not before. In contrast to the belief that the soul is immortal and goes on living in a disembodied form once the material body dies, the dead will rest in graves until the resurrection occurs. It is only at that time that believers will receive a spiritual body.

15:50–58. The Eschatological Resurrection. Paul starts to draw his discussion about the nature of the resurrection to a close by summarizing what he said in vv. 35–49. Paul uses the expression "flesh and blood" as a figure of speech to describe the nature of human existence in this world (v. 50). The mortal and corrupt body that all humans have in this world is not fit for the perfect world to come. Our bodies must be radically changed before we can receive God's inheritance for us.

When and how will that transformation occur? Although the answer to that question was once a mystery (v. 51) hidden from human understanding, it has been divinely revealed (vv. 51–52). The glorious transformation that Paul describes will affect all of God's people—both the living and dead. The dead will be brought forth from the grave with immortal bodies, while those who are alive when Christ returns will also be changed without experiencing death (cf. 1 Thess. 4:13–18). Paul explains that this transformation will not occur over a period of time, but in an atomos ("moment," "flash," "instant"), the shortest possible time period that could be expressed in the Greek language. Paul reinforces his point by also comparing it to the blink of an eye. At that moment, every trace of corruption and imperfection will be forever removed and our lowly bodies will be made like Christ's glorious resurrected body (Phil. 3:21).

Immortality is not ours at the time of death. Paul was clear that God's followers will receive immortality only at the resurrection when Christ returns in judgment as conquering King. It is only at that time that our mortal bodies will be clothed with immortality. The goal is not to be rid of a body but to be clothed with an immortal body (cf. 2 Cor. 5:1–5). Until that day comes, those who have died will rest in the grave awaiting the resurrection.

When that glorious transformation will occur at the resurrection, victory over death will be final and absolute (1 Cor. 15:54–55). Paul draws together two passages from the OT: a quotation from Isaiah 25:8 and an allusion to Hosea 13:14. Although death is still at work in the world, believers need not despair. Paul assures us that death will not be triumphant forever. Christ's death will not be triumphant forever. Christ's victory over the power of sin and death is the hope and guarantee of the full and final restoration that will occur when He comes again. Until that day comes, Paul encourages believers to remain firm and consistent in their faith as they recognize that their labor in the Lord is not in vain (v. 58).

16:1–24

Closing Instructions

Having addressed the major issues he needed to deal with at Corinth, Paul concludes his letter to the Corinthians with instructions regarding a financial collection for the poor in Jerusalem (vv. 1–4), some miscellaneous comments connected to his tentative travel plans (vv. 5–18), and final greetings followed by an appeal for love (vv. 19–24).

16:1–4. The Collection for Jerusalem. Paul desired that the believers in Corinth participate in a collection to help support the needy Jewish believers in Jerusalem. Based on the comments he made here and in his other letters, this collection was part of a wide-ranging project that involved the support of Gentile churches in Galatia, Macedonia, and Achaia (cf. Rom. 15:26; 2 Cor. 8–9). The economic situation of the believers around the time Paul was writing appears to have reached a crisis. Although Paul does not explain the reason they were in need, there are at least three possible reasons.

First, it has been suggested that the situation of the church in Jerusalem went back to a severe famine that had been experienced some five or six years earlier. It was so severe that it was mentioned in the writings of later Jewish and Roman historians. In response to this situation, believers in Syrian Antioch sent Paul and Barnabas with financial help for their fellow believers (Acts 11:28, 29). The consequences from that famine may have lingered on for years, contributing to the growing needs of the poor in Jerusalem.

Second, others have argued that the extreme generosity that prompted the earliest believers in Jerusalem to sell all their property and to donate the money for the common good may have over time also depleted the community's ability to continue to provide for their own needs (cf. Acts 2:44–45; 4:34–35), and this made Paul's collection necessary.

Third, according to others, the persecutions that the Jewish Christians experienced at the hand of nonbelieving Jews would have certainly made life extremely difficult for the church in Jerusalem. Ostracized by their fellow Jews, the Christians in Jerusalem would have had little to no help in times of need.

Whatever the case, the collection Paul organized was unusual in the ancient world. The Greco-Roman world had a system of public benefaction for the needy, but nothing that raised funds to be distributed to the poor of a different ethnic group and in a country hundreds of miles or kilometers away. Although Paul did not explain the reason why he wanted the Gentiles to join him in this task, he certainly would have believed that this act of kindness would strengthen the bond between Gentile and Jewish Christians and demonstrate that Christian unity transcended ethnic barriers (cf. 2 Cor. 8:16–24). He may also have seen it as a fulfillment of the OT prophecies that spoke of the wealth of the Gentiles coming to Jerusalem (Is. 45:14; 60:5–17; 61:6).

So that he would not have to worry about organizing the collection when he arrived in Corinth, Paul instructed the believers there to set aside and store up some money appropriate to their income (1 Cor. 16:2). Although some have seen an example of Sunday worship in this passage, there is nothing in the context that would suggest that the collection was connected to a worship service on Sunday. The NT is clear that the early Christians continued to worship on the Sabbath (cf. Acts 13:14, 42, 44; 15:21; 18:4). Paul merely wanted individual families to evaluate their needs at the beginning of a new week and to systematically set aside at home a regular amount according to their ability. In that case, the phrase "the first day" of the week would simply mean on a weekly basis. This would allow the church to give over a period of time rather than trying to raise a large amount all at once.

To avoid any suspicion, Paul indicated that once the money was collected, it would be necessary for the Corinthians to appoint a local church representative to take the gift to Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:3). If everything worked out for Paul to make the trip himself, he wanted them to travel with him. The book of Acts indicates that Paul was able to make the trip and that a delegation of Gentile believers did accompany him on that journey (cf. Acts 20:4–6, 16).

16:5–18. Thoughts Related to Paul's Travel Plans. Paul informed the Corinthians that he intended to visit them. He planned to remain in Ephesus, from where he was writing to them, until Pentecost (v. 8), that is, until sometime in the spring. At that point, he planned to travel through Macedonia (v. 5) on his way to Corinth, no doubt to visit the churches he founded in cities like Philippi and Thessalonica. Paul hoped to spend a considerable amount of time with them, perhaps even the winter if the Lord would permit (vv. 6–7). In the meantime, Paul hoped that the Corinthians would welcome Timothy on his behalf and that he would not be treated with disrespect (v. 11).

Paul had good reason to be concerned for his younger colleague. Earlier in his letter, Paul mentions that he had sent Timothy to Corinth in order to remind them of his ways in Christ (4:17). Since those instructions were connected to Paul's rebuke of the Corinthians for their arrogance, there was a chance that a negative response toward Paul might be directed toward Timothy. Paul eagerly waited for the return of Timothy, hoping that he would come back with positive news about the situation in Corinth (16:11).

The Corinthians may have asked that Apollos visit them again. While Apollos was in Ephesus with Paul, he was unwilling to come at that time (v. 12a). Although no reason is given for this decision, Apollos did not want to contribute to the divisive elements in the church that had attempted to pit Paul and him against each other (1:12). Paul had spoken out strongly against this sort of mentality, and Apollos did not want his presence in Corinth to undermine what Paul had said. Once the situation had clearly taken a turn for the better, Apollos would return when he had an opportunity to do so (16:12b).

In the meantime, Paul admonished the Corinthians to be alert and steadfast and to have faith, courage, and strength while doing all things in love (vv. 13–14). And in addition to these general exhortations, he specifically encouraged the Corinthians to submit to the household of Stephanas and to those who worked and labored with Paul and his associates (vv. 15–16). The members of the household of Stephanas had not only been Paul's first converts in Asia (v. 15; cf. 1:16) but they had also devoted themselves to caring for the needs of church (v. 15). Their behavior served as a model of the type of servant leadership needed in the church at Corinth. Paul wanted the various factions in Corinth to follow that example of leadership.

16:19–24. Final Greetings and an Appeal for Love. As Paul's letter draws to a close, he concludes, as he regularly does in his letters, with several greetings from believers who were with him at that time (vv. 19–20). The churches of Asia would have included all the believers living in the western part of Asia Minor, modern-day Turkey, with Ephesus as the region's economic and administrative center. This would have included the seven churches mentioned in Revelation 2–3, as well as the churches at Colossae and Hierapolis (Col. 4:13–16).

The personal greeting from Aquila and Priscilla (1 Cor. 16:19) was especially appropriate since this Christian couple had played an integral role in helping Paul establish the church in Corinth (Acts 18:2). When Paul left Corinth during his second missionary journey, this couple had not only traveled with him to Ephesus (Acts 18:18) but they also allowed the believers in Ephesus to meet in their home for communal worship. Paul was likely living with them when he wrote his letter to the Corinthians.

Paul's instruction to "greet one another with a holy kiss" (v. 20) symbolizes the strong bond of fellowship experienced among the early Christians. He mentions this practice in several of his other letters (Rom. 16:16; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26). Since Paul refers to the kiss as "holy," it was more than just a socially appropriate greeting. It served as an outward sign of the new community of men and women from different backgrounds, nationalities, and races that God had brought together as His church—the family of God.

Paul ended the letter by writing out the benediction with his own hand (1 Cor. 16:21). This was his regular custom, as he mentions in several of his other letters (Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17; Philem. 19). After dictating the letter to a scribe (Rom. 16:22), Paul would write out the final benediction himself, as a person might add a signature at the end of a typed letter.

While the anathema or curse in 1 Corinthians 16:22 on anyone who "does not love the Lord" may sound startling to modern readers, it is a warning of the judgment that awaits anyone who rejects the lordship of Jesus. Paul's fervent longing for the day when the Christian hope will be realized at the return of Christ is expressed in his expectant cry for the Lord to come. These words are not written in Greek but in the Aramaic, the language of the earliest Christians. The English word "maranatha" comes from the Aramaic expression meaning "Our Lord, come." Christians applied "Lord" (as when referencing God in the OT) to Jesus. It forms a fervent prayer for the Lord Jesus's soon return, bringing the world at long last into subjection to God (15:28). Christians were constantly looking forward, hoping for the return of the Lord.

After offering the blessing that typically brings his letters to a close—that the grace of Jesus would be with them (16:23)—Paul expresses his love to all of them "in Christ Jesus" (v. 24). While Paul had to confront a number of challenging issues in his letter to the Corinthians, even using strong language at times, he reached out to them one last time at the end with a reminder that not only did God love them but that he loved them as well. It is in the context of his deep love for the Corinthians that Paul longed for his words to be understood and for the divisions in the church to be healed. The letter closes with two fundamental Christian concepts: hope and love.

2 CORINTHIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. In the Greek, the title of this letter is Pros Korinthious B, "To the Corinthians 2." This title is found in the oldest extant copy of the manuscript, which dates to about A.D. 200. There are similar and longer titles that also appear in other manuscripts from much later dates. In all the titles ascribed to the letter, it is either the alphabetical letter B or the word "second" that is used, although a few also add a place name like "written from Philippi" or "Macedonia." The title clearly indicates the presence of an earlier epistle to the Corinthians. As is the case with all of Paul's letters, this one would not have originally had any title. The title was added by later scribes based on the opening salutation (2 Cor. 1:1) and their awareness of the existence of an earlier letter to the Corinthians.

Paul's authorship of 2 Corinthians is not a matter of scholarly dispute. Early church fathers like Polycarp (ca. A.D. 155), Irenaeus (ca. A.D. 185), Clement of Alexandria (ca. A.D. 200), and Tertullian (ca. A.D. 210) recognized Paul as the author of the letter and used it authoritatively. As is the case in several of Paul's other letters, Timothy is identified as a co-sender and witness to the letter (Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1; Philem. 1). Timothy would have been well known to the Corinthians. He had traveled to Corinth as Paul's emissary (1 Cor. 4:17), and was likely the one who brought back the disturbing news about the continuing problems in Corinth (1 Cor. 16:10–11).

While there is little doubt about the Pauline authorship of 2 Corinthians, some scholars have suggested that the letter might actually be an edited compilation of anywhere from two to five originally independent letters. Evidence for this is supposedly seen in the shift from the generally positive tone in chapters 1–9 to the more negative one in chapters 10–13, as well as in the presence of some rather rough transitions throughout the letter (e.g., 2:14; 6:13; 7:1; 8:24). Connected to this question is the fact that Paul wrote at least four letters to the Corinthians, and some of those letters are missing. His first letter, which is referred to in 1 Corinthians 5:9, no longer exists. This makes the letter we know as 1 Corinthians actually Paul's second letter to them. The third letter he wrote to them is the "painful" letter he mentions in 2 Corinthians 2:3–4; 7:8, 12. Thus this would make 2 Corinthians the apostle's fourth letter. Some suggest that rather than the "painful" letter being lost, a truncated portion of it remains in 2 Corinthians 10–13. Others claim that the final chapters of 2 Corinthians are part of yet another letter.

Though the transitions in 2 Corinthians are not always smooth, and the tone does seem to shift in the final four chapters, these elements do not necessarily indicate that 2 Corinthians is not a unified document. If the letter was written over an extended period of time as Paul traveled through Macedonia, it is not hard to imagine that changing circumstances and additional news along the way would have impacted the structure and nature of the letter. While that is possible, it seems even more likely that the entire letter is simply a twofold response to the news Paul heard from Titus when he returned from Corinth. Encouraged by the positive developments in Corinth, Paul wrote chapters 1–9 in an attempt to build on the spirit of goodwill that had been reestablished with the Corinthians. Then in chapters 10–13, Paul turns his attention to the source of the earlier problems in the church—the presence of self-appointed apostles who were creating doubts about Paul's apostolic ministry. Evidence of the unity of 2 Corinthians is seen in the fact that, outside of a few fragments, 2 Corinthians has been preserved as a single literary unit throughout its entire manuscript history.

Date. Second Corinthians was written while Paul was traveling through Macedonia (cf. 2 Cor. 2:1–12; 7:5ff.). A careful examination of the account of Paul's travels in Acts, the situation outlined in 1 Corinthians, and the events that led to the writing of 2 Corinthians all lead to the conclusion that 2 Corinthians was written roughly a year after 1 Corinthians, probably in the fall of A.D. 56. There is a significant amount of information supporting this conclusion. According to Acts, Paul ministered in Corinth for eighteen months during his second missionary journey (Acts 18:11). When he arrived in the city he met Aquila and Priscilla, a Jewish couple who had recently been forced to leave Rome as a result of Emperor Claudius's expulsion of Jews from the capital. This expulsion occurred around A.D. 49 (18:2). While Paul was in Corinth, the Jews brought charges against him before the governor, a man named Gallio. Ancient inscriptions indicate that Gallio held this office from July A.D. 51 to July A.D. 52. Since Aquila and Priscilla had recently come to Corinth from Rome, it is conceivable that Paul had arrived in the city in A.D. 49 or quite early in A.D. 50. In an attempt to take advantage of the early stage of Gallio's proconsulship, the Jews appear to have brought their accusations against Paul in the autumn of A.D. 51. Since he stayed on for some time after his acquittal, he may have left in the spring of A.D. 52.

After returning to Syria, Paul set out on his third missionary journey in A.D. 53. During that time, he ministered in Ephesus for nearly three years (Acts 19:8, 10; 20:31). His own comments make it clear that he wrote 1 Corinthians while in Ephesus, sometime before the feast of Pentecost (1 Cor. 16:8) in the spring of A.D. 55. On account of the growing problems in Corinth, Paul eventually traveled to Corinth via Macedonia, during which time he wrote 2 Corinthians (2:12–13; 7:5; 8:1–5; 9:2). His impending third visit announced in 2 Corinthians 12:14 and 13:1 suggests that this letter was written in the fall of A.D. 56, before he arrived in Corinth for the winter (see 8:10; 9:2).

Backgrounds. Corinth was strategically located on the narrow land bridge separating Athens and the Greek mainland to the north from Sparta and the Peloponnese peninsula to the south. With the Gulf of Corinth to its west and the Saronic Gulf to its east, Corinth established itself as an influential center of international trade and commerce between the eastern and western parts of the Roman Empire by building a harbor in each gulf: Cenchreae in the east and Lechaeum in the west. In order to allow cargo and small ships to be transferred from one port to the other, a paved road (called the diolkos) was built across the four miles (6 km) separating the two harbors. Merchants were glad to enrich the treasury of Corinth for this service, instead of taking the risk of sailing around the Peloponnese and its notoriously dangerous Cape of Maleae. Like many cities that have prospered through trade, Corinth also had developed a reputation for sexual promiscuity.

Although Corinth had been completely destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C. when it attempted to break away from Rome, Julius Caesar rebuilt the city as a colony in 44 B.C. Its location quickly made it prosperous again. Inhabitants of the new Corinth included retired soldiers, slaves, freedmen, some Greek residents, a considerable number of Jews, and a large influx of wealthy merchants. In recognition of the city's achievements, Rome established Corinth as the capital of the senatorial province of Achaia in 27 B.C. Like other provinces in the Roman Empire, Corinth was Hellenized in terms of culture, philosophy, and religion. Greek was the lingua franca. It was in this new and flourishing Corinth that Paul preached and established a Christian community.

As noted earlier, Paul founded the church in Corinth during his second missionary journey (Acts 18). As was his custom, he first attended the synagogue and proclaimed to Jews and God-fearing Gentiles that Jesus was the promised Messiah (Acts 18:4–5). When opposition arose to his message (Acts 18:6), Paul moved from the synagogue to the house of Justus and remained in Corinth for one and half years (Acts 18:7, 11). During his stay, he preached the gospel of Jesus Christ, which he called the foundation of his ministry (1 Cor. 3:10–11; cf. Acts 18:11). Paul then left for Caesarea through Ephesus, and finally returned to his home church in Syria Antioch (Acts 18:21–22).

Shortly after returning to Antioch, Paul embarked on his third missionary journey. He returned to Ephesus and remained there for almost three years (Acts 19:8, 10; 20:31). During this time, news reached Paul that there were some challenges facing the believers in Corinth. Paul wrote a letter to the Corinthians instructing them not to associate with sexually immoral people (1 Cor. 5:9). This letter no longer exists. In response to additional reports, Paul wrote another letter to them from Ephesus—the letter we know as 1 Corinthians (1 Cor. 16:8). In it he promised to visit the church at Corinth (1 Cor. 16:5–8). In addition, Paul sent Timothy as his personal envoy to assess the situation (1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10–11). Timothy appears to have returned to Ephesus with news that the problems in Corinth had grown worse. Concerned about the rapidly deteriorating situation in Corinth, Paul apparently changed his plans and decided to visit Corinth immediately. Without notifying the Corinthians, Paul sailed directly across the Aegean from Ephesus to Corinth. His surprise visit, however, did not go well, as it seems that he experienced a hostile response (2 Cor. 2:1). Some ringleaders had hijacked the church and were now questioning Paul's leadership (2:5–8, 10; 7:12; 3:1–3; 11:13–15).

Worried that another visit to Corinth might result in more confrontations, Paul decided to deal with the disciplinary problems in Corinth by sending the church a letter in which he sharply rebuked the members for their behavior (2:1–4). Titus was given the responsibility of delivering the letter (2:4, 13; 7:12). This letter is now lost. After Titus left for Corinth with the letter, Paul began to worry that the Corinthians might fail to see the deep love and concern behind his candid words. Eventually, Titus returned with a good report about the church's attitudinal change toward Paul (7:6–16). On receiving this news, the apostle wrote to express his relief and joy. As indicated earlier, Paul wrote our present 2 Corinthians probably while traveling through Macedonia on his way to Corinth (2:13; 7:5; 9:2).

Once this ailing relationship appeared to have been restored, Paul addressed other equally pressing issues in the letter. First, he wrote to encourage the church members to complete their promised collection for the needy saints in Jerusalem (8:6–7, 10–11; 9:3–5). Second, he differentiated his apostolic ministry from the workings of the false apostles in order to safeguard the fragile faith of the Corinthian believers (2:17; 3:1, 12; 11:3–4, 13–15). Third, he wrote to prepare the Corinthians for his third visit to the church, hoping to avoid taking any disciplinary action (10:2, 5, 11; 11:3; 12:19–21; 13:10).

Theology and Purpose. Several notable theological themes are present in 2 Corinthians: (1) the Trinity-Godhead, (2) comfort and hope, (3) stewardship, and (4) apostolic or pastoral ministry. The central theme seems to be the apostolic/pastoral ministry as Paul sought to reaffirm his integrity and the nature of his ministry.

1. The Trinity-Godhead. The Godhead formula appears in 2 Corinthians 13:14. In the epilogue, Paul extends to the church grace from Jesus Christ, love from God the Father, and fellowship or communion with the Holy Spirit. These divine Persons played a significant role in Paul's purpose for writing to the church. He focuses on their collective role in his apostolic ministry as well as in the salvation story of the church. The person of God pervades this letter. The Greek word for "God" is used more than seventy times. God the Father willed Paul's apostleship and made him and his coworkers able ministers of the gospel. Believers in Corinth constituted the church of God, highlighting ownership (1:1; 3:6; cf. Gal. 1:15). God bore true witness to Paul's ministry as an authentic ministry (2 Cor. 1:23; 2:17; 11:31) made possible by His power (2:14; 6:6–7; 10:4–5; 12:19, 21; 13:4, 7). His faithfulness is emphasized (1:18–19). Just as Jesus was raised up by God, believers are to be raised up by Him in the last day (4:13–15). Therefore, He becomes the object of praise (1:3; 4:15; 9:15; 11:31). God is woven into all facets of Paul's ministerial calling, service, existence, and final redemption.

Paul's designation of Jesus as Christ is significant in addressing issues that called forth the writing of the letter. By this designation, Jesus is the Anointed One. The mission of Christ was foretold by Isaiah and Daniel (Is. 61:1; Dan. 9:24–29). The title Christ appears more than forty times in 2 Corinthians. This means that Paul attached to it great significance. Jesus Christ was the source of Paul's apostolic authority (1:1; 5:20; 10; cf. Acts 9:5, 15), and He is, as the Son of God, the substance of the gospel that Paul preached to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1:19; 4:4–5; 10:14; 11:4). "In Christ," a frequent Pauline phrase, is employed several times to affirm the sphere of salvation and the believers' union with Christ. It explains and motivates the conscious and spontaneous actions of believers (1:21; 2:14, 17; 3:14; 5:17; 11:3; cf. Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 1:2; Gal. 2:16; Eph. 2:10). Christ is the reason and the motivation for ministry, godly acts, and perseverance in the faith (2 Cor. 5:14–16; 8:9; 12:9–10). There is only one Christ to whom the church is metaphorically married (11:2). This title suggests that Jesus was divinely appointed, commissioned, and accredited as the Savior of humanity (John 1:1–14; Acts 2:22; Gal. 4:4). Since Paul was appointed by Christ as His apostle and the content of his preaching was Jesus Christ, the meaning of his ministry revolved around the significance of this name.

The Holy Spirit features briefly in 2 Corinthians. The ministry of Paul and his associates had been sealed with the Spirit as a guarantee for successful ministry (1:22; 3:3; 5:5; 6:6). As Paul stated elsewhere, the signs and wonders accomplished among the Corinthian believers by him were the result of the influence of the Spirit (12:12; Rom. 15:19; Heb. 2:4). The Holy Spirit was with both Jesus and His disciples when they performed signs and miracles (Mark 3:22–29; Luke 12:12; John 20:22; Acts 1:8). The promise that the Spirit would have a close relationship with God's people is echoed in 2 Corinthians 13:14. Just as the Spirit guaranteed Paul's ministry through thick and thin, so also He would continually be by the side of the Corinthians.

2. Comfort and Hope. Christian suffering is one of the principal theological themes in 2 Corinthians. Paul recounted the life-threatening sufferings he experienced for the sake of Christ (1:3–11; 4:7–18; 6:3–10; 12:1–10). He was anxious when he could not find Titus in Troas, from whom he expected some news from Corinth (2:13). But amid the sufferings and instability, God the Comforter and Deliverer comforted and delivered him (1:10; 7:7; 11:32–33). Even if God would not deliver him, Paul was determined to persevere in the faith because God would preserve him in the midst of his trials (2 Tim. 4:17–18; cf. Dan. 3:17–18).

Christ's death and resurrection are given special attention in 2 Corinthians. If Paul died for the sake of Christ, he trusted in God's promise of the resurrection (2 Cor. 1:8–10), when everything mortal may be "swallowed up by life" (5:4). The hope of the resurrection is also firmly anchored in the historic resurrection of Jesus (4:14). On the basis of this hope, Paul and his associates did not lose heart but remained faithful to the end (4:7—5:10; cf. 1 Cor. 15). The final judgment was mentioned to motivate believers to faithfulness to God (2 Cor. 5:10). Ministry aims at creating hope in the human heart based on God's promises and in nurturing this hope to the end.

3. Stewardship. Christian stewardship is more pronounced in 2 Corinthians 8–9 than in any other NT book. Paul appealed to the Corinthians to support the needy saints in Jerusalem with their financial resources. The church was made to feel responsible for relieving the physical needs of the saints (8:14; cf. 1 Cor. 16:1–3). Willingness to support the needy is emphasized as the true essence of Christian stewardship (2 Cor. 9:5). Two primary motivations for giving are mentioned. The first one is the gift of divine grace, which reached the believers through the proclamation of the gospel and that instilled in them a disposition to give (cf. 8:1). A gift received, in this case from God, should move believers to give with a disposition coming from the Lord. Second, believers should give because they have received many blessings from God (9:8–11). The Corinthians had received enough from the Lord to provide for their needs and to share with others. Third, the most important motivation to give is found in Christ, who became poor for us in order to redeem us (8:9). He gave all He had for us in the most sublime manifestation of divine love. Stewardship is in essence a response of gratitude to God for all He has given to us and particularly for what He did for us through His Son. Therefore, any offering given willingly and generously to the Lord is a freewill offering (8:3; 9:11–12). It is in fact the embodiment of the loving disposition of our hearts to surrender our lives to the Lord.

4. Apostolic or Pastoral Ministry. Apostolic or pastoral ministry is defined in terms of its impact on the spiritual growth and life of the church. This is the central theme of the letter. Jesus Christ was the source of Paul's apostolic and pastoral ministry (cf. 8:23), and Paul was ministering to the church as its founder (2 Cor. 1:19; 11:2, 28; cf. Acts 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:14–17; 2:1–2). Hence, he was relating to the church as a father (2 Cor. 6:13; 12:14) who, as a tender pastor, was sensitive to the needs of his flock (1:24; 2:6, 7; 6:1; 10:2; 13:5, 10). He entreated his children to reconcile fully with him (1:14; 6:11—7:2), expressed his joy over the children's repentance, and strongly urged them to forgive and comfort the offender who had shown signs of repentance (2:5–11; 7:9, 16). Paul appealed to sinners within the church to repent and tried to avoid taking ecclesiastical disciplinary actions (12:20—13:3). His approach in ministering to the financial needs of the saints in Jerusalem indicates how he viewed believers as one, irrespective of their geographical locations. Since they were one, they were to care for each other wherever the need was. The practice of pastoral care epitomized in this letter demonstrates the true spirit of pastoral ministry.

It could be said that 2 Corinthians serves as a pastoral manual for a responsible and result-oriented ministry. For Paul, ministry was not a profession but a divine calling to service requiring a deep spiritual relationship with Christ. As an ambassador of God, the minister is to represent Him through proper conduct and through the clear proclamation of the message of reconciliation through Christ. Ministry is the result of a calling, election, and enabling work of the Spirit and is accompanied by a profound sense of responsibility toward God and His people. In other words, at the core of ministry, according to Paul, we find unwavering commitment to and love for God and His people. For Paul, the ministry required a willingness to proclaim and defend the message given by God to His church against false teachers. There are forces that oppose the gospel and that can influence the church. In such cases, it is necessary to lovingly minister to the church so as to win the people back to Christ. Since the opposition comes from both outside and within the church, ministry is often characterized by suffering. In this case, perseverance is needed while we keep in mind that God is our source of comfort. True ministry reconciles sinners to God and establishes them in the faith in the anticipation of the return of Christ, when He will reward us according to our works of love (5:10).

1:1–11

PROLOGUE

One of the chief characteristics of ancient letters is the prologue, which establishes a relationship between the sender and the recipient. It also provides significant information about the content and the main themes of the entire letter. The opening eleven verses of 2 Corinthians were designed to serve these intentions. In a circumstance in which Paul's relationship with the church was strained and his authority was being questioned, it was inevitable for him to reassert his qualifications and his ministry. The prologue consists of two main parts: the salutation (1:1–2) and the thanksgiving (1:3–11). Paul revealed the source and nature of his apostleship (1:1–2) and described the close bond existing between him and the church. He praised God in the midst of trials for His comfort and for delivering him from death (1:3–11).

1:1–2. Salutation. The salutation identifies Paul as the sender of the letter and Timothy as co-sender. The church of God in Corinth and the believers—"saints" or "holy people"—in the whole region of Achaia (v. 1) were the recipients of the letter. Paul extended greetings to the church from God the Father and Jesus Christ (v. 2). The main focus of this section is Paul's special relationship with the church as occasioned by the will of God. Usually, letters from the Greco-Roman period began by naming the sender, that person's office or profession, and the recipients, followed by greetings and wishes for good health. Paul followed this practice with marked differences. With the exception of 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Philippians, and Philemon, Paul called himself "an apostle" of Jesus Christ (1:1) in all his letters (e.g., Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 1:1). He claimed equality with the twelve apostles on the basis of the special revelation of Christ that God had granted him during his conversion and call (Acts 9:15; 1 Cor. 9:1; Gal. 1:15–16; 2 Cor. 12:1–14). Particularly in 2 Corinthians, such a claim may have been due to the recent arrival of the self-commended apostles and the growing questioning of Paul's apostleship (10:12; 11:13, 23). In this way, he distinguished himself from the apostoloi ("apostles," "messengers") of the churches who were to deliver the collection to Jerusalem (8:23). In essence, his apostleship was not by self-assertion or congregational appointment but by divine election. He was a chosen instrument through whom God would reach out to both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 9:15). The implication of his divine appointment is that rejecting Paul's apostolic authority would be the same as rejecting God's authority (2 Cor. 5:18–20).

Paul called his coworker, Timothy, "our brother" (2 Cor. 1:1). This is the normal reference for carriers of his letters, who were personally known by the recipients (1 Cor. 1:1; cf. 1 Cor. 4:17; 2 Cor. 1:1; Col. 1:1; Philem. 1:1). Perhaps equally important was the need to remind the Corinthians of the close bond shared by believers because they all belonged to the one body of Christ (Acts 9:17; Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 12:12; cf. Rom. 16:22). Timothy was Paul's envoy to Corinth and may have even delivered the letter of 1 Corinthians (1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10–11). Titus was given that task for the second letter (2 Cor. 8:6, 16–18).

Paul extended his greetings to the church of God in Corinth and to all the saints in Achaia. The believers in Corinth were designated as the church (ekklēsia, "assembly") of God. This qualification, "of God" (1:1), intimates that the church belonged to God. Since Paul's apostleship was occasioned by God, the church that he founded with the power of God (3:1–6) was the "church of God" (1:1), not of Paul. The other addressees included believers in neighboring cities like Athens and Cenchreae, where Paul had also proclaimed the gospel (Acts 17:34; Rom. 16:1). He described them as hoi hagioi ("saints," "holy people") because they were called to be separate from the world and set apart for God's service. While the church in Corinth constituted Paul's primary audience, he probably included those in all of Achaia in anticipation of his instructions about the collection that was being gathered throughout Achaia (9:2).

In greeting the audience, Paul mentions "grace" (charis) as underlining Christ's sacrificial death, which furnished us with the forgiveness of our sins (1:2; cf. 6:1; Rom. 3:18–25; 5:18a, 19). He adds "peace" (eirēnē), probably indicating the result of accepting the death of Christ, which closes the eternal gulf that on account of sin separated us from God (cf. Gen. 3:8; Rom. 5:1). Since we have peace with God, we can call Him "our Father" (v. 2). Since it is through Jesus that humanity has been reconciled to God, Paul can call Jesus "Lord." In effect, both God and Jesus work together for the salvation of humanity.

1:3–11. Praising God in the Midst of Trials. This section reveals Paul's practice of praising God in the midst of trials, a theme that the apostle will develop throughout the letter. In such situations, God is to be looked on as the only source of hope (vv. 9–10). As Paul was comforted by God in trials, he became better equipped to comfort the Corinthians in their own trials. He expresses his appreciation for God's comfort and its effect on the church (vv. 3–7). He then makes a specific reference to how God comforted him in the province of Asia (vv. 8–11).

Following a salutation, Paul normally gives thanks to God on behalf of his recipients (Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:4–9; Philem. 1:4). But in 2 Corinthians 1:3, through a blessing, he gives thanks to God for comforting him. The word "comfort" (paraklēsis) is associated in other places with someone who comes alongside another, offering encouragement and help. It is closely related to the word used to describe the work of the Holy Spirit (John 16:16–18). It is this personal divine comfort that Paul received in tribulation that enabled him to comfort those in any painful experience (2 Cor. 1:4). The Greek word in v. 4 is thlipsis ("trouble," "tribulation"), which can refer to oppression or pain that is brought by either outward events (e.g., Rom. 2:9; 5:3; 8:35; 1 Cor. 7:28; 2 Cor. 1:8; 4:17) or by a mental state (2 Cor. 2:4, 13; 7:4–5). The former meaning of the word fits Paul's discourse in that it corresponds to "the sufferings of Christ" (1:5). The word "suffering" (pathēma) refers to passion, misfortune, physical pain, or death (Rom. 7:5; 8:18; Gal. 5:24; Phil. 3:10; Col. 1:24; 2 Tim. 3:11). But in v. 4, when Paul speaks of God comforting him in all thlipsis, he has in view the specific tribulation described in 2 Corinthians 1:8–11, an occasion in which he was almost killed. Hence, God's comfort may refer not only to consolation of inner feelings but also to deliverance by God from deadly peril (v. 10). For Paul, God is the only One who comforts those who are downcast or depressed (7:6). Paul understood his sufferings to be a reminder to trust God alone and an enabling force to empathize with those in any kind of hardship. In a world of suffering and oppression, we are also called to comfort those who suffer.

Paul next explains why tribulation was better for preparing him to share God's comfort. The abundance of suffering is always accompanied by an abundance of consolation from God through Christ (1:5). We are never left alone to confront our sufferings. Paul believed that he was suffering as Christ suffered because of his decision to follow Him (cf. 1 Thess. 3:3–4). He found, in the sufferings of Christ, the strength to persevere in the midst of his own suffering (Acts 14:22; Col. 1:24). Obviously, his sufferings were by no means equal to those of Christ, who, though He was righteous, suffered for the sin of the world (John 1:29; Rom. 3:25–26; 5:7–8; 8:18). Paul was aware that when he was sharing in the sufferings of Christ, Christ was identifying with his affliction (Acts 9:4–5) and providing the comfort needed (1 Cor. 10:13). In 2 Corinthians 1:6a, Paul repeats the thought from v. 4b: his afflictions put him in a better position to comfort the church. He was firmly hoping that the Corinthians would be comforted when faced with afflictions in the future (v. 7).

Paul next cites an unpleasant incident exemplifying God's comfort in the midst of the trials just described (vv. 8–11). He mentions the affliction that came on him in Asia, that is, the Roman province in western Asia Minor, the capital of which was Ephesus. It seems difficult to determine exactly where and what kind of tribulation Paul had suffered. The Corinthians perhaps knew this incident, which would explain why they prayed for him (v. 11). Elsewhere, Paul recounts numerous personal experiences of suffering for the sake of the gospel (11:26; 12:2–4; cf. Acts 19:23—20:1; 1 Cor. 15:32). Since he likened his afflictions to those of Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 1:4–5), his sufferings were for the sake of the gospel. Paul did not provide specific details about his sufferings but stressed the fact that his human limitations led him to totally rely on God. At any rate, humanly speaking, the affliction was unbearable and Paul even despaired of life (v. 8). The situation appears to have been so hopeless that he was not able to even appeal to his Roman citizenship as he had done at least once elsewhere (cf. Acts 22:25–29). Only God, who raises the dead, was able to deliver him from such an intensely life-threatening situation (2 Cor. 1:9–10a) and would continue to deliver him from any deadly peril in the future (v. 10b). Trusting in the Lord for deliverance is the only refuge for the afflicted (Ps. 22:20; Jer. 39:17–18; Dan. 6:16; Acts 26:17; 2 Tim. 3:11). Paul believed that the Corinthians' prayers of intercession played a significant role in his deliverance (2 Cor. 1:11). This solidarity shown to Paul in their prayers underlines the bond of which he wanted to remind the Corinthians existed between them. He hoped that they would offer God prayers of gratitude on his behalf (cf. 1 Cor. 1:4). Obviously, church leaders still need the prayers of the church.

1:12—7:16

PAUL, THE CORINTHIANS, AND HIS APOSTOLIC MINISTRY

After the thanksgiving in 1:3–11, the body of Paul's letter begins by focusing on three main issues concerning charges raised against his character and ministry. A defense of his travel plans had become necessary to address the question of his integrity (1:12—2:13). Some of the believers were still suspicious of him as an apostle, so he needed to clarify any misconceptions about his ministry (2:14—7:4). He responded joyfully to the positive report that Titus had brought concerning the church's attitudinal change toward him (7:5–16).

1:12—2:13

Defense of Paul's Travel Plans

Before delving into a defense of his travel plans, Paul briefly responded, presumably, to charges of improper actions and deceptiveness (1:12–14). After successfully rebutting these charges, he addressed the accusation of being inconsistent in his travel plans (1:15–22). He specifically explained to the church why he had canceled his third visit immediately after one that had caused pain and sorrow (1:23—2:4). On hearing the report that the church member who had offended him had repented, Paul urged the church to demonstrate forgiveness to the offender (2:5–11). He described his emotional restlessness in Troas when he could not meet with Titus as planned (2:12–13). This part of his defense strategy was geared toward strengthening the bonds of fellowship between him and the church.

1:12–14. An Affirmation of Paul's Sincerity. This passage is strategically placed here to reinforce the relationship between Paul's behavior and his ministry. In vv. 3–11, he established that he and the church shared in the same fate and that God comforted them all. It was hoped that they would acknowledge his sincerity toward them. Apparently, his integrity as a messenger of God seems to have been questioned. In his defense, Paul appealed to his own conscience as his witness and to the Corinthians' knowledge of his conduct (v. 12). This conscience was telling Paul that there was no contradiction between his inner convictions and his actions. He had been doing what the Lord had taught him with respect to the proclamation of the gospel to the world (cf. 1 Cor. 4:4–5). This means that it was necessary that he exercise what is in the Greek called haplotēs ("simplicity," "uprightness"), which designates the absence of duplicity, and godly eilikrineia, which connotes sincerity or purity of motive in dealing with the Corinthians and the world. The Greek words haplotēs and eilikrineia are frequently used in Paul's writings to designate lives transformed by God (2 Cor. 2:17; Rom. 12:8; 1 Cor. 5:8). Paul's character was driven by divine values and principles. Consequently, his letters were not intended to deceive his audience (2 Cor. 1:13). He did not work on the basis of wisdom that is sarkikos ("fleshly," "worldly"; v. 12). He had not employed any worldly wisdom to deceive or defraud the Corinthians but had solely relied on the grace of God in his dealings with them. But Paul knew that his readers had at least understood some of the things he had written to them previously and was hoping that they would gain full knowledge (1:14). The desired results were that they would be proud of Paul as a messenger of the gospel and that he would be proud of them in the Day of the Lord, that is, they would be the fruit of his ministry (2 Cor. 1:14b; 5:10; cf. Rom. 14:10).

1:15–22. Charge of Inconsistency. Once Paul's integrity had been reaffirmed by appealing to his godly conscience and the Corinthians' knowledge, he proceeded to explain and defend the change in his travel plans (vv. 15–17). This defense was successfully achieved by appealing to God's faithfulness and the content of his preaching, which is Jesus Christ (vv. 18–20). The defense aims at reaffirming his authority as an unwavering messenger of God.

Paul intended to visit Corinth following his founding visit and to stay there for a while (cf. 1 Cor. 16:5–7). He apparently planned to leave Ephesus for Corinth through Macedonia and then go to Judea with the offering he was collecting as a sign of support for the struggling Jewish believers in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26; 1 Cor. 16:5–6). But meanwhile, the situation in the church at Corinth had deteriorated and Paul decided to make an unplanned visit to the church. He sailed directly across the Aegean from Ephesus to Corinth. Unfortunately, this visit did not go well (1 Cor. 2:1).

Following this experience, Paul returned to Ephesus and wrote a severe letter to the Corinthians, rebuking them for the way he had been treated. Titus was given the responsibility of delivering the letter to Corinth. Shortly after Titus left, however, Paul began to worry that the Corinthians might not understand the love and concern that had prompted his letter. He feared that rather than solving the problem, his letter might have actually made the situation worse. Eager to hear back from Titus about the response of the Corinthians to this letter (2 Cor. 7:5), Paul traveled to Troas, where the two men had apparently planned to meet (2:12–13). Titus was not there, so Paul continued on to Macedonia, where at some point the two finally met.

While Paul was overjoyed to learn that the Corinthians had responded positively to his letter (see 7:6–9), it also appears that he had learned from Titus that some in Corinth had seized on his change of plans and accused him of being insincere—claiming one thing but doing another (v. 17). Paul denied the charge, insisting that his change of plans was not done in a worldly insincere manner (v. 17b). As a messenger of God, he could not say one thing while planning to do another. His attitude toward them was not a whimsical yes and no (v. 17). On the contrary, it was always a positive yes, though it might have been expressed in different ways (v. 18). This reminded Paul of God's faithfulness. For in Jesus, every promise of God is a resounding yes for humanity (v. 20).

Paul then went on to again refresh the minds of the Corinthians concerning the content of his preaching (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10–11). He, together with Timothy and Silas, had preached Jesus Christ, the promised Messiah, and the fulfillment of God's promises to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1:19–20; cf. Acts 18:5). This content was the clear answer to the human problem of sin. Jesus Christ remains the same as the only answer to the human predicament (cf. 2 Cor. 5:18–19, 21). With this answer, both Paul and the Corinthians had been legally secured as people of God at peace with Him (1:21; cf. Rom. 5:1). In his ministry, Paul reflected the consistent actions of God through Christ (the Yes of God).

1:23—2:4. An Explanation of a Canceled Visit. Additional reasons explain Paul's change in travel plans and emphasize his love for the entire Corinthian church. Apart from his conscience, Paul called on God as his witness against his life (cf. vv. 12, 18). This highlights the seriousness of what Paul was saying. He had not taken the change of travel plans lightly. He simply wanted to spare the Corinthians another painful visit. Visiting them so soon after the previous sorrowful encounter could have worsened his relationship with them. Overreacting to problems in the church is not the best way to solve problems. We need to give the Spirit time to do His reconciling work in the church. Of course, as an apostle and their spiritual father, Paul had the right to discipline them (13:1–4, 10; 1 Cor. 4:19–21), but he was mindful of his role as a servant to the people of God (4:5). He had no selfish interest in unnecessarily displaying his apostolic authority. His concern was to promote their highest joy and save them from unhealthy pain. If they were happy, he was also happy and vice versa. Since their pain would have been his pain, Paul had sent Titus to them rather than risking another confrontation if he had come (vv. 1–2; cf. v. 23). Paul was convinced that both he and the church should share the same joy, not sorrow. The ultimate reason for writing the sorrowful letter to the Corinthians and for having changed his travel plans was his sincere concern for them. Love motivated his change of travel plans (2:4).

2:5–11. A Call to Forgive the Offender. Thanks to God's working, the sorrowful letter yielded positive results. The church sided with Paul and disciplinary action was taken. That was a relief (cf. 7:5–13). Paul, however, would next urge the church members to reaffirm their love to the offender; otherwise, Satan might take advantage of their unforgiving attitude.

During Paul's unplanned and painful visit, a certain man had openly grieved him, apparently challenging his apostolic authority. At that time, the church might have sympathized with the offender. Not siding with Paul to discipline the offender during his visit seems to have created the tension between Paul and the church. In fact, his offense affected both Paul and the church (2:5). However, after Titus delivered the painful letter in which Paul rebuked the situation while reaffirming his sincere love for the Corinthians, the majority of the church implemented Paul's disciplinary action against the offender. Paul appreciated the Corinthians' obedience in this regard (v. 6), but he also recognized the importance of redeeming the offender (v. 7b). Since the man appears to have repented, Paul urged the church to demonstrate love by forgiving and comforting him. Paul empathized with the psychological trauma of the offender, which could have led to his abandoning the faith. He showed his pastoral care for the welfare of the offender and had already taken the initiative by forgiving him (v. 10). Likewise, the church members had to forgive. If they did, it would be strong evidence that they acknowledged Paul as their spiritual father (v. 9). The true existence of the community of faith as the church of God is tied to how its members treat repentant sinners. If they do not forgive, they cease to be the church of God. It is in and through forgiveness that we all become and remain children of God (cf. Matt. 6:12, 14–15; 18:23–35). The idea is that Christian discipline should be administered in love with the attitude of transforming and reconciling the offender to God.

2:12–13. Waiting and Preaching in Troas. Having recounted the positive response to the painful letter and its implications (vv. 5–11), Paul resumes his case, introduced in v. 4, where he intimates the emotional condition in which the letter had been written in the context of his travel plans. After Paul had sent the letter with Titus from Ephesus, he moved to Troas to preach the gospel and to wait for Titus. Troas was an important port city that connected Asia and Macedonia. During his second missionary journey, Paul had briefly preached the gospel in Troas but had left for Macedonia upon receiving a vision (Acts 16:8–10; cf. 20:7). Meaning to revisit Troas, Paul arranged to meet Titus there. That may have been his primary reason for going to Troas. Although there was a positive response to his ministry in the city (v. 12), Paul was not at peace. He was experiencing inner distress waiting for Titus to return from Corinth. What was keeping him? How had the Corinthians responded? When Titus did not show up, Paul finally and anxiously set sail for Macedonia, where he hoped he would meet Titus, perhaps in Philippi. The distress Paul experienced in Troas waiting for news from Corinth underlines the unconditional affection he had for the wayward church.

2:14—7:4

Apostolic Ministry Clarified

Up to this point, Paul had been defending his integrity regarding his travel decision. When Paul was writing 2 Corinthians, he had already received the positive response from the Corinthians. With 7:5, Paul resumes the discussion in 2:13, where Paul is said to have left Troas for Macedonia to meet with Titus. The favorable report Titus brought suggested God's vindication of Paul's apostolic ministry. The passage 2:14—7:4a contains a speech sandwiched between 2:13 and 7:4b aiming at Paul's vindication of his own ministry. While in 1:12—2:13 the emphasis is on sufferings from within and without, in this speech, Paul, in a polemic tone, speaks to the uniqueness of his ministry (2:14—4:6), the sufferings and rewards of the apostolic ministry (4:7—5:10), the place and role of it (5:11—6:10), and its openness (6:11—7:4).

2:14—4:6. Uniqueness of the Apostolic Ministry. In this subsection of the discourse, Paul begins to describe the privilege of being an apostle (2:14–17). He was convinced that the Corinthians were evidence of his apostolic ministry (3:1–3) and that his ministry was effective because of God's enabling (3:4–6). He argued that his apostolic ministry was life-giving and superior to the Mosaic ministry of death (3:7–11), because in Christ the veil of Moses is removed (3:12–18). God through this ministry brings the light of the knowledge of Himself (4:1–6).

In spite of all the challenges, Paul thanked God for always making him triumphant in Christ and for using him to spread the knowledge of God everywhere (2:14). He employed the metaphor of a Roman triumphal procession to depict the progress and success of the gospel proclamation in the face of trials. While the details of the corresponding realities in the procession may not have been the primary concern of Paul, God's leading him and his coworkers, as victorious soldiers seems to have impacted Paul's use of the metaphor. He understood that Christians share in the victory of Christ (Rom. 8:37). It is God who triumphs, and Paul was delighted to be part of this triumph. He seems to be describing himself and the believers as an incense offering whose fragrance, being diffused in every place, is the saving knowledge of Christ. This is the aroma that brings life to those who believe the gospel and the aroma that leads to death for those who reject it (cf. John 3:18). Ultimately, the propagation of the gospel is pleasing to God because it is the aroma of Christ. Those who preach the gospel for personal gain (2 Cor. 11:20) do not know about its life-giving aroma. Paul's ministry took place in the sight of God and Christ and was proclaimed with sincerity (eilikrineia, "purity of motive").

Letters of recommendation were common in the ancient world (8:16–24; Acts 18:27; Rom. 16:1–2; 1 Cor. 16:3, 10–11). They served to establish the credibility of the bearer. Paul's opponents possibly bore letters of recommendation from Jerusalem to challenge the integrity of his ministry (2 Cor. 3:1b). In 2:14–17, Paul had just laid out his special role as an apostle. His work was known in all places, and his suffering for the sake of the gospel bore a mark of his apostleship. He had founded the Corinthian church (Acts 18), and the Corinthians were further proof of his apostleship. Their changed lives, wrought by the Spirit of the living God, were proof of what he considered to be a valid ministry. The author of these changed lives was Christ, the epitome of the new covenant (cf. Jer. 31:33; Ezek. 11:19). Therefore, unlike peddlers of the gospel, Paul did not need any letter of recommendation to establish his authority. As the founder of the church in Corinth, the only necessary testimony of his apostolic credibility were the changed lives of the Corinthian believers.

The existence of the Corinthian church bolstered Paul's confidence toward God (3:4–6). It was not his physical prowess and intelligence that brought the church into existence. The confidence, signified by the existence of the church, came through Christ. Paul's opponents may have complained about his self-commendation, but his answer was acknowledging God as the source of his commendation (v. 5; cf. Acts 9:15, 17–19). He and his colleagues had been made ministers not of the old covenant but of the new covenant (2 Cor. 3:6; Matt. 26:28). The old covenant symbolizes the legalistic experience of those who rely on their own obedience as the means of pleasing God, like the experience of the unbelieving Jews at Sinai (cf. Ex. 19:3–8; Deut. 5:28–29; Jer. 31:31–34). The new covenant, however, represents the experience of those who rely completely on God's grace to do all that He has promised (see commentary on Gal. 4:21–31). Here Paul intimates that the old covenant was just a written code that, separated from faith in Christ, only condemns and kills us (cf. Rom. 7:6–11; 8:3; Gal. 3:19–22). While the law of God makes us aware of our sin against God, it lacks the ability to empower our will and motives to please Him (see commentary on Gal. 3:19–22). On the other hand, in the new covenant ratified by the blood of Christ (Eph. 2:13; Heb. 13:20), God not only forgives our sins but also, through the indwelling Spirit, empowers us to live to His glory (Rom. 8:4). Paul viewed the ministry of Christ and the transformative power of the Spirit in believers as the fulfillment of the OT prophecy of the new covenant between God and His people (Jer. 31:31; Ezek. 36:27).

The two covenants are compared in terms of their attendant splendor (2 Cor. 3:7–11). Paul offered an implicit rabbinic Midrash (commentary) on Exodus 34:29–35. When Moses descended from Mount Sinai with the Ten Commandments, his face shone so brightly that the people of Israel could not look steadily at him (2 Cor. 3:7b). Admittedly, the attendant glory of the giving of the Law to the Israelites speaks for itself as noble, yet the Law sentences human beings to death because it lacks life-giving power. However, in the ministry of the new covenant, the Spirit empowers human beings to reflect the righteous ways of the Lord based on their acceptance of His atoning sacrifice. Comparing the impact of each of the two covenants, Paul notes that it is indeed much more glorious than the ministry of condemnation or the old covenant (v. 9). The old covenant, which was characterized by a gradual fading glory, was replaced by an everlasting covenant with a far surpassing glory (Heb. 8:6–13; 13:20). By every measure, the ministry that produces righteousness in human beings is permanent and remains much more glorious.

If this new covenant is more glorious, permanent, and effective, Paul together with his colleagues could boldly and clearly proclaim its reliability (v. 12). The power of the gospel of Jesus Christ is not veiled. The fact that Moses veiled his face to cover a glory that was passing away (Ex. 34:29–35) is taken by Paul to point to the gradual fading away of the old covenant. The full significance of the old covenant is understood when the veil is removed, that is to say, when we find Christ in it. Paul argues that the unbelieving Jews needed to recognize that the old covenant was pointing to Christ. Only in Him would they fully appreciate the redemptive work of God. For Paul, this was making his ministry a superior and unique one.

In vv. 16–18, Paul infers that if the Jews and sympathizers of Judaism (i.e., God-fearers) would turn to God by accepting Jesus Christ, they would gain a fuller knowledge of the truth. Since the Lord and the Spirit are inseparable, if the people would turn to the Lord, the Spirit would grant them freedom from the condemning aspect of the old covenant. They would experience the transformative power of God through the Spirit (cf. Is. 61:1; Zech. 4:6; John 8:32–36; Acts 26:18; Rom. 6:16b; 7:23–25; 1 Pet. 3:18). Notice that the Lord is characterized as the Spirit in order to emphasize His work in the human heart (2 Cor. 3:17; cf. John 4:24). The glory of the new covenant, which is the glory of the resurrected Christ, transforms the people into the image of the Lord, thus restoring God's image in them (2 Cor. 3:18; cf. Rom. 6:4; Gal. 5:13–18, 22–24).

Paul reaffirmed the certainty of his appointment by God as a minister of the new covenant by pointing to the transparency of his ministry (2 Cor. 4:1–6). He himself was transformed by the Spirit and therefore he was not walking in deceptive ways. There was nothing hidden in his ministry, but everything was done in the sight of God. He was not handling the gospel deceptively, because it is by nature a manifestation of the truth (4:2; cf. 2:17). To those who argued that Paul's gospel was hidden—that it was a deception—Paul characterized it as veiled only to those who were perishing on account of their unbelief (4:3–4; cf. Rom. 10:16, 18–21; 11:11; 1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15). They still had a veil. Those willing to look to Christ as the image of God would not be proclaiming their own message but the glory of Christ and would see themselves as His servants (2 Cor. 4:5). This is true ministry. The church should remember that the content of this message is Christ, "the image of God" (v. 4), the visible representation of the invisible God (vv. 4, 5; cf. John 1:18; Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3; Col. 1:15; Heb. 11:3). Paul was able to dispense the knowledge of Christ once God liberated him from darkness. The absence of the knowledge of salvation in Christ means existing in a darkness that can be dispersed only by the power of the Creator God (2 Cor. 4:6; cf. Gen. 1:2–3).

4:7—5:10. Suffering, Reward, and the Apostolic Ministry. It was by God's initiative that Paul became an apostle. But the fulfillment of his ministry was accompanied by afflictions, and he was sustained by the power of God. God's power manifests itself when we are weak (4:7–18). The painful experiences of the present do not determine the way we live but authenticate true ministry. Paul employs a series of metaphors to convey how expectant he was of the ultimate divine deliverance from the present condition at the Second Coming of Christ (5:1–10).

Paul begins the first part of this section (4:7–18) by declaring that it is the gospel that is of ultimate value, not the messenger who proclaims it. The relationship between the messenger of the gospel and the gospel itself is likened to an expensive ointment contained in an inexpensive and easily broken container. The frailty of the gospel messenger demonstrates that the excellent and powerful ministry of salvation is the work of God and not of us (v. 7; cf. 6:7; 12:9). God formed Paul from the dust of the ground and appointed him to disseminate His knowledge (cf. Gen. 2:7; Is. 29:16; Lam. 4:2; 1 Thess. 2:4), but as a vessel Paul was fragile and weak. His only hope was in God, who enabled him to withstand all sorts of animosities (see 1:4, 8–11). These sufferings, which are occasioned by the sharing of the message of salvation, were part of his ministry as they were of Jesus's ministry (12:10). In the hands of the Lord, the apostle's sufferings could become a blessing for the Corinthians' Christian experience (4:7–12; cf. 1:3–7).

In vv. 13–18, Paul shares his motivation for not retreating in the face of persecutions. He was persuaded that even in his humiliation the Lord would deliver him (v. 13). Hope and perseverance come together, allowing the apostle to say that even if his mortal body were killed, he would be confident that God would raise him up at the Second Coming (v. 14). His confidence and hope were grounded in the resurrection of Christ guaranteeing his future resurrection. With God on his side, the outward pressures were not in any way commensurate with the future glory. Suffering may be taking a toll on us, but the Lord is renewing us in our inner being day by day. Paul called his sufferings "light" and temporal in comparison with the experience of eternal life after the resurrection (vv. 17–18; cf. 1 Cor. 15:43; Phil. 3:21; Col. 1:16). What we experience is temporary; but that which is not yet visible—what we contemplate in hope—is permanent. Although suffering becomes a blessing in the hands of God, it is not by itself desirable. It will come to an end.

Humanity and all of creation yearn for freedom from affliction (Rom. 8:22–23; cf. Gen. 3:17). Paul develops the idea of yearning for the ultimate redemption of our bodies in 2 Corinthians 5:1–10. In v. 1, Paul provides an explanation of 4:18. We should therefore understand 5:1–10 in the context of Paul's earthly suffering and his reward at the return of the Lord. He contrasts the temporal earthly tent-house with the more desirable and eternal heavenly house. Paul likens the earthly tent to his mortal body, susceptible to corruption (4:10–11, 16). But he was yearning to be clothed with the heavenly house (or immortality) made by God (5:2–4). Paul refers clearly here to the work of God (v. 5), who will clothe us with immortality. Not being "found naked" (v. 3) is a metaphor for death. Thus, the hope of Christians is not to be separated from our mortal bodies but to be remade with new immortal bodies. The active working of the Spirit in us is a source of hope and assurance that we shall be clothed with immortality at the coming of the Lord (Rom. 8:23, 26; Eph. 2:10; 1 Pet. 5:10).

Verses 6–10 of 2 Corinthians 5 climax in the assured hope of clothing the earthly tent-house with a heavenly, glorified body at the parousia, that is, the return of Christ. Paul emphatically wished to be with the Lord but away from the body (v. 8). Up to this point, he had been contrasting his afflicted body with the immortal body from heaven (vv. 1–4). To be absent or away from the Lord (v. 6) parallels being in the earthly tent-house, which is the mortal body (4:10–11, 16; 5:1). Paul was ready to be present with, or at home with, the Lord (v. 8). This statement has been understood by some to refer to the intermediate state of the righteous dead before the coming of Christ. However, following Paul's consistent use of certain phrases to describe earthly and heavenly realities in 5:1–4, it can be maintained that to be present with the Lord and at home with Him parallels being clothed with the permanent and eternal heavenly house, which is the resurrected immortal body to be received at the Second Coming of the Lord (1 Thess. 4:14–17; cf. 1 Cor. 15:51–54; 2 Tim. 4:6–8). Paul taught elsewhere that the transformation of our mortal bodies into immortal ones does not occur when we die but at the moment of the glorious return of Christ (1 Cor. 15:52). It was with confidence that Paul expressed his readiness to be present with the Lord. He knew that the fruits of his ministerial work wrought by God in him would be acceptable to Christ (2 Cor. 5:10). Paul presented Jesus Christ as a righteous judge who was to judge believers and unbelievers on the basis of works done in the mortal body (cf. 1 Cor. 4:5). The legal decisions in the heavenly tribunal are based on objective evidence and are not arbitrary. Our works show whether we have remained in a faith relationship with the Lord to the end. Justification by faith cannot be separated from a sanctified life. Those who accept Jesus as Savior should not continue to walk in darkness (1 Cor. 6:9). As children of light, believers must show forth their good works (Matt. 5:16; 12:50). These good works do not save us, but they testify to the fact that we have been saved. They are the fruit of our salvation. Or, to put it another way, our works are not meritorious—they do not earn our salvation. Rather, they demonstrate the authenticity of our faith. The judgment that Paul foresaw motivated him to do what was pleasing to God in his ministerial work (v. 9). He had been a faithful minister of the gospel that had been entrusted to him many years earlier.

5:11—6:10. Place and Role of the Apostolic Ministry. The coming judgment was motivating Paul to proclaim the gospel with humility, because in this work he was being propelled by the love of Christ manifested in His sacrificial death (5:11–15). Paul's apostolic ministry was deeply connected with and defined by the message of reconciliation through Christ (5:16—6:2). Because the good news of reconciliation in Christ is so important, Paul was living a blameless life to avoid damaging his ministry of reconciliation (6:3–10).

In view of the certainty of the final judgment and Christ being the divine judge (5:10), Paul was earnestly trying to persuade people to embrace the gospel (v. 11), but in an unselfish way. According to Paul, if someone were to boast, it should have been the Corinthians who had come to know the message of salvation through Paul (v. 12). This knowledge enabled them to give an answer to the charges raised against Paul by the false teachers. If the church members were to fully come to appreciate the true intent of his apostolic ministry, they could withstand any gospel detractors (5:12). For the sake of argument, Paul accepts the charge of the detractors that he is insane. This apparent insanity is at the service of God and approved by Him. The evidence for this is that the church had experienced the blessings of Paul's ministry (cf. 4:12, 15).

According to Paul, the deepest motivation for ministry is the love of Christ manifested in His sacrificial death for all (see "The Death of the One and the Death of the All," p. 1669). With this understanding, Paul urges everyone who has accepted Christ to unselfish service to Him as the resurrected Lord (5:14–15). Every Christian is to walk in newness of life (Rom. 6:4; Col. 3:1–2). Just as Paul's selfless ministry serves as evidence of living a life that pleases Christ, so also every believer must live a life that pleases Christ. Believers are no longer servants of the power of sin but are servants of righteousness (Rom. 6:19; cf. 2 Cor. 5:21).

5:16—6:2. Ministry of Reconciliation. If every person has been an object of divine love through the death of Christ, then there is no place for ethnic prejudice on the scale of values of the economy of salvation. All humans share the same deadly fate of eternal separation from God (cf. Rom 3:9, 23), and to everyone has been offered reconciliation through Christ, who gave Himself as a sin offering for all. On account of the work of Christ, God removed all barriers between Him and us, making our reconciliation with Him possible (5:19). All that is necessary for salvation has been accomplished through Christ. We simply need to accept what God has already done for us. In that sense, reconciliation is an invitation. God has taken the initiative in the process of reconciliation, making it possible for us to be reconciled to Him through Christ (v. 19). Those who accept Christ become new creatures. They have died through Christ and they are now a new creation, at peace with God. The divine initiative reaches its goal when we are actually reconciled to Him (5:16a, 17–18a; cf. John 3:16).

The Death of the One and the Death of the All

Second Corinthians 5:14–15 is an important passage for the understanding of the significance of the saving power of the death of Christ. The phrase noting that if One "died for all," then "all died" deserves particular attention.

1. Christ's Death. The one who died is obviously Jesus, whose love compelled Paul to faithfulness in his ministry. His death was on the cross. The Greek preposition hyper ("for") could be translated "on behalf of"; but since by the NT period it had come to express the idea of substitution, it could also be rendered "in place of" (e.g., John 11:50). The context suggests that the idea of substitution is also present here (2 Cor. 5:21). Jesus did not only die as our representative ("for us") but also as our substitute ("in our place"). His death was for the benefit of others and not for His own benefit.

2. Benefit of His Death. "All" refers to the extent of Jesus's atoning death. He did not only die for the elect but for every human being who has ever lived or will live in this world. "All" is probably another way of referring to the "world," mentioned in v. 19. The universal impact of the death of Jesus is emphasized. He died for Jews and Gentiles. This is the meaning of the phrase "Savior of the world" in John 4:42. His sacrificial death did not involve ethnic barriers or any other barrier, because all are sinners and in need of a Savior. It is universal in its range and significance.

3. Dying through Christ. The idea that One died and then all died is difficult to understand. How did all die? What kind of death is this? With respect to Christ, His death was a real, literal one; He expired on the cross. This cannot be said concerning the "all." Hence, we have to ask, In what sense did all die? In our passage, Paul does not provide a clear answer to this question. Scholars have provided different possible answers. But v. 15 seems to provide one, suggesting that those who are alive are those who died to self and were also resurrected with Christ to a new life through baptism (Rom. 6:1–6).

The only death implicit in the context, apart from the physical death of Christ on the cross, is death to our selfish nature. The connection between the death of Christ and the death of the believer to self is part of Paul's theology and teaching. It could then be suggested that the phrase "all died" (v. 14) simply means that the death sentence pronounced against humanity was actually executed in the person of Christ on the cross and that there is no reason for anyone to perish. Christ paid the penalty for the sin of humanity. In other words, when Christ died, all died in the sense that they were given not only the possibility of escaping their deserved destiny of eternal death but also the possibility of living a new life for their Savior. Death was no longer the inexorable destiny of humanity. According to v. 21, Christ was made sin for us and died for us, providing salvation for all. He died in place of all and consequently His death is objectively the death of all, though not all have yet actually died to sin. It is only in the sense that when He died, we all died. The passage is thus stressing the objective significance of Christ's death on the cross and its implication for humanity.

This message of reconciliation through Christ had been given to Paul and his fellow workers (2 Cor. 5:18b—6:2). According to it, Christ is the exclusive means of divine reconciliation. But in this task Christ was not acting alone, as if He were an object of divine hatred: God was "in Christ" reconciling the world to Himself (5:19). The divinity of Jesus Christ, as well as His incarnation, is emphasized here to indicate the sublime truth of divine love. God made Jesus Christ a sin offering for us (i.e., to be sin for us) in order for us to become the righteousness of God in Christ (v. 21). God's righteousness is ours only in our union with Christ (cf. John 1:14, 18; Phil. 2:7).

From the human point of view, Paul had previously regarded Jesus Christ as one of the failed messiahs (2 Cor. 5:16b; cf. Acts 5:34–39). But after his Damascus experience, he came to appreciate Jesus as the divinely appointed Savior whose death had guaranteed eternal life to believers. This message was entrusted to Paul and his workers as ambassadors of Christ. On behalf of Christ, Paul appealed to the Corinthian church to "be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20). This call to reconciliation for the Corinthians may appear superfluous because they were believers in Christ. But our reconciliation to God is inseparable from our reconciliation to each other, and the Corinthians—at least some of them—needed to be reconciled to Paul (13:5–6). So, Paul pled with them to make a positive decision regarding their attitude toward him and his ministry (6:1–2; cf. Is. 49:7–9). Like his Master and Savior, Paul sincerely and passionately sought to help the unrepentant to renew their commitment to God (2 Cor. 6:2; cf. Luke 15:7–10).

Paul and his workers had learned to remain resolute in order for the ministry of reconciliation not to be ridiculed (6:3–10). Verse 3 continues the logic of v. 1 and 5:20 with its focus on the ministry entrusted to Paul and his workers. It had not been the intention of Paul and his workers to put stumbling blocks in anybody's way so as to damage the gospel (6:3). In vv. 4–10, Paul provides a list of ministerial experiences that would commend his ministry to the Corinthians (see below, "A Profile of Paul's Ministry"). Under any circumstances, Paul and his workers had not given occasion for anyone to dishonor the gospel (cf. Acts 14:14–19; 20:7–11, 13, 31; 27:21–22; 2 Cor. 11:25–27). In other words, the gospel is far more valuable than human pride and preferences (cf. Luke 9:24; Eph. 6:13–17). Irrespective of present circumstances, the minsters of the gospel should always seek to glorify the One who called them to His service (cf. Matt. 5:16; Rev. 2:10).

A Profile of Paul's Ministry

Second Corinthians contains four lists of Paul's ministerial experiences and convictions (4:8–9; 6:4–10; 11:23b–29; and 12:10). In 6:4–10, the list specifically aims at commending his ministry to the Corinthians. It reveals how Paul perceived himself and how he dealt with his ministerial experiences in the light of the cross and his divine calling. Scholars have analyzed the list in slightly different ways, but we will simply list the items and draw some conclusions from it.

1. Facing Difficult Circumstances. The phrase "in much patience" (or "in great endurance") is probably describing how Paul faced at least the following nine difficult circumstances in his ministry, all of them introduced by the Greek preposition en ("in"; "in the midst of"): in tribulations (troubles), in needs (hardships or calamities), in distresses (anguishes), in stripes (beatings), in imprisonments, in tumults (disturbances or riots), in labors (hardships, hard work), in sleeplessness, in fasting (hunger) (vv. 4–5).

2. Virtues and Means for Ministry. Paul next adds a number of qualities or virtues and means needed for an effective ministry. All of them are again introduced by the preposition en ("in"), but this time with the sense of "by" ("by means of"): by purity (sincerity), by knowledge (understanding), by longsuffering (patience, forbearance), by kindness (goodness, generosity), by the Holy Spirit, by sincere love (genuine love [agapē]), by truthful speech (by the word of truth, or the reliable word; probably a reference to the gospel), by the power of God (power provided by or coming from God; vv. 6–7a). Paul continues his list of qualities or means using the preposition dia ("by," "through," or "by means of"): by the armor and weapons of righteousness. At this point he shifts to a list of antitheses based on perceptions of his person and ministry. The list still emphasizes important experiences in his ministry: by honor and dishonor, by evil or bad report and good report (defamation or slandering and good report or reputation).

3. A True Minister. Paul next shifts to the use of the conjunction hōs ("as") to contrast the truth about him with what others have said about him: as deceivers, and yet true (as impostors, but honest, truthful, genuine); as unknown, and yet well known (as not well known or regarded as unknown, and yet being well known). He also mentions divine deliverance from some threatening experiences: as dying, and yet living; as chastened, and yet not killed (punished, disciplined, beaten, and yet not put to death). He concludes on a positive note, stressing the greatness of his ministry in spite of its difficulties. He describes himself as being "sorrowful, yet always rejoicing" (v. 10); as "poor, yet making many rich" (v. 10; cf. 8:9); and as "having nothing," yet possessing everything (v. 10; cf. 1 Cor. 3:21–23).

4. Overview of Ministry. In commending his ministry, Paul provides some basic elements in a Christian understanding of ministry. First, Christian ministry takes place in a context of adversity and requires from believers a strong willingness to persevere. Second, adversity arises from outside the parameters of the church (e.g., imprisonment) or in the context of the life of the church (e.g., defamation). In both cases, perseverance is needed. Third, opposition to the ministry is to be overcome through a consecrated life (e.g., purity, love, the presence of the Spirit, righteousness, and a full knowledge of the truth). A life of unquestionable integrity makes ministry powerful and effective. Fourth, ministry and message are inseparable. Paul's intense defense of his ministry was motivated by the fact that a rejection of it by the Corinthians would have been a rejection of the message he was proclaiming. Fifth, ministry requires a positive attitude in the midst of adversity based on the conviction that God can always deliver us or strengthen us. There is always reason to rejoice in the Lord and to see ourselves as rich in Him and able to enrich others with the gospel truth.

6:11—7:4. Openness and the Apostolic Ministry. As ambassadors for Christ Jesus, Paul and his workers once again were registering their unconditional love for the Corinthians (6:11). Their ministry among them had resulted in a filial relationship between them and the church (1:18–19; 3:2; 10:14; cf. Acts 18:2–17). Both Timothy and Titus were brothers of the church (1:1; 12:18), and Paul in a sense was the father (2 Cor. 6:13; 12:14–15; 1 Cor. 4:14–15). Everything the apostle had experienced had been for the benefit of the church (2 Cor. 1:4, 6; 4:12, 15; 5:13). They shared one common history and hope (cf. 1:14), and he was ready to die together and live together with the church (7:3). As far as Paul was concerned, he was still the father of the Corinthian church (6:13). Therefore, he was appealing to the Corinthians to reconsider their love toward him (vv. 11–13) and to disengage themselves from unbelievers (vv. 14—7:4).

First, Paul was appealing to the Corinthians to open up their hearts to him. He only addressed his audience by name (Corinthians) when his emotions had been deeply affected (6:11; cf. Gal. 3:1; Phil. 4:15). As far as he was concerned, there was nothing in his heart against them. He recognized that the Corinthians were holding back their affections from him and was entreating them to unleash their love toward him as his children (vv. 12–13; cf. 11:2).

Second, returning to Paul would mean breaking away from those who were unbelievers in the gospel of Paul. At first, 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1 seems to break the flow of Paul's appeal for the affection of the Corinthians, which is resumed in 7:2. But it can also be considered a logical development of the discourse. If the Corinthians were to return their affection to Paul, they would need to break away from any other relationship militating against this new move. While it was necessary to heal a broken relationship, it was equally significant to discontinue an existing one that would make healing impossible. Some have understood 6:14—7:1 as Paul's charge to the Corinthians to dissociate themselves from pagans and their influence. It is maintained that pagan relationships such as marriage, business, eating of food offered to idols, and solving issues at pagan courts should not be entertained. This understanding is possible since Paul had already discouraged some of these relationships in his previous correspondence (cf. 1 Cor. 1:11–12;

5:1–2, 9–10; 6:1–8; 7:12–15; 10:19–28). However, contextually Paul was talking about unbelievers who were Christians who had rejected the gospel he was proclaiming, and he was encouraging the Corinthians not to be unequally yoked with them (2 Cor. 6:14). (See below, "Unbelievers").

In 6:14a, Paul appeals to an OT imagery of crossbreeding animals of different kinds to discourage the union between the Corinthians and unbelievers (cf. Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:10). He also employs five rhetorical questions with expected negative answers (2 Cor. 6:14b–16a). These questions stress the incompatibility of a relationship between Corinthian believers and unbelievers that would have included marriage. He further quotes the OT to appeal to the church members to dissociate themselves from unbelievers and to return to God as their Father (vv. 16b–18; cf. Ex. 4:22; Is. 52:11). Paul was encouraging the church as the temple of God to cleanse itself from uncleanness (7:1), restating the theme introduced in 6:14a.

Finally, after appealing for disengagement from the false ministers, Paul closes this section of the epistle by pleading again for reconciliation (7:2–4). As Paul had demonstrated, he had not offended anybody and the church could bear witness to this (4:2; 5:11; 6:3). He had not taken financial advantage of anyone when ministering among them (11:9; 12:16–18; cf. 1 Thess. 2:9–10; 2 Thess. 3:7–10). He was wanting the Corinthians to understand that his attempt to exonerate himself of the false charges against his integrity and ministry was not amounting to his disowning them. He still loved them (7:3; cf. 11:2). In other words, nothing, including these charges, could make him grow cold toward them. It is true that he had freely spoken to them about their problems, but at the same time he had been telling others great things about them (v. 4). Paul's outlook with respect to the Corinthians was very positive. Here, we are looking into the heart of a true pastor.

Unbelievers

Technically speaking, the Greek term apistoi ("unbelievers") as used in Paul's writings commonly refers to non-Christians (1 Cor. 6:6; 7:12–15; 10:27; 1 Tim. 1:13; 5:8). However, it is context that gives meanings to words. In 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1, Paul discusses a situation in which believers were no longer in the faith.

1. Contextual Considerations. When we examine 2 Corinthians, it is clear that in Paul's call to the Corinthians to be reconciled he was thinking about both his ministry and his message (5:18—6:4). This suggests that the believers in Corinth were expected to dissociate themselves from a ministry that was competing with Paul's ministry for their loyalty (6:11–12; 7:2). He was aware of false ministers of the gospel who most probably thwarted the Corinthians' loyalty to Paul by questioning his apostolic authority (11:1—12:13). The Corinthians had started to allow themselves to be courted by these false ministers, who commended themselves, not Christ. So, Paul and his associates were urging them to dissociate themselves from these false ministers, who were not the true ambassadors of Christ (5:20). From Paul's perspective, such individuals were "unbelievers." Similarly, in 1 Corinthians 15:33, the Corinthians were strongly urged not to continue to allow themselves to be deceived by those questioning the resurrection of the dead (cf. 1 Cor. 15:12b). This was a call to break away from an already existing relationship that was competing for the Corinthians' loyalty to Christ (2 Cor. 6:14a).

2. Christians as Apistos. Paul discouraged believers from associating with nonbelievers who were fornicators, coveters, extortionists, and idolaters (1 Cor. 6:9–10) and specifically forbade association with any believer who also shared in these habits (1 Cor. 11–12b). Though the technical term apistoi ("unbelievers") is not used in this passage, conceptually believers can be designated as apistoi ("unbelievers"; cf. 2 Cor. 4:1–6; Titus 1:15). Any Christian relationship with unbelievers that was negatively infectious to the Christian was to be severed. Believers were expected to take the initiative in breaking away from these associations. Perhaps the only exception was a believer already married to an unbeliever. In such a case, a believer was not to take the initiative to leave the unbeliever (1 Cor. 7:12–15); the sanctity of marriage was essentially revered by Paul (1 Cor. 7:10).

It is suggestive that a believer can essentially be termed an "unbeliever" if he or she is promoting a message different from the basic rudiments of the Christian faith. It is clear that in the Corinthian correspondence, a "believer" (pistos) was one in a consensual agreement with Paul's gospel. Any teaching that questioned the content of his gospel to the Corinthians was a farce, and any peddler of such a teaching was an unbeliever (2 Thess. 3:6).

7:5–16
Titus's Return

After the discourse vindicating his ministry (2:14—7:4), Paul resumes the account of his movement in search of Titus in Macedonia (7:5; cf. 2:13). The return of Titus from Corinth brought comfort to Paul (7:5–7). Paul recounted the effect of the painful letter that had been sent through Titus to the Corinthians (7:8–16).

7:5–11. Impact of the Painful Letter. In 2:13, Paul indicated that in his quest to know the result of the painful letter that he had sent to the Corinthians through Titus, he left Troas for Macedonia. In Troas, he was emotionally distressed because Titus did not show up (7:5–7). On coming to Macedonia, he was physically restless and emotionally anxious as he waited to see Titus. With the coming of Titus, Paul was comforted because the Corinthians showed signs of repentance and a desire to defend Paul's ministerial integrity (v. 7; cf. 2:5–10). Paul found in this change of attitude divine comfort in his afflictions (cf. 1:1–9), attributing the power of repentance to God.

At some point, Paul regretted sending the letter that had hurt the Corinthians (7:8). But after Titus reported to him the change of mind among the Corinthians, what Paul had intended to accomplish, he was happy that he had written it (v. 9). The emotional instability of Paul during his search for Titus in Troas and Macedonia was the result of his fear that the letter could have had an adverse effect on his already estranged relationship with the Corinthians. But God worked on their hearts to appreciate the intent of the letter (v. 10). The Corinthians bore witness to the positive effect of the letter even though it had caused them pain (v. 11).

7:12–16. Response of the Church to the Letter. Paul next highlighted the ultimate purpose and intended result of the painful letter. Apart from the fact that he had to demonstrate his dissatisfaction for the attitude of the erring believer, Paul needed to make the Corinthians appreciate his love for them from God's perspective (v. 12). Since the founding and nurturing of the Corinthian church, Paul had consistently shown his affection for the church. Even when the Corinthians' love grew cold toward Paul, his love for them did not. He capitalized on the situation to show his love even more to them (cf. 2:2–3). The positive response of the church made him happier. In his experience as the father of the church, he boasted to Titus that the ailing relationship was temporary. Titus was well received by the Corinthians, and Paul was pleased with the reception of and obedience to his demands (cf. Eph. 6:5; Phil. 2:12). Paul was happy with the response, but there was still a restraint among a minority of the Corinthian believers (2 Cor. 1:14; 3:5–6; 11:7–12; 12:13–16). Paul cared not only for the majority that had embraced him but equally sought to gain the affection of the others too. Titus had established a good relationship that Paul was ready to capitalize on in order to reinitiate a call for a further demonstration of their love.

The Corinthians, Paul, and the Church Today

The lengthy attempt by Paul to defend his ministry and to call the Corinthians to reconciliation with him speaks to the church today as it faces similar internal conflicts. From his discourse we can learn how to deal with conflicts in the church and avoid them.

1. Perhaps one of the most important things we learn from the experience of the Corinthians is that even today the church, in spite of being holy, is not yet what God expects it to be. It is on a journey toward that ideal, but it has not yet arrived. Therefore, we should not allow conflicts within it to weaken our conviction that God is indeed sanctifying and leading the church. The imperfections of the church are the imperfections of its members, and we should do all we can to avoid allowing our imperfections to damage the unity of the church. It is only through the reconciling power of Christ that the unity of the church can be preserved in spite of our imperfections.

2. The experience of the Corinthians tells us that turmoil in the church is often the result of self-asserting and strenuous individuals, like false teachers, whose judgmental attitudes plant seeds of distrust in the minds of its members. They usually bypass God's appointed ministers and appoint themselves as true exponents of the message of salvation when in reality what they bring is division, animosity, and conflict.

3. Paul is telling us that in such situations church leaders are to clearly speak up and not to negotiate the message of the church. This appears to have been the purpose of the painful letter that Paul had sent to the Corinthians. For Paul, his message of reconciliation that was being threatened through attacks against his ministry was worth fighting for. This message was not his to negotiate—and neither is it ours—but it was given to him and to all of us by our resurrected Lord. We have no choice but to proclaim it. In any situation of church conflict, the gospel has to be reaffirmed and its implications for the life of the church made clear, because only the gospel of salvation through Christ can unify us.

4. In seeking to resolve conflicts within the church, love should characterize all we do and say. Paul constantly reaffirmed his love for the Corinthians, as well as the sincerity of all his actions toward them. The most powerful agent of change is the love of God working in our hearts. Often this love reaches us through the love of fellow believers. Paul was not seeking revenge against those who offended him but their restoration through forgiveness. The most fundamental purpose of church discipline is bringing healing to all the parties involved.

5. Since the main source of church dissension seems to be self-appointed teachers, Paul states that in order to avoid division or to restore harmony in the church, it is indispensable for church members to separate themselves from such individuals. Their influence needs to be restrained, and this is something that church members must do. In some situations, it would be necessary for them to disengage from such individuals by ending any type of relationship that would be damaging to their faith and the church.

6. For Paul, the change that took place in the hearts of the Corinthians was a display of the reconciling grace of God. In examining the way he had handled the situation, he at times seems to have regretted some of his techniques. At least he regretted sending the painful letter. But together with Paul, we should realize that God is powerful enough to use us, in spite of our imperfections, to His glory and for the benefit of His church. God does not abandon His church when it faces internal conflicts, but He works within it to bring about healing. In this task, God uses church members and ministers who are humble enough to be used by Him. The intensity of His love for the church is such that He will never let it go from His loving hands.

8:1—9:15

THE COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS IN JUDEA

Once the ailing relationship apparently had been restored, certain measurable obligations needed attention. In 1 Corinthians, Paul had urged the Corinthians to give financial aid to the needy saints in Jerusalem (16:1, 3; cf. Rom. 15:25–27). This directive had also been given to the churches in Galatia and Macedonia, and they complied (2 Cor. 8:1–2; 1 Cor. 16:1). In Paul's understanding, it was the responsibility of the well-to-do believers to attend to the needs of impoverished believers (Rom. 15:27; 1 Cor. 16:1). Since Paul's painful visit occurred after Timothy had been ill-treated in Corinth, Paul could not request this financial aid. But now that the Corinthian church had responded positively to the letter sent by Paul through Titus, Paul could remind them of their financial responsibility toward the needy saints in Jerusalem. It is important to note that Paul knew the financial strength of the Corinthians; hence, he did not make an unreasonable demand. When Paul ministered to the Corinthians, Corinth was the hub of the Achaean economy owing to its location and two sea ports. It can be said that the Corinthian believers were active workers who could start saving money from the first day of the week (see commentary on 1 Cor. 16:1–4). Paul reminded them in two different ways about their responsibility for the needy. First, he refreshed their minds concerning the need to contribute to the aid fund (2 Cor. 8:1–15). Second, he made a case for the integrity of the envoys who were to gather the money in anticipation of his third visit to Corinth (8:16—9:15). Chapters 8–9 constitute Paul's appeal to the Corinthians to prepare to give liberally for the needy saints in Jerusalem.

8:1–15

The Need for Liberality

In this section, the Corinthians were reminded of the need to give generously. Paul began by citing the generosity of the Macedonian churches, namely, the congregations in Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea (8:1–5). He then appealed to the Corinthians to give generously (vv. 6–15).

8:1–5. The Free Giving of the Macedonians. Before his appeal for funds from the Corinthians, Paul cited the generosity of the Macedonians to motivate the Corinthians to give generously (v. 5). Even though the Macedonian churches were facing persecution and were financially weak, they gave abundantly (8:1–3). Persecution usually renders one poor (cf. Rev. 2:9). In spite of these imposing situations, the Macedonian churches insistently pleaded with Paul to be given the opportunity to contribute to alleviate the more pressing needs of the saints in Jerusalem (v. 4). Serving the dire needs of believers is a privilege and flows from a heart that has been voluntarily given to the Lord. If the whole self is willingly surrendered to the Master Jesus Christ, then all material things can generously be given to His service. Through this request, Paul implies that the Corinthians were willing to truly and fully renew their commitment to Christ and to him so as to understand and practice Christ-centered stewardship. Ultimately, the disposition of the Macedonians was occasioned by God's will.

8:6–15. Appeal to the Corinthians. In view of the exemplary generosity of the Macedonians in their disadvantaged situation, the Corinthians were also to be willing to give. Since Titus was well received by the Corinthians, Paul considered him to be the perfect envoy to help gather the collection (vv. 6, 10). Paul saw a correlation between recognition of apostolic authority and obedience to apostolic directives (v. 7). Unlike his command in 1 Corinthians 16:1, he was pleading with them to willingly contribute to the aid fund (2 Cor. 8:1–8). The change in tone is a reflection of their renewed relationship. For Paul, the exemplary giving of the Macedonians was not the most important motivation for liberal giving; it was Jesus. Even though He is God, and therefore rich, He identified Himself with the needs of humanity by becoming poor for us (cf. John 1:14; 2 Cor. 5:21; Phil. 2:6–8). True stewardship is grounded in the sacrifice of Christ (2 Cor. 8:10). This does not mean it was appropriate that the Corinthians should have been overburdened and destitute as a result of helping the needy. They were entreated to contribute according to their means. The stress of Paul's appeal lies in the fulfillment of the promise made by the church to contribute to the aid fund (vv. 11–15; cf. 9:5). It is important to note that Paul did not encourage laziness (cf. 1 Thess. 4:11–12; 2 Thess. 3:10–13). The dire conditions in Jerusalem were the result of extreme and prolonged poverty brought about by a famine that struck Judea in the first half of the first century (cf. Acts 11:28–29). The need in Jerusalem was certainly legitimate. And due to the growing opposition Jewish believers encountered from their fellow Jews, their only real source of help would be their fellow believers living outside of Judea.

8:16—9:5

Mission and Commendation of Titus

Assuming that the Corinthians would be ready to give generously, a trustworthy person had to go and collect the money. In view of his apostolic integrity, Paul felt obliged to recommend certain individuals to collect the money. He recommended Titus and two other believers and urged the Corinthians to welcome them (8:16–24). In view of their visit, the Corinthians were to prepare and cooperate with the delegates (9:1–5). Paul emphasized the blessings that may accrue from generous giving (9:6–15).

8:16–24. Integrity of Titus and His Companions. Both Paul and Titus shared the same passion for raising funds to help the saints in Jerusalem. Titus had developed a good relationship with the Corinthians (cf. 8:6) and had willingly decided to go back to Corinth for the collection. Paul chose his words carefully to underscore the willingness involved in the act of that specific giving. He commended Titus for this task as a fellow worker (vv. 16, 17, 23). The church could attest to this information, so no one could question the integrity of Paul (cf. 2:13). Paul wanted total transparency in the way the collection was being gathered and regarding the process of taking it to Jerusalem. As a wise pastor, he left no room for suspicion (8:20). In addition to Titus, Paul also recommended two unnamed brothers in the faith to participate in the collection. The first brother was known by the Macedonian churches for his sincere service to the gospel and was chosen by the churches. Paul was not involved in the appointment of this first brother. Paul reported exactly what happened to safeguard his integrity before God and believers (vv. 18–19, 21). Another brother, who had proved diligent on several occasions, was commended to be one of the delegates. These individuals are likely part of the group of delegates identified by name in Acts 20:4, three of whom were Macedonians (Sopater from Berea and Aristarchus and Secundus from Thessalonica). Whoever they were, these two unnamed brothers were special messengers of the Macedonian churches while Titus was Paul's partner in ministry and known to the Corinthian church. Paul recognized that one sure way of building up and preserving his integrity in the ministry was to be transparent in financial matters.

9:1–5. Preparation for the Collection. The content of chapter 8 was intended to motivate the Corinthians to give willingly, as they had promised the previous year (v. 10). It was their initial zeal to contribute to the fund that inspired the Macedonians to give (8:11; 9:2). Paul's concern in chapter 9 was to make sure that the Corinthians would follow through on their promise to give generously when the delegates arrived to collect the donations of the Achaeans, including the Corinthians (vv. 2, 5). Paul's purpose in reminding the Corinthians about the Macedonians was not to increase the size of the offering by pitting one group of believers against another; it was to remind the Corinthians that not only was their reputation at stake on this issue but his was as well. Not wanting to be shamed if the Corinthians failed to honor their zeal to give, Paul appealed to their collective conscience to persuade them to cooperate with the delegates in their generous gift. If they would cooperate, his boasting of their zeal to contribute to the aid would be affirmed. If he would come with some of the Macedonians to Corinth and they would not be prepared, his integrity might be at stake. Therefore, if the church had again embraced him as their spiritual father, it was appropriate that they would honor him by giving generously but not grudgingly. So far, Paul had appealed to them in three scenarios: (1) the exemplary generosity of the Macedonians; (2) the selfless and voluntary sacrifice of Jesus; and (3) the integrity of Paul and the Corinthians. These scenarios were to motivate them to give generously.

9:6–15. The Result of Liberality. The fourth motivation for helping the needy involves the blessings that accrue from generous giving. God uses mortal beings to shower His blessings on other mortal beings (cf. Gen. 12:2). Paul employed a common shared analogy of reaping what one sows on the field (2 Cor. 9:6; cf. Luke 6:38; Gal. 6:7). This analogy is used to stress the principle of generous giving (2 Cor. 9:5). The Corinthians were to remember that all material prosperity belongs to God, and He distributes His gifts to any benefactor who attends to the needs of the poor (cf. Ps. 112:3, 9). Such a benefactor will be blessed by the Lord. Those who have should be willing to assist the destitute (cf. Luke 12:1, 13–21; 14:14). Paul was persuaded that we receive God's blessings in order to practice liberality regularly (2 Cor. 9:11). The liberality of the Corinthians would not only supply the needs of the saints (v. 12a) but would also bring glory to the Lord (vv. 11b, 12b). Additionally, the saints in Jerusalem would pray to God on their behalf. All in all, the Corinthians were to remember the gift of Jesus Christ, whom God had given to them so that they might be saved (cf. Rom. 5:15, 17; 6:23; 1 Cor. 1:7). The indescribable gift of God (2 Cor. 9:15) is what transforms humans from selfish creatures into beings willing to emulate the Greatest Giver of all, our Lord and Savior.

10:1—13:10

Paul's Defense of His Apostolate

Paul changes gears to discuss issues relative to the defense of his apostolic authority. The tone of 2 Corinthians 1–9 is a reflection on bruised relations that had recently been eased. Chapters 10–13 present a picture of uneasiness. As noted in the introduction, this change of tone has led some to question whether chapters 10–13 constitute part of Paul's original letter, while others who see these chapters as authentically Pauline have criticized what they see as the mercurial temperament of the apostle. Neither of these conclusions are necessary. Not a single Greek manuscript supports the view that the original letter ended at chapter 9. And the issue of commending oneself in the gospel ministry has been addressed in both major sections (2:17; 3:1–3; 5:12; 10:12; 11:22–24). These frequent references suggest the presence of false teachers in Corinth, perhaps from Jerusalem (11:22–23), who had been competing for the loyalty of the Corinthians. Thus, chapters 10–13 do not necessarily indicate that Paul wrote them because he had received fresh information about any sudden and negative changes of attitude on the part of the Corinthians toward him. After all, the reference to sinners who should have repented but who had not (12:21—13:2) suggests that some of the issues addressed in chapters 10–13 had been longstanding ones. And the impression that Paul loved the Corinthians more than they loved him permeates the entire letter (e.g., 6:13; 11:11; 12:15). In addition, Paul had repeatedly mentioned his upcoming visit as his third one (12:14; 13:1), which clearly seems to follow the painful visit mentioned earlier in 1:23—2:4. Although the tone of chapters 10–13 seems to deviate from chapters 1–9 to some degree, it is important to recognize that the entire letter is polemic; it seeks to defend the integrity of Paul's apostolic ministry as a whole.

Understood from this perspective, the entire letter appears to have served as a twofold response to Titus's overall report on the situation in Corinth. Building on the positive reaction of some in the church to his earlier letter, Paul first erects bridges of goodwill with the church in chapters 1–9. Then in chapters 10–13, he addresses the crux of the problem—the individuals who had created doubt in the minds of the Corinthians about the integrity of his apostolic calling and ministry. In these final chapters, Paul develops the defense of this apostolic authority along three lines. First, he brings to view the nature of the spiritual authority of his apostleship so as to further strengthen their fraternal bond among themselves (10:1–18). Second, he specifically outlines the nature of a true apostle over against that of the false apostles (11:1—12:13). Finally, he again announces his upcoming third visit, at which time, if the troublemakers in Corinth had not turned from their contentious ways, he would have demonstrated the power of his apostolic authority in bringing the situation to a decisive end (12:14—13:10; cf. 9:4–5).

10:1–11. The Spiritual Authority of the Apostle. By the measure of some, Paul should have been boastful of his authority and accomplishments when he visited the Corinthians. Instead they observed that he had acted with boldness and authority only when he wrote to them (v. 10). Paul appealed to them by the humbleness and gentleness of Christ, hoping that he would not have to be bold with the Corinthians, even though he feared that he would need to be bold with those who argued that he walked according to the flesh (vv. 1–2), that is, with those who claimed that he was not guided by the Spirit and was living according to the standards of this world. These individuals were not to confuse his humility with timidity. He had the apostolic right to come to the Corinthians "with a rod" to discipline or in love and gentleness (1 Cor. 4:21). He acknowledged that in one sense he did walk in the flesh, that is to say, that he was human just like everyone else. However, in the performance of his ministry, he was not waging war according to the flesh—in a worldly manner—but in the power of the Spirit. In other words, Paul was arguing that his ministry could not be judged according to human standards because his ministry had to do with spiritual matters (2 Cor. 10:3–5; cf. Eph. 6:11–17). Paul indicates that in this war the spiritual weapons were powerful enough to overcome the arguments and human sophistries of the enemy and to finally defeat them. The results involve bringing people to obedience to Christ (2 Cor. 10:6) and punishment to those who oppose the message. Paul had been given the authority to build up the church. Thus, the focus was not to be on him but on Christ (vv. 7–8). In terms of worldly standard and appraisal, he may not have displayed rhetorical competence or physical strength. However, even those who sought to subvert his authority admitted that his letters were powerful in content. Therefore, he was repeating his desire to be bold or powerful when he would visit them; he chose to be bold only when necessary. Somehow a section of the church had misunderstood his ministerial strategy. He was interested in building up the body of Christ, not in tearing it down (vv. 9–11).

10:12–18. The Place for Apostolic Boasting. Even if Paul had to boast about his authority, there was a place and a proper way to do it. In his Damascus experience, the mission of Paul was clearly spelled out. God gave him the authority to officially relay the saving act of Christ to Gentiles and Jews (Acts 9:15). This authority was further affirmed at the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:1–21). The Jerusalem church had recognized his authority to minister to Gentiles, including the Corinthians (cf. Gal. 2:7–8). In other words, if he were to boast, he would do it in a place where he had ministered. In such a situation, the Corinthian church, established by him, was evidently the subject of his boasting. This understanding was to inform and educate the so-called apostles who had invaded his ministerial territory and were commending themselves (2 Cor. 10:13–15). Unlike Apollos, these busybodies had come to Corinth to supplant Paul (cf. 1 Cor. 3:5–6). Paul shared the conviction that true apostles should not be prideful in a place where they had not sown the seed of the gospel (2 Cor. 10:16; cf. Rom. 15:18–21). But more important than commending oneself in a defined jurisdiction is the commendation that is done by the Lord (vv. 17–18). The only legitimate boasting is boasting in what Christ has done for or through us (Rom. 15:18; Gal. 6:14). All glory is thus given to God as the source of our success. It is only this kind of individual who, like Paul, will receive the commendation of Jesus (2 Cor. 10:17–18; cf. 5:9–10).

Characteristics of True and False Apostles

In this part of his defense, Paul continues to outline specific differences between apostles commended by Jesus Christ and self-commended ones. In this regard, Paul confined his effort to safeguarding the Corinthians against false messengers (11:1–6). He had been charged with lacking love toward the church because he had not requested financial aid from it for his personal sustenance. Here, he responds to this charge so as to defend his ministerial credentials and expose the works of the false apostles (vv. 7–15). For the sake of argument, he boasts in the same way as the false teachers, namely, as fools (vv. 16–33). But in truth, his privileges as an apostle of Jesus Christ were uncontested and he boasted in what made him dependent on Jesus (12:1–2). He finally makes a case for his apostolic ministry (12:11–13).

11:1–6. Safeguarding the Church against False Messages. Some of the Corinthians had been sympathetic to the false teachers who commended themselves (5:12; 10:7, 12; 11:12–18). Paul was imploring them to bear with him as he, like his opponents, boasted about his apostolic credentials (11:1–6). Although Paul clearly felt that boasting in this manner was improper, he still did so since this was the type of criterion his opponents laid claim to and that was apparently valued by the Corinthians themselves (v. 4). Accordingly, Paul offers three reasons for why he should be allowed to boast. First, the Corinthian church was the result of his ministry. He felt responsible for their spiritual purity until Christ's coming. Like God's own jealousy for Israel, Paul was jealous for the Corinthians' exclusive love for Christ, their spiritual husband (cf. Ex. 34:12–16; Hos. 2:19–20; 4:12; 6:4; 11:8). Paul described himself as the father of the bride. As such, it was his responsibility to present her as chaste to her bridegroom, Jesus Christ, at the Second Coming (2 Cor. 12:141; 1 Cor. 4:15). This nuptial imagery reveals his pastoral responsibility and love for his converts. Based on this relationship, he was to be allowed to boast briefly in the Lord (2 Cor. 11:2–3). Second, since the Corinthians had entertained a different gospel message from the self-promoting troublemakers, they were to allow Paul to do what the false teachers did but to do so in the Lord. Paul recognized how vulnerable the church was to being deceived by these sorts of religious charlatans (vv. 3–4). Third, in the context of entertaining these troublemakers, the Corinthians were not to regard Paul as inferior or lacking in comparison to the eminent or "super" apostles. It appears that these ostensibly great apostles were different from the "pillars" of the Jerusalem church or the twelve apostles and probably refers to the false teachers troubling the church in Corinth (Acts 15:6; 1 Cor. 15:5; Gal. 2:9). At the time 2 Corinthians was being written, the Jerusalem church had recognized Paul's ministry and gospel (Acts 15:22–27). The message of these people was considered different from Paul's (2 Cor. 11:4). Even though he was not as versed in rhetorical training and skill as they were, he was more than proficient in the knowledge of the gospel. To him, style was less important than substance.

11:7–15. Paul's Financial Self-Reliance. Paul had been accused of not loving the Corinthians because he had rejected their financial help. In 1 Corinthians, Paul had argued for the apostolic right to be remunerated by his converts (1 Cor. 9:3–18). In fact, some itinerant philosophers in the Greco-Roman period often supported themselves by charging a fee for their tutorial services. Others worked at a trade as they sought to maintain their reputation. However, while Paul's principle did not contravene that of Christ and the apostolic church (Luke 9:3–4; 10:4, 7; 1 Cor. 9:6, 11, 14; 1 Tim. 5:17–18; 3 John 5–8), he consciously refused to accept any financial help from new converts to whom he was currently ministering at his founding visit (2 Cor. 11:9; 1 Cor. 16:17; Phil. 4:14–16; 1 Thess. 2:9). He would receive financial help from his converts after the message had been accepted and the church had been established (1 Cor. 16:6, 11). In Corinth, he worked at his trade as a tentmaker during his founding visit (2 Cor. 11:9; cf. Acts 18:3). He provided for himself so that the gospel would not be hindered (1 Cor. 9:12). After Silas and Timothy arrived from Macedonia, Paul devoted himself to the preaching of the gospel (Acts 18:5). It can be implied that Silas and Timothy brought some monetary gift from Macedonia to Paul, which encouraged him to devote himself entirely to preaching the gospel (Phil. 4:15; cf. 1 Thess. 3:6). Paul had no hidden agenda, and God knew his motive and love for the Corinthians (2 Cor. 11:11). Paul's opponents in Corinth had, however, taken money from the Corinthians for sharing their gospel. Then, in order to justify their behavior, they had sought to discredit Paul's apostolic ministry for not receiving remuneration. The difference between Paul and the false apostles was clear, and the Corinthians should have been able to identify him as the true apostle rather than listening to the false apostles whose interest lay in financial reward (v. 12).

In vv. 13–15, Paul identifies these self-acclaimed teachers as ministers of Satan. They were deceitful workers, mimicking the father of all lies (John 8:44). In his attempt to deceive, Satan was able to transform himself into an angel of light (2 Cor. 11:14; cf. Rev. 13:13). These deceivers had won the loyalty of some of the Corinthians by cunningly mischaracterizing Paul's financial independence as a demonstration of his lack of affection for the Corinthians. Even though these individuals claimed to be ministers of the gospel, their misconduct had rendered them ministers of the adversary. As noted earlier, they preached a different gospel (2 Cor. 11:4). Their message lacked the true substance of the gospel (cf. v. 6). Such "apostles" would also be subject to judgment by their works (v. 15). This statement is a reaffirmation of Paul's belief that the way we execute our divinely assigned responsibilities and commitments will be evaluated in the final judgment (5:10).

11:16–33. Paul's Boasting as a Fool. Paul had been responding to the Corinthians as an "ignorant" (aphrōn, "foolish," "senseless," "unlearned") person. Foolish people tend to boast about their limited perspective of experience, hence betraying their emptiness. Paul was answering the ignorant apostles according to their ignorance (Prov. 26:5). He was pleading with the Corinthians to entertain his ignorant speech as well. They knew that he did not boast like that, but for the sake of argument he craved their indulgence as he was doing a little boasting (2 Cor. 11:16; cf. v. 1). This ignorant boasting was not in the Lord in that it did not mimic the "gentleness of Christ" (10:1); rather, it followed the line of the intruders from Judea (11:17–22). It appears that the Corinthians had recognized the false apostles by foolishly remunerating them for their preaching of another gospel. The point was that if the Corinthians had gladly put up with these peddlers, they should give Paul a little room for boasting. In other words, the attitude of the Corinthians had occasioned Paul's boasting (vv. 19–20).

Paul was not boasting as an ignorant fool but also as a madman. It was a shameful boasting, but he had no choice but to boast! The Corinthians had fallen in love with the Hebrew heritage of the false apostles; for the sake of comparison, Paul reminded the Corinthians of his rich Hebrew cultural heritage (Acts 18:12b–15; Eph. 2:12; Phil. 3:5). Both he and the false apostles shared the same national identity and cultural heritage. They were not better than him in this regard (2 Cor. 11:21–22). In relation to ministry, they claimed to be ministers of Christ. Paul contended that he was even more. This means that if the Corinthians were regarding them as supreme apostles (v. 5), then it was necessary that they regard Paul even more highly (v. 23a).

Shortly after arriving in Corinth, Paul wrote to the believers in Rome. He told them that not only had he planted churches all across the eastern Mediterranean region of the Roman Empire (Rom. 15:19) but he had also finished collecting the aid fund for the impoverished saints in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26–27). The account of Paul's missionary activities in Acts indicates the large geographical scope of the apostle's ministry (Acts 9:22–26; 13:4—14:26; 16:6—18:19; 19:1—20:31). Paul was consciously aware of both the spatial and numerical scope of his ministry. He was able to boldly and without provocation opine that by the grace of God he had labored more than even the apostles themselves (1 Cor. 15:9–10). Therefore, the claim that the false apostles could not match him in terms of labor was certainly true (2 Cor. 11:23c).

To clarify even more what is involved in a better ministry, Paul provides another list of difficult ministerial experiences identifying him as a true apostle, because only a true apostle could go through them and remain committed to the divine calling (vv. 23b–27). While Luke's account of Paul's ministry in Acts fills in some events that otherwise would not have been known today, we should not expect it to provide us with a detailed perspective of Paul's afflictions in ministry. Both Luke and Paul had their own individual reasons for writing. Still, at times, their writings offer us a complementary view of some of the significant historical events that took place during Paul's career. For example, Paul stated that he suffered frequent imprisonments, severe beatings, and frequent exposure to death (2 Cor. 11:23). Luke related one of these events that occurred before Paul's founding visit to Corinth—his arrest, beating, and imprisonment in Philippi (Acts 16:23–40). In addition to the general characterization of his ministry as one beset with the threat of death (2 Cor. 11:23), Paul goes on to list a number of more specific events, some of which are not found in Luke's account in Acts. Paul recalls that he received thirty-nine lashes five times, the traditional Jewish punishment for certain offenses (Deut. 25:1–3). Three times he was beaten with rods, once he was stoned, and three times he suffered shipwreck (2 Cor. 11:25). These specific incidents of Paul's personal afflictions portray a minister who had been tested almost beyond measure but who had stayed true to this calling. But the list does not stop there. Paul goes on to mention other experiences involving personal deprivations for the gospel, such as physical rest, food, water, clothing, and warmth. And on top of all of that, he was constantly concerned for the well-being of the churches, identifying himself with their experiences (v. 28).

Such is the nature of a Christian ministry that is characterized by unselfish service to God's people. Paul was not complaining or giving a report to the Corinthians of his ministerial experiences; he was not accountable to them but to the Lord. He simply cared for all the churches that came into existence with or without his ministry (cf. Rom 1:5, 8–11; 15:20–23; 1 Cor. 3:6; 4:15; Col. 2:1). He shows deep interest in fostering good relationships between people of different descents and ideologies (Rom. 11; 14:1–13; Eph. 2:10–19; Phil. 4:2; Philem. 10–12, 17). He also ensures a consistent vertical relationship of believers with God (Phil. 1:9–10; Col. 1:9–10; 1 Thess. 5:17–19, 22; 2 Thess. 1:11–12). Whereas he fervently cared to attend to the basic financial needs of the poor (2 Cor. 8–9; cf. Rom. 15:25–26), he was equally discouraging to lazy believers who failed to develop their God-given intelligence to take care of themselves and those in need (Eph. 4:28; 2 Thess. 3:10–11; 1 Tim. 5:8). When a believer stumbled in sin, he selflessly dealt with such a person. If sinners did not show signs of repentance, Paul disciplined them with the view of restoring them to Christ. When sinners repented, Paul rejoiced in their repentance (cf. 2 Cor. 2:6; 7:9–12; 1 Tim. 1:20). He also ministered to churches from a distance through letters and delegates (2 Cor. 2:13; Rom. 1:7–12; 1 Cor. 4:17; 7:7–8; Gal. 6:11; Phil. 2:25; Col. 1:7; 4:12).

Paul reminded the Corinthians, lest they misunderstood the object of his boasting, that contrary to what they may have been thinking, he could boast only about his weaknesses (2 Cor. 11:30). It was only in the Lord that he could boast, because in his weaknesses the mighty hand of God was evinced (1:8–10; 4:7, 10–11; 12:5–10). His sufficiency amid these weaknesses was coming from God (3:5).

A frequent reference to God as a witness to Paul's claim characterizes the defense of his integrity and apostolic ministry (cf. 1:17–18, 23). To be more specific, in case the Corinthians would doubt his uncountable difficult experiences, the epistle recounts Paul's nocturnal escape from Damascus (11:32–33). Luke confirmed that immediately after conversion, Paul engaged the Jews in Damascus, proving that Jesus was the anointed Savior. Consequently, the Jewish leaders plotted to kill him, but he was able to escape from the city during the night (Acts 9:22–25). The governor of Damascus was under the rule of Aretas IV, king of the Nabataeans. It should be recalled that Paul went to Arabia after his call and conversion and returned again to Damascus (Gal. 1:17). It is conceivable that the Nabataean king opposed Paul's evangelistic activities and had instructed his representative in Damascus to apprehend him. Paul's narrow escape through a window was an act of God (2 Cor. 11:33). In any event, the import of 2 Corinthians 11:31–32 is the trustworthiness of the accounts of Paul's personal afflictions, which he considered to be his weaknesses. If Paul were to boast, he would boast about what God had done for him. This is elaborated in the next section.

12:1–10. Vision of Christ and Boasting. In order to clarify his understanding of boasting, Paul relates his visionary experience from fourteen years earlier (v. 2). According to Luke, Paul had several visionary experiences. First, during Paul's call and conversion on the road to Damascus, Jesus audibly spoke to him in a vision (Acts 9:10; 26:19; Gal. 1:16). Again, during his second missionary journey while intending to minister in Troas, Paul saw a man in vision beckoning him to come to Macedonia (Acts 16:8–9). Also, when he was afraid to preach the gospel in Corinth during his second missionary journey,

God assured him of divine protection in a vision (Acts 18:9–11). Furthermore, when Paul visited Jerusalem immediately after his conversion, he was praying in the temple when he had a vision. In this experience, Jesus asked him to leave Jerusalem because of the unreceptive attitude of the people to the gospel (Acts 22:17–21). Finally, when Paul was arrested, the Lord appeared before him to assure him that Paul would minister for Him in Rome (Acts 23:1). The form of Paul's encounter with Jesus is not described, but it can be assumed that Jesus appeared to him in a vision (cf. Acts 27:23, 24). In these supernatural experiences, Luke describes what Paul heard and saw.

In 2 Corinthians 12:1–2, Paul recounts his experience in an indirect way, as if it had happened to some other person. Since 2 Corinthians was written in A.D. 56, this experience may have occurred around A.D. 42. It is commonly held that Paul remained in Tarsus from A.D. 37 to 45. In other words, this revelation would have occurred in the early and unknown years of Paul's apostolic ministry in Tarsus—a time when Paul was no one important. He betrayed his bewilderment concerning whether he was caught up to heaven in the body (physically) or out of the body (spiritually; in a vision). This experience is unique to all the attested experiences in Luke and other Pauline writings. Why did Paul refer to this unique experience?

A cursory reading of vv. 2–3 would lead one to think that Paul was boasting about another person's achievement. In v. 2, he refers to "a man in Christ." In the context of boasting, appealing to the experience of somebody else would weaken his argument (v. 5). But he then employs the first-person singular as he relates the connection between this experience and his boasting (v. 7). Only God knew the precise nature of his earlier experience (vv. 3–4). Taking Paul to the third heaven was an act of God. This experience was not gradual but a sudden ascent to the third heaven or paradise.

Jewish apocalyptic literature of the time reveals that some Jews believed in the existence of seven heavens, beyond which was the divine throne. Those who desired to experience a revelation of the presence of God had to embark on a visionary ascent through the heavens. While Paul lacked awareness of the condition of this experience, he had a clear knowledge of different heavens. However, it is very unlikely that he shared the apocalyptic viewpoint of a seven-heaven cosmology. If he had, his opponents could have easily criticized him for having only been taken to the third heaven. Moreover, outside of this passage, Paul says nothing about visionary ascents through the heavens; he speaks only of God's descent to the earth through the revelation of Christ. By the third heaven, Paul is referring to the highest heaven, the dwelling place of God (cf. 1 Kin. 8:27).

In v. 4, Paul's terminology switches from being caught up to the "third heaven" to being caught up into paradise. The word "paradise" was borrowed from a Persian word, which meant "Garden of God." Following this sense, it was used in Judaism to refer to the Garden of Eden. In later writings dating to the time of Jesus, it also came to refer to the place of God's dwelling, as well as that of the righteous dead. It appears that Paul uses it in the former sense as an equivalent of the third heaven (vv. 2, 4; cf. Luke 23:43; Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14), that is, the place where God dwells. Since what he heard in the third heaven or paradise was reserved for him alone, there is no need for us to speculate about it. He certainly had every right to boast about this honor God granted him (2 Cor. 12:5a). However, Paul preferred to boast in his weaknesses (v. 5b). Only fools would boast of such rare privileges, and he was not a fool (v. 6). Though he recognized the natural human tendency to be proud as a result of these visionary experiences, he refrained. It is likely that the false apostles boasted of their visionary experiences in their ministry. This may have called forth Paul's recounting of this rare honor that God had granted him. But his point is that visionary experiences do not necessarily validate true ministry. They can be falsified (cf. 11:13–15).

Paul was not immune to falling prey to boasting. But God, in His own wisdom, is willing to protect us from it (12:7–10; cf. 4:6–7). This God had done for Paul by allowing him to experience a physical affliction (12:7). This was personified as a messenger of Satan and was not from God; but God was using it for the benefit of Paul, that is, to keep him humble (cf. Matt. 26:67; Mark 14:65). It is likely that Paul suffered from some bodily ailment known to him and his contemporaries but unknown to us. Certainly, it was something Paul detested. Three times he requested that the Lord take it away from him (v. 8). The repetitiveness of the prayer for healing demonstrates the debilitating nature of the ailment and the sincerity of Paul's request (cf. 2 Sam. 12:16–23). The Lord's answer was sublime and reassuring. Paul would always have enough grace to outweigh the difficulties inflicted by the ailment. The assurance that God is aware of human pain and that He provides the grace we need to bear such things should strengthen our faith and perseverance in the midst of hardships and unbearable situations. Our prayer for healing may not be answered in the way we expect, but God answers it by strengthening us through His grace to bear patiently our burden while trusting in Him. We, like Paul, should boast in the magnificent power of God that sustains and preserves us (2 Cor. 12:9–10). That is why Paul could boldly claim that he could do everything through Christ who gave him strength (Phil. 4:13). This distressing affliction may have appeared to hinder his ministry, yet he humbly accepted the will of God for him.

Sin has subjected humanity to inexplicable diseases, hardships, and tormenting pains. As long as we are on this sinful earth, believers are not exempt from these predicaments (cf. Luke 13:16). They test our persistent faith and love for Christ. But we are assured of the ever abiding presence of Jesus Christ amid uncertainty and hopelessness (cf. Matt. 28:20b). God did not answer Paul's prayer the way he wished. It was not because Paul did not have enough faith but because God knew what was best for him. Here the issue is not faith (cf. James 5:15) but the will of God for His servant. God had performed great signs and wonders through Paul, but not this time (2 Cor. 12:12). God is not only good when things are going well for us but He is also good to us in the midst of our loneliness and suffering. His will seeks always what is the best for His children. Jesus had an accurate knowledge of the tormenting persecutions of the believers at Smyrna. However, He urged them to be faithful until death (Rev. 2:10).

12:11–13. Evidence of Paul's Apostolic Ministry. Even though Paul had been trying to resist the temptation of boasting, he finally realized that he had been compelled to boast a little. Since the Corinthians entertained and recognized the foolish boastings of the false ministers (11:19–20), he was moved to respond appropriately. When his ministry was attacked, he expected the church to commend and defend it (12:11). Paul was never interested in making himself the center of his own ministry (cf. 4:6). But humanly speaking, he was not inferior to the false and self-appointed apostles (11:5, 21–22). Again, humanly speaking, he was just a vessel that the Lord employed to disseminate His saving word (cf. 4:6–7). The Corinthians could bear witness to the signs, wonders, and mighty deeds wrought among them. God demonstrated and authenticated Paul's ministry with mighty deeds even in the face of persecution (12:12; Heb. 2:4). The apostolic signs and wonders in his ministry underlined his apostolic office (Acts 5:12; 15:12; Rom. 15:18–19; 1 Cor. 2:4–5). Since Paul was not inferior as an apostle, the Corinthian church was not inferior to other churches that he had established. The Corinthians had enjoyed all the benefits of his apostolic ministry but had not had to bear any of the financial burden of supporting Paul (2 Cor. 12:13). Remuneration was his right but not a mandate. He strategically forwent their financial help to safeguard his ministry even though he had more right to receive it than any credible apostles (1 Cor. 9:12). If his refusal to accept their financial assistance offended the Corinthians, Paul was sorry (2 Cor. 12:13).

12:14—13:10

Announcement of Paul's Third Visit

With this misunderstanding clarified, Paul could confidently announce his third visit to the church. During this third visit, he would continue to be financially independent of the Corinthians. He took a firmer stand on his policy not to be remunerated but rather to consolidate his love toward them (12:14–18). He was seeking to purge the church from the moral uncleanness that was threatening the sanctity and unity of the church (vv. 19–21) and was warning the persistently disobedient of an inevitable discipline at his coming (13:1–4). Finally, he made an appeal to those who questioned his ministry to examine themselves before he would come to see whether they were in the faith (vv. 5–10).

12:14–18. Promise Not to Be Burdensome. Paul expressed his readiness to visit the Corinthians a third time. This coming would not be a surprise visit because the apostle wanted to utilize its announcement to achieve several objectives. First, he intended to reaffirm his love toward the Corinthians, which would mean that they would learn to equally love him. How was he going to demonstrate his love? As the founder of the church, he would continue to maintain his policy of self-reliance in financial matters. Once they would come to appreciate it as his apostolic right to either enjoy or forgo remuneration from them and that this did not render him less apostolic, they could meaningfully relate to the ultimate intent of his ministry. He made clear that his interest lay in their spiritual well-being, not what he could get from them (12:14–15). This expressed his love for the church. The principle he espoused here concerning parent-child relationships should be strictly taken in the context of his ministry to the Corinthians (cf. 1 Cor. 4:14–15). This counsel is not in conflict with Paul's appeal to believers to care for their relatives, including parents (1 Tim. 5:8; cf. Mark 7:10–12). At least the Philippian church, which he had established, had been helping him financially (Phil. 4:15–16). His financial independence underlines a holistic attitude to the proclamation of the gospel. By working at a trade while evangelizing an area, he demonstrated a positive attitude toward work. His work also provided him with a way to meet individuals with whom he could share the gospel. Converts were strongly urged to follow this example (cf. 2 Thess. 3:8–10). Love for Christ does not warrant laziness or discourage personal development. In any event, as far as Paul was concerned, he had not defrauded the Corinthians (2 Cor. 12:16). The self-appointed apostles may have claimed that Paul defrauded them through Titus (vv. 17–18). Paul challenged them to give evidence of their claim because, as far as he knew, Titus was also clean. The church could bear witness to this fact.

12:19–21. An Appeal to the Unrepentant. Paul's second objective for announcing his visit was to motivate those who had sinned to repent. Their present situation could emotionally impact him (cf. 2:3). First of all, he was reminding the Corinthians not to see the defense of his ministry and integrity as implying that he was guilty of the charges. He was not accountable to them but to God (cf. 5:10). The purpose of his defense was to build them up and not to tear them down (12:19). What mattered most was their full devotion to God. Second, Paul wanted to avoid again going through what he had experienced during the sorrowful visit. He was hoping that when he arrived at Corinth there would not be serious problems (see the list in vv. 20–21). He was expecting a peaceful relationship and hoping that neither he nor they would be frustrated. They both were to look forward to a good experience free from the divisive presence of sin. This would require the repentance of those who had sinned (v. 21). In 1 Corinthians, Paul had stated that some of the believers were once dreadful sinners but had been washed, sanctified, and justified "in the name of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. 6:9–11). Now Paul wanted to present them to Christ as an undefiled, chaste bride (2 Cor. 11:2). He was not only interested in their early conversion but also in establishing them in faith and devotion to God until the coming of Christ (4:14).

13:1–4. Warning of Inevitable Discipline. The inevitable would happen if the Corinthians would not repent. For the unrepentant, Paul's third coming would not be good news. Paul's reference to the establishment of every word by "two or three witnesses" (13:1b) may point to the inevitable discipline due to unrepentant sinners who had been cautioned severally in this context. This understanding is confirmed in v. 2, where he states that failure to heed his present as well as previous admonitions would subject them to discipline during his third visit. It is clear in 12:21 that some of the Corinthians had been involved in fornication (porneia) and lasciviousness (aselgeia; 12:21). These words are descriptive of the unbridled sexual behavior of some of the church members.

Paul's strong words are understandable if we keep in mind that some of the Corinthians had concluded that Paul was weak and that Christ was not using him; they wanted evidence that Christ was speaking through Paul (13:3). He was reacting to the accusation by arguing that what really mattered was that Christ was not weak in relationship to them but rather full of might and power. They had experienced the saving power of Christ. Then, he identified himself with Christ, who was crucified in weakness but lives by the power of God (v. 4). The idea is that the power of God is revealed in weakness. By way of argument, Paul's conclusion was that we are all weak in Christ's weakness (the Crucifixion), but we will experience the power of the resurrection of Christ. This power was already working in the Corinthians. Paul was simply telling the Corinthians that the question was not whether he was weak but whether they had experienced the weakness of Christ and were living by the power of His resurrection. The implication is that the presence of sexual immorality and dissension in the church seemed to point to the contrary and that he would deal with this situation when he visited them. Paul's attitude toward sinners in the church is appropriate and consistent with Christ's teachings (cf. Matt. 18:15–20). Paul had verbally warned these sinners, but he was more interested in their repentance than in excommunicating them (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5, 13). However, if they remained in their sin, he would not spare them.

13:5–10. Appeal for Self-examination. Although some of the Corinthians had questioned whether Paul was a spokesperson for Christ, it was evident in their lives that Christ had used Paul to effect significant changes in them. These changes were the result of accepting Christ as Savior (8:9; 13:3–4; cf. 1 Cor. 6:11). In a sense, challenging Paul's authority amounted to discrediting the source of his authority and the work that the Lord had performed in them. Paul had consistently told them that Christ was the source, the content, and the reason for his ministry (cf. 2 Cor. 1:1, 5, 19; 2:10, 15; 4:5; 5:14; 10:14). Paul was now appealing to them to examine themselves to see whether they were in the faith (13:5). For him, doing this was more important than seeking again to establish the authenticity of his apostolic authority. Paul believed that although there was a possibility of failing the test, they would pass it because Christ was in them. Some of them may still have believed that he was disqualified, that Christ was not in him, but that at this point did not bother Paul. What was important for him was that they would do what was right and honorable (v. 7), and to this end he was praying for them when coming to the end of his letter. They were all to be totally committed to and working for the truth (v. 8). Paul tenderly told them that he would be glad to be weak as long as they were strong in Christ (v. 9). He was praying again that they may katartisis, which means to be "made perfect," "completed," or "restored" (v. 9). He was praying for their restoration to their original state when they were one in Christ (v. 11).

No good leader is interested in dealing with tensions. That is why Paul was writing to the Corinthians hoping that when he visited them there would not be any need to use his apostolic authority to apply discipline. But he was making it clear that if he had to discipline some of them, they should understand that he was trying to edify them and not to destroy them (v. 10). There is a genuine pastoral concern in the application of church discipline.

CONCLUSION

Characteristic of Paul's letters as well as Greco-Roman letter writing is the use of greetings in the epilogue. But unlike the secular Greco-Roman letters, Paul generally added a doxology or benediction. In this case, he closes with a few exhortations, a brief greeting, and a benediction.

The term chairō, used at the outset of v. 11, literally means "to rejoice" (i.e., expressing a fond farewell) and is an excellent way of ending a letter in which Paul had dealt with very sensitive issues (cf. v. 9). Joy is a gift of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) and is present in those who have experienced the saving power of Christ. A call to rejoice is a call to remain in union with Christ. This is followed with an exhortation to be katartizō ("to perfect," "to complete," "to restore," "to put back into order"), that is, to return to their original condition as a church when they were one in Christ. Paul's use of parakaleō ("to comfort, "to encourage," "to exhort") may mean "listen to my exhortations" or simply "cheer up." Paul next tells them to "be of one mind" (or "agree with one another" or "be like-minded") in 2 Corinthians 13:11 with respect to the faith taught to them by Paul in this epistle and in all of his instructions to them. There was a body of beliefs that could keep them together in their Christian experience.

Paul's admonition to "live in peace" (v. 11) addresses the root of the problem of the Corinthians; they needed to be reconciled with God and Paul and with each other. This peace would be the result of being justified by faith in Christ (Rom. 8:1). Paul introduces a statement or a promise: "The God of love and peace will be with you" (2 Cor. 13:11). The idea is not that if the Corinthians were to follow the exhortations God would be with them but that God would be with them as they procured to put them into practice. Only God's presence makes it possible for us to love each other and be at peace. The final exhortation in the letter is to greet each other with a "holy kiss" (13:12). This form of greeting expressed love and peace (Gen. 27:26; 31:28; 1 Kin. 19:20; Ps. 2:12; Song 1:2; 8:1; Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14). Jewish men and women expressed their affection by kissing those of the same gender in the synagogues during worship. Such a kiss could be misused to hide evil intentions (2 Sam. 15:5; 20:9; Matt. 26:48; Mark 14:44; Luke 7:45; 22:47). Paul made a distinction between a mere formality and a meaningful demonstration of love and respect by calling it a "holy kiss" (see 2 Cor. 13:12; Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 1 Thess. 5:26). As such it would have been free from any evil motivation, expressing the unity of love they had found in Christ.

Paul closes the letter with a greeting from all of God's people ("the saints" or "holy ones"; v. 13), that is to say, from the church members in Macedonia where he was located when he wrote the letter. The greetings at the end of Paul's Epistles emphasize the solidarity and oneness of the Christian church. The benediction is expressed using a Trinitarian formula (v. 14). He invokes the blessings of the Lord Jesus Christ, God, and the Holy Spirit. It is only in this book that Paul employs the Trinitarian formula in the epilogue to highlight the distinctive roles of the Godhead in the work of salvation (cf. Rom. 16:27; 1 Cor. 16:23–24; Gal. 6:18). Second Corinthians is replete with high emotive language used to depict Paul's affection for the wayward Corinthians (2 Cor. 2:4; 6:6, 11–12; 11:11; 12:15). The unusual order of the Trinity is prominently functional (Jesus Christ, God, and the Holy Spirit). Jesus Christ is the source of the apostleship of Paul (2 Cor. 1:1). It was through Him—the content of Paul's apostolic message (4:5–7)—that God reconciled believers to Himself (5:17–19). In this benediction, the saving grace of Jesus Christ and the love of God are emphasized. The Holy Spirit is the One who creates fellowship or communion in the church and is the seal and guarantee of salvation (13:22; cf. 3:3; 5:5). Grace, love, and communion are not natural to human beings, but they flow to the church from the members of the Godhead as divine gifts. These were the gifts that could heal the church in Corinth and that would prepare it for the realization of the Christian hope at the return of the Lord.

GALATIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. As a personal letter written to the churches of Galatia, Paul's epistle originally did not have a title attached to it. The earliest evidence of any sort of formal title is a line added at the end of the document (a subscription) that identified it simply as being "To the Galatians."

Date. Although some scholars have argued that Galatians was written as late as A.D. 57, based largely on its similarity to the message of Romans, a growing number believe the letter contains several clues that suggest it may have been written earlier, making it possibly one of the earliest written documents in the NT.

The first clue for dating Galatians appears in Paul's reference to his conversion experience and the two subsequent visits he made to Jerusalem. He states that the first visit occurred three years after his conversion (1:18) and the second fourteen years after it (2:1), which indicates that Galatians was written several years after Paul's conversion, thus representing the apostle's seasoned theological viewpoints. Assuming Paul's conversion happened around A.D. 34, Galatians could not have been written any earlier than A.D. 48.

Another indication appears in Paul's appeal to the Corinthians to participate in a special offering for the Jewish believers suffering in Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1). He informed the Corinthians that he had made a similar request to the churches of Galatia. While an allusion to the origin of this collection may occur in Galatians 2:10, no direct appeal is found in Galatians. In light of the problems Paul was confronting, it would not have been the appropriate time to request a donation. The invitation to the Galatian churches must have been extended sometime after Paul's letter to them; and since 1 Corinthians was written around A.D. 53 or 54, Galatians would have been written sometime before that.

A more precise clue is found in Paul's account of a confrontation he had with Peter in Antioch soon after his second visit to Jerusalem. In a desire to gain the approval of a group of Jewish believers who had recently arrived from Jerusalem, Peter had stopped eating in the company of the uncircumcised Gentile believers in Antioch (Gal. 2:11–12). His actions influenced even Barnabas to separate from the Gentile believers (2:13). Since Peter, James, and John had agreed in an earlier meeting with Paul in Jerusalem that Gentile believers did not have to submit to circumcision (2:9–10), Paul interpreted Peter's behavior as an act of hypocrisy. It is hard to imagine that Peter and Barnabas would have directly contradicted the council that met in Jerusalem in late A.D. 49 (which ruled publicly in favor of Paul's position on circumcision; Acts 15:22–29), so this situation suggests that Galatians was likely written prior to the Jerusalem Council, when there were still no official guidelines regarding the issue of circumcision for Gentile believers. Therefore, Galatians most likely represents Paul's thoughts on the matter in A.D. 49, shortly before the council met in Jerusalem to make a decision regarding the issue. Further information about this early date is found below under "Backgrounds."

Backgrounds. Paul's missionary activities among the Gentiles in Galatia must be understood in relation to his missionary activities as described in the book of Acts. After successfully working with Barnabas to attract Gentile converts at Antioch in Syria for several years, Paul embarked on a series of missionary journeys across Asia Minor and Greece. On his first journey, from about A.D. 47 to 48, he and Barnabas traveled to Cyprus and then on to Asia Minor, where they founded churches in Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe (Acts 13:14—14:23). After returning to Antioch in Syria, they were sent to Jerusalem to aid the suffering believers located there (Acts 11:29–30). Shortly after this, in A.D. 49, the Jerusalem Council decided against making circumcision a requirement of Gentile believers (Acts 15).

At this point, Paul and Barnabas went their separate ways (Acts 15:37–39), and Paul, accompanied by Silas, returned to Asia Minor as part of a second missionary journey (from A.D. 50 to 52). They returned to the churches of Derbe and Lystra, where Timothy joined them (Acts 16:1–5), and from there they journeyed through Phrygia and the region of Galatia (Acts 16:6) on their way to Alexandria Troas. After crossing into Europe, Paul and Silas returned to Antioch in Syria via Caesarea.

Concerned about the welfare of the churches he had founded, Paul set out on a third missionary journey (from A.D. 52 to 57). He again traveled through the region of Galatia and Phrygia (Acts 18:23) and even to Ephesus, where he remained for nearly three years. After leaving Ephesus, Paul visited the churches of Macedonia before returning to Jerusalem, where he was arrested and imprisoned (Acts 21:17–33).

Locating Paul's letter to the Galatians within the timeline of Paul's ministry in Acts largely depends on whether the churches of Galatia are to be identified with the cities of Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, located in the southern portion of the Roman province of Galatia (called the South Galatian Theory), or with cities such as Ancyra and Pessinus, located much farther north in the geographical region that originally made up the ethnic kingdom of Galatia (the North Galatian Theory). If the latter is correct, Paul may have visited the northern region of Galatia during his second missionary journey with Silas (cf. Acts 16:6; 18:23). The visit to Jerusalem described in Galatians 2 would then correspond with the Jerusalem Council in Acts 15. Allowing time for the problems in Galatia to develop, Paul's letter to the Galatians would have been written during his third missionary journey, either shortly after he arrived in Ephesus (i.e., A.D. 53–55), or soon after he left the city a few years later (i.e., A.D. 56–57). This was the only viewpoint held by scholars at the turn of the twentieth century.

More recent archaeological evidence has caused the majority of biblical scholars to conclude that the biblical account better fits with the churches Paul founded in southern Galatia during his first missionary journey with Barnabas (Acts 13:13–28). According to this South Galatian Theory, Galatians provides a window into the earliest days of the church when it was first struggling with the question of circumcision and Gentile converts. If this is the case, Galatians was written sometime after Paul and Barnabas returned from their joint missionary endeavor but before the Jerusalem Council reached a conclusion on the issue of circumcision in Acts 15. This would make Galatians Paul's earliest letter, written in late A.D. 48 or early A.D. 49.

The South Galatian Theory takes into consideration the fact that in Paul's lifetime the Roman province of Galatia encompassed the entire central region of Asia Minor, extending from just south of the Black Sea in the north to the slopes of the Taurus Mountains bordering the Mediterranean in the south. By the fourth century, however, the province of Galatia had been broken up into smaller administrative units, with Galatia being restricted to a smaller region in the north that had historically been associated with the earlier ethnic kingdom of Galatia. Since the earliest commentaries on Galatians date to the fourth century and later, it was assumed that the area referred to as Galatia in the NT was the same as the northern geographical region of Galatia of their day. Later scholars followed this interpretation for centuries until archaeological evidence revealed that Galatia had once covered a much larger geographical area.

Since the South Galatian Theory appears to provide the most persuasive framework for understanding Paul's letter and placing it in the historical context of the early church, it will serve as the basis of the notes for this commentary. This approach in no way alters the message of the Epistle to the Galatians. According to this perspective, Paul's letter appears to have been written to the churches he and Barnabas founded in south Galatia during their missionary journey around A.D. 47 or 48. Shortly after they left that area, the churches became divided on whether Gentile believers needed to be circumcised. Before this issue was decided at the council in Jerusalem in late A.D. 49, Paul shared his views on it via his letter to the Galatians.

Authorship. Although critical scholars have questioned the authenticity of several of the letters attributed to Paul in the NT, the authorship of Galatians has never been seriously questioned. It is most likely that Paul dictated the original letter to a scribe (cf. Rom. 16:22) before writing the final few sentences with his own hand (Gal. 6:11–18).

Theology and Purpose. The sustainability of Paul's work among the Gentiles in Galatia was at risk. The new believers were teetering on the edge of spiritual collapse. Although these Gentiles had responded positively to the invitation to become followers of Jesus, shortly after Paul's departure, a group of Jewish Christians tried to convince them that Paul had not told them the whole truth. They argued that while professing faith in Jesus was important, faith by itself was not sufficient. If the Gentiles wanted to experience salvation and be genuine followers of Christ, they would also have to be circumcised (Gal. 6:12–15). Galatians is Paul's fiery response to these accusations.

Even though the question of circumcision is no longer an important issue in the church today, Paul's letter to the Galatians continues to be just as relevant as it was two thousand years ago. The issue at the heart of Galatians runs more deeply than the physical act of circumcision itself. It strikes at the very heart of what Christianity is all about: salvation and access to it. It is about who can be considered a Christian. Paul was convinced that there was only one answer to this question, and it was not based on ethnicity or works. The distinguishing mark of a Christian is a life defined first and last by faith in God and His promises. This type of faith was the defining characteristic in the life of Abraham, who was circumcised, but circumcision was merely an outward sign of his inner faith in God—a faith that marked his life before he was circumcised. Thus, while a Christian will certainly seek to do God's will, what transforms a person into a Christian is an inner circumcision of the heart (Deut. 30:6; Rom. 2:29)—a living and vibrant faith in God and what He has done for us in Jesus Christ.

Paul demonstrates this by not limiting the issue in Galatians to circumcision alone but expanding it to include any work of the law humans perform in an attempt to secure God's favor (2:16). Paul is appealing to the Galatians to have faith in the faithfulness of Jesus, the Savior, rather than trusting in human works. Christ's faithful obedience is credited to us through faith, a process Paul refers to as justification by faith (2:16).

Paul continues to highlight the importance that faith has in the life of a believer by appealing to the experience of Abraham and to passages from the OT. He shows how Jesus is the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham that He would bless the entire world through his descendants (3:15–16). The giving of the Law on Mount Sinai did not alter God's promise to Abraham at all. The Law was given to make people aware of their sins and to point them to faith in Christ as the only real solution to the sin problem (3:17–29). Instead of trying to relate to God through a set of rules as though they were slaves, Paul was urging the Galatians to have faith in God's love for us as His children and heirs (4:1–11). Any attempt to relate to God on the basis of behavior will always fall short of what God requires. Abraham's attempt to produce his own heir through Hagar resulted in God's disapproval and rejection of Ishmael as the promised child (4:21–31).

Because Galatians is so focused on the gospel, it has little to say on other central Christian doctrines, including the hope of the Second Coming. Does that mean it is irrelevant to those awaiting Christ's return? Hardly! Jesus Himself asked whether He would find faith in the world (Luke 18:8). To be faithful as we await Christ's return is to have faith in Christ and His gospel, not some other, counterfeit version. Jesus comes to redeem those who acknowledge their need of salvation, not self-righteous people who rely on their legalistic behavior. As a training manual for such a perspective, the Epistle to the Galatians has no equal. In studying this letter, we must keep this Second Coming perspective in view—Galatians is training us to meet Him! It clarifies the relation between faith and law, so important to those waiting for the coming of the Lord. At its core, Galatians is a letter about what it means to be a follower of Jesus Christ. As such, it will always be of utmost relevance as we seek to experience the fullness of what God has done for us in Jesus and to relate to Him in the way He desires as we look forward to His return with hearts full of hope.

COMMENTARY

1:1–10
Introduction

The introduction to the letter contains a greeting (1:1–5) and a rebuke for those who preach a false gospel (1:6–10). Although Galatians begins with the usual greeting found in ancient letters, Paul's greeting is far from a mere formality. Paul transforms these elements of letter writing into a distinctly Christian message of hope specifically suited for the situation of the believers in Galatia. In doing this, Paul's opening greeting reveals the main purpose of his letter: to defend his credentials as an apostle and to demonstrate the truth of the gospel he proclaimed. Paul's decision to replace the customary prayer of thanksgiving, which typically follows his greeting, with a fiery rebuke of those who were preaching a distorted version of the gospel indicates how concerned he was with the spiritual well-being of the Galatian churches (cf. Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:4; 2 Cor. 1:3).

1:1–5. Greeting. After identifying himself as the principal author, Paul begins Galatians with an emphatic defense of the divine origin of his apostolic credentials. He was responding to accusations that questioned the nature of his authority in spiritual matters—perhaps, since Paul had not been one of Jesus's original disciples, his authority was derived from humans, either from leaders in Antioch, who had commissioned him as a missionary (Acts 13:1–3), or from Ananias, who had baptized him (Acts 9:10–18). Such accusations and insinuations were a deliberate attempt by Paul's opponents to undermine his spiritual authority and his teachings about the gospel. Recognizing the danger of these false allegations, Paul states that his apostleship rested solely in the commission he received from God.

The greeting of grace and peace (v. 3) appears to have been uniquely coined by Paul, since it occurs nowhere else in ancient literature before Paul's letters. The usual practice was simply to say "greetings" (cf. Acts 23:26; James 1:1), but Paul replaced "greetings" with one of his favorite words: "grace." He not only uses the word more than any other NT author, but he also places it as a harbinger of divine hope at the beginning and the end of each of his letters. Its most basic meaning emerges from the OT Hebrew verb khanan ("to be gracious to someone," "to demonstrate goodwill"), which was associated with the way God cares for His people (cf. Gen. 6:8; 39:21; Ex. 33:12; Ps. 51:1). In this word, Paul saw a revelation of God's ultimate act of kindness in not treating us fallen humans as we deserve but in forgiving our sins, bestowing on us Christ's righteousness, and empowering us with His Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 12:9; Eph. 2:1–10).

In talking about peace, Paul was also drawing from his knowledge of the OT. The Hebrew word for "peace" is shalom, and the richness of its meaning makes it impossible for any single word in English to convey all that it entails. It points not only to the absence of hostility but also to the positive state of unhindered unity and harmony. It is a peace that brings completion, wholeness, prosperity, health, and wellness. As such, it is only God who can bring true peace to humans, who are inherently broken because of sin (cf. Num. 6:24–26; 1 Chr. 22:9–10; Ps. 85:8), and it is through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus that Paul realized God had begun to offer that fullness of peace to every descendent of Adam and Eve.

To help the Galatians understand all that the gospel involves and to anticipate what he develops later in his letter, Paul expands on his distinctive greeting by adding a succinct summary of the gospel. He refers to Jesus as the One who gave Himself for our sins (v. 4). Salvation is not rooted in anything that humans can do to earn it but in what Jesus has already done for us in laying down His life as a substitutionary sacrifice for the sins of the world. The self-sacrifice of Christ is an important and recurring theme in Paul's writings (e.g., Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2, 25; 1 Tim. 2:6; Titus 2:14).

The purpose of Christ's atoning sacrifice was that He might exaireō ("set free," "deliver," "rescue") us from the present evil age (cf. Acts 7:10, 34; 12:11; 23:27; 26:17). Paul is speaking about a divine deliverance from the power of sin that reigns over humanity like a wicked taskmaster—a divine deliverance that occurs in this world (cf. John 17:15; Rom. 6:6–7, 11–14; 8:1–4). The fact that this immediately follows the reference to Christ's substitutionary sacrifice indicates that for Paul, the gospel involves more than merely rescuing humans from the penalty of sin through forgiveness; it also brings with it the good news of deliverance from the enslaving power of sin. However, that deliverance is not the basis of salvation; it is a result that follows what God has already done for us in Christ. Reflecting on this good news led Paul into a spontaneous doxology as he concludes his opening greeting (v. 5).

Within a few short verses at the beginning of his letter, Paul has masterfully described the essence of the gospel message. Throughout the rest of the letter, he expounds in more detail on the nature of the message and the implications it has for the Christian life.

1:6–10. Fiery Rebuke. Although Paul often responded to a variety of local challenges in his letters, it was still his custom to follow his opening greeting with a word of thanksgiving to God for the faith of his readers; however, Galatians is different. Paul was so shocked, concerned, and upset to discover that the Galatian believers were in the process of abandoning the gospel that he omitted the thanksgiving entirely and replaced it with a fiery rebuke (v. 6).

Paul charges the Galatians with abandoning (v. 6) the true gospel—the good news of what God has done to save us through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. The Greek word here literarily means to change one's allegiance or to desert. The verb is in the present tense, indicating that the Galatian believers had not yet fully turned their backs on the gospel but were in the process of doing so. In some of the strongest terminology recorded in the NT, Paul pronounces a curse on anyone who preaches a false gospel (v. 8). The Greek word used here is anathema, and in Paul's letters, this term always refers to something given over to divine wrath for destruction (cf. Gal. 1:8–9; Rom. 9:3; 1 Cor. 12:3; 16:22). Its application here to anyone who distorts the gospel of Christ illustrates Paul's firm conviction that there is only one gospel for Jews and Gentiles alike: the gospel Jesus preached. Paul is so emphatic on this point that he states the curse twice (vv. 8–9). We should not dismiss this language merely as an inappropriate outburst. Paul's words did not arise out of personal animosity but out of a deep concern for preserving the truth of the gospel. For this reason, Paul desires that the curse of God fall on anyone who perverts that message, including himself.

1:11—2:21

Paul's Defense of His Apostolic Calling

Having gained the attention of the Galatians with this strongly worded rebuke, Paul sets out to defend the truth of his gospel in the first major section of his letter (1:11—2:21). His purpose was to demonstrate his earlier claim that his gospel was not of human origin. He provides an autobiographical account of the events before (vv. 13–14), during (vv. 15–17), and immediately after his conversion (vv. 18–24) to demonstrate that he did not receive his gospel from anyone, nor was he taught it; God revealed it to him. The autobiographical specifics continue in chapter 2, where Paul goes into much more detail to describe a second visit to Jerusalem that occurred more than a decade after his previous visit. This supports Paul's overall point, for it was during this second trip that the apostles recognized the validity of God's divine calling on Paul's life and the truth of the gospel he proclaimed (2:1–10).

The section ends with the account of a conflict that occurred in Antioch between Paul and Peter shortly after the Jerusalem visit had concluded (2:11–21). When Peter, Barnabas, and other Jewish Christians capitulated to the demands of a group of Jewish believers from Jerusalem that contradicted the truth of the gospel, Paul did not hesitate to protest. Because he had received his gospel directly from God Himself, he was empowered to confront Peter, just as he was when confronting the Galatians over the same issue.

1:11–17. Paul's Conversion and Divine Calling. The opening two verses in this section announce the theme that Paul develops in the larger passage that extends to 2:21: the divine origin of his gospel message. Echoing the comments made in v. 1, Paul states forthrightly that he had not received his gospel from any human being. Instead, he had received it through an apokalypsis (from which we derive the English words "apocalypse" and "revelation") Iēsou Christou. This phrase can be understood in two ways, as is evinced by the renderings of various translations. It could refer to a divine revelation that Jesus personally presented to Paul or to a revelation Paul received containing information about Jesus. While the latter appears to be primarily in mind in vv. 15–16, it is difficult to completely eliminate the former option, since the appearance of the risen Christ to Paul on the road to Damascus also played a key role in his conversion and understanding of the gospel (cf. Acts 9; 22; 26). Paul could have had both ideas in mind.

In order to show that his radical transformation had been brought about by God's divine intervention in his life, Paul reminds the Galatians of the vastly different path he walked before becoming a Christian. He had not only disagreed with the beliefs of the Christians but had also been their foremost persecutor. His crusade against the early Christians had been nothing short of a deliberate and sustained plan to exterminate the Christian faith (cf. Acts 8:1–3; 9:1–2, 13–14, 21; 22:3–5). From a human perspective, there was certainly no reason for Paul to have suddenly joined the ranks of those he had been dedicated to destroying. His campaign against Christians had won him the approval and blessing of many influential Jewish leaders, including the most powerful and respected person in all of Judaism: the high priest (Acts 9:1–2). Some even see in v. 14 an indication that Paul's religious fervor had earned him a seat in the Sanhedrin, the highest governing authority in Judaism at the time. Outside of an act of God, there is no way to explain or understand this radical change in Paul's life.

It is important to note that when Paul refers to the traditions of his fathers or ancestors at the end of v. 14, he is referring both to the laws recorded in the Torah and to a collection of oral laws associated with Pharisaism (cf. Mark 7:1–5). These oral laws were traditional explanations and rulings based on the Torah. They served as a "hedge" or a "fence" around the law to protect people from violating the written laws of God in the Torah. In the eyes of the Pharisees, a group of which Paul himself was a member (Phil. 3:5), these traditions were as authoritative as the Torah itself. In fact, in actual practice, they often appeared to be even more important than the Torah.

Paul's course of life changed because God had a vastly different plan for him—a plan for which he was destined from the day he was formed in his mother's womb (v. 15). Paul's words are an allusion to Jeremiah's consecration in his mother's womb and to his call to be "a prophet to the nations" (Jer. 1:5). Likewise, Paul saw a divine purpose being revealed in his life. From the very beginning, it was God's plan for him to be a prophet to the Gentiles (cf. Acts 9:15; 22:21; Rom. 15:15; 1 Tim. 2:7).

Since Paul's encounter with the risen Christ on the road to Damascus had also revealed the essence of the gospel to him, he did not need to consult with anyone (v. 16). There was no need for any human to provide him with an authoritative explanation of the gospel. Paul knew that Jesus is in fact the risen Lord and had commissioned him to be His missionary to the Gentiles. So, instead of traveling to Jerusalem to learn the gospel from the apostles, Paul traveled to Arabia (v. 17). This is probably a reference to the Nabataean kingdom that roughly coincided with the southern parts of modern Israel and Jordan. Although this area is largely barren today, it was prosperous in the first century, with a number of large cities. While Paul does not state the reason for going to Arabia, it was likely connected to his calling to take the gospel to the Gentiles. Paul spent three years in Arabia before returning to Damascus.

1:18–24. Paul, Jerusalem, and the Judean Believers. After returning to Damascus, Paul traveled to Jerusalem (v. 18). His first trip to Jerusalem must have taken place after his three-year stay in Arabia, around A.D. 37 (Acts 9:26). The purpose of this second trip to Jerusalem was not to obtain the approval of the apostles; rather, he wanted to see Peter (also called Cephas [see John 1:40–42], the name actually used here in the Greek). The visit, which Barnabas may have arranged (see Acts 9:27), was probably intended to be a means for Paul to become better acquainted with Peter and to learn firsthand some of the historical details about the life and ministry of Jesus (cf. 1 Cor. 11:23; 15:3–5).

Although Paul met with Peter, he is emphatic in Galatians that the visit added nothing to the essence of his gospel message. Paul emphasizes this in two ways: First, he states that his visit to Jerusalem was very brief, lasting only fifteen days (v. 18). Second, he affirms that while he was there, he did not see any of the other apostles except for James, the Lord's brother (v. 19; see Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). Paul even takes an oath to prove that he is telling the truth (v. 20). Although James did not believe in Jesus during Christ's earthly ministry (John 7:3–5), he met the resurrected Jesus (1 Cor. 15:7) and became an important leader in the Jerusalem church (Gal. 2:9, 12; Acts 15:13; 21:18).

After leaving Jerusalem, Paul traveled to the regions of Syria and Cilicia (v. 21), heading specifically to Tarsus, the city of his birth (Acts 9:30; cf. 21:39; 22:3). Tarsus was the capital city of the Roman province of Cilicia, strategically located on the main road connecting Rome to Syria in the east. Paul stayed there for nearly six years before finally joining Barnabas in Antioch around A.D. 43 (Acts 11:25–26). Paul points out, however, that after he departed from Jerusalem (v. 21), the believers in Judea continued to rejoice because their former persecutor was now a preacher of the gospel (v. 24). For Paul, this was an explicit approval of the validity of his gospel message (vv. 22–24) and was recognition of the fact that he received his gospel directly from God.

2:1–10. Paul and the Jerusalem Church. Paul now recounts in more detail the events associated with a second trip he made to Jerusalem several years after his first visit. This private meeting is not the same as the formal meeting in Jerusalem recorded in Acts 15 but is Paul's second trip to Jerusalem recorded in Acts 11:27–30 and 12:25. In Paul's view, this meeting validated his calling, since three of the leading apostles—Peter, James, and John—formally acknowledged Paul's message (2:7–9). It also demonstrated that the truth of the gospel had to be preserved in the face of those who were requiring Gentiles to submit to circumcision in order to become so-called genuine Christians (2:3–5).

Paul's second trip to Jerusalem likely took place sometime in the mid-40s, though the exact date is difficult to determine with certainty. Two of Paul's colleagues in ministry, Barnabas and Titus, joined him on this visit. Barnabas, also known as Jose or Joseph (see Acts 4:36), was Paul's primary companion during his first missionary journey (Acts 13–14). Titus was Paul's uncircumcised Gentile understudy, whom he called a "true son in our common faith" (Titus 1:4), and he played a prominent role as one of Paul's delegates to Corinth (2 Cor. 2:13; 7:6, 13–14; 8:6, 16, 23; 12:18).

Paul states that he did not travel to Jerusalem at the behest of the apostles but rather by a divine revelation (2:1–2). This may be a reference to the revelation of Agabus in Acts 11:28 that prompted the church in Antioch to send Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem to provide aid for their fellow believers. This theory agrees with Paul's description of the trip as a "private" visit with the leaders of the Jerusalem church, particularly with the leaders of reputation (i.e., Peter, James, and John; cf. 2:9) rather than the public and more formal council described in Acts 15. Paul notes that during his visit, the apostles did not compel Titus to be circumcised (2:3) in order to be recognized as a fellow Christian. This is important, because circumcision was the very issue troubling the churches in Galatia (cf. 5:2–3; 6:12–13). While the apostles did not require Titus to be circumcised, Paul records that a group of Jewish Christians had tried. They were deceptive (2:4). They argued that Gentiles like Titus had to be circumcised in order to be genuine Christians (cf. Acts 15:1). For these individuals and for Judaism in general during that time, circumcision had become the definitive sign of national and religious identity. It was originally the outward sign of an inner faith that was to characterize the covenant relationship between God and Abraham and his descendants (cf. Gen. 17; Rom. 4:11–12), but unfortunately, many Jews had lost sight of that important distinction. There is a constant need for us to guard against failing to distinguish between outward forms and inner faith. If we do not, religious convictions have no value.

In vv. 6–10, Paul states that the leading apostles offered him "the right hand of fellowship" (2:9). The practice of giving the right hand marked the conclusion of a formal agreement between two parties, and its use here indicates a formal acceptance of Paul as an equal colleague in the task of proclaiming the gospel. Peter's background was better suited for applying the gospel to the needs of his fellow Jews, while Paul was better equipped to take the gospel to the Gentiles. Paul's customary way of referring to Peter is "Cephas" (2:9; 1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5). The Greek (i.e., official) name Peter reminds the reader of the official nature of the decision cited in 2:8. The division of missionary work—for the Gentiles and for the Jews, respectively—should be understood more as a division of responsibility than as a fixed division based on ethnicity or geography. We know that Paul reached out to Jews, and Peter's first letter seems directed to Gentiles.

The leading apostles only asked Paul to remember the poor (2:10). The specific reference could be to the Jewish believers in Jerusalem who had sold all their possessions for Christ (Acts 2:44–47). This concern was important due to the rapid growth of the church among the poor and marginalized of society and because of a severe famine that struck Judea in the mid- to late 40s (Acts 11:28–29). Paul fulfilled their request by taking up a collection from his churches and personally delivering it to the Jewish believers in Jerusalem at the end of his third missionary journey (Rom. 15:25–27; 1 Cor. 16:1–3; 2 Cor. 8–9).

2:11–14. Confrontation in Antioch. Although the Jerusalem leaders had agreed that circumcision was not a requirement for Gentiles to become Christians, during a subsequent visit to Antioch, Peter completely backtracked on his commitment to the decision. Antioch was the third-largest city in the Roman Empire and was a hub of Gentile Christianity (cf. Acts 11:19–21), as it was the city in which the first Gentile church was established.

The rapid growth of this Gentile church brought with it some concern from Jewish believers in Jerusalem. Members of the "circumcision party" in Jerusalem had been critical of Peter's connection with the baptism of a Roman centurion (Acts 11:1–3). They certainly would have been even more suspicious of a larger infusion of uncircumcised Gentiles into the church in Antioch. In response to these concerns, James sent a delegation of Jewish believers from Jerusalem to assess the work being done in Antioch (Gal. 2:12).

Paul mentions that it had been Peter's custom to regularly eat with the Gentiles before these Jewish believers arrived (2:12). It is sometimes assumed that this passage indicates that Peter and the other Jewish believers in Antioch had ceased following the OT food laws, but it is implausible to believe that all of the Jewish Christians in Antioch had abandoned the food laws entirely at a time when the early church was almost completely Jewish. If they had, there would have been an even greater uproar within the church, and there is no indication of such an event. When the Jewish believers arrived in Antioch, they were scandalized to see their fellow Jews eating with uncircumcised Gentiles. Since Jews viewed Gentiles as ritually unclean, it was common practice to avoid social contact with Gentiles as much as possible. It was Peter's violation of this norm that had outraged the Jews when he had associated with the Roman centurion Cornelius (Acts 11:1–3). In fact, Peter had struggled with this issue himself; it was only a vision from God that helped him see the error of his ways (cf. Acts 10:28).

What bothered Paul was that Peter had since begun to refuse to fellowship with the uncircumcised Gentile believers out of a fear of condemnation from the Jerusalem brethren for openly fellowshiping with Gentiles. Because Peter was withdrawing and separating himself (2:12), his actions were compromising the message of the gospel. Although Peter and the other Jewish believers supported the gospel in word, their actions spoke differently. As Paul says, they acted hypocritically (2:13). For them, uncircumcised Gentile believers were nothing more than second-class Christians. Gentiles could eat with Jewish Christians only after submitting to the rite of circumcision. Paul's reference to the fact that even Barnabas went along with the hypocrisy (2:13) reveals the deep sense of betrayal and disappointment he felt in response to the actions of his trusted colleague (see 2:9).

For Paul, Peter's hypocrisy was doubly ironic in that while Peter was living a manner of life undefined by Jewish customs, he was urging the Gentiles to live as Jews by following Jewish traditions (2:14). The word Paul uses here literally means "to Judaize," that is, to adopt a Jewish way of living. In this case, the outrage was that circumcision was being deemed the ultimate sign of whether a person was a true follower of God rather than faith in Jesus being first and foremost.

Since the truth and integrity of the gospel message was at stake, Paul confronted Peter publicly. In recounting the event in his letter, Paul desired the Galatians to avoid Peter's mistake and not submit to circumcision. Instead, he wanted them to follow his own example of standing firm for the gospel. The story is an important reminder for us today to ensure that our actions are in harmony with the central beliefs we hold as people of faith, regardless of whether we receive the approval of others.

2:15–21. Justification by Faith. This passage provides a summary of the essence of Paul's gospel message and brings to a close the first section of Galatians. In relation to the previous section, it functions as a continuation of Paul's speech to Peter, though the account has been expanded to address the Galatians' broader situation as well.

In addressing his fellow Jews, Paul employs terminology that emphasizes the traditional distinction between Jews and Gentiles. Although we might find the generalized terminology for Gentiles as sinners (2:15) incendiary today, his Jewish audience would not have interpreted it that way. Gentiles were sinners in the sense that they did not have the restraining influence of God's law; they lived outside of God's covenantal promises (Rom. 2:14; Eph. 2:12).

The word "justified" (dikaioō) in v. 16 and its verbal siblings (e.g., "justification," "righteousness") are key terms Paul employs to explain the gospel. In Galatians alone, these terms occur a total of thirteen times (Gal. 2:16–17, 21; 3:6, 8, 11, 21, 24; 5:4–5). The verb is used to refer to the positive verdict a judge pronounces when a person is declared innocent of the charges brought against him or her (cf. Deut. 25:1; Prov. 17:15). Since it is the opposite of condemnation, it involves much more than pardon or even forgiveness; it involves the positive declaration that a person is considered righteous.

The phrase "works of the law" (Gal. 2:16) refers to any act of obedience to God's law, whether moral or ceremonial, done in an attempt to earn God's favor (see Gal. 2:16; 3:2, 5, 10; Rom. 3:20, 28). While outward acts of obedience might identify someone as Jewish in the eyes of the world, Paul's point is that those actions themselves will never be sufficient to put a person in a right relationship with God. The law cannot resolve the human need for salvation because it can only condemn us; it cannot reunite us with God.

Since we humans cannot earn God's favor through our obedience, the only hope we have is to trust in what God has done for us through Jesus. The pisteōs Iesou Christou (v. 16) is literally "the faith of Jesus." While the general sense of what Paul is saying is clear, in the Greek the phrase can be understood in two equally valid but specific and nuanced ways: (1) As is the case with most modern Bibles, it can be translated as "faith in Jesus Christ." Since Paul often contrasts works of the law and faith in Jesus, this fits with his writings elsewhere. The repetition between "faith" and "belief" in the passage is not superfluous; it is emphatic. Paul is emphasizing the necessity of faith in Jesus as the only means by which humans can be right with God. (2) The phrase "the faith of Jesus" can also be understood as referring to "the faithfulness of Jesus." This literal translation is important. According to this understanding, Paul is saying that the solution to finding favor with God ultimately resides in Christ's faithfulness. Through the incarnation, Jesus did what Israel and every individual Israelite failed to do: He was faithful to God in every moment of His life. He lived the perfect life that God's law requires, and in doing so, He rewrote the history of humanity as the second Adam (Rom. 5:18–19). It is because of what Christ did that God offers every person a new identity, not one marked by sin and failure but with the spotless life of His Son. Faith in Jesus is important, but it comes only as a response to His faithfulness. To make Christ's perfect life our own, we are called to believe, or trust, in what Christ has already done for us, effectively placing our faith in Him. It is important to note that these two ways of understanding the phrase "the faith of Jesus" are not necessarily contradictory. They both agree with Paul's overall understanding of salvation.

Although the Jewish Christians agreed that a person is not justified by obedience to the law (2:16), they felt that Paul's emphasis on justification by faith in Christ alone was going too far. In their opinion, Christ is a crucial component of salvation, but faith in Christ is not sufficient by itself. It has to be augmented by obedience to the law. They feared that Paul's "law-free" gospel would make belief in Christ an excuse and vindication for lawless behavior (cf. Rom. 3:8, 28; 6:1).

In v. 17, Paul emphatically rejects the idea that his gospel would engender a lawless lifestyle. While it is possible for people to return to a former way of life after coming to Christ, the fault would not lie with the Christ-centered gospel but with their own wrong choices. Why is Paul so confident that his law-free gospel will not lead to a life of lawlessness? The answer is that a genuine Christian is someone who has died to his or her old way of living and has become a new person in Christ. Paul illustrates this from his own experience: he says that he died to the law through the Law (2:19), which is a reference to the radical transformation Christ had worked in his life. It was Paul's zealous, though mistaken, understanding of the law that led him to see in the followers of Jesus a threat to the spiritual purity and identity of Israel. Compelled by this mentality, Paul vigorously persecuted the followers of Jesus until Christ personally met him (cf. Gal. 2:13–14; Phil. 3:6). Paul's new union of faith with Christ had so radically changed his life that he now saw himself as "dead" to his former way of life, which had been dominated by his mistaken perspective of the nature of the law (cf. Phil. 3:7–9). Like Paul, all Christians are dead to the law as the way to salvation.

Paul was so profoundly overcome by his experience with Christ that he saw his life as no longer his own. His life had been united completely with Christ in faith; he had been crucified with Christ (2:20). In other words, Christ's death had become his death, and Christ's life his life (cf. Rom. 6:1–4; 2 Cor. 4:10; Phil. 3:10). The use of the perfect tense in Greek indicates that Paul did not see his death in Christ as merely a singular past event that occurred at his conversion but as a past event with saving power that continued to manifest in his daily life.

The gospel was more than just a theory for Paul. In it, he experienced the Jesus who loved him and gave Himself for him (2:20). He found in the gospel the astounding and humbling realization of the depths of God's love for him in Christ (see commentary on Gal. 1:1–5).

3:1—5:12

Paul's Defense of the Gospel

Having stated that a person is accepted in God's sight on the basis of faith alone and not by the works of the law (Gal. 2:15–21), Paul recognized that his opponents in Galatia would object to his claim about the all-sufficiency of faith. In anticipation of their protest, Paul dedicates the third and main section of his letter (Gal. 3:1—5:12) to demonstrating why faith alone is the only reliable means of securing God's favor. He makes his case in two ways: First, he approaches the issue from the perspective of the Galatians themselves in reminding them of their own experience when they accepted the good news about Jesus (Gal. 3:1–5). Second, since Scripture is the ultimate authority on questions of belief and practice, Paul proceeds to explain how the OT reveals that salvation has always been based on a response of faith to God and His promises (Gal. 3:6—5:12).

3:1–5. The Experience of the Galatians. Paul was so shocked and anxious regarding the Galatians' about-face on the gospel that he refers to them as being "foolish" (lit. "mindless"; 3:1). Paul's point is not that the Galatians were not thinking clearly but that they were not thinking at all! Their behavior was so completely illogical that Paul even wondered if demonic forces had cast a spell over them (cf. 2 Cor. 4:3–4).

What surprised Paul the most about the Galatians' apostasy is that they should have known from their own experience that salvation was not rooted in their own achievements but solely in what Christ had done for them. In an attempt to bring them to their senses, Paul was reminding the Galatians that when he first came to them, he presented the message of the crucified and risen Christ so clearly that it was as if he had depicted (in Greek it is something like "placarded" or "painted") the events right before their eyes. In response, the Galatians had simply accepted this message, placed their trust in Christ, and received God's promised Spirit (3:2). They had come to Christ just as they were, and He had accepted them. Had they forgotten that?

Through their behavior, the Galatians illustrated that they had become confused about the distinction between justification and sanctification. As Paul indicated earlier, justification is the act whereby God legally pronounces a sinner to be just or righteous in His sight because of what He has already done for that person in Christ (cf. Gal. 2:16–18; Rom. 3:23–26). Justification, therefore, is our admission into heaven. Sanctification, however, refers to the enabling power of the Spirit that begins to work in us when we are justified (cf. Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 4:3–8). Sanctification is not the means by which we gain access to heaven; it is the way God readies us to live in heaven.

3:6–9. Experience of Abraham. Jews looked to Abraham as both the father of the Jewish race and as an example of what a true Jew should be like. Many believed that obedience was the defining characteristic of Abraham's life; after all, Abraham had forsaken his homeland, accepted circumcision, and had even been willing to sacrifice his son at God's command (Gen. 11:31–32; 12:1–5; 17:22–27; 22:1–3, 15–19). Some even claimed that God declared Abraham righteous because of his obedience. Paul's opponents appear to have supported similar arguments.

Paul, however, turns the tables on his opponents by presenting Abraham as the utmost example of the all-sufficiency of faith. He anchors his argument in the passage from Genesis that describes Abraham's trust in God's promises and how God counted, reckoned, or credited righteousness to him for his expressions of that trust (Gal. 3:6; cf. Gen. 15:6). To understand how important this verse was to Paul, it is helpful to know that the word "faith" and the verb "to believe" come from the same root word in Greek (pisteuō). For Paul, this meant that regardless of what his opponents might say, Scripture clearly states that it was because of Abraham's faith—his belief in God's promises—that God considered him righteous. His faith in God's promises was the defining characteristic of his life, and although his faith wavered at times, he continued to believe, against all odds, that God would fulfill His promises (Gen. 12:1–3; Rom. 4:18–25; Heb. 11:11–12, 17–19). As important as Abraham's obedience was, it was only a by-product of his faith. Consequently, Paul sees in Abraham's experience a paradigm of the gospel.

3:10–14. Testimony of Scripture. The experience of the Galatians and even of Abraham himself implies that faith is sufficient for salvation, but Paul adds that the Hebrew Scriptures themselves explicitly teach that human obedience to God's law will never be sufficient to merit salvation. He does this by alluding to several passages from the books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Lev. 18:5; Deut. 21:23; 27:26), each of which indicate that the law requires perfect obedience to all of its precepts, all of the time. Since no one has done that perfectly except Jesus, all of us, Jew and Gentile alike, are under the law's curse, that is, condemned as sinners and thus separated from God.

Therefore, obedience itself cannot be the way to attain absolution from God (Gal. 3:11). Paul finds hope, however, in two other passages from the OT, the first of which is taken from Habakkuk 2:4. Habakkuk, a prophet of God who lived at a time when there seemed to be little hope for the survival of Israel, proclaimed that the only way to life was faith, trusting in God's promise to provide for His people. The second passage refers to what God has done through Christ to free humanity from the curse of the law. In v. 13, Paul refers to our emancipation from the curse of the law—Christ became a curse for us. Paul then quotes Deuteronomy 21:23, where it is stated that a person would be under God's curse if, after execution, the body was hung on a tree or a pole. Jesus's death on the cross was seen as a fulfillment of this (Acts 5:30; 1 Pet. 2:24). This explains why the cross was a stumbling block for so many Jews; they could not fathom the idea that the Messiah was cursed by God. Paul, however, saw this as exactly God's plan. The curse Christ bore on the tree of Calvary was not His own but the curse that rested on humanity in its entirety.

In referring to our redemption in Christ (3:13), Paul introduces a new metaphor to explain what God has done for humanity in His Son. The word "redeemed" was a common secular word in Paul's time, literally meaning "to buy back." It connoted the paying of a ransom price to secure the release of individuals who were being held as hostages or the act of paying money to free a person from slavery. Likely building on Jesus's own use of this image in relation to His ministry (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45), Paul applies it to what Christ has done for us (Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 1:30; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14; Titus 2:14). Since "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23), the curse of the law was ultimately a death sentence: permanent separation from God. Jesus paid the penalty of our sin by becoming our sin-bearer (1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23), voluntarily taking our curse on Himself and suffering the full wages of sin on our behalf (2 Cor. 5:21) so that we might be reconciled with God.

3:15–18. God's Unchangeable Promise. In an attempt to demonstrate to the Galatians that God's covenant with Abraham and all his descendants was based on faith without the works of the law, Paul draws on an example taken from everyday life: the unalterable nature of confirmed human covenants and testaments (3:15). The word translated as "covenant" (diathēkē) can also refer to a person's legal "will." Paul appears to pick up on this double meaning, and he uses it to highlight specific ways that God's covenant with Abraham is similar to a person's final will and testament. Like a human will, God's covenant concerns a specific beneficiary: Abraham and his offspring (Gal. 3:16; Gen. 12:1–5). It also involves an inheritance (Gen. 13:15; 17:8; Rom. 4:13), but most important is the unchanging nature of God's covenant. If a legally ratified will cannot be altered or modified in any way once the testator dies, God's covenantal promise to Abraham is all the more unchangeable, for God is not a promise-breaker (Is. 46:11; Heb. 6:18).

Not wanting the Galatians to miss the main point of his comparison between God's covenant and a person's final will, Paul writes of the historical priority of the promise to Abraham over the law (the law was given 430 years later) and of the incapacity of the law to annul the promise confirmed by God in Christ (Gal. 3:17). The Galatians could say all they wanted about the law, but God never related to Abraham on the basis of law, for the law (i.e., the Torah, in all its specificity) had been entrusted to the children of Israel several hundred years after His covenant promise to Abraham was made (cf. Gen. 15:13; Ex. 12:40). Faith was all God required when making a covenant with Abraham and his descendants. For the Galatians to say that the law is a requirement to receive God's promise of salvation would have meant that God had defaulted on His word.

As a parenthetical note, Paul clarifies that the promise to Abraham and his Seed (i.e., Christ; Gal. 3:16) did not relate to Israel as a nation of many individuals but that its primary focus was ultimately about the coming of the Messiah (cf. Gen. 3:15). Paul notices that, although the word for "seed" or "offspring" in Hebrew and Greek can have a collective sense attached to it, the word is actually singular in number. That fact suggests to Paul that this is a reference to Christ as the true Seed of Abraham and thus also the promised Messiah through whom all the nations of the earth would be blessed (cf. Gen. 12:1–3).

3:19–22. Why the Law Was Given. In this section of Galatians, Paul anticipates the question he knows his opponents are bound to ask: "If God's promise to Abraham was entirely unaffected by the law, why did God give the law to Abraham's descendants at all?" The interpretation of Paul's reply in 3:19 has been a debated question for centuries. Some understand it to be a reference to the ceremonial law of sacrifices and offerings that ended through Christ's sacrificial death on Calvary, while others say it refers to the Ten Commandments, claiming that they were abolished at Calvary. To understand what Paul meant, we need to carefully examine several aspects of this verse.

The first item to be considered is Paul's use of the word nomos, which occurs more than one hundred times in Paul's letters. It can refer to God's will for His people, the Pentateuch (Rom. 3:21), specific books in the OT (1 Cor. 14:21), the entire OT Scriptures (Rom. 3:10–19; 5:13), a general principle (Rom. 7:21), or even to the moral law of the Ten Commandments (1 Tim. 1:8–11). Since it does not always mean the same thing, the identity of the law in Galatians can only be determined within the context of Paul's overall message in the letter.

Although Paul is arguing against the necessity of circumcision, his concern is far broader than just ceremonial rituals. He is arguing that any attempt to be accepted by God on the basis of a law or obedience is insufficient regardless of whether the focus is on the demands of the ceremonial or the moral law. A careful examination of the more than thirty places in which the word "law" (nomos) occurs in Galatians illustrates this very point. When Paul mentions the law in this epistle, he almost always has a more general definition in mind (e.g., 2:21; 5:3–4, 23; 6:13). The law is not a group of ceremonial laws versus a separate group of moral laws. Such strict divisions are more the result of modern attempts of systemization than they are explicit biblical categories. When Paul says the law was added 430 years after the covenant was made with Abraham, he has in mind all of the legislation given to Moses at Mount Sinai, both in its ceremonial and moral dimensions.

If the use of the law in Galatians includes all the legislation given to Moses, why does Paul say that it was "added" (3:19) at Mount Sinai? Paul is not saying that the law did not exist before it was given at Sinai, as that would make no sense in light of the many references in Genesis and Exodus to both the commandments and to the ceremonial laws that predate the giving of the law at Sinai (e.g., Gen. 2:1–3; 8:20–22; 12:8; 26:5; Ex. 16:22–26). Neither does Paul mean that the law was added to God's covenant with Abraham as if it were a later addendum to a will that somehow altered its original provisions. Paul has already denied that in the letter (Gal. 3:15–18).

Why then were the laws "added" or "given" to the children of Israel? Paul says that the law was given because of transgression, and he has two aspects in mind here. The first can be seen in a similar statement in Romans 5:20, where Paul refers to the impartation of the law resulting in the increase of trespasses, or offenses. While in Egypt, the Israelites had lost sight of God's greatness and high moral standards and consequently failed to recognize the extent of their own sinfulness. The law was given on Sinai to reveal to the children of Israel their true condition and need of God's grace, as it continues to do for us today. The law was not intended to be a ten-step program on how to "earn" salvation. The moral law with its "Thou shall nots" reveals that sin is not a normal, legitimate condition but a violation of God's law (Rom. 3:20; 5:13, 20; 7:7–8, 13). Even the ceremonial laws were given to reveal the brokenness of humanity before God and the need for divine forgiveness.

While similarities between Galatians 3:19 and Romans 5:20 do exist, there are also important differences. First, there is the absence of the word "increase" in Galatians 3:19; second, there is the use of the word "trespass" (paraptōma) in Romans but "transgression" (parabasis) in Galatians. "Trespass" refers to a deliberate sinful act while "transgression" is a more generic term for "disobedience." Paul's comment in Romans limits the role of the law at Sinai to an entirely negative function—it reveals sin. Although this is true, Paul is not nearly as explicit about this in Galatians, where in 3:19, he simply says the law was added because of transgressions. The general nature of this statement does not limit his meaning to the negative aspect of revealing sin.

Paul's terminology is broad enough to understand the "adding" of the law as also a positive response—because of transgressions. The law in itself points to the remedy for transgression. The children of Israel not only failed to recognize the gravity of sin during their slavery in Egypt but they also lost sight of the remedy for sin that is illustrated in the sacrificial system. God expanded the laws of sacrifices and offerings at Sinai to indicate more fully that He had provided a means of atonement for human sinfulness. According to Paul, God gave the law in a public manner to reveal sin and to direct His people to the remedy for sin that was foreshadowed in the sacrificial system associated with the sanctuary.

What did Paul mean when he said the law was added until the Seed to whom (or concerning which) the promise was made had come (3:19)? Since Christ, our Passover Lamb, has been sacrificed (1 Cor. 5:7), it is true that there is no longer any need for animals to be sacrificed (Heb. 9–10), but one should not conclude that in Galatians 3:19 Paul is proclaiming that the Moral Law had been abolished. Such a conclusion is faulty for at least two reasons: First, Paul specifically denies such allegations. In a similar discussion in Romans 3:31, he asks whether we katargeō ("make void," "nullify") the law through faith. Paul uses katargeō frequently in his letters, and it can be rendered as "to abolish" or "set aside" (Eph. 2:15), "to do away with" (Rom. 6:6), to make "without effect" or "nullify" (Rom. 3:3), or even "to destroy" (1 Cor. 6:13). Had Paul wanted to indicate that the cross terminated the law, this would have been the occasion to do so. But he not only denies that idea with an emphatic "no"; he also states that his gospel establishes the law.

Second, the word translated as "till" or "until" in Galatians 3:19 does not indicate that the law would end after a certain period of time. While it can occasionally imply the end of a specific period of time, it does not always have this temporal sense. For instance, in Revelation 2:25, Jesus tells believers to cling to what they have until He comes. Obviously, Jesus does not mean that once He returns we no longer need to be faithful. Or, how about Paul's instructions to Timothy to devotedly ensure that there be reading (of Scripture), teaching (doctrine), and exhortation in preaching until Paul came (1 Tim. 4:13)? While Paul's arrival would certainly alter some things, it does not mean Timothy would cease to do any of those things. In both examples, the words "till" or "until" do not imply an end to the activity described. They merely emphasize that a change occurs.

The same is true in Paul's use of this word in Galatians 3:19. The role of the law did not end with the coming of Christ; it continues to reveal sin (cf. Gal. 3:21–22). Paul is saying that the advent of Christ marks a decisive turning point in human history. While the giving of the law on Sinai was the defining point in Israel's history, the incarnation of Christ far outshines it. Christ can do what the moral and ceremonial laws could never accomplish: provide a true remedy for sin, that is, justify sinners and fulfill His law in them by His Spirit (Rom. 8:3–4).

3:23–25. The Coming of Faith. Having said the law does not oppose God's promise (Gal. 3:21–22), Paul turns his attention to what the law does and how the coming of the promised Messiah affects the role of the law. Although Paul said the law was added "because of transgressions" (3:19), he expands on what that means by using three terms to describe what the law does and what it is like: phroureō (3:23), sygkleiō (3:23), and paidagōgos (3:24). The first (phroureō) comes from a word that literally means "to keep" or "to guard." While it can be used in a negative sense, such as "to hold in subjection" or "to watch over" (see 2 Cor. 11:32), in the NT it generally has the more positive meaning of protecting or keeping (cf. Phil. 4:7; 1 Pet. 1:5).

The same is true of the second word (sygkleiō; Gal. 3:23). The Greek word means "to shut," "to close," or "to enclose," and can have a positive, negative, or even neutral meaning. For example, the Septuagint employs it to refer to God "closing" the wombs of the wives of Abimelech until he returned Sarah to Abraham (Gen. 20:18). It can also refer to individuals confined to a specific geographical area or city (Ex. 14:3; Josh. 6:1; Jer. 13:19). In the NT, it can refer to the nets that enclosed the disciples' miraculous catch of fish (Luke 5:6) or the process by which God "confines" or "imprisons" people in sin (Rom. 11:32; Gal. 3:22).

As demonstrated earlier, the context is important in understanding the term "law" in Galatians 3:19. It is also crucial in determining whether the words in v. 23 should be interpreted in a negative, positive, or neutral sense. The way Paul understood these terms is seen in his usage of them in vv. 24–25 in relation to the law as a paidagōgos.

The idea of the law guarding and confining brought to Paul's mind the role of a specific type of slave called a paidagōgos in Greco-Roman society. This slave was placed in charge of his master's sons from the time they turned six or seven until they reached maturity. The responsibilities of this slave were so diverse that there is not an equivalent word in English that encapsulates them all; he was something like a nanny, a chauffeur, a tutor, a nurse, a bodyguard, and a parent all rolled into one. His duties for the master's sons would include drawing their baths, providing them with food and clothes, and caring for them when they were sick. He was also to ensure that his master's sons went to school and did their homework. He was not only expected to teach and practice moral virtues but to make sure the children learned and practiced them as well. However, the primary task of the paidagōgos boiled down to protection, prevention, and correction. Some pedagogues were kind and loving, but the predominant description of them in ancient literature is of strict disciplinarians. It was their duty to ensure obedience, whether it was secured via wise counsel, harsh threats and rebukes, or whipping and caning if necessary.

Paul envisioned God's law from this same perspective; it is like a paidagōgos. In Galatians 3:23, Paul describes the law as a controlling power that both guards and condemns. As discussed earlier, he is referring to both the ceremonial and moral aspects of God's law (Gal. 3:19); it is God's law as a whole that both guards and confines. So, did Paul envision the law as positive or negative? While the law has the negative role of revealing and condemning sin, it also has the positive function of guarding and protecting us from evil—of acting a guide for the Christian life. Even the negative aspect of condemning sin ultimately helps us realize our need for Christ. The answer is not really either-or, but rather both-and. The law is simply necessary.

Although the law is essential in light of the sin problem, how does this correlate with Paul's statement that we are no longer under a paidagōgos after faith has come (Gal. 3:25)? Considering Paul makes positive comments about the law elsewhere (e.g., Rom. 3:31; 7:7, 12, 14), he cannot be dismissing the law here. God's law did not expire with the arrival of Christ. To be sure, certain aspects of it were fulfilled in Him, but its moral truths continue to be applicable today. What has changed is the position of the law in relation to God's people. It no longer condemns us, because Christ took on Himself the condemnation of the law. When it comes to salvation, the law is not the ultimate authority, but Christ is. He is the epitome of all it requires and more (Gal. 6:2; 1 Cor. 9:21). While the law continues to be applicable as a guide for the Christian life, we do not merely follow a set of rules; we follow Jesus. We are called to live a life that is pleasing to Christ (1 Thess. 4:1), and Paul refers to this as walking in the Spirit (Gal. 5:18). Christ writes His law on our hearts (Heb. 8:10) and makes it possible for the righteous requirement of the law to be fulfilled in us (Rom. 8:4); we are no longer under the law's condemnation (v. 3). We simply enjoy the privilege of being under grace (Rom. 6:14–15), manifested through loving obedience to the law of God.

Thus, Christ's coming marks a fundamental shift in the epic of salvation history, just as it should in our own personal lives. The ultimate goal of every Christian is total conformity to Christ, for it is in conformity that we truly fulfill all that the law requires. Therefore, neither sin nor the law lords over the believer. In the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, the promised Messiah, we find the true Lord of our lives. In that sense, we could say that He has overshadowed the law. Christ first and Christ last—that is the nature of the Christian life. Within this context, obedience to the law of God is our response of love.

3:26—4:7. From Slaves to Heirs. Galatians 3:26 marks another stage in Paul's overall argument. He gives a second reason as to why believers are not under the law: they are God's children. They are no longer minors but adults. Paul previously explained the relationship between the law and the promise, but here he turns his attention to the relationship between the law and sonship. The development of the concept of sonship in Galatians 3:26—4:7 brings an end to his thoughts regarding the identity of the true sons of Abraham that was first introduced in 3:7.

Although it is easy to overlook, Paul's shift in pronouns in v. 26 is significant. He had directed his previous comments to the Jewish believers (the "we" in vv. 23–25), and here he addresses all the Gentile believers in Galatia by using the second person pronoun "you" (plural in Greek). The statement he makes in v. 26 is revolutionary: the Gentiles are called the children of God, a designation that God had historically used as a special term of affection to refer to the nation of Israel (Ex. 4:22–23; Deut. 14:1–2; Hos. 11:1). By calling uncircumcised Gentiles God's children, Paul was completely casting aside the us-versus-them mentality promoted by some Jewish believers. The blessing that was to come on all the families of the earth as part of God's promise to Abraham had now become a reality in Christ.

Paul explains the rationale behind this declaration in vv. 26 and 27. The Gentiles had become part of God's covenantal family—first, not because of anything they had done, but solely on the basis of what Christ has already done for them (cf. Gal. 2:16; 3:26); and second, Gentiles became united with Christ through baptism (Gal. 3:27). This union means that what is true of Christ is also true of us. Since Christ is the "seed" or "offspring" of Abraham and we are fellow heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17), we also inherit all the covenantal promises made to Abraham (Gal. 3:29). Christ's faithfulness has become our faithfulness and His identity our identity (Gal. 1:15–16; 2:20). Verse 28 underscores the fact that a believer's primary identity in the church is "in Christ Jesus," not in social position, race, or gender. This was an important concept in Paul's time and still is in ours, given the sinful human tendency toward division and conflict between these various subsidiary markers.

In Galatians 4:1–3, Paul elaborates on his thoughts using the theme of inheritance. His terminology envisions a situation in which an owner of a large estate has died, leaving all his property to his eldest son. His son, however, is still a minor, and the father's will stipulates that his son is to be subject to supervision until he reaches maturity, which, in ancient wills, was usually twenty to twenty-five. Until then, the son would be master of his father's estate in title alone. How are we to understand Paul's analogy? Paul refers to being in bondage to stoicheion as children (v. 3). The meaning of this word is debated, as indicated by the various renderings in major translations. Scholars have interpreted stoicheion as a description of the basic elements that compose the universe (2 Pet. 3:10, 12), the demonic powers that control this evil age (Col. 2:15), or the rudimentary principles of religious life, that is, the most basic fundamentals of religion (Heb. 5:12). Paul's emphasis on humanity's status as minors before the coming of Christ (Gal. 4:1–3) suggests he had in mind the last translation—the rudimentary principles of religious life. His basic point seems to be that any religious system that does not have Christ as its center is an enslavement that consists of rudimentary principles deprived of saving power. The Jews were heirs of God's promises, but because they did not find in Christ the saving power of God, their religious regulations became enslaving elementary principles. They only needed Christ in order to inherit (see 2 Cor. 3:7–18). For the Galatians to turn to a law-based religious experience after Christ had already come was like the adult son in Paul's analogy wanting to be a minor once again.

In Galatians 4:4–7, Paul explains that we have become the adopted children of God through the coming of Christ as our Savior and Lord. Paul is the only NT author to use the word "adoption" (Gr. huiothesia) as a metaphor for salvation (Gal. 4:5). Like today, adoption in the Greco-Roman world functioned as a legally binding agreement guaranteeing that adopted children would have the same rights accorded to a biological child. Building on the rights we now have as God's adopted children, Paul says we also have the privilege of enjoying the close and intimate relationship children have with their parents. We can call God "Abba" (cf. Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15–16), which was the intimate name Jewish children used to address their fathers, somewhat like the word "daddy" or "papa" today. This concept would have certainly seemed radical to Paul's Jewish audience, for outside of Jesus, no Jew had ever referred to God as Abba (Mark 14:36). Yet, now as joint heirs with Christ, we, too, have that special privilege.

4:8–11. The Call Not to Return to Slavery. In Galatians 4:8–11, Paul asks the Galatians to live the Christian life like sons and not to return to their former state of spiritual slavery. Paul likely had in mind the idol worship and superstitious practices that dominated the life of pagans in the ancient world. Ancient calendars revolved around the observance of days dedicated to the pagan gods, religious festivals, and sacrifices, which functioned much like national holidays.

In spite of this reality, some interpret Paul's objection to calendrical observances in v. 10 as a reference to the Jewish ceremonial laws and the Sabbath. Such an interpretation is unsustainable. We have no list of Jewish customs or practices identical to those referenced in Galatians. If Paul really wanted to single out specific Jewish practices, he could have easily identified them by name (cf. Col. 2:16); however, he is more ambiguous. The context indicates that Paul is drawing a more general parallel between the Gentiles' former practices in paganism and their willingness to base their new Christian life around works of law.

4:12–20. Paul's Pastoral Appeal. Galatians 4:12–20 is one of the most immensely personal and gripping passages in all of Paul's letters. Although Paul is notably upset about the events taking place in Galatia (cf. Gal. 1:6–9; 3:1; 5:12), his concern is rooted in the deep love he has for the Galatians. His burden is evident in his personal appeal to become like him (v. 12). The Greek word deomai ("to urge," "to beg," "to plead") has a strong sense of desperation connected to it (e.g., 2 Cor. 5:20), so, in essence, Paul is really saying, "I'm pleading and begging that you change your course!"

Paul's heart was bound up in the lives of the people brought to Christ through his ministry. He was their spiritual father and they were his children (1 Cor. 4:14–15; 1 Thess. 2:7). He compares his concern for the Galatians to the anguish that accompanies a mother in childbirth (Gal. 4:19). Paul thought his previous labor had been sufficient for their "safe delivery," but when the Galatians wandered from the truth, he experienced those labor pains all over again. He knew that their picture of Christ and what He required of them would affect every aspect of their lives and their eternal destiny could be at stake.

4:21–31. The Two Covenants. Galatians 4:21–31 is a highly complex argument that requires a broad knowledge of OT persons and events. In order to make sense of this passage, we first need a basic understanding of the OT concept of the covenant, which is central to Paul's argument (5:24).

A covenant in the OT designates a binding contract, agreement, or treaty. Covenants often involved the slaughter of animals as part of the process of making (lit. "cutting") a covenant. The killing of animals symbolized what would happen to a party that failed to keep their covenantal promises and obligations. In order to convey the certainty of His promise to redeem humans from the consequences of sin, God chose to enter into a formal covenantal relationship with them (cf. Gen. 6:18; 9:8–10). The most notable example of this is His covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15), in which He promised to make Abraham a great nation even though Abraham and Sarah were childless (Gen. 12:1–3). Although Abraham trusted God, after waiting for ten years, he began to wonder if he had misunderstood Him. To reassure Abraham of the certainty of His promise, God deigned to enter into a covenant with him (Gen. 15:7–18). Abraham slaughtered the animals and God symbolically passed through the pieces of the sacrificed animals to indicate that He staked His very life on the certainty of the promise He had made to Abraham.

The second element necessary to understand Galatians 4:21–31 is the tragic circumstances surrounding Abraham's relationship with Hagar, whose place in the story is directly related to Abraham's failure to trust God's promise. In spite of the covenant God had made with Abraham, he and Sarah decided to help God by bringing about the birth of the promised child through Hagar, whom Sarah gave to Abraham as a concubine-wife. Although strange to us today, according to ancient customs, a female slave could serve legally as a surrogate mother for her barren mistress. However, the child that was born (Gen. 16:3–4) was not the one God had promised (Gen. 17:15–19). The birth of Ishmael revealed Abraham's lack of faith. God was not waiting on Abraham to "do" anything, because the promise to Abraham was all about God doing something for people that they could not do for themselves. The divine plan to bless the entire world would begin with the miraculous birth of Abraham and Sarah's child.

Paul sees a connection between the experience of Abraham and Hagar and the actions of the Galatians. They thought they, too, needed to do something—in this case submit to circumcision—in order to experience God's promised blessing of salvation. But their efforts, like Abraham's, were ultimately insufficient in God's sight. In the same way, our efforts to gain God's favor through obedience will never be sufficient. Instead, we are to trust that in Christ, God has given us the salvation that we never could have earned, like the miraculous birth of Isaac to Sarah (Gen. 21:1–3). Thus, Hagar and Sarah represent two paths to salvation: Hagar the false way, based on human effort, and Sarah the true gospel rooted in absolute faith in God.

Paul associates the covenant relationship between God and Israel on Mount Sinai (vv. 25–26) with the false path to salvation symbolized by Abraham's experience with Hagar. While some see this association as an indication that the law is inconsistent with the true gospel of salvation in Christ, this is certainly not the idea Paul had in mind. First, when God brought Israel out of slavery in Egypt, He desired to share the same covenant relationship with them as He had with their forefather Abraham. The Lord told Abraham and the Israelites what He would do for them (Gen. 12:1–3; Ex. 19:4–6). He did not ask the Israelites to promise to "do" anything to "earn" His salvation. The Hebrew words translated "to obey" (shama') and "to keep" (shamar) in Exodus 19:5 literally mean "to hear" and "to treasure." The Lord wanted Israel to have the same faith that characterized Abraham's response to His promises. The covenant on Sinai was to be a covenant of grace.

Why then does Paul compare Mount Sinai with Hagar's negative experience? As discussed previously (see Gal. 3:17), the giving of the law at Sinai sought to reveal both humanity's sinfulness and the remedy, which was God's abundant grace typified in the sanctuary services. The problem at Sinai was not on God's part but with the faulty promises of the people (Heb. 8:6). Instead of responding to God's promise as Abraham did, the Israelites responded with self-confidence that they would comply with everything God had told them (Ex. 19:8). Their response was typical of slaves: "Whatever you say, we will do it." It was not that their choice of words offended God; He declared that their words were correct (Deut. 5:28). The problem was the condition of their hearts. They failed to appreciate what salvation was all about and had a naive confidence in their own efforts and abilities (Deut. 5:29). In the same way that Abraham and Sarah tried to help God fulfill His promises, the Israelites sought to turn God's covenant of grace into one of works.

In Galatians, Paul is not claiming that the law given at Sinai was evil or abolished. In fact, he actually never explicitly mentions the law at Mount Sinai. He only refers to it as a parallel to the experience of Abraham and Hagar. Paul was concerned with the Galatians' legalistic misapprehension of the law. They, too, had perverted God's purpose in giving the law. Instead of being convicted of the impossibility of earning God's favor through law-keeping, they concluded that through obedience they would contribute to their salvation.

When Paul refers to these two covenants, he does not see them as a matter of time but as the condition of the human heart. They depict two different ways of trying to relate to God. The old covenant symbolizes those who mistakenly rely on their own obedience as a means of earning the promise, as did the unbelieving Jews at Sinai. The new covenant, however, represents the experience of those who, like Abraham, rely wholly on God's grace. The new covenant is the everlasting covenant; it is the one true gospel (see Gen. 3:15), promised and experienced by Abraham and his descendants (Gal. 3:8). It was foreshadowed in the laws and rituals given to Israel, and it reached its ultimate expression and fulfillment in Christ. In Him, God kept His promise. Paul's references to the experience of Abraham, Sarah, Hagar, Isaac, Ishmael, and the children of Israel at Sinai indicate that his discussion is not ultimately about abstract theological ideas. It is not so much about what we should "think" as how we should live.

5:1–12. Freedom in Christ. In concluding this major section of Galatians (3:1—5:12), Paul's appeal reaches its climax. Having argued from the experience of the Galatians and the testimony of Scripture that faith in God alone (not faith and circumcision) is fully sufficient for salvation, he summarizes the entire purpose of his letter in 5:1.

In the original Greek, the command to remain firm does not appear at the beginning of v. 1; an important fact precedes it: Christ set us free for freedom. Christians should stand firm in their freedom because Christ has already set them free. True freedom is the result of what Christ has already done for us (cf. Rom. 6:6, 12; 1 Cor. 6:20; Eph. 4:1; Col. 2:6). This is Paul's way of telling believers to "become what you already are in Christ." Contextually, Paul is referring to freedom from the bondage and condemnation of a law-driven Christianity, but his message also includes freedom from sin (Gal. 3:22; Rom. 3:9), death (1 Cor. 15:51–56), and demonic powers (Gal. 1:4; Col. 2:13–15; Heb. 2:14–15).

Paul's introduction to vv. 2–12 indicates the importance of what he is about to say, as is evident in various translations of the Greek word ide (from horaō, "to see"), such as "behold," "indeed," "look," "listen," or "mark my words." He even evokes his full apostolic authority with the words "I, Paul" (5:2). If the Gentiles wanted to embrace a legalistic understanding of Christianity, Paul wanted them to realize why legalism is so deadly. He highlights several reasons. First, the primary problem with trying to earn God's favor by by submitting to a legalistic requirement for legalistic reasons is how it affects our relationship with Christ. The point is so important that Paul states it twice (vv. 2, 4). Legalism ultimately alienates, severs, and estranges us from Christ. It involves a rejection of God's path to salvation through Christ. If keeping the law had been sufficient, Christ's sacrifice would not have been necessary. When Paul mentions circumcision, he is referring to it from a legalistic perspective. Obviously, he was a circumcised Jew, and he even had Timothy circumcised (see Acts 16:3), so the problem was not circumcision in and of itself (Gal. 5:6; 6:15) but the way it was being forced on the Galatians as a so-called requirement for salvation.

Second, legalism obligates a person to keep the whole law (5:3). Paul is saying that submission simply to circumcision is not enough. The Galatians would have had to faithfully keep the whole law if they wanted to base their absolution before God on their behavior; they could not simply pick which commands to follow. It is all or nothing, as far as the law is concerned. Such an attempt would sunder any who tried it from Christ (v. 4).

Third, legalism hinders spiritual growth. Paul uses an athletic metaphor to address this point (5:7). The analogy here is of a runner whose progress toward the finish line has been sabotaged. Greco-Roman military circles employed the word egkoptō to refer to damages inflicted on an enemy to hinder them from completing their main objective. Legalism does the same: it hinders our spiritual advancement by causing us to take our eyes off Jesus. When Christ is no longer the focus, we either develop a false sense of self-righteousness or experience guilt-ridden despair. In either case, legalism engenders a faultfinding mentality that results in division. Paul compares the results of legalism to the savage behavior of a pack of wild dogs that mercilessly bite and devour one another (Gal. 5:15).

Fourth and finally, Paul says legalism removes the offense of the cross and the persecution he was suffering because of it (5:11) by implying that we can contribute to our salvation. This is flattering to human pride, whereas the message of the cross is offensive because accepting the cross means acknowledging that we are fully dependent on Christ. Paul was so outraged at his opponents that he wished that the knife used for circumcision would slip and his opponents would castrate themselves (5:12). Strong words, but not nearly as deadly as the false gospel of the Judaizers.

5:13—6:10

Defending the Freedom of Faith

Galatians 5:13 marks an important turning point in this letter. Whereas until now the apostle has focused entirely on the theological content of his message, in this final section, he turns to the issue of Christian behavior (5:13—6:10). How should a person who is saved, not by works of the law but through faith in Christ, live the Christian life? Aware of the human tendency for self-indulgence, Paul warns the Galatians not to allow their freedom in Christ to become an excuse to live as they please (5:13). Instead, he appeals to them to live a Spirit-empowered life (5:16–26) that fulfills the law of God by reflecting His love to others (5:13–15; 6:1–10).

5:13–15. Fulfilling the Whole Law. Paul begins his explanation of what freedom means by warning the Galatians not to use the freedom that comes through faith as an opportunity for the indulgence of the flesh (v. 13). The word aphormē refers to a starting point or a base from which an expedition is launched, and the word sarx (flesh) refers to a life centered on pleasing the self. Paul says believers should never use their freedom in Christ as a starting point for indulging their self-centered desires but should instead serve one another out of love (cf. Gal. 5:13; Lev. 19:18).

The love that defines the Christian life does not oppose God's law. Paul specifically says love fulfills the whole law (v. 14), meaning true Christian behavior is much more than the outward obedience of "doing" the law or following it as a list of rules. Rather, love fulfills the law. For Paul, the word "fulfill" goes far beyond simply doing; it implies that the obedience offered meets more than the minimum requirement of the letter of the law because it encapsulates that which satisfies the intent of law, namely, love. This type of obedience is rooted in Jesus (see Matt. 5:17). It is not an abandonment of the law nor is it a reduction of the law to love only, but it is the way through which the true intent and meaning of the law can be experienced.

5:16–24. Walking in the Spirit. Next, Paul illustrates his point by describing the destructive works of the flesh in contrast to the life-giving and law-fulfilling fruit of the Spirit. The basic contrast between these two ways of life is introduced through a tantalizing promise, found in v. 16. The realm of the Spirit and that of the flesh stand in stark contrast with each other, for a life lived according to the flesh seeks to satisfy its own desires while a life given over to the Spirit seeks to please God. Ancient philosophers recognized that humans always seem to make happiness dependent on satisfying some sort of desire (e.g., lust for food, sex, power, money). For them, the answer to the problem of desire boiled down to the conviction that a proper understanding of the nature of life leads to right living. In other words, the problem of desire was simply faulty thinking. Paul's diagnosis, however, is vastly different. Sinful desire is not simply a by-product of incorrect thinking; it is an enslaving and destructive power at work within every human being. Right thinking is not enough. Freedom from the power of sin ultimately resides in submission to the power of God's indwelling Spirit, or, as Paul says, in the act of walking in the Spirit (5:16).

Walking is a metaphor drawn from the OT that refers to a person's way of life. Although Paul employs this image to describe the type of conduct that should characterize the Christian life, he connects walking with the Spirit instead of its usual association with the law (e.g., Deut. 26:17; 28:9; 30:16; 1 Kin. 11:38), thereby effectively saying that Christians should live by the Spirit. Once again, it is not that Paul was opposed to the law; rather, he was rejecting the legalistic misuse of the law in Galatia. The obedience God desires is the result of an inward motivation produced by the Spirit (Gal. 5:18). Since it is the Spirit who set us free (Rom. 8:2) and who sustains our freedom in Christ (2 Cor. 3:17), it is only the Spirit who can enable us to fulfill God's law (Rom. 8:3–4; 15:16). Paul goes on to outline the types of behavior associated with the flesh and the Spirit: fifteen destructive works of the flesh and nine grace-filled manifestations of the fruit of the Spirit.

The lists are noteworthy in at least two ways: First, Paul refers to them in different ways. He labels the vice list as actions coming from the flesh (5:19), but the virtue list he calls the fruit of the Spirit (5:22). The distinction between works and fruit is significant. The works of the flesh describe the results of the detrimental behavior of fallen humanity's pursuit of its own interests (e.g., fornication, hatred, envy, murder). Those who follow a life focused on the self will experience God's final judgment against sin: permanent exclusion from the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:21). A life graced with the fruit of the Spirit, on the other hand, places the welfare of others before its own. This behavior is not generated by humans themselves; it is what the Spirit produces in them (i.e., the fruit).

Second, the vice list is deliberately labeled as being plural in number (5:19), while the fruit of the Spirit (5:22) is singular. This difference may suggest that a life lived in the flesh promotes disruption, divisiveness, and disunity. Sin lacks purpose; it only fragments. In contrast, life in the Spirit produces one fruit of the Spirit, God's love, which manifests itself in different forms to foster unity. This prioritizing of love agrees with the central role it has already been given in Galatians 5:6 and 5:13 and with the emphasis on its being first place in Paul's virtue lists elsewhere (2 Cor. 6:6; 1 Tim. 4:12; 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22). Love is not one virtue among many but the cardinal Christian virtue, the key to all others. It is the supreme gift of the Spirit (Rom. 5:5; 1 Cor. 13:13) that should fill the life of every follower of Jesus (John 13:34–35).

Although the fruit of the Spirit is the moral life that the Spirit produces in us, this transformation does not happen automatically. Five verbs in Galatians 5:16–29 indicate that believers play a role. The first four demonstrate the necessity of a daily decision to allow the Spirit to work within us; we are to walk (v. 16), be led (v. 18), live (v. 25), and conform to the Spirit (v. 25). God will not force Himself on us. In addition, being led by the Spirit suggests that we also need to learn to discern the Spirit's prompting in our lives, and this can develop only when we spend time in private communion with God in prayer.

The final verb Paul employs is the most startling; he instructs us to crucify the flesh with its passions or affections and desires or lusts (v. 24). While Paul was obviously speaking figuratively, the basic point of his terminology is clear: we are to work with the Spirit by taking drastic action in regard to our old way of life. It must be put to death (cf. Rom. 8:13). Crucifixion becomes a reality in our lives when we feed our spiritual life and starve the desires of the flesh through the strength of the Spirit (Rom. 13:14). It is important to note that crucifying the flesh is not something we do in our own strength. We welcome the Spirit into our lives to do what God already did for us in Christ at Calvary.

6:1–6. The Gospel and the Church. Paul's discussion of Christian behavior after Galatians 5:13 is largely theoretical. He explains that God's law is fulfilled through love (5:14) and that it is the Spirit alone who can produce that love in people's lives (5:16–26). To help the Galatians better understand what is involved in a life defined by God's love, Paul concludes the body of his letter with several practical examples that illustrate what such a life should look like.

The first example deals with the situation of a fellow believer falling into sinful behavior. The situation Paul envisions in v. 1 does not appear to be an act of deliberate apostasy. This is evident in his choice of the word paraptōma (lit. "to fall beside"; variously translated as "wrongdoing," "sin," "fault," "trespass"), which was used figuratively to describe a person who makes a false step. Therefore, rather than dealing with a case of defiant or intentional sin (cf. 1 Cor. 5:1–5), Paul is referring to a mistake in the Christian life that has drawn one into sin. In such a case, Paul says the church should seek to restore the person. The word translated as "restore" (katartizō) means "to mend" or "to put in order." The NT uses it in reference to mending fishnets (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19), and Greek literature employs it as a medical term describing the process of setting a broken bone. As members of the body of Christ, it is our responsibility to gently care (5:23) for our brothers and sisters in Christ who may stumble and fall as we walk together in our Christian pilgrimage.

Paul also counsels those involved in the ministry of restoration to take into account their own vulnerability to temptation (Gal. 6:1). The word skopeō literally means "to look at carefully" or "to pay careful attention to" (cf. Rom. 16:17; Phil. 2:4), so Paul is instructing us to keep a careful eye on ourselves lest sin also take us by surprise. The earlier warning against becoming proud or conceited (lit. "empty glory"; Gal. 5:26) suggests that Paul is specifically warning the Galatians against feeling spiritually superior over those in need of restoration. This warning, repeated in v. 4, implies that in recognizing our own frailty, we should not boast on account of the failures of others.

Love is also to be manifest in the church by believers bearing one another's burdens (6:2). "Burden" refers to a heavy load that is difficult to bear over a great distance, and it became a metaphor for any type of trouble or difficulty (e.g., Matt. 20:12; 1 Thess. 2:9; 2 Thess. 3:8). The immediate context of Paul's injunction to bear one another's burdens certainly includes the moral lapses of the believers mentioned before, but the idea he has in mind is much broader. God does not intend for us to shoulder all our burdens alone. The church is a living entity, like a human body; what happens to one member affects the rest of the body (1 Cor. 12:12–26). The church is a community of believers who interact with and care for each other. Paul calls on us to care for others and to allow others to care for us. Unfortunately, we are often far more willing to assist others in carrying their burdens than we are to allow anyone to help us shoulder our own. Paul condemns this attitude of self-sufficiency as human pride that refuses to admit that we, too, have needs and weaknesses (v. 3). Such pride robs us of the comfort of others and prevents others from fulfilling the ministry that God has called them to perform.

Paul connects bearing burdens with fulfilling "the law of Christ" (v. 2). The phrase "the law of Christ" occurs nowhere else in the Bible, though Paul uses a similar expression in 1 Corinthians 9:21. Some mistakenly argue that this expression indicates that the law of God given at Sinai has been replaced with a different law: that of Christ. Others claim that the word "law" simply designates a general principle (Rom. 7:21), such as following the example of Jesus (1 Pet. 2:24). While the latter concept has some merit, the context and Galatians 5:14 suggest that fulfilling the law of Christ is another reference to fulfilling the Mosaic law through love.

Paul has already shown that the coming of Christ did not annul the Moral Law. Instead, the Moral Law interpreted by love continues to play an important role in the Christian life. This is the epitome of what Jesus taught and practiced during His earthly ministry. In bearing others' burdens, we are not only following in the footsteps of Jesus but also fulfilling the law. Viewed from this perspective, the law is not about legalistic rules that focus our attention primarily on ourselves, but it is about how we should love God and care for other people (Lev. 19:18).

Paul reminded the Galatians that caring for each other in love includes caring for the financial needs of their spiritual leaders as well (Gal. 6:6). In Philippians 4:15, he mentions the financial support the Philippians had so generously "shared" with him. Although it had been Paul's practice not to rely on his churches for financial support, he acknowledges that financial remuneration is a right a teacher or preacher can expect to be honored (1 Cor. 9:3–12). His counsel to care for the teachers (Gal. 6:6) was also appropriate for Gentile believers, for unlike Jews, who were accustomed to supporting their spiritual leaders through tithe and offerings, the Gentile world had no similar practice.

6:7–10. Sowing and Reaping. Paul rounds out his counsel on what the church is called to be with a general exhortation about sowing and reaping to the flesh and to the Spirit (cf. Matt. 13:1–11, 18–23). Paul uses the counsel to highlight his previous comments about the flesh and the Spirit in Galatians 5. His metaphor has two types of soil—the flesh and the Spirit—and humans can choose which one to sow in. Following Paul's analogy, the type of soil that one uses for sowing determines the crop that is produced (cf. John 3:6). The flesh can never produce a spiritual crop and the Spirit can only yield a spiritual harvest. Everything depends on how a person sows. For the church to be what God has called it to be—His representative on this planet—it must invest in spiritual things. Hence, Paul urges the Galatians not to tire of doing good in order to reflect God's love in tangible ways to everyone, especially to those in the church, the house (or family) of believers (6:10).

6:11–18
Final Thoughts

Paul's concern for the situation in Galatia compelled him to make one last appeal to the Galatians to turn from their foolish ways (6:11–17) before concluding the letter with a prayer (v. 18).

6:11–17. A Last Plea. The closing remarks in Paul's letters usually include three elements: (1) personal greetings for specific individuals associated with the church to which the letter is addressed (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:19–20), (2) a personal signature (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:21), and (3) a closing benediction (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:23). When these typical features are compared to the final remarks in Galatians, two significant differences appear: First, Galatians contains no final greeting. Had Paul not omitted the usual word of thanksgiving at the beginning of this letter, the absence of the final greeting might not seem too significant. The omission of both elements, however, can hardly be accidental. They are another indication of Paul's strained relationship with the Galatians.

Second, Galatians contains a long appeal written by his own hand. Like many others in antiquity, Paul's standard practice was to dictate his letter to a scribe (cf. Rom. 16:22; 1 Pet. 5:12). Afterward, he would take the pen and write the closing benediction with his own hand to authenticate the letter (cf. 2 Thess. 3:17). In this case, when he took the pen from the scribe, his concern for the Galatians prevented him from simply writing a final benediction. He felt compelled to appeal to them once more to return to the true gospel.

Paul begins the appeal by calling the Galatians to notice the size of his large letters (v. 11). Some see this remark as indicating the apostle's poor eyesight (see Gal. 4:15; 2 Cor. 12:7–9), while for others the reference is to the letters' misshapen form. They speculate that Paul's hands were either so crippled from persecution or gnarled from leatherworking that he could not shape the letters with precision. While both views are certainly possible, Paul may simply have been writing with large letters to emphasize his point and to get their attention.

Although Paul hinted earlier at the agenda and motivation of the Judaizers (see Gal. 1:7; 4:17; 5:10, 12), his remarks in Galatians 6:12–13 are his first direct comments about them. He describes them as wanting to make a prideful display in the flesh (lit. to put on "a good face"; 6:12). The Greco-Roman world used this same word to describe the mask an actor would wear in the theater when playing a role. This suggests that Paul is comparing the Judaizers to actors who seek the audience's approval. In forcing the Gentile believers to submit to circumcision, the Judaizers appear to have been seeking the approval of their fellow Jews in Galatia and other Jewish Christians back in Jerusalem. Like David, who presented the foreskins of two hundred Philistines to King Saul in order to become his son-in-law, the Judaizers wanted to boast in the Gentile foreskins they had acquired as an indication of their own spiritual accomplishments (cf. 1 Sam. 18:25–27). Having exposed the dishonorable motives that prompted the Judaizers' insistence on circumcision, Paul summarizes his gospel message to the Galatians one final time. For him, the gospel rests on two fundamental tenets: (1) the centrality of the cross, which excludes human boasting (6:14), and (2) the doctrine of righteousness by faith, or what he calls the new creation (6:15).

In summarizing the gospel message, Paul makes a paradoxical comment that in Christ neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is important (6:15). Since he has been arguing strongly against circumcision (5:2–4), how can he now declare that neither circumcision nor uncircumcision really matters? Paul did this to prevent the Galatians from misunderstanding his main point. He does not want anyone to conclude that uncircumcision is more pleasing to God than circumcision. True religion is not rooted in any form of external rituals but in the radical work God does in the human heart that results in a new creation.

The word ktisis (6:15) can refer either to an individual creature or creation (2 Cor. 5:17) or to all of the created order (Rom. 8:22; Heb. 9:11). Both imply the action of a creator, and that is Paul's point. Salvation is not something that can be brought about by any human endeavor, whether circumcision or anything else. He refers to it as new because it is something that we do not naturally possess. It involves a total change, a divine act. Jesus described this same process as a new birth (John 3:5–8). It is a new birth or a new creation because it is a divine act by which God takes a spiritually dead person and breathes spiritual life into him or her.

Before the final benediction, Paul makes what seems to be a rather cryptic statement: no one is to trouble him, because he bears on his body the marks of the Lord Jesus (6:17). The Greek word used here is stigma, from which we derive the English word "stigma." Some have seen in this comment a reference to the practice of branding slaves with the insignia of their master to identify them or to a ritual in some mystery religions in which participants branded themselves as a sign of devotion. It is more likely, however, a reference to the scars left on Paul's body by the persecution and hardship he had experienced in proclaiming the gospel (cf. 2 Cor. 4:8–10; 11:24–27).

The reference to these imprints or scars is directly connected to Paul's message and to his experience with the Galatians. In contrast to the mark of circumcision, Paul says he bears on his body marks that are a much more significant indication of his true devotion to Jesus: the physical scars he acquired as a consequence of proclaiming the gospel of Christ. Anyone questioning his apostolic calling and message need only look at these marks to find evidence of his divine commission. Some of these marks, as the Galatians knew, were the result of the persecution he experienced when taking the gospel to Galatia (Acts 14:19; cf. 2 Cor. 11:25).

6:18. A Prayer. The apostle's last word to the Galatians is the same word that begins and ends all his letters: grace (6:18). Grace, it has been said, provides the bookends of the gospel. His prayer for all his churches was grace first and grace last. It was the grace that Paul saw poured out on Calvary that had captivated his heart and changed his life. He concludes by praying that the Galatians would experience this same grace anew. It is the same grace that enables us all to hope.

EPHESIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The absence of the place-name "in Ephesus" (1:1) in the text of three of the earliest and often most reliable Greek manuscripts that date back to the third and fourth centuries (P^{46}; Codex Sinaiticus [ℵ]; Codex Vaticanus [B]) has led some scholars to wonder if this epistle was originally intended to be a general letter written to several of the churches in Asia Minor instead of just to the church in Ephesus. The fact that, unlike Paul's other epistles, this letter does not contain a single personal greeting to any individual in Ephesus appears to support this theory (cf. Phil. 4:2–3; Col. 4:15–17).

There are two potential explanations for the absence of the place-name "in Ephesus." One possibility is that the phrase was originally included in the letter but was omitted at some later time to make its message more relevant to other churches. This same type of scribal activity appears to be the reason the words "in Rome" (Rom. 1:7) were omitted from later copies of Paul's letter to the church in Rome. The other possibility is that the phrase was in fact originally absent because the letter was meant for the churches in Asia Minor. While both explanations are viable, the nearly unanimous use of the title "to the Ephesians" (cf. P46; Codex Vaticanus) demonstrates that from an early date, this letter was very dear to the Christians in Ephesus. Being the most significant city in Asia Minor as well as the base for Paul's ministry for nearly three years (Acts 19:10), the letter probably circulated first among the local churches in Ephesus before eventually being shared with the other churches in the surrounding area.

Date. Together with the other Prison Epistles (i.e., Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon), Ephesians was likely written during Paul's two-year imprisonment in Rome from A.D. 59 to 61 (Acts 28:30; cf. Eph. 3:1; 4:1; 6:20). Among the Prison Epistles, Ephesians and Colossians are closely connected. Not only do they have a high degree of resemblance but also both were sent through the same courier: one of Paul's companions named Tychicus (6:21; Col. 4:7). This connectedness indicates that Ephesians and Colossians were written and sent at the same time. When they were written, Epaphras, who brought the report from Colossae to Paul, was still with the apostle (Col. 4:12). Allowing time for Paul to have received communication in Rome from the churches at Ephesus, Colossae, and Philippi and for ministering to Onesimus before sending him back to Colossae with Tychicus, Ephesians was likely written late in his imprisonment, around A.D. 61.

Authorship. Although the epistle identifies Paul as its author (Eph. 1:1; 3:1), critical scholars have questioned the Pauline authorship of Ephesians based on the resemblance between Ephesians and Colossians. They have argued that Paul would not have needed to write Ephesians after writing Colossians and that an imitator used the latter to produce the former. While there are similarities in the overall structure and sequence of the two epistles, there is actually only one verse in the Greek that is identical in both of them: Ephesians 6:22 and Colossians 4:8 (although, interestingly, they are not always translated in identical ways). The content of these two passages, however, is not theological and would have hardly required someone to copy from the other.

In spite of such basic similarities, each letter has its own distinctive theological emphasis. Ephesians focuses on the unity of the church as the body of Christ with Christ as the head, while Colossians focuses on the supremacy of Christ. The juxtaposition of these similarities and differences likely suggests that these two epistles were written within a short time of each other and that Paul, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, developed and modified his thoughts to better address the different needs of his readers. Colossians addressed a specific threat that faced the believers in Colossae while Ephesians dealt with the more general needs confronting the churches in Asia Minor.

Although early church fathers from the second and third centuries A.D. were aware of later Pauline forgeries, their statements unanimously affirm the Pauline authorship of Ephesians. We find no significant reason to disregard the strength of this testimony and affirm Paul as the author of Ephesians.

Backgrounds. Paul visited Ephesus for the first time toward the end of his second missionary journey (Acts 18:19–21). He returned on his third missionary journey and stayed for about three years (Acts 20:31; cf. 19:7–10). It was probably some of Paul's converts who brought the gospel message to the cities surrounding Ephesus. Epaphras, for example, was likely the one who founded the churches in Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Col. 1:7; 4:12, 13). There is no indication in the letter that Paul wrote in response to a specific report from the church in Ephesus as he did in the other Prison Epistles (cf. Phil. 2:25; Col. 1:7–8; Philem. 1:10–12). After receiving a report from Epaphras about the church in Colossae, Paul wrote a letter to the Colossians and appointed Tychicus with the responsibility of delivering it (Col. 4:7). Recognizing that Tychicus would have to pass through Ephesus, Hierapolis, and Laodicea on his way to Colossae, Paul probably also entrusted Tychicus with the letter to be read in Ephesus (Eph. 6:21). Realizing that no one within his circle of companions was currently in Ephesus since Timothy and Epaphras were with him (Col. 1:1; 4:12), and anticipating the coming of the false teachers he had predicted a couple of years before (Acts 20:29), Paul would have felt the need to strengthen the faith of the Christians in that territory as well as their unity in Christ. Thus the letter to the Ephesians was written. Since the church in Laodicea was located near Colossae and was likely facing challenges similar to those among the Colossians, Paul advised the believers in Colossae to share his letter with the Laodiceans (see commentary on Col. 4:7–18). The fact that Paul encouraged the Colossians to share his message with neighboring churches supports the idea that he may have written the letter to the Ephesians in such a way that its message could also be shared with surrounding churches as well.

Theology. One of the most important theological topics in Ephesians is the church of Christ, particularly its union with the Lord and its inner unity. We also find an emphasis on hope and love.

1. Unity of the Church. The unity of the church in Ephesus and of those in Asia Minor in general was one of Paul's primary concerns (Eph. 2:11–22; 4:1–16). He emphasized not only unity among the members of a local church but also unity among the churches. He described the church as a human body with Jesus Christ as the head (1:22; 4:15; 5:23) and Christians as members of the body (5:30). Together, all Christians comprise the household or the building of God with Jesus as the chief cornerstone and the apostles and the prophets as the foundation (2:19–21). In Christ, the church has become one (2:15–16); the church has access to the Father in "one Spirit" (v. 18). For the church, there is only "one Lord, one faith, one baptism" (4:5), "one God and Father" (v. 6). The church is to live harmoniously in the love of Christ (5:21–33) collectively and in the relationships between husbands and wives, parents and children (6:1–4), and masters and servants (6:5–9). He reminded the Christians of the salvation granted to them by grace through faith (2:1–10) and that they should be confident of their status as heirs of salvation and sharers of God's promise (3:1–20).

2. Christian Hope. The people of God are to be united in one hope (4:4; cf. 1:18)—a hope based on Christ, who died, rose again, and ascended to heaven, bringing captives with Him (4:8–10). Thus, this is the hope of resurrection and ascension. In his other letters, Paul related this hope to the Second Coming of Christ (1 Cor. 15:19; 1 Thess. 4:13; Titus 2:13). Although there is no explicit mention of the Second Coming in Ephesians, Paul may have had this event in mind when talking about hope. He explained that Christ, who died and rose again, had been seated at the right hand of the Father in a "heavenly" location (Eph. 1:20). He is above all in the current "age" and in the one yet to come (v. 21), which means that those who believe in him have hope not only now but also in the future. The coming of Christ is the hope of the future. Therefore, the epistle encouraged the church members to be growing and united in faith while waiting for the fulfillment of their hope at the Second Coming of Christ.

3. The Centrality of Love. The phrase en agapē ("in love") appears in Ephesians quite often. Of the twelve uses of the phrase in the Pauline writings, six are found in Ephesians (1:4; 3:17; 4:2, 15, 16; 5:2). En agapē is presented as the reason why God has adopted those who believe in Him to be His children in Jesus Christ (1:4–5). In order to comprehend the love of Christ, Paul instructed the Christians to be "rooted . . . in love" (3:17). Paul then admonished God's people to be patient with one another "in love" (4:2), to speak the truth "in love" (v. 15), so that the body of Christ may grow "in love" (v. 16). The last appearance of en agapē relates to the love of Christ as a basis for Christians to walk in love (5:2). Unfortunately, about thirty-five years later, the church of Ephesus abandoned their first love (Rev. 2:4).

COMMENTARY

1:1–2

Opening Greeting

Paul introduces himself as an apostle of Jesus Christ "by the will of God" (v. 1) and acknowledges that he was not the only apostle, but one of many. He became an apostle according to God's design for him, an idea that is repeated several times in his letters (cf. 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 2 Tim. 1:1). With the exception of the Gospel of John, the concept of God's will appears more in Ephesians than in any other book in the NT (Eph. 1:5, 9, 11; 5:17; 6:6). This concept refers not only to God's redemptive plan for humanity but also to His initiative, resolve, and active intervention in human history in bringing that plan to fruition in Christ (1:5, 9, 11). Because of what God has done for us, we are to serve Him and do His will from our hearts (6:6), and as we live the Christian life, our goal should be to grow in our understanding of His will (5:17). Therefore, by referring to his apostleship as being realized by the will of God, Paul points to a divine calling that benefits others. God's calling to every Christian is of this same nature. Paul called the Christians—meaning "saints" or "holy people"—in Ephesus "faithful" (v. 1). This description of believers only appears here and in Colossians (Col. 1:2) and is one of the parallels between the two epistles. By calling the Christians faithful in Christ Jesus, Paul was emphasizing that despite his absence, their faithfulness was to be grounded in their union with Christ. This is the kind of faithfulness that should characterize the life of every Christian.

1:3—3:21

The Church as the Community of the Redeemed

In this section, Paul lays a foundation for understanding the nature of the church of Christ. After highlighting all the spiritual blessings Christians receive in Christ (vv. 3–14), Paul offers a prayer on behalf of the church (vv. 15–23), discusses the conversion of Gentiles as a transition from death to life (2:1–10), and then proceeds to discuss the unity of the church in Christ (2:11–22) and his ministry among the Gentiles (3:1–13) before concluding with another prayer (3:14–21).

1:3–14. Spiritual Blessings in Christ. This section emphasizes the spiritual blessing we receive from God. In v. 3, Paul introduces the concept of blessing God and being blessed by Him using the adjective eulogētos ("blessed," "praised"), the verb eulogeō ("to bless," "to bestow blessing"), and the noun eulogia ("blessing," "gift"). In short, the reason for blessing God is that God has already blessed us abundantly in Christ (v. 3). The eleven appearances of the "in Christ" motif in this section indicate that the hope of humanity is not rooted in anything we can do for ourselves, but only in our union with Christ, who is the Son of God. Outside of Christ, all we have are sin, condemnation, and death.

Paul uses a singular noun, "blessing," with the adjective "every" to indicate that the blessing is one and yet many (v. 3). This overarching blessing is realized in the many blessings we receive in Christ. The first blessing is that before the world began, God chose us to be holy and blameless in Him (v. 4). Before Creation, God determined that our election to a holy and blameless life would occur only in Christ, who was chosen to be the sacrificial Lamb "without blemish" (1 Pet. 1:19). The second blessing is that our adoption as God's children is possible through Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:5; cf. Gal. 3:26). To those who believe in Him, He gives "the right to become children of God" (John 1:12; cf. Rom. 8:17). Our adoption through Christ is rooted in God's love (Eph. 1:4; cf. 1 John 3:1).

The third blessing is that en tō ēgapēmenō (in "the Beloved," in "the One He loves," meaning Christ), God has accepted us by His grace (v. 6). Grace is a prominent theme in Ephesians. Saving grace has been given and not earned (3:7–8; 4:7); by His grace we have been saved "through faith" in Christ (2:8). He has accepted us according to the riches of His grace that grants forgiveness of sins (1:7). It is by His grace (charis) that God gives us grace (charitoō). Grace is only from God and is bestowed on us in Christ. Thus, by receiving Christ, we receive God's grace; in Christ, we are in favor before God (Rom. 5:1–2).

In Christ, "we have redemption" through His blood (Eph. 1:7). This is the fourth spiritual blessing. He died once and for all as a sacrificial Lamb (Rom. 6:10). The references to redemption we can have through His blood and "the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. 1:7) suggest that we are redeemed or reclaimed from the power of sin and that it is possible through the sacrificial blood of Jesus (cf. Heb. 9:22). The plan of redemption is a mystery of God's will, hidden from the ages (Eph. 1:9; cf. 3:3–4, 9; 6:19), and is revealed in the fullness of time (cf. Gal. 4:4). It is a mystery, because it is only accessible to us through divine revelation. Even after the mystery has been revealed, God's love for sinners and Christ's sacrifice on the cross remain unfathomable.

Predestined

A superficial reading of Paul's remarks in Ephesians 1:5, 11, and Romans 8:28–29 and 9:9–16 has led some to the erroneous conclusion that God has arbitrarily predestined some individuals for salvation and others for damnation irrespective of their personal choice (see "Predestination," p. 1583).

First, this view not only distorts the words of Scripture but also gravely misrepresents the character of God (cf. John 3:16, 17; 1 John 4:8, 16). Scripture is clear. God desires that all would be saved (1 Tim. 2:4) and that no one would perish (2 Pet. 3:9). Second, here in Ephesians, Paul proclaims that before the world was created, God made provision for all sinners to be restored to divine favor and He predestined (Gr. proorizō, "to decide beforehand") that all who accept this provision will find salvation in Jesus Christ. Third, the idea that the course of a person's life is somehow fixed by fate is exactly the mindset Paul was confronting in the ancient world. Pagans believed that their lives were hopelessly predestined or predetermined by the stars and planets, which they regarded as gods. The announcement that God had acted to offer them a vastly different reality and future would have been very good news.

The fifth spiritual blessing is that in Christ we were chosen for an allotted inheritance (Gr. klēroō, either "appointed by lot" or "obtain an inheritance"; Eph. 1:11). The inheritance is first for the Jews (vv. 11, 12) and second for those who believe after hearing the message of the gospel: the Gentiles (v. 13). The past tense in v. 11 indicates that when God adopted us as His children, the inheritance was there for us. The inheritance is something that we, by the guaranteeing power of the Holy Spirit (v. 13), keep until the redemption of the possession (v. 14). It is through the work of the Spirit that we come to believe in Jesus after hearing the word of truth (v. 13). If the Spirit abides in our hearts, we have the guarantee of salvation (see 2 Cor. 1:22). It is in this sense that the Holy Spirit "seals" or marks us as God's. The redemption of the possession (Eph. 1:14) refers to the completion of the atonement for those who have been reclaimed. This inheritance is preserved by the guaranteeing power of the Spirit. Implicit in the text is the Second Coming of Jesus Christ (4:30; see Luke 21:28, 34). The many spiritual blessings flow from the one blessing of salvation in Christ.

This section of Ephesians describes the Triune God—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—working together for the salvation of humanity. God the Father bestowed on us His grace through His Son and adopted us as His children (Eph. 1:3–6). The Son shed His blood for us and made possible the redemption and forgiveness of sins (vv. 7, 11). The Holy Spirit seals those who believe and works to keep them in faith (v. 13). The fact that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit work together for the salvation of humanity demonstrates how important our salvation is to God. The gift of salvation is based on the character of God, love (1:4), and comes from the counsel of His will (v. 11).

The bestowal of the many divine blessings should lead us to praise Him—to acknowledge His power and glory. We praise Him for His grace (v. 6), for what He accomplished for us through His beloved Son (v. 6), and for the guaranteeing power of the Holy Spirit (v. 14). Although at the beginning of this section the praise and honor go only to the Father (v. 3), it is clear that the Son and the Spirit also deserve praise and honor. There is no better expression of gratitude for what the Triune God has done for us than praising His name.

1:15–23. Paul's Prayer. Paul informs the believers that he had been praying for them from prison. The prayer is based on the spiritual blessings they had received and on what Paul had heard about their faith in and love for the Lord (v. 15). He was praying for them before his letter reached them. The introductory words to the prayer, dia touto ("therefore," "for this reason"), indicate that Paul was building his prayer on the content of the previous section (vv. 3–14). Prayer and thanksgiving are to be offered for all the material and spiritual blessings we receive. Paul also emphasizes that he was praying unceasingly for them (v. 16; see Col. 1:3, 9; 1 Thess. 1:2, 3; 2 Thess. 2:13) and that the Ephesians should always pray for him as well (Eph. 6:18, 19), implying that church leaders should pray for believers and that believers should pray for them in turn. Believers praying for one another strengthens the unity of the church.

The prayer is a long sentence with only one request introduced by hina ("that," "so that"; v. 17): that God would give the Christians in Ephesus the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of God for the purpose of knowing Him better. What makes the prayer longer is the discussion of the result of receiving the Spirit of "wisdom" (v. 17). Paul asks God to give wisdom to the church so that they could increase their knowledge of Him (v. 17). Asking is one of the main components of a prayer (see Matt. 6:11; 7:7; 18:19; John 15:16). Paul ends the previous section by highlighting the role of the Spirit in salvation (Eph. 1:13–14), and here he asks for the Spirit of "wisdom and revelation" (v. 17), that is, the wisdom and revelation that come from the Spirit (cf. James 1:5). Indeed, the Spirit is the source of wisdom and knowledge (Is. 11:2; Acts 6:3, 10; 1 Cor. 2:4, 13; 12:8), and fortunately the heavenly Father gives the Spirit to those who ask Him (Luke 11:13).

In the previous section, Paul mentions the wisdom God gives to understand His grace (Eph. 1:8); here, he prays for God to give the members of the church the Spirit of "wisdom and revelation" (v. 17). The Christian's understanding of the grace of God is not simply the result of the wisdom given to him or her; it is gained through it being revealed by God. With wisdom and revelation, Christians may have a deeper knowledge of God (v. 17). Every believer needs to grow in his or her knowledge of God and His grace. This knowledge is specifically based on a deep commitment to Him and His will for us. The more we understand God and His grace, the stronger we become in Him.

The purpose of asking for the Spirit of wisdom is so that Christians may know three things: First, Christians may know the hope of God's calling (v. 18). Paul does not explicitly explain what he means by hope. In this epistle, he simply mentions that there is "one hope" (4:4), which is only for those who are in Christ (2:12). From the content of the previous section, we know that this is the hope of salvation. Second, Christians may know the riches of God's glorious inheritance among His people ("the saints," "holy people"; 1:18). This is the inheritance mentioned twice in the previous section (vv. 11, 14). Believers, who are the portion or inheritance that on this earth belongs to God, receive the riches of the inheritance (v. 18) from the riches of His grace (v. 7). Third, Christians may know the greatness of God's power for them (v. 19). This is the same power that raised Christ from the dead. After dying and returning to life, Christ was seated at the right hand of the Father in the heavenly places, exalted above all other rulers, powers, and domains (v. 21). It is this power of God that enables the followers of Christ to stand firm against the spiritual powers of darkness that seek to overcome them (see 6:10–13).

In this prayer, Paul introduces a new concept to his audience: Christ is the head of the church, which is His body (1:22–23). He is the head because salvation is made possible in Him. The church, Christ's body, is "the fullness" of the One who fills all things in every way (v. 23). The word plērōma ("fullness," "completeness") appears twelve times in the Pauline Epistles, but only in Ephesians and Colossians is it used to describe the fullness of Christ or of God (Eph. 1:23; 3:19; 4:13; Col. 1:19; 2:9). Despite this verbal parallel, there is a thematic difference between the two epistles in the use of the word. In Ephesians, the fullness of Christ or of God fills the church (Eph. 1:23; 3:19; 4:13). In Colossians, the fullness of God already dwells in Christ (Col. 1:19; 2:9). As noted earlier, Paul's emphasis in Colossians is on Christ, who reigns supreme over the cosmos (Christology). Paul's goal in Ephesians, however, is to underline the significant role the church plays in God's plan to redeem humanity (ecclesiology). Although Christ reigns over all the cosmos, it is the church and the church alone that is described as being His body (Eph. 1:22–23), which He rules and fills with all of His fullness. The fullness of Christ dwells in the church in the sense that He fills it with His Spirit, grace, and gifts.

Therefore, it is in the church that all of the saving benefits of Christ's work are effective. He is the sovereign Lord over both the church and the cosmos (1:10).

2:1–10. From Death to Life. In his prayer in the previous section, Paul asked that his audience might receive the Spirit of wisdom to know the power of God that raised Jesus from the dead (Eph. 1:20). Here, Paul emphasizes that the same power had made those who were once dead in trespasses and sins alive with Christ (2:1, 5). His arguments in this section can be divided into three parts: (1) dead in sin (vv. 1–3); (2) alive in Christ (vv. 4–7); and (3) the way of salvation (vv. 8–10). Parts 1 and 2 have parallels and contrasts; they both make the point that we were dead in sins (vv. 1, 5) and juxtapose being dead in sins with being alive in Christ. For Paul, life is a journey and we walk either in the way of Christ and life or in the way of sin and death (see below, "Walking in Christ as a Way of Life").

It is important to realize that in vv. 1–3, Paul is not merely describing the excessive sinful behavior of some excessively immoral pagans but is portraying the natural condition of all of humanity outside of Christ. It is a condition in which we all once lived (v. 3). The plural reference to sins provides a comprehensive account of the sinful behavior of humans. The word paraptōma ("trespasses," "transgressions") refers to a false step—a deliberate crossing of a known boundary. The word hamartia ("sins"), however, describes any action that falls short of a standard of right behavior. Together, these words encompass both the rebellious nature of human sin as well as the ways in which even the best of human behavior falls short of God's ideal. In this state of alienation from God and under the influence of evil powers, humanity is enslaved to the desires and lusts of the flesh and the mind (v. 3). As a consequence of our condition, Paul says we are by nature children of wrath, that is, we deserve God's divine judgment. The solution to this predicament is Christ, who, through His death on the cross, created a new way of life for believers.

After describing the hopelessness of being dead in sins (Eph. 2:1–3), Paul turns his attention to being alive in Christ (vv. 4–7). This passage contrasts two attitudes: wrath (v. 3) versus love and mercy (v. 4). God's love is emphasized using the noun agapē and the verb agapaō (v. 4). God loved us before we could love Him (cf. Rom. 5:8) and demonstrated it by giving His Son to die for us. This is what Paul calls grace (Eph. 2:5; cf. 1:6–7; 2:7–8). It is through this grace that God made us alive with Christ, even when we were dead in our trespasses and sins (v. 5). In other words, He did not wait for us to be sinless to save us (cf. Rom. 8:1–2). It was in our sinful condition that God granted us forgiveness. This is saving grace by faith in Christ (Eph. 2:8).

Walking in Christ as a Way of Life

The believers had once lived in sin (vv. 1–2). The verb used here, peripateō ("to walk," "conduct oneself"; v. 2), carries the connotation of walking on a certain path in a certain direction.

1. The Way of Life. Figuratively, this verb describes the Christian way of life. Paul contrasts walking in trespasses and sins (vv. 1–2) with walking in good works in Christ (v. 10). In chapter 4, he contrasts walking in God's calling (4:1) with walking in the ways of the Gentiles (v. 17). Then, in chapter 5, he repeatedly encourages Christians to walk (i.e., live) in "love" (5:2), "as children of light" (v. 8), and vigilantly (v. 15). Paul uses the same present imperative verb peripateite ("walk," "live") three times to call believers to remain in the way of life while contrasting the two ways of life. Jesus did the same. When He said to enter via "the narrow gate" (Matt. 7:13), He also highlighted the difference between the two ways: the broad way leads to destruction (Matt. 7:13) and the narrow way to life (Matt. 7:14). There are only two options, and we are encouraged to choose life.

2. The Way of Sin. Paul clarifies what it means to walk in trespasses and sins. Walking in sins means walking in the ways of the world (Eph. 2:2). The course or way of this world is driven by the lusts, evil desires, and cravings of the flesh (v. 3; cf. 1 John 2:16). Walking or living in sins also means to follow the ruler or prince of the kingdom or power of the air (Eph. 2:2). He is the spirit who works in those characterized by disobedience (lit. "sons of disobedience"; v. 2). There are two spirits: the Holy Spirit with whom we are sealed when we believe in Jesus (1:13; cf. 4:30) and who is the source of wisdom and revelation that allows believers to know God (1:17), and the spirit who works for disobedience (2:2)—the spirit who comes from the prince of the power of the air (v. 2). This prince appears to be the chief commander of all the evil spirits who work in the hearts of fallen humans to encourage the fulfillment of the lusts of the flesh.

3. The Two Ways in the Cosmic Conflict. Toward the end of Ephesians, Paul reemphasizes that the struggle of the Christians is against evil supernatural powers (6:12). This statement follows Paul's warning to the Christians to be aware of the tricks of the diabolos ("devil"). Thus, the devil is the prince of the evil spirits. This belief is in line with the apocalyptic narrative that states that the devil, or Satan, was cast out from heaven with a group of his supporting angels (Rev. 12:7–9). Paul wanted his audience to see the two ways of life in the context of the Great Controversy between good and evil, between Christ and Satan, between the Holy Spirit and the evil spirit. Christians are not controlled by the world or by the evil powers of the present age but are bound to heaven, waiting for the coming of Christ. They do not live according to the way of this world.

In this passage, three compound verbs with the prefix syn ("together with") appear: synezōopoiēsen ("He made alive together with"; v. 5), synēgeiren ("He raised up together with"; v. 6), and synekathisen ("he seated together with"; v. 6). God is the subject of the actions and Christ is the one we join (vv. 5–6). The idea is that without Christ we would not be made alive, would not be raised from our death in sins, and would not sit in heavenly places. Therefore, Christ is the guarantee, the manifestation, the executor, and the benefactor of God's grace (cf. Eph. 1:20; Rev. 3:21).

Ephesians continues, after contrasting death with life and destruction with salvation, by presenting the divine grace of salvation (Eph. 2:8–10), clarifying what it is and what it is not. First, it is by grace through faith, and not of ourselves (v. 8); and second, it is the gift of God and not of our works (v. 9). We are not the source of our salvation, and neither do we attain it through our good behavior. Instead, it is by God's grace alone; it is the gift of God. It comes from God's grace through faith. The role of faith should not be misunderstood. Our faith is not the source of our salvation—it is a divine gift that enables us to positively respond to the grace of God. This certainly excludes all boasting.

Notice that in Ephesians 2:1–10, Paul uses the active voice when speaking of how it is God or Christ who "made us alive" (v. 5), showed us great love (v. 4), "raised us up" (v. 6), and had us sit with Him (v. 6), that He "might show" His grace (v. 7). On the other hand, when salvation is associated with humans, the apostle uses the passive voice: "You have been saved" (vv. 5, 8). This indicates that God has the active role in salvation and that we receive it by faith. Salvation is possible because of the works of God and not because of our works. Paul uses the word ergon ("work," "deed," "action") twice in seemingly contradictory ways. On the one hand, he argues that salvation is not by ("from," "of") works (v. 9), but we are created for good works (v. 10). Although the verb "to create" could refer to the creation of human beings (Gen. 2:7), here the emphasis is on the new creation in Christ. This concept is present in the phrase "created in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:10). The phrase "in Christ," "in Christ Jesus," or "in Him" has been used many times thus far in this epistle to refer to what God has done in or through Christ for the salvation of humanity (1:3, 4, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 20; 2:5, 6, 7).

Therefore, the phrase "created in Christ . . . good works" refers to being saved in Christ for good works. It does not mean we do good works in order to be saved but because Christ has already saved us. Salvation comes first by God's grace through faith, and we who are saved in Christ will do good works as a response of love for what God has done for us (Gal. 5:6). Works are not the means of salvation but are the fruit of the Christian life. We are not saved by our good works (Eph. 2:9), but to do good works (v. 10). In fact, it is only those who are part of the new creation in Christ who are able to truly do good works (Rom. 8:3–4, 7–8; 2 Cor. 5:17). We are God's poiēma (Eph. 2:10), a term Paul uses to refer to the works of God at Creation (Rom. 1:20) and to His work in our salvation.

Therefore, just as creation is fully the work of God, so also is the salvation of human beings.

Paul closes this section by describing the way of the Christian life: walking or living in good works (Eph. 2:10). The verb peripateō ("to walk," "to conduct oneself") is used at the beginning (v. 2) and the end (v. 10) of the passage. Believers formerly walked or lived in sins and trespasses according to the way of the world (v. 2). After being saved by God in Christ, they walk or live in the way of good works, which are the fruit of our salvation, not the means.

2:11–22. One in Christ. While Ephesians 2:1–10 presents the vertical reconciliation between repentant sinners and God through Christ Jesus, this section emphasizes the horizontal reconciliation between the Jews and the Gentiles through Christ. Reconciliation with God should naturally be followed by reconciliation with fellow human beings. In vv. 1–10, Paul contrasts the way Christians lived before accepting Christ with their way of life after, and in vv. 11–22 he compares the relationship between Jews and Gentiles before and after they accepted Jesus. Notice the use of adverb of time pote ("used to," "once," "formerly," "previously") in vv. 2, 3, 11, and 13. His point is that Christ can transform our lives if we respond to God's grace by placing our faith in Christ.

The use of the present imperative "remember" in v. 11 indicates that Paul wanted his Gentile Christian audience to continuously remember their former and present lives and how God in Christ stepped in, bringing a dramatic change to their ways of life. He urged them to remember that they had once been (v. 11) Gentiles in the flesh, they had been referred to as uncircumcised, and that they had been separate from Christ (vv. 11–12). The Jews considered themselves the people God would save based on the covenant of circumcision. For them, the uncircumcised Gentiles had no hope; they could not enjoy the covenant promises. Gentiles were excluded from citizenship in Israel (v. 12), but God had plans for the Gentiles. God treated the house of Israel and strangers alike even in the OT (e.g., Lev. 17:8, 10, 13; 19:34). However, many Jews had mistakenly concluded that God's promises and covenant were exclusively for them. Instead, God had acted to provide a way of salvation for the Gentiles exclusively through Christ: by believing in Him (Eph. 2:13–19).

In vv. 13–19, Paul describes the condition of Gentile believers who were in Christ: They had been brought near (had access to God) by the blood of Christ, and both they and the Jews had been made one people (v. 15). The wall that had separated the two groups had been broken (v. 14) and there was no more enmity or hostility (vv. 15–16). They had access to the Father (v. 18) and were citizens and members of God's household (v. 19).

Gentiles and Jews alike are saved only through Christ. Paul always refers to Jews and Gentiles as "both" or "the two" in the context of being one in Christ (vv. 14–16, 18). This is how he explained to his audience that the church is one body. Through Christ, the faith of Israel is to reach the Gentile world; it has been universalized. Spread throughout the epistle is this emphasis on the oneness of the church as the body of Christ: "one body" (2:16; 4:4), "one Spirit" (2:18; 4:4), "one" human (2:15), "one hope" (4:4), "one Lord, one faith, one baptism" (4:5), "one God and Father" (4:6), and "one flesh" (5:31). The unity of the church is very dear to Jesus (John 17:21). At the center of this unity is Jesus Himself, who keeps the church together through the one message of salvation entrusted to it, the work of the Spirit, the sacrament of baptism, a new way of life for believers, and a common hope.

Christ's death brought the animosity between Jews and Gentiles to an end, cultivating peace through His blood (Eph. 2:13–15; cf. Rom. 5:1). The death of Jesus is described as having broken the wall of separation. This image is probably taken from the structure of the Jerusalem temple before its destruction in A.D. 70. It was forbidden for Gentiles to go further than the outer court of the temple (called the Court of the Gentiles), while the Jews could go into the inner court. Separating these two sections of the temple was a balustrade, a lattice fence made of stone, which, according to the Jewish historian Josephus, stood nearly six feet tall (1.8 m). Posted at various intervals along the wall were signs written in Greek and Latin warning Gentiles not to proceed further on pain of death. This literal wall symbolized the exclusiveness of salvation that was removed by Christ. The Gentiles who were once held far off had been brought near to God and could now enjoy salvation through Christ, the Messiah (2:13).

On account of what Christ had accomplished for humanity, Gentiles had become part of the household of God—the church (Eph. 2:19). In context, the phrase regarding members of God's household is parallel with the phrase

"fellow citizens" (v. 19)—God's people. Gentile Christians had become a part of the household of God's people. The term hagios (lit. "holy ones"; v. 19) itself refers to the followers of Christ (1:1; cf. 4:12). In the NT, Christians gathered for worship and fellowship in the homes of their fellow believers. Paul refers to these congregations and the individuals who hosted them throughout his letters. We learn, for example, about the "the household of Aristobulus" (Rom. 16:10), "the household of Narcissus" (Rom. 16:11), and the church in the house of Philemon (Philem. 1:1–2). We find cases in which a person was baptized along with his or her household, constituting a gathered group of believers in that particular house (e.g., Lydia and her household [Acts 16:15], "the household of Stephanas" [1 Cor. 1:16], the keeper of the prison in Philippi [Acts 16:31–34]). All believers are members of God's household (cf. Eph. 2:19; 1 Tim. 3:15). The church is God's, and Christ is its head. The church in Ephesus belonged neither to a Jewish nor a Gentile family but to God alone (Gal. 3:26–28). It is this concept of oneness in Christ that is reinforced by the reference to God's "household" (Eph. 2:19).

Paul uses a building metaphor to describe the church as the household of God (vv. 20–22). Its foundation is "the apostles and prophets" (v. 20), a phrase that is used again in Ephesians 3:5 in the context of the revelation that those making up the foundation had received from the Holy Spirit concerning Christ's work of salvation (vv. 3–5). This salvific message was preserved by the apostles and prophets in the Scriptures (cf. Rom. 1:2; 2 Pet. 1:20, 21). The apostolic teachings were indeed the foundation of the church and Christ the chief cornerstone, but the ultimate foundation of the church is Jesus Christ Himself (1 Cor. 3:11). The function of the apostles and the prophets was to lay the foundation. Paul presents Jesus as "the chief cornerstone" of the household of God (Eph. 2:20; cf. Matt. 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:6–7), because without that stone the foundation is not strong enough to support the building. In fact, He is the chief cornerstone that joins the whole building together (Eph. 2:21–22). In other words, in the absence of Christ, there can be no church. Thus far, three metaphors have been used to represent the church: the body of Christ (1:23), the household of God (2:19), and a holy temple or a dwelling place where God lives by the Spirit (cf. 2:21; 1 Cor. 3:9–17; 6:14–20; 1 Pet. 2:4–8). In the first two metaphors, Christ has the most important role: the head of the body and the chief cornerstone of the building. Just as there is no body without the head, so also is there no house without the foundation. Near the end of the letter, Paul also describes the church as being the bride of Christ (Eph. 5:23–27) and as an army combating evil (6:10–20).

Abolishing the Law of Commandments

The reference to the law that Paul said had been abolished or set aside (Eph. 2:15) does not mean that the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:1–17; Deut. 5:6–21) were done away with at the cross, as some have claimed. That can hardly be the case when, throughout his epistles, Paul calls on the followers of Jesus to live their lives in accordance with the Moral Law given on Mount Sinai (Ex. 20:1–17; Deut. 5:6–21). Out of gratitude for the salvation already given to them in Jesus, Christians are to honor their parents (cf. Eph. 6:1–3; Col. 3:20), avoid committing adultery (cf. Eph. 4:17–24; 5:3–5, 21–33; Rom. 13:9), refrain from stealing (cf. Eph. 4:28; Rom. 13:9; 1 Cor. 6:10), avoid bearing false witness (cf. Eph. 4:25; Rom. 13:9), and abstain from coveting (Eph. 5:5; Rom. 13:9; 1 Cor. 6:10; Col. 3:5).

The law of commandments Paul was discussing refers primarily to the ceremonial laws of the OT that found their fulfillment in Christ and were consequently brought to an end. It could also include the Pharisaical way in which the whole system of OT law had been used to create a complex set of rules and regulations—human traditions—that resulted in the erection of a serious barrier between Jews and Gentiles. It would then be that specific misuse of God's law and its ceremonial components that Christ brought to an end in His flesh, that is, through His life and death (cf. Matt. 5:17–19; Rom. 7:12, 14).

This section ends with two uses of the relative pronoun (2:21–22), introducing a parallel as follows:

v. 21	v. 22
A in whom/ him [the Cornerstone]	A in whom/ him [the Cornerstone]
B the whole building	B you also/ too
C fitted/ joined together	C are being built together
B′ Grows/rises into a holy temple	B′ a dwelling for God
A′ in the Lord	A′ in the/by his Spirit

These parallels suggest that the whole building united together in the Cornerstone is the church, the people of God. The uniting together of the people of God makes the church a holy temple—the place where God dwells. The chiastic structure of v. 21 suggests that the whole building (B) is a holy temple (B′), and the structure of v. 22 indicates that each church member (B) is a place for God to dwell (B′). The A and A′ of both verses suggest that the building may be united together only in Christ and the Spirit. Line C, the center of the structure, reemphasizes the result of abiding in Christ: the unity of the people of God. This unity is described by two verbs with the prepositional prefix syn ("together"): synarmologoumenē ("being joined together") and synoikodomeisthe ("be built together"). In both the previous section (Eph. 2:1–10) and here in vv. 20–22, Paul uses this kind of verb multiple times to emphasize the unity between believers and Christ (vv. 6–7).

3:1–13. Paul's Ministry to the Gentiles. This section begins with a prepositional phrase, "for this reason" (v. 1), linking this passage to the preceding one. After emphasizing that the Jews and the Gentiles had become one body in Christ Jesus, Paul describes himself as the prisoner of Christ Jesus for the sake of the Gentiles (v. 1; cf. Philem. 1:1, 9), to whom the mystery of Christ had been revealed—a mystery that specifically refers to the inclusion of the Gentiles in the inheritance of salvation in Christ (Eph. 3:6). The statement "for this reason I, Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus" (v. 1) lacks a verb. Perhaps the best solution would be to find the verb in v. 13, for after a long digression, Paul returns to what he had wanted to say in v. 1: as a prisoner of Christ, it was his wish that his troubles not discourage them or cause them to lose heart. The fact that he was the prisoner of Christ had something to do with encouraging his audience not to lose heart. In describing himself as a "prisoner of Christ" (v. 1), Paul refuses to see himself as a prisoner of Rome. The only reason he was imprisoned was because it was in some way part of God's plan. Later in his letter, Paul states that he was the "prisoner" of the Lord (Eph. 4:1; cf. Philem. 1:9). Paul maintained this same mentality even during his second Roman imprisonment, when he knew his death was imminent (2 Tim. 1:8). Being a servant of the Lord, he was confident that no matter what happened to him, it took place in the Lord—under the Lord's control. Thus, the Christians in Ephesus did not need to lose heart (Eph. 3:13).

During this imprisonment, Paul continued to be an ambassador of the gospel (6:20), for what had been considered an affliction had turned out to be for the advancement of the gospel message (Phil. 1:12). The whole palace guard and others had been introduced to Christ (Phil. 1:13), and his imprisonment had encouraged others to preach the gospel even more boldly (Phil. 1:14). The Lord turned what was intended for evil into a blessing for others (cf. Gen. 50:20). For this reason, Paul beseeches his fellow Christians not to be discouraged.

In this section, Paul also speaks of "the mystery," a term he introduced in Ephesians 1:9. Of the six uses in the Greek of the word mystērion ("mystery") in this epistle, three appear in this section (Eph. 3:3–4, 9). It is the mystery of Christ made known to Paul by revelation. Their union with Christ had made Jews and Gentiles fellow heirs, fellow members of the body, and fellow recipients of God's promise (v. 6). Thus far, Paul had emphasized eight things in which the Jews and the Gentiles were sharers in Christ. The first three are what both groups had experienced together with Christ: they were made alive together, raised up together, seated together (2:5–6). The next two indicate that they had been joined together and built together in Christ (vv. 21–22). The last three describe what they shared together in Christ: the status of being fellow heirs, fellow members of the body, and fellow recipients of God's promise (3:6). Therefore, the essence or nucleus of the mystery is Christ Himself.

It seems Paul uses two interchangeable terms to describe the mystery: unfathomable or incalculable riches of Christ (v. 8) and the manifold wisdom of God (v. 10). The phrase "riches of Christ" (v. 8) refers to all the gifts and benefits of salvation that God has made available to us through Christ. Obviously, the ultimate gift, the full richness, is Christ Himself. In the Septuagint, the adjective anexichniastos ("untraceable," "unsearchable," "incalculable") is used only to describe things God does (Job 5:9; 9:10). In the NT, Paul is the only author that uses this term, and he uses it consistently to describe the wisdom of God (Eph. 3:8; Rom. 11:33). The work of salvation through Christ reveals the wisdom of God, and we will never fully grasp its depth.

Looking back to his past, Paul describes himself as less than the least of all the saints (i.e., God's people; v. 8) and as "the least of the apostles" (1 Cor. 15:9). Jesus said that anyone who wants to be the greatest must be the least, the one who serves (Luke 22:26). Paul contrasts his self-described status as less than the least of the saints (Eph. 3:8) with the incalculable riches of Christ in an attempt to highlight that it was because of God's grace in Christ Jesus that he had been saved and called to be a minister of the gospel (vv. 6–7). Although the wisdom of God is incomprehensible, it had been revealed to Paul and he shared it with the church through his writings.

The task Paul was performing may be described as an "administration" or "dispensation." The Greek term oikonomia ("management of a household, task, work, responsibility") appears twice in this section: the oikonomia of God's grace (v. 2) and the oikonomia of the mystery (v. 9). This word also means "stewardship" (Luke 16:2–4), the management of a property entrusted to someone. The administrator is called an oikonomos ("manager," "steward," "treasurer"; Luke 12:42; 16:1, 3, 8). Paul says that he and his coworkers had been entrusted with "the mysteries" of God (1 Cor. 4:1). These mysteries had been hidden for ages before being revealed through Christ (Eph. 3:9). Paul not only enjoyed knowing "the mystery of Christ" (v. 4) but also the blessings of the mystery itself—he had been saved (vv. 7–8). He, as a good administrator of what he had received and enjoyed, was responsible for proclaiming it to all, particularly to the Gentiles. The mystery is, in fact, the gospel message of salvation in Christ.

This mystery was to be made known by the church to the rulers and authorities (v. 10), who were to a large extent influenced by the unseen wicked supernatural powers in the heavenly realms that opposed the church (6:12). The church is involved in a cosmic conflict between Christ and Satan. The revelation of the grace of God, the proclamation of the gospel, and the positive response of an individual to the grace of God are all attacks against evil powers. The book of Revelation describes how the church is involved in the controversy through the proclamation of the three angels' message to every nation, tribe, tongue, and people (Rev. 14:6). This implies the entrusting of "the mystery of Christ" (Eph. 3:4) not only to the apostles and the prophets but also to the church at large. All of us are stewards of the grace of God. The Godhead is involved in this task, for the mystery is made known by God the Father (3:2–3) through the Holy Spirit (v. 5) and is accomplished in Christ Jesus (v. 11). Paul's goal in this section was to encourage the Christians in Ephesus not to lose heart because of his tribulations (3:13). His imprisonment was a chapter in the cosmic conflict, and it was being used by the Lord for His own glory. Therefore, he encourages Christians to see tribulations from heaven's perspective.

3:14–21. Prayer for the Church. Appearing in the middle of this epistle is another prayer introduced by the phrase "for this reason" (v. 14), flowing from Paul's concern for the Ephesians not to lose heart. It is offered to the Father (cf. Matt. 6:9) in the name of Jesus Christ as Mediator on behalf of the church, which is a part of God's family in heaven and on earth. The Spirit is mentioned as being the church's source of power (Eph. 3:16). After Paul's petitions, the prayer closes with an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God and His glory (3:20–21; cf. Matt. 6:13).

There are three petitions in this prayer, each introduced by the conjunction hina ("that," "in order that"): (1) God would strengthen the believers' inner life through the power of the Spirit (Eph. 3:16), so that Christ would dwell in their hearts (v. 17); (2) they could comprehend the love of God that surpasses understanding (v. 18); and (3) they would be filled with the fullness of God (v. 19). These three requests are deeply interrelated. Paul was praying that believers be spiritually strengthened through the Spirit, who had revealed the mystery of God's grace to the prophets and the apostles. Paul wanted Christ to dwell in their hearts and be the center of their lives, for this would enable them to comprehend the love of God. Gaining knowledge of God's love means participating in His saving power; it is not only an intellectual apprehension of doctrinal knowledge. This type of divine knowledge brings us close to God.

With the Spirit in our hearts and an understanding of the love of God, we will be filled with the fullness of God (3:19), which most likely refers to the constant presence of God in the Christian life. This presence is mediated through Christ and made effective through the Spirit, and it grants believers the ability to reflect and proclaim the divine love that surpasses all knowledge.

Filled with the Spirit and with Jesus abiding in their hearts, Christians will grow into the completeness of God's love. Love is important in this intercessory prayer. The noun is used twice (vv. 17, 19), and Paul mentions the width, length, depth, and height of the concept between those two appearances (v. 18). This is the fullness of God that surpasses understanding. Paul emphasizes love throughout the epistle, writing on the love of Christ for the church (2:4; 5:25), the love among the saints (1:15), and the love between husband and wife (5:25, 28, 33). It is because of this agape ("love") of Christ that the church as a whole is united vertically with God and its members united horizontally with one another.

In the prayer, love is also presented as the soil and foundation of the Christian life; Paul discusses being grounded or established and rooted in love (3:17). The roots of the Christian experience are to dwell deep in the abundant love of God. Those whose lives are rooted in Christ's love will not only be able to endure the scorching rays of the sun (Matt. 13:6, 21; Mark 4:6, 17; Luke 8:13) but will also bear the fruit of the Spirit, for "the fruit of the Spirit is love" (Gal. 5:22). Love is also the foundation on which the Christian life is to be built. The verb Paul uses here is the same one Jesus used to describe the wise builder who built his house on bedrock (Matt. 7:25). Clearly, the only Christian journey that will withstand the storms and trials of life is the one grounded in the love of Jesus. Jesus is the rock of our faith (1 Cor. 10:4), and it is on that Rock that the church is built (Matt. 16:18).

4:1—6:20

Instructions to the Church in the World

Following these instructions on the concept of salvation and the nature of the church, Paul moves to specific instructions for the Christian life. These include topics such as the unity and the diversity of the church (Eph. 4:1–16), characteristics of the new person in Christ (4:17–32), walking in the light (5:1–21), manifestations of love (5:22–33), and Christian warfare (6:10–20).

4:1–16. The Unity and the Diversity of the Church. While on the one hand the church is united in Christ (vv. 1–6), on the other it is rich with the diversity of spiritual gifts (vv. 7–13). The church is strongly established and grows in Christ through both its unity and diversity (vv. 14–16). Paul introduces his exhortation with a pastoral appeal for Christians to walk or live a life worthy of their calling (v. 1). The appeal is grounded in their election and is a call to a holy life (1:4). Their way of life should correspond to the divine intention for them. Paul concentrates on the way believers should relate to each other as an introduction to his emphasis on the unity of the church. He urges them to be gentle, patiently "bearing with one another in love" (4:2). It is a call for believers to be kind, patient, and supportive of each other. They are to seek the unity of the Spirit in a "bond of peace" (v. 3), which is the result of the work of the Spirit that manifests itself in the church as peace and harmony. "The unity of the Spirit" (v. 3) could mean the unity in or by the Spirit. For Paul, there is one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father of all (vv. 4–6). The basis of the unity of the church is found in the unity of the Godhead.

Using the body as a metaphor for the church, Paul identifies church members as body parts, Christ as the head, and the gifted individuals identified in v. 11 as joints or ligaments that help unite the body (see particularly vv. 15–16; cf. Col. 2:18–19). He highlights that the unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God (Eph. 4:13) is the fundamental purpose for all the spiritual gifts. By one Spirit different gifts are bestowed to edify the one church, in order for it to be united in its knowledge of Christ. The unity of the church was of utmost importance to Jesus (cf. John 17:3, 21), and Paul offers a way to fulfill Jesus's prayer for the church. Before listing the different gifts, Paul emphasizes the foremost gift of God: His grace that was given as Christ apportioned or measured it to the Ephesians (Eph. 4:7). God's grace is given in the person of Jesus Christ, who Himself is the supreme gift. It is only by accepting the gift of Christ that a believer may receive spiritual gifts. The Spirit gave some the gifts required for apostleship, some those for prophesying, some those for evangelism, and some the gifts for pastoring and teaching (v. 11). Since the spiritual gifts stated here vary with those found in Romans 12:4–8 and 1 Corinthians 12:4–11, 27–30, each of these lists appears to offer examples of possible gifts rather than exhaustive lists.

The term apostolos ("apostle") literally refers to someone who is sent out with a message. In the NT, this term is used in two distinctive ways: First, it is used in a formal manner to refer solely to the twelve disciples Jesus appointed as His representatives and to whom He gave the authority to act in His name in founding the church (Luke 9:2, 10; cf. 17:5; 22:14; Acts 1:26; 2:37, 43; 4:33, 36; 5:12, 18, 29, 34, 40; 6:6). Although Paul was not originally a part of the Twelve, the risen Lord commissioned him with the same divine authority when He appeared to him on the Damascus road (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:1; 15:8). James, the brother of the Lord, also seems to have been included in this group, since the risen Christ appeared to him as well (1 Cor. 15:7; Gal. 1:19). Second, the word "apostle" is used by Paul to describe other believers whom he saw as "messengers" or "representatives" of the churches (2 Cor. 8:23; cf. Phil. 2:25). This group includes individuals such as Titus, Epaphroditus, and others who served the church as messengers of the gospel and who were tasked in establishing churches and encouraging believers in the faith (Acts 13:1–3; cf. 14:4, 14; 15:22, 27). In these cases, an apostle was like a missionary or a church planter. The different ways the word "apostle" is used in the NT indicate that while God sends out some individuals within the church to proclaim the message of salvation as gospel missionaries, they are not "apostles" in the technical sense of the word.

The gift of prophecy is the supernatural way in which God speaks to His people at specific times and for a particular purpose through the mouths of His prophets. This gift is not limited to the times during which the Bible was written; it is a permanent gift in the church. In the NT, there are references to prophets from Jerusalem and to others such as Agabus (Acts 11:27, 28; cf. 21:10), a prophet in Crete (Titus 1:12), some prophets in Antioch (Acts 13:1), and the four daughters of Philip (Acts 21:8, 9). In the end time, the gift of prophecy will also play a very important role. In fact, it is one the characteristics of the end-time remnant (Rev. 12:17; cf. 19:10).

The gift of evangelism refers to the proclamation of the gospel. This gift is obvious in the ministry of Philip, who was one of the Seven (Acts 6:5; 21:8). The role of the evangelist is related to preaching the word of God. The verb "to preach" appears frequently in descriptions of Philip's ministry with words such as kēryssō ("to proclaim," "make known," "preach"; Acts 8:5) and euangelizō ("to preach the good news"; Acts 8:12, 25, 35, 40). Paul uses one definite article for both pastors and teachers (Eph. 4:11), joining the two functions as one. This suggests that pastoring and teaching are two inseparable roles. A person with the gift of pastoring is usually talented in the realm of teaching as well. One task of pastoral work is to keep the believers from false teachings by instructing them in the truth (Acts 20:28–30).

The long sentence of Ephesians 4:11–16 presents the different purposes of the spiritual gifts. First, it is stated that the purpose of the gifts is for (Gr. pros) the equipping of the saints (God's people) for (Gr. eis) the work of serving in ministry as well as for (Gr. eis) the edifying or building up of the body of Christ (Eph. 4:12). Paul uses two different prepositions to describe the purpose: pros ("toward," "for the purpose of") and eis ("into," "to"). The first preposition introduces the basic purpose, the equipping of God's people, while the second preposition indicates what is expected from those so equipped: to serve in the work of ministry for the edifying or building up of the body of Christ. The pastor is to train church members so that they are prepared to serve in ministry. Spiritual gifts are not for personal interest or benefit but are for the benefit of the body of Christ. Consequently, every member of the body should be ready to serve.

The preposition "until" or "till" suggests that the work of equipping should be an unceasing effort made by the church until it attains unity of faith and has grown into the fullness of Christ (v. 13). The members of the church are to continuously help one another grow spiritually and in the knowledge of the Lord. In fact, this is the end result of the utilization of the gifts: to grow in all things or every respect into the Head, which is Christ (v. 15). In this section, Paul uses the adjective "all," or "every," twice. He emphasizes first that all believers will grow into the fullness of Christ (v. 13) and second that they would grow in all or every way into Christ (v. 15). Therefore, the spiritual gifts are given to equip the members of the church for the work of ministry and the fortification of the body of Christ (v. 16; cf. Joel 2:28–31).

4:17–32. Do Not Live as Gentiles. This section contrasts a Gentile pattern of life (Eph. 4:17–19, 22) with the Christ-inspired pattern (vv. 20–21, 23–32). The Gentiles' way of life was a result of their ignorance of the truth. Their way revealed a darkened understanding of God, a blindness regarding Him, and alienation from Him (v. 18). This was the condition of Gentile Christians before they came to Christ. From this point onward, they were expected to live a holy life (v. 24), to speak the truth, and to do good things (vv. 25–29).

Using the imagery of a change of clothing, Paul exhorts believers to put off (v. 22) the old pattern of life and put on (v. 24) the new Christ-inspired one (cf. Rom. 6:1–14; 13:12; Col. 3:9–14). The contrast is between the old person living a corrupt life (Eph. 4:22) and the new person re-created in true righteousness and holiness (v. 24) that reflects the image of God. Thus, the purpose of redemption and salvation is the restoration of God's image in fallen humanity. It is important to note that Paul's counsel suggests that this transformation does not happen instantly but is a process in which believers reflect God's character more and more as they continue to learn (v. 21).

Since the Holy Spirit is the One who transforms a person, Paul admonishes the Christians not to grieve the Holy Spirit of God (v. 30). When the Spirit is allowed to work in the heart, believers utilize their spiritual gifts to build up the church and to produce the fruit of the Spirit in their own lives. When such transformation does not happen, the Spirit is grieved (lypeō, "to become sad," "to offend," "to insult"). Paul stresses the importance of the Spirit in the Christian life by mentioning one of His important functions: the sealing of believers for the day of redemption (v. 30). This sealing means that they already belong to the Lord, and this will be clearly manifested in the day when their redemption will be consummated: at the Second Coming of Christ (v. 4).

Ephesians 4 presents the active participation of the Triune God in equipping believers with the spiritual gifts and the fruit of the Spirit. Paul mentions "one Spirit" (v. 4), "one Lord" (v. 5), and "one God" (v. 6), and then he continues to emphasize God as "Father" (v. 6), Christ as "the Son of God" (v. 13), and the Spirit as "the Holy Spirit of God" (v. 30). This is a unique presentation of the Godhead as the Members are listed twice in a chiastic structure: one Spirit—one Lord—one God—the Father—the Son of God—the Holy Spirit of God. This is the only place in the epistle where the titles "the Son of God" and "the Holy Spirit of God" are found. In fact, this is the only place in the whole Bible where the latter title is used. Within the church, two of the functions of the Godhead are to equip believers with spiritual gifts and to help them produce the fruits of the Spirit in their own lives.

5:1–21. Walk in Love as Children of Light. In the previous section, Paul presents the contrasting realities of the "old" and the "new" person in Christ. Here, he presents another pair of contrasting realities: walking or living in the darkness versus walking or living in the light (5:8; see "Walking in Christ as a Way of Life," p. 1712). In the NT, darkness is associated with dwelling outside God's kingdom (Matt. 8:12; 22:13; 25:30), the world (John 12:46), death (Luke 1:79; John 1:4, 5; 8:12), the works of Satan (Luke 22:53; Acts 26:18), and sins and evil deeds (John 3:19). However, light is associated with Christ and life (John 1:4; 8:12), the gospel and the truth (Acts 26:23; 2 Cor. 4:4; 2 Tim. 1:10), and good works (Matt. 5:16).

As a result of the work of the Spirit, believers are called to be followers or imitators of God and to walk or live as Christ did (Eph. 5:1–2). In imitating Christ, we also imitate God, who forgave us in Christ (4:32). Christ is the supreme example of love because He gave Himself as a sacrifice that was acceptable to the Father, and therefore Christ made us acceptable in Himself (see Lev. 1:9). This is atonement through sacrifice as a manifestation of divine love. We imitate Christ when we walk in love, a topic that will be further developed later in the epistle (Eph. 5:25, 28, 33; 6:24). Of all the deeds of darkness, Paul emphasizes three that should not even be mentioned among the saints: porneia (any type of illegitimate sexual acts, including fornication), akatharsia (all types of moral corruption, uncleanness, or impurity), and pleonexia (covetousness, greediness, avarice). In 5:5, the doers of these deeds are called pornos, meaning sexually immoral people (including fornicators), akathartos, meaning unclean or impure persons, and pleonektēs, meaning covetous or greedy people who are idolaters and who will have no inheritance in the kingdom of God (v. 5; cf. 1 Cor. 6:9–10; Rev. 21:8, 23; 22:15). Paul also mentions other evil deeds that damage not only our spiritual life but also our peaceful coexistence with others in the church. In contrast to those who embrace these practices, Paul encourages believers to live with a heart full of gratitude to God and to others (Eph. 5:4). Believers are not to be associated with the evil deeds of the children of wrath (v. 7) but with the promises of God (3:6). There is a clear border between good and evil and light and darkness, and we are called to live in the light of salvation.

It is the responsibility of the children of light to bring that light to the darkness and to abolish the deeds of darkness—a missiological task (5:11–13). The purpose of this task is to bring those who are in darkness to the light (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9). This movement from darkness to light is described metaphorically as being awakened from sleep or being resurrected from the dead (Eph. 5:14), which is another way of speaking about the new birth or creation of the new person through Christ and implies repentance and conversion.

Paul proceeds to highlight the implications of the movement from darkness to light (vv. 15–17). Believers are to carefully watch their way of life (v. 15), which is described using a contrasting statement: they are not to be fools but wise. To be wise is explained as understanding what the Lord's will is for us (v. 17). Paul admonishes believers to make the most of their time and their opportunities, so that they can redeem that time. The Greek here reads, literally, "to buy out the time" (v. 16), a phrase that is borrowed from the marketplace (see also Col. 4:5). Like bargain hunters during a brief sale that offers large discounts, Paul urges us to use our time wisely, taking advantage of the opportunities available to us as much as possible, because we are living in evil days. Those who walk in light are to be filled with the Spirit (Eph. 5:18), which in practical terms means speaking to one another in psalms, singing, making melodies (v. 19), and giving thanks for everything (v. 20). The Christian life should be a joyful life filled with constant gratitude. As Paul closes this section and introduces the following one, he commands God's people to submit to each other because of their reverence for God and Christ (v. 21).

5:22—6:9. Christ-Oriented Life in the Christian Household. The phrase about submitting "to one another" (5:21) in the previous section serves as an introduction to this one. In this section, three groups are called to mutual submission: (1) wives and husbands (vv. 22–33); (2) children and parents (6:1–4); and (3) bondservants and masters (vv. 5–9). The verbs "to submit" and "to obey" are not applied to husbands, parents, and masters, which raises a question regarding the meaning of the reciprocal pronoun allēlōn ("one another"; v. 21; see v. 33) in the context of this section. This question may be answered by looking at the three mutual relationships (see below, "Ancient Household Codes").

1. Wives and Husbands. Although most English versions have the verb "submit" or "be subject" in Ephesians 5:22, there is no verb in the Greek text. However, it is clear that it is to be supplied from v. 21. Paul begins with exhorting the wife to submit to her husband as to the Lord. The submission is expected, but Paul restricts it to the marriage relationship and grounds it in the submission of the wife to the Lord. The wife

Ancient Household Codes

It was not uncommon for ancient authors, both in and outside the NT, to compose lists of rules to regulate social behavior, particularly for how members of the family or "households" were to treat each other (for NT examples, see Col. 3:18—4:1; 1 Tim. 6:1–2; Titus 2:1–10; 1 Pet. 2:18—3:7).

1. Household Codes in Roman Society. In the Roman world, the paterfamilias (father of the family) had, in principle, full authority and control over all the members of his household, including not only members of his immediate family but also members of his extended household, that is, slaves, servants, laborers, tenants, and even freedmen. In non-Christian examples, the focus of the household code was always on how the various members of the household were to act toward the paterfamilias. While the paterfamilias was expected to provide for the welfare of his household, little if anything was usually said about the way he should treat them—except for advocating the use of harsh treatment to ensure the protection of his honor.

2. Paul's Household Codes. While Paul acknowledges the social structures of his time, he advocates filling and transforming those relationships with the values of the gospel. Motivated by their commitment to Christ, wives, children, and slaves were to offer the appropriate submission and obedience. At the same time, husbands, fathers, and slave owners were not to misuse their authority but to put aside threatening and to deal tenderly with those in their care.

submits to the husband as a Christian woman submits to the Lord along with all believers in the church. Paul gives a reason for the submission: the husband is the head of the wife. This idea goes back to Genesis 3:16, but Paul does not explicitly refer to it. He uses the lordship of Christ over the church as his model for establishing the relationship between husbands and wives: Christ is the head of the church, and as such, He saved the church. The emphasis is not on the authority of Christ over the church but on what He did for the church, an idea that controls the discussion. The conclusion is clear: since the church is subject to Christ, so wives should be to their husbands in everything (v. 24), meaning in everything that is comparable to their submission to Christ as head of the church. Verses 22–24 form a nice literary structure:

A Wives submit to your husbands (v. 22a)
  B as to the Lord (vv. 22b)
    C Husband is the head of the wife (v. 23a)
    C′ Christ is the head of the church (v. 23bc)
  B′ The church is subject to Christ (v. 24a)
A′ Wives be subject to their own husbands (v. 24b)

The structure reveals that the subjection of wives to their husbands flows from a Christological perspective that provides a Christian basis for the submission; the model for the submission of wives to husbands is the submission of the church to Christ. Paul does not identify specific ways in which the wife is to submit to her husband.

Paul then addresses the husbands, admonishing them to love their wives. This is not a call to exercise authority as head of the wife. Paul redefines the exercise of headship in terms of Christ's love for the church; He exercised His headship over the church by loving her, and this love was manifested in His sacrificial death on her behalf. He did this exclusively for her own benefit, to make her holy (sanctify her), cleanse her by washing with water (a reference to baptism) by the word (probably a reference to the gospel; v. 26). His intention was to present her to Himself as a glorious bride without spot or wrinkle; holy and blameless without blemish (v. 27). The discussion on marriage led to a discussion of what Christ accomplished for His church as an expression of His love for her.

After describing the meaning of the headship of Christ over the church, Paul returns to the responsibility of the husbands as heads of the wives: so husbands ought to love their own wives as their own bodies (v. 28). The "so" (or "in the same way") grounds this imperative in the love of Christ for His church, but by referring to the wives as "their own bodies," Paul introduces a new idea that helps him strengthen the imperative to love them: a husband who loves his wife also loves himself, because no one ever hates his own body or flesh. This is an argument from common sense but is based on the oneness and unity of the couple as stated in Genesis 2:24. In marriage, the husband and the wife are one. Paul applies it here to Christian marriage, saying that instead of hating his flesh, the husband nurtures and cherishes his body just as Christ does the church (v. 29). According to Paul, this is the function of the husband as head of the wife and of Christ as head of the church. Christ continues to be the model for headship at home. The oneness and unity of the husband and the wife is grounded in Genesis, and Paul uses it to provide a Christological view of headship for those who are a part of Christ's church in a world of sin.

Paul concludes by stating that what he had just discussed is a profoundly great mystery, which he then clarifies as being the mystery of Christ and the church (v. 32), that is, the unity of the Lord and His church. The chapter concludes with Paul finally summarizing his discussion on husbands and wives: husbands should love their wives as themselves, and wives should respect (phobeō, "to fear," "to show respect") their husbands (v. 33). Here, to submit to the husband means to respect him. We can speak of the mutual submission of the wife and the husband (see 5:21) if submission is understood as the wife respecting her husband and the husband loving his wife.

2. Children and Parents. The second mutual relationship that is presented in this section is the one between children and parents. Paul states that children should obey their parents in the Lord, or as they would obey the Lord (6:1). He uses the word teknon ("children"), five times in Ephesians (2:3; 5:1, 8; 6:1, 4). Besides relating it to the verb "to obey" (6:1–4), he connects it with the verb "to walk" ("to conduct oneself"; 2:2–3; 5:1–2, 8). The life of a child is described as walking on a path with rules to obey and with someone to follow or imitate. This is the reason Paul uses the verb "to obey" in describing the duty of children (6:1). The verb hypakouō means listening with a willingness to follow what is said. Although the parents are to be obeyed, they need to live an exemplary life. Therefore, children's obedience to their parents should be "in the Lord," meaning children should obey or imitate their parents as they obey or imitate the Lord (6:1). This is the right thing to do, which Paul demonstrates by quoting the fifth commandment of the Decalogue: "Honor your father and mother" (6:2; cf. Ex. 20:12). It is right, because it is what the law requires, but there is a further motivation expressed when Paul notes that this was the first commandment given with a promise. There is a special blessing for those who honor their parents: they will enjoy a long life.

Paul proceeds to describe the responsibilities of parents. He first describes what they should not do: fathers should not exasperate their children, provoking them to anger (Eph. 6:4). "Father" represents both parents and thus the mother is included. Parents should treat the children in a way that fosters their children's love toward them and does not stimulate anger toward them, which unmistakably excludes verbal or physical abuse. Moving to what they should do, Paul says parents are to rear their children in the discipline and instruction of the Lord (v. 4). The rearing of children is to be done in a loving and caring way. The parents are to educate and instruct them on proper conduct based on God's purpose for them and on Christian values. The mutual submission consists in the fulfillment of their respective duties.

3. Servants and Masters. The last advice on interpersonal relationships concerns masters and their servants (6:5–9). Slavery was common in Greco-Roman society. In Galatians, Paul says that in Christ there is "neither slave nor free" (Gal. 3:28), but society had not yet arrived at this conclusion; therefore, he provides relational instructions for slaves and masters. Although from the human perspective slaves have human masters, Paul says slaves are to be as Christians are slaves of Christ (Eph. 6:6); in other words, their obedience to the human masters is to be with a sincere heart, as they would obey Christ (v. 5). They are to seek to please God and not merely their human masters (6:6–7), for the Lord, not their masters, would truly reward them (6:8). Both masters and slaves belong to Christ through redemption (1:14), and the fear of the Lord should determine how they relate to each other (v. 5; cf. 5:21).

The masters are to realize that before the Lord, they and their slaves have the same Master in heaven (v. 9), and He does not recognize the social distinction between slaves and masters; there is no favoritism or partiality with Him. Social equality is firmly established on God's will for humanity. Paul specifically mentions that masters are not to threaten their slaves. Threats and punishments were inseparable in disciplining slaves, but Paul says that this should not be the case among Christians. He promotes a relationship in which slaves obey the master out of respect for the Lord and masters treat slaves with the respect and dignity that exclude verbal abuse and physical discipline. This is a way of expressing mutual submission. Love and respect are to be the ruling principle even in the relationship between master and servant.

6:10–20. The Church's War against Evil. This concluding section makes explicit that Christians are involved in a cosmic conflict and that it is necessary for them to be strong in the Lord and in the vastness of His mighty power. The idea of a conflict appears previously in Ephesians in such contrasts as works versus grace (2:8–10), far versus near (2:17), foreigners versus citizens (2:19), old person versus new person (4:22, 24), darkness versus light (5:8) fruit of the Spirit versus unfruitful works (5:9–10), and being filled with wine versus being filled with the Spirit (5:18). This war is not against flesh and blood, that is, against mere human beings (cf. 1 Cor. 15:50; Gal. 1:16); it is against the rulers of darkness (Eph. 6:12), including the devil himself (6:11). Satan is working through many methodeia ("trickery," "tricks," "tactics," "wiles," "schemes"; 6:11) to try to overcome God's people. Paul refers to false doctrines as the result of the human trickery in the cunning craftiness (methodeia) of deceitful schemes (4:14). Adam and Eve were "tricked," so to speak, by the enemy through his lies (Gen. 2:16–17; 3:1–6). Jesus Himself labeled Satan as a liar and the father of lies (John 8:44).

However, Christians can overcome this spiritual enemy by putting on the full armor of God (Eph. 6:11). The verb "to put on" conveys the idea of taking off the old clothes and permanently wearing the new ones (see Eph. 4:22–24; Rom. 13:12; 1 Cor. 15:53–54). So important is the armor of God that Paul gives his counsel twice (6:11, 13), and between each instance is the description of the enemy. This repetition suggests that the only way to stand strong against the enemy is by putting on the armor of God, which includes seven military devices.

The girded waist indicates a readiness to do a task (v. 14; cf. 2 Kin. 4:29; 9:1; Nah. 2:1). By wearing the belt of truth, Christians are ready to fight against the enemy. This is the truth of the gospel that has transformed the lives of believers (Eph. 1:13; 4:15, 25) and that reveals Jesus as the truth (John 14:6).

A soldier of Christ should also be equipped with the breastplate of righteousness (Eph. 6:14) and the helmet of salvation (v. 17), which cover and protect the head and the heart during battle (cf. 1 Sam. 17:38). Only Jesus can protect us in this spiritual warfare. He is our righteousness (Rom. 5:17) and our salvation (Acts 4:12; 1 Thess. 5:9). It is by His blood that the end-time saints can overcome Satan (Rev. 12:10–11). Another crucial piece of gear in the spiritual battle is the feet shod with readiness for the gospel of peace (Eph. 6:15). Christians should be prepared to proclaim the gospel that is peace or that brings peace (Is. 52:7). Active involvement in the proclamation of the gospel is a weapon against Satan. Another device is the shield of faith (Eph. 6:16), which is a large shield that protects believers from anything the enemy might throw at them. Faith is total trust in the Lord under the most difficult circumstances they can face. To take up the shield of faith is to recognize that God is reliable—that He is our refuge.

The different elements of the armor listed so far are for defense and protection, but there is one device designed for attack: the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God (v. 17). The Scriptures, inspired by the Spirit (2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20–21), have proven to be an effective weapon against Satan. Jesus overcame the enemy in the wilderness through the use of God's word (Matt. 4:1–11). In our spiritual battle, we hold with one hand the shield of faith and with the other the sword of the Spirit. It is the Spirit who makes the word effective in the human heart. Faith and the word of God are inseparable, because faith comes by hearing the word of God (Rom. 10:17). The last device is prayer, which is presented without a militaristic analogy. In fact, this is a device that is invisible and untouchable by the enemy. It has been literally used by the soldiers of God's people (1 Kin. 8:44; 2 Chr. 6:34) and can be used at any time and in any circumstance. It puts us in touch with our supreme military leader, Jesus Christ, who empowers us with His power (Eph. 6:10). Paul asks the Christians to pray for themselves, for other people, and for him (vv. 18–19). In the earlier part of the epistle, he mentions three times his praying for the Christians in Ephesus that they would be strengthened by the Spirit (3:16), that they would understand the love of Christ (3:19), and that they would be filled with the fullness of God (v. 19). Here, he wants the audience to pray for him, so that he might be able to boldly make known the mystery of the gospel (v. 19). He was telling his audience that even though he was a prisoner, he was remaining an ambassador of Christ and of the gospel. Intercessory prayer is important in the cosmic conflict in which we are all involved.

Concluding Instructions and Greetings

Paul concludes his letter by commending Tychicus, whom he was to send to the church with a report of how he was doing (v. 21). Tychicus had been a faithful minister or servant (v. 21) from Asia (probably Ephesus) who joined Paul during his third missionary journey (Acts 20:4). When Paul requested that Titus leave Crete to go to Nicopolis, Tychicus was sent to replace him (Titus 3:12), and when Paul called Timothy to meet him in Rome, he sent Tychicus to replace Timothy in Ephesus (2 Tim. 4:12). In fact, Tychicus was the one Paul sent to strengthen the faith of the churches in Ephesus and Colossae (cf. Col. 4:7). He was indeed a faithful minister.

Finally, Paul closes the epistle with a benediction that brings together peace, love, faith, and grace and that identifies God and Christ as their sources. He underlines the importance of love by using both the noun agapē ("love") and the verb agapaō ("to love"; Eph. 6:23–24). He reemphasizes the importance of the love of Christ for His church, the love of the church for Christ, and the love of Christians for one another. An additional word Paul uses that is unique to this benediction is aphtharsia ("imperishability," "immortality"; v. 24). Of its eleven appearances in the Pauline Epistles, he uses this word six times to describe the blessed hope of the resurrection at the Second Coming (1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 52, 53, 54; 2 Tim. 1:10). It could be that in this benediction Paul was asking that God's grace be with all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ "in immortality" (Eph. 6:24), that is to say, in anticipation of being invested with immortality at the coming of Christ. If this is the case, Paul was ending the letter on a note of hope.

PHILIPPIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Like most of the epistles of the NT, the letter to the Philippians had no title when it was first written. A title was unnecessary because the introduction to the letter unambiguously states that it was addressed to the Christians in Philippi, Macedonia (1:1; cf. Acts 16:12), the first church among the many Paul founded in Europe. The earliest title associated with the letter was simply "To the Philippians." It was later expanded to include Paul's name as well as other scribal assumptions about the origins of the letter, one of the most common being "To the Philippians written from Rome through Epaphroditus."

With few exceptions, Paul has always been acknowledged as the author of Philippians. Although he mentioned Timothy as coauthor, he used the first-person singular throughout his letter (e.g., 1:3–4, 7–9, 30; 2:2, 16–20; 3:1, 4; 4:1–4) and tended to distinguish himself from Timothy as the author (2:19–24). The picture of Paul portrayed in the epistle coincides with what is found in his other letters. Paul spoke about his incarceration (1:12–14), expressed his personal and innermost feelings (1:15–24), mentioned coworkers (2:19–24), shared information about his life (3:5–11), and mentioned the assistance the Philippians provided him (4:15–16; cf. 2 Cor. 8:1–5).

Date. There is no doubt that this epistle was written while Paul was imprisoned (1:7, 12–14), although the letter does not identify the place of incarceration. References such as "the whole palace guard" (1:13; lit. "praetorian guard," a detachment of soldiers assigned to the emperor) and to members of "Caesar's household" (4:22) have led most interpreters to conclude that it was most likely written during his first imprisonment in Rome sometime between A.D. 61 and 62 (cf. 1:19–24; 2:24; Acts 28:16, 30–31). Due to the large distance between Philippi and Rome and the time it would have taken for Timothy and Epaphroditus to travel back and forth between the two cities, other scholars have more recently suggested that Paul must have written his letter from a closer city during another imprisonment, perhaps connected to his ministry in Ephesus (Acts 19; A.D. 54–57), his imprisonment in Caesarea (Acts 23:33–35; 24:22–27; A.D. 58–60), or, as has been less commonly suggested, from Corinth (Acts 18:1–17; A.D. 50). While the basic argument makes sense, there is little evidence to support it. There is no record that Paul was imprisoned in either Ephesus or Corinth, and while he was imprisoned in Caesarea for two years, the distance between Caesarea and Philippi is also considerable. For these reasons, this commentary will assume that Paul wrote to the Philippians from Rome between A.D. 61 and 62.

Backgrounds. In ancient times, Philippi was a small village called Krenides, but in 358–357 B.C., Philip II, king of Macedonia and Olympias and father of Alexander the Great, conquered the village and renamed it after himself. The city quickly became one of the most important cities of Macedonia (Acts 16:12). After the combined forces of Mark Antony and Octavian defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi, retired Roman soldiers often settled in the city, which led to Rome granting it the privileged status of a Roman colony. This designation allowed Philippi to enjoy a certain degree of autonomy regarding the provincial government and the right to rule over civil issues and mint its own coins.

Philippi was an important commercial and military urban center in Macedonia. This was largely due to its strategic location along the Via Egnatia, the main Roman road that stretched from Rome in the west to Byzantium in the east. It was a main thoroughfare for Roman legions traveling across Macedonia, and it served as an intense trading route near Neapolis, the harbor town of Philippi, currently Kavalla, which favored the personal and commercial interest of many people from other regions of the empire.

The city was characterized by wide religious diversity. Egyptian, Roman, and Greek gods were worshiped beside those of the native Thracian religion. Among others, gods such as Silvanus, Isis, Serapis, Apollo, Asclepius, Men, and the great mother-goddess Cybele were worshiped. Due to its heterogeneous population, Philippi had imperial, aboriginal (Thracian), Italian, Anatolian, Syrian, Egyptian, and Greek cults. The city also had a small Jewish community. The absence of a regular synagogue service, evident in the fact that Paul had to find an informal meeting of women gathered at a river for prayer on the Sabbath, suggests Judaism had at best a modest role in the community.

The rise of the Christian community in Philippi occurred between A.D. 49 and 52, when Paul and Silas arrived in Macedonia during Paul's second missionary trip. The decision to travel from Asia Minor to the continent of Europe had been made in response to a vision Paul received while he was in Troas, which urged him to journey to Macedonia (see commentary on Acts 15:36—18:22). Philippi was the first city Paul visited. With a population of only five thousand to ten thousand inhabitants, it was not particularly large—at least in comparison to leading cities such as Antioch or Jerusalem (Acts 16:12).

According to the book of Acts, Paul's ministry in Philippi began on a positive note with the conversion of Lydia, a businesswoman from Thyatira, and her household (Acts 16:12–15). Shortly thereafter, the situation became more difficult as Paul and Silas were arrested, beaten, and thrown into prison (Acts 16:16–24). God, however, turned what appeared to have been a great defeat into an opportunity for the proclamation of the gospel, as the two men were miraculously released and the jailer and his household were brought to faith in Jesus (Acts 16:25–34). After their release, Paul and Silas left the city. Luke, however, one of Paul's traveling companions, remained in the city to encourage the new believers in Paul's absence. He seems to have remained in Philippi for several years, since we do not hear from Luke again in Acts until Paul's return to Philippi about six years later (Acts 20:6). Nevertheless, the bond formed between Paul and the Philippians was so strong that the church provided their beloved apostle with financial assistance from time to time in order to care for his needs (Phil. 4:15–16).

Paul's letter to the Philippians was written some ten years after his initial visit to the city. The letter indicates that when Paul wrote it, there were adversaries threatening the church in Philippi. Paul referred to them as "enemies of the cross of Christ" (3:18–19; cf. 1:28; 3:2) and regarded them as perverting the Christian message. Unfortunately, determining the exact identity of these opponents is difficult. It is hard to know whether Paul had one specific group in mind or if he envisioned a variety of adversaries. And just who were these individuals? Should we envision them as unbelieving Jews, Christian Judaizers, or other Gentile Christians? And were they advocating a legalistic theology, a form of antinomianism, or perhaps some kind of pre-Gnostic doctrine? While a definitive answer to these questions is elusive, the references to Jewish practices make it virtually certain that either Jews or Judaizers were involved in some way.

Theology and Purpose. The Philippians had joined Paul in advancing the gospel and were a constant source of friendship and financial support to his ministry (1:5, 15–18). Therefore, Paul wrote the letter to thank and comfort them regarding his own situation as a prisoner (1:12–14) and to inform them about his plans for the future (2:19–30). Joy seems to be a significant topic, because in this letter the Greek word for "joy" appears five times (1:4, 25; 2:2, 29; 4:1) and the Greek verb for "rejoice" appears eleven times (twice in 1:18; 2:17, 18; 4:4; once in 2:18, 28; 3:1; 4:10). For this reason, the letter has been called Paul's hymn of joy, the central command of which may be defined as "rejoice in the Lord always" (4:4). Within the framework of this command, Philippians reveals a set of convictions or ideas that give some structural organization to Paul's theological statements, requests, and arguments.

1. God. The occasional theological statements found in the epistle place great emphasis on God (2:6–11; 3:3, 9, 13–14; 20–21; 4:19). He offers righteousness, salvation, and peace in Christ (1:11, 28–29; 2:6–11; 3:8–16, 20–21; 4:6–7, 9) and originates the community of God's holy people in Christ Jesus (1:1; 4:21), who are the "children of God" (2:15). "God our Father" (1:2) is at the beginning and end of the salvation that His children enjoy in Christ (1:28–29; 3:9). Salvation is the "good work" that God begins in them and that He will complete (1:6; cf. 3:9, 14), because He is working in them in order to enable them to desire and carry out His righteous purposes (2:13).

God is the "God of peace" who is with His children (4:9) and who guides them and supplies their needs (4:6–7, 19), particularly the need of righteousness that comes through faith in Christ

(3:9). Their final reward is also found "in Christ Jesus" (3:14). What God has done for us through Christ and the Spirit (1:19; 2:1; 3:3) will be "to the glory and praise of God" (1:11; cf. 2:9–11; 4:18, 20). God's character is described as being full of grace and peace (1:2), and also mercy (2:27).

The Holy Spirit is at work in several vital aspects relating to our salvation in Christ: He leads in the accomplishment of God's purpose, and thus He vindicated the apostle and the proclamation of the gospel during his imprisonment (1:19–20). He promotes unity of purpose and love in the body of Christ (2:1–2), and He inspires and leads people to true worship and service to God (3:3). Thus, salvation in Christ is accomplished through God the Father, with whom the plan originated; Jesus Christ the Son, who accomplished the work of salvation within history; and the Holy Spirit, through whose work we appropriate it (1:6; 3:3).

2. Christ. The epistle to the Philippians reveals the central role of Christ in Paul's theology of salvation. For Paul, "to live is Christ" and "to die is gain" (1:21). His primary desire in Philippians is to "depart and be with Christ" (1:23). His first choice is to consider all things a loss compared to the inestimable value of knowing the Lord Jesus Christ and being found in Him, not having his own righteousness based on the law but on a righteousness from God through faith in Christ (3:8–9).

Knowing Christ intimately and totally is the first goal (3:13–15). Christ is the content of the gospel (1:12, 15–18; cf. 1:27), which is associated in this letter with the person and the work of Christ. Preaching Christ (1:15–16) means proclaiming the word of the gospel to be "the word of life" (2:16). To live "worthy of the gospel of Christ" is to live worthy of Christ (1:27). His death on the cross is the premise underlying both our suffering because of Him (1:29) and our having Him as the pattern for our "already-but-not-yet" present Christian existence (2:5–8; cf. 3:10). Our justification is "through faith in Christ" (3:9), which means that those who accept it are found in God—not with their own righteousness, but that which is of God.

In Philippians, Paul did not attempt to develop his theology in a systematic way. However, theology is an inseparable part of his exhortations to believers as indicated in 2:12–13. Through His atoning death, complete and sufficient, Christ fully revealed the character of God and became the ultimate and only perfect model of Christian life. It is precisely in His being such a supreme example, as explicitly shown in the narrative of His humiliation (2:6–11), that Paul's theology reaches its highest point and deepest meaning, infusing Christian hope with a cosmic expectation that anticipates the moment when Christ will be universally recognized as Lord of all.

Thus, the Christians in Philippi could rejoice in Christ (3:3), because the Lord had accomplished the work of salvation on their behalf (1:11; 3:12). Christ is the foundation and assurance of trust (2:24), hope (1:20), and rejoicing (3:1; 4:4). Everything they did had meaning only if done in and through Christ.

3. The Christian Life. The theological focus that we find in Philippians has two primary purposes: (1) to encourage the Philippians to live at that historic time in the righteousness that is found through faith in Christ (3:9) while awaiting the end of the ages at Jesus's coming (1:6, 10; 2:16) and (2) to be filled with the fruits of righteousness (1:11) because of their citizenship in heaven (3:20). Paul tried to motivate the Philippians to cherish certain attitudes and behaviors (1:9–11; 2:1–4) and to forsake others (2:3–4). There may have been a lack of Christian love among them that resulted in attitudes of unmistakable selfish ambition or conceit (2:3, cf. 2:4; 4:2–3), which in turn led to some internal complaining and arguing (2:14). Paul urged them to live in harmony and humbleness in the context of love (1:9; 2:1–4).

Such love is defined in the letter as humble thinking (2:3) that leads to a lifestyle in which Christians regard others above themselves and prioritize not only their own interests but also the interests of others (2:3–4). This attitude was exemplified in Christ, who is equal with God yet humbled Himself to the status of an obedient Servant and died on the cross (2:6, 8). The story of Christ (2:6–11) illustrates the need for the Philippians and modern readers alike to live humble and selfless lives dedicated to serving others as the fruit of righteousness, a reality for which Paul prayed (1:11). On account of the knowledge of Christ, the apostle renounced everything (3:8–11) in order to serve those in need, and he presented himself as another model to be imitated by both the Philippians and modern readers (3:15–17).

COMMENTARY

1:1–11

Introduction

The introduction to Philippians consists of a salutation (1:1–2) and a prayer of thanksgiving

(1:3–11). It also contains some key theological topics to which Paul would return in the rest of the epistle.

1:1–2. Salutation. Paul began his letter by identifying himself and his companion Timothy without any reference to his apostleship, as was his custom in most of his letters. Timothy was Paul's faithful son in the Lord (1 Cor. 4:17; cf. Acts 19:22), one of his closest associates in the preaching of the gospel (Rom. 16:21; 1 Cor. 16:10; 2 Cor. 1:1, 19; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1; 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2; Philem. 1), and his faithful representative and messenger (Phil. 2:19–20). It is apparent that Timothy was not a coauthor of the letter in the strict sense of the word, because Paul constantly uses the first-person pronoun "I" (e.g., 1:12, 20, 22; 2:17, 19–20; 3:4, 8; 4:2, 18).

Paul called himself and Timothy douloi ("bond-servants," "servants," "slaves"; 1:1) of Jesus Christ, the same title used in other of his epistles (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; Titus 1:1; cf. James 1:1; 2 Pet. 1:1; Jude 1). The term conveys the idea of complete and utter devotion to Christ, as well as loyalty to and a personal relationship with the Lord. In other words, Paul belonged to Christ wholly and completely.

Paul called His Lord "Jesus Christ" (1:2). "Jesus" means "Savior" (Matt. 1:21), and "Christ" means "Messiah." By using the compound name Jesus Christ, Paul pointed to the work and functions of his Lord. From the very beginning of his letter, he emphasized that the Person to whom he submitted himself was none other than the Savior, the Messiah, in whom God's promises and the hope of Israel were fulfilled. The name Christ used by itself is most common in the letter (1:10, 13, 15, 17–18, 20–21, 23, 27, 29; 2:1, 16, 30; 3:7–10, 18), but Paul also used "Christ Jesus" (or "Jesus Christ"; 1:1; 2:5, 21; 3:3, 12, 14; 4:7, 19, 21), "Jesus" (2:10), "Lord Jesus Christ" (1:2; 3:20; 4:23), "Lord Jesus" (2:19), "Lord" (2:24, 29; 3:1; 4:1–2, 4–5, 10), and "Christ Jesus my Lord" (3:8).

Paul addressed his letter to all of God's "holy people" (alternatively translated as "saints") in Christ Jesus (1:1). This statement does not refer to any particular group in Philippi that was considered sinless, exceptional, or morally and religiously perfect. The same use of a title appears in the opening of some of his other letters (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:2; Eph. 1:1) to describe or perhaps define what the Christian church is, namely, those called by Jesus through the Spirit to belong to Him, to be His people. The phrasing stresses the fact that the letter was sent "to all" Christians in Philippi (1:1; emphasis added).

The letter is also addressed to the episkopois ("overseers," "bishops") and deacons—two groups that had leadership responsibilities (1:1). These episkopois were the same as the "elders of the church" or "presbyters" in Ephesus (Acts 20:17; cf. 1 Tim. 3:2–5; Titus 1:5–6), "overseers" (Acts 20:28), and shepherds (1 Pet. 5:1–2). The term "deacons" means "servants" or "ministers" who serve the needs of the congregation. Notice that Paul addressed his letter to God's people "with" or "together with" the overseers and deacons. Had Paul used the conjunction "and," he would have implied that there were three groups in the Philippian church, but he did not do that because the church at large is made up of God's holy people (they are "saints" only in their union with Christ), and this includes all of its members.

The distinctive Christian greeting pattern used in most of Paul's letters began with an expression of grace and peace and was followed by an expression of gratitude or blessing "from God our Father" (Phil. 1:2). The expression "our Father" echoes the model prayer Jesus taught the disciples (Matt. 6:9). God, not Paul, is the source of grace and peace. He was the God of the apostle and of the addressees of the letter, and all blessings come from Him. By saying "and the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:2), Paul indicated that he regarded the Father and Jesus Christ as equals. They are coequal in attributes, power, and glory. They, as one, are the source of grace and of peace.

1:3–11. Prayer of Thanksgiving. Next in Paul's epistle is his usual expression of gratitude (1:3–8) and a prayer (1:9–11). He strove to positively capture the attention of his addressees by telling them how thankful to God he was for them (1:3), how much he loved them (1:7, 8), and how often he prayed for them (1:9–11). In his brief prayer, he asked for the church to (1) grow in love and in the knowledge of God's will (1:9); (2) have the capacity to determine what is most valuable (1:10); (3) be in right standing before God eis ("for," "until," "at") the Second Coming of Christ (1:10); and (4) be filled with the fruits of righteousness (1:11; cf. Gal. 5:22–23). He was reminding them that all blessings are possible only by or through Jesus Christ. Christians can stand blameless before God only through Christ alone, not through their own efforts (1:11).

1:12–26

Paul's Hope through Trials

Paul moves to a new topic using the transitional phrase "I want you to know," proceeding to tell the Philippians about himself in the context of his imprisonment and opposition in Rome (1:12–18) and about his hope to be set free for the glory of Christ and the progress and rejoicing of the Philippians (1:23–26). In two sections, Paul describes the advancement of the gospel being preached both inside and outside the prison (1:12–14), each in a setting of opposition (1:15–18).

Paul's words about church members being his family are tender; he calls them brothers and sisters, an expression that seems to be his favorite (cf. 3:1, 13, 17; 4:1, 8, 21). He wanted the Philippians to know that what he was going through had not hindered the progress of the gospel but had in fact contributed to its spread (v. 12). First, due to his imprisonment, the whole palace guard had come to know that he was chained for the cause of Christ (1:13), that is to say, that he was not a criminal. The controversies surrounding Paul's imprisonment resulted in greater knowledge of the gospel on the part of the Roman guard (praitōrion). The Greek indicates that these soldiers were members of the elite force known as the Praetorian Guard, who served as the emperor's personal bodyguards and were tasked with protecting Rome. While carrying out their supervisory duties, they would have easily come in contact with the imprisoned Paul, learned of his situation, and marveled at the spirit in which he bore his incarceration. Second, though Paul's commitment to Christ's cause placed him in prison, others were becoming more courageous in proclaiming the gospel message (lit. "the word") "without fear" (1:14). Because of Paul's imprisonment, the believers in Rome were actively proclaiming the name of Christ more than before.

Verses 15–18 can be divided into two parts: Paul (1) describes those who preached in Rome in response to his imprisonment (1:15–17) and (2) expresses his joyful reaction to the situation. Paul rejoices because Christ was preached, encourages the Philippians to rejoice with him in spite of his imprisonment, and emphatically states that he would continue to rejoice (the Greek allows for the translation "and what is more, I will rejoice"; v. 18). It should be noted that the Majority text (e.g., the NKJV) and the Alexandrian text (e.g., the NIV) reverse the order of Philippians 1:16–17.

Paul expressed his conviction to always glorify Christ (1:20–26). He faced the future rejoicing in the Lord because of his certainty that (1) he would be delivered from prison and (2) he would not experience shame because Christ would be honored in his body, whether by his life or his death (1:20). He anticipated that the Philippians' joy would increase at his deliverance and reunion with them (1:25–26). The first conviction that brought him unfailing joy was the fact that his life would be spared and that he would remain and continue to support all of them in their progress and joy in the faith (1:25).

The second conviction that fed Paul's continual joy was the assurance that nothing would shame him (1:20). With the assurance of his deliverance and the foresight of his defense and affirmation of the gospel during his probable trial before the Roman tribunal (1:7, 16), Paul did not consider the court as something that could humiliate or threaten his life and ministry. It was a suitable stage from which to proclaim the gospel, because Christ would be exalted (v. 20) no matter what happened. Christ would be known by a greater number of people either by Paul's release or his conviction and possible death.

Despite Paul's confidence in his deliverance from prison (1:24–26), the phrase "by life or by death" (1:20) shows that he was prepared for both options. He preferred Christ above all (1:21). Everything he did was inspired by and done for the sake of Christ, who gave direction, meaning, and purpose to his life. Therefore, to preach Christ and to die for Him as a martyr would be an honor. He would glorify Christ both by living (in liberty) or dying (through conviction).

The meaning of v. 23 is debated. Some see in Paul's statement an indication of the belief that death is the gateway to heaven, for they claim that when a person dies the soul lives on with Christ in heaven. This viewpoint, however, is a misunderstanding of what Paul and the Scriptures teach about the nature of death.

The Bible teaches that death has two dimensions; the first is temporary and the second permanent. With the exception of those who will be alive at Christ's return, all humans will experience the first dimension of death: the end of human existence in this world. The Bible describes this aspect of death as "sleep." Everyone who experiences this dimension of death will rest in the grave until they are brought back to life at the final resurrection of the righteous and unrighteous (Dan. 12:2; John 5:28–29; 11:17; 12:17; Acts 2:29; 5:5–10; 8:2; 1 Cor. 15:4, 35). The second dimension of death is eternal and permanent; it is the penalty of separation from God (2 Thess. 1:9) that befalls all who reject His gift of life and choose to remain in sin. Those who accept God's gift of salvation, however, will receive the gift of eternal life at the resurrection and will dwell with Christ forever (John 14:2–3; 1 Thess. 4:16–18). As Paul awaited his own certain death in Rome several years later, he made it clear that his reward would not occur at the moment of his death but at the resurrection of the dead at the Second Coming (2 Tim. 4:8). Thus, it is clear that Paul was not teaching that we will immediately be with Christ in heaven when we die.

What exactly then was Paul saying in this passage of Philippians? Here we have a window into the heart of the apostle as he reflected on the meaning of life and death in the context of his apostolic ministry and on which of the two he would prefer for himself. Death would release him from the challenging circumstances of ministry (2 Cor. 11:24–33) and would lead to his being with Christ since his next conscious experience following death would be seeing Christ at the Second Coming. The interim period between the two events would be spent in a sleep (e.g., 1 Cor. 15; 1 Thess. 4:13–18). While being with Christ was Paul's personal preference, his own preferences were not what directed his decisions in life. Unlike those having ministry rooted in "selfish ambition" (Phil. 1:16 [NKJV]/17 [NIV]), Paul put the interests of others before his own and added that to remain alive would be more beneficial for his fellow believers (v. 24). For this reason, he was willing to continue on in the difficulties of his ministry so he might encourage and strengthen the Philippians. Paul's comparative expressions reveal that both options were in balance. One was much better, but the other was needed more (vv. 23, 24). Paul himself had already made clear that both desires were equally strong, to the point that he acknowledged that it was difficult to make the choice (v. 22). Paul knew that the Philippians needed him, so this caused him to desire to remain and continue with them in their progress and joyful faith (v. 25).

1:27—2:18

Exhortation to Unity

Paul instructed the believers in Philippi to continue being united in the Spirit (1:27–30), to be "like-minded," following the example of Christ (2:1–11), and to live without complaining and arguing in this dark world (2:12–18).

1:27–30. Conduct Worthy of the Gospel. The apostle exhorted the Philippians to live as good citizens in the midst of opposition, behaving according to the gospel of Christ. This way of living would promote in their community unity, peace, hope, good works, service, and solidarity toward the needs of others. While they were faced with the mockery and challenges of their opponents, Paul motivated them to be united around one exclusive purpose: to preserve and defend the faith brought to them by the gospel (v. 27). They were not to be intimidated by their opponents but were to show courage and boldness in the defense of the gospel (1:28). Through their suffering for Christ, Paul and the Philippians were communing with each other and with Christ, the Sufferer (1:29–30; 3:10). This life of complete commitment to Christ is a life worthy of the gospel of Christ.

2:1–4. One Mind in Love. Paul reiterated the idea that unity was essential for the Philippians and should be accompanied by humbleness (2:3) and self-denial on behalf of the needs of others. The four conditional "if" clauses in Greek that make up the beginning of Paul's appeal in v. 1 should not be understood as actual questions but rather as an appeal based on the certainty ("since there is") of the spiritual realities expressed (2:1) in the Christian life. The Greek word paraklēsis conveys the ideas of consolation, comfort, and encouragement—these would strengthen the Philippians morally and spiritually in Christ. A word similar in meaning, paramythion, is connected with love of Christ, which soothes our difficult experiences in life. The koinōnia ("fellowship," "sharing") in the Spirit refers to enjoying a fellowship established by the Holy Spirit. Splanchnon literally means "bowel," but it is often used as a metonymic way of referring to affection or tenderness of the heart. Oiktirmos means "compassion," "pity," or "mercy." Here, these words may refer to what the Philippians were called to express toward each other or toward Paul. However, since Paul depicted God as the source of all of these blessings (2 Cor. 1:3; cf. Rom. 12:1), he was most likely referencing the manifestation of God's compassion and mercy toward the Philippians (cf. 1:2–3; 3:3, 9; 4:6–7, 9; Acts 16:12–40).

Since these four virtues should have been a reality in the Philippians' lives, Paul was appealing to them to complete or fulfill his joy, that is to say, to add to his joy for them by being like-minded in a union of intentions and goals expressed in a common love toward each other and toward Christ (2:2). He further explained what he meant by listing three negative attitudes and actions that were hindering the unity of the church. Selfish ambition describes those who promote their own agendas to satisfy their conveniences more than the general interests of the church (cf. Rom. 2:8; 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:20; Gal. 5:20). Conceit points to people who arrogantly promote their ideas, creating strife within the church. Their concern for their own reputation incites rivalry among others (cf. Gal. 5:26).

Christians should consider not only their own interests (2:4) but should also think about and do what is good and best for the community of believers (cf. 1 Cor. 10:24; 13:5). Paul wanted the church to understand that an overemphasis on the individual would destroy the unity of the church. True unity requires that everyone humbly regard others above themselves (2:3), which ultimately means to consider others as equals—if we could mutually see each other as better, then we would all be equal. This requires a humility that consists of an awareness of our own shortcomings and our total dependence on God. Our real value originates from Him.

Paul's counsel on how to relate to and care for others stands in stark contrast to the rigid hierarchical structure of society in the Roman Empire. Roman society was extremely class-conscious. The status of a person was based on wealth, position, freedom, and citizenship. At the top of Roman society was the emperor, his family, and members of the senatorial class (mainly wealthy landowners). Further down the social ladder were members of the equestrian order (wealthy businesspeople) and rich freemen. The vast majority of people, however, were at the bottom: the poor working class and freemen and slaves. The higher a person's rank in society, the more honor and privilege he or she received. Since members of the different classes dressed differently, it was always clear who was deserving of more honor than others. These kinds of societal constructs should not be the lens through which the followers of Christ consider others. Instead, we are called to love, value, and serve others as equals. To illustrate his teachings (2:2–4), Paul presented the greatest example of love, self-denial, and service on behalf of others: the life of Christ Jesus (v. 5).

2:5–11. Model of Self-Emptying. Paul described three moments of Christ's existence: His pre-incarnation (2:6–7a), His life during the incarnation (2:7b–8), and His exaltation post-resurrection (2:9–11). Paul's main purpose of this section was not so much to present a theological exposition of these conditions but rather to urge the Philippians to imitate the generous surrender that characterized the life of Christ. Paul expected the same attitude demonstrated by Christ Jesus (2:6–8) from his addressees (2:2–4).

The relative pronoun "who" affirms that the historical Jesus (2:6) existed before His physical incarnation, having the same character as God because He is God. The Greek term morphē ("form") designates the very nature of a person and consequently identifies Jesus as having the nature of God (see vv. 6–7). The meaning of Jesus's motivation in v. 6 is to a large extent determined by the Greek word harpagmos, which could designate something to which one has a claim. The scholarly study of the use of this word in extra-biblical literature indicates that it could mean "something to be used for one's own advantage" or "something to take advantage of." In the context of this passage, Paul was saying that Christ Jesus, who was fully divine, did not use His divine nature for His own advantage but for something else.

Jesus ekenōsen ("made Himself nothing," "made Himself of no reputation," "emptied Himself"; v. 7). This does not mean that He left His divinity in heaven or had only some divine attributes as a result of the incarnation. Had that been the case, He would not have been God in human flesh. It means that during the incarnation He did not use His divinity for His own benefit. This is indicated by the following description of Christ taking the morphē ("form," "nature") of a servant, when He fully became a Servant of God. His self-emptying consisted of becoming a Servant of God, and this was possible only because He did not use His divinity for His own advantage. Christ came in the likeness of a human being. Here in v. 7, the participle genomenos ("was made," "coming") is contrasted with the present participle hyparchōn ("being") in v. 6. The incarnation had a beginning, but the divine nature did not. The noun homoiōma can mean "likeness," as in the sense of a similar form or appearance, or it can refer to an identical duplicate of the original. The expression as used here does not mean that the incarnate Christ had only the appearance of a man; otherwise, it would imply some form of docetism, the heresy that Christ only seemed to have a human body. It is better to take the term "likeness" (homoiōma) as implying both the idea of identity and distinction; Jesus was both fully human and yet not like sinful humanity (cf. Rom. 8:3; Heb.

4:15). No wonder that when referring to Jesus's conditions for His priestly ministry, the author of Hebrews also expressly added the adjectives "holy," "harmless" or "blameless," and "undefiled" or "pure" to underline the absence of everything perverse or reproachable (Heb. 7:26). It is clear that Jesus had no need to offer sacrifices for His own sins before offering one for humanity's (Heb. 7:27; cf. Heb. 9:14).

He was "found in appearance as a man" (Phil. 2:8). The Greek term schēma ("appearance") could designate not only the outward look but also the inner nature. In the context of this passage, the latter meaning may fit better. Christ was fully divine but became fully human and took on the nature of a humble Servant (v. 7). Here, Paul provides a little more explanation and detail regarding what he meant by calling Jesus a servant: Jesus humbled Himself and became obedient even to death on a cross (v. 8). The basic characteristic of a servant is obedience. In the case of Christ, taking on that nature was an act of humility, an attitude that Paul wanted the Philippians to have. As a divine Servant, Christ was obedient to the point of the unimaginable. Obediently He died, but He died on a cross as a criminal. He indeed emptied Himself by humbly giving all He had for us. Paul pointed to the climax of the spectrum of Christ's humiliation, which was made possible by His willingness to obey and fulfill God's purposes.

After expounding on Christ's self-humiliation (2:7b–8), Paul describes His exaltation (2:9–11). God exalted the One who had emptied Himself and placed Him above all things after His resurrection and ascension (v. 9; cf. Acts 2:32–33; 5:30–31; Eph. 1:20–21; 1 Pet. 1:21). God gave Him the name that is "above every name" (v. 9). The title that distinguishes Him from all beings in the universe is kyrios ("Lord"; Phil. 2:11), and the name used to translate God's sacred, covenantal, OT name into Greek is Yahweh.

Paul then explains God's purpose in exalting Jesus and naming Him Lord: that at Jesus's name "every knee should bow" (v. 10). This is the moment when the cosmic conflict will come to an end, for at that time the entire universe will acknowledge Jesus as Lord and will pay reverence and homage to Him (v. 11). Those in heaven are the heavenly beings, those on earth are humans, those under the earth in the residence of the demons of the ancient world are the demonic powers (v. 10). Before evil powers and unrepentant sinners are extinguished from the universe, they will acknowledge that Christ is indeed the Lord and that they were wrong in opposing Him. All of this will be done "to the glory of God the Father" (v. 11). His wisdom in the resolution of the issue of sin will be recognized and He will be praised (see Rev. 15:3–4).

In 2:5–11, we find the climax of the apostle's presentation concerning the principles underlying humbleness and exaltation. Paul's goal was that his readers learn that God can exalt only those who humbly serve Him as Christ did. Just as the servant Jesus, who was no greater than His Lord (John 13:16), the Philippians were to live in humility and sacrificial service to others.

2:12–18. Call to Faithfulness. An emphasis on obedience and faithfulness links this section to 2:5–11. Paul was exhorting the Philippians to be shining lights in the world amid a corrupted generation (2:15). The affective expression agapētoi ("my beloved," "my dear friends"; 2:12) is one of the apostle's favorites (e.g., Rom. 1:7; 2 Cor. 12:19; Phil. 4:1; 1 Thess. 2:8). The Philippians had been obedient in the past, but they should have been growing in their willingness to obey God. Since they had shown some unhealthy traits that were inappropriate for church members (2:3–4), Paul was urging them to "work in something useful" (katergazesthe), that is, in their salvation and spiritual well-being (2:12). The salvation they received through Christ should have been expressing itself in all they were doing, allowing them to display the humility of Christ and overcome selfishness, strife, and factionalism. This was something they were to do not only when Paul was present, but even more in his absence. They were always to have a spirit of humility and respectful obedience (cf. 1 Cor. 2:3; Eph. 6:5).

Paul recognized that what he was asking is something humans cannot accomplish by themselves; God works in us to will and act according to His good purposes (Phil. 2:13). Only God could give the Philippians the power to bring about the necessary changes in their wills, intentions, and behaviors; He is the One who works efficiently and effectively in the lives of believers (cf. 1 Cor. 12:6, 11; Gal. 2:8; 3:5; 5:6; Eph. 1:11, 20; 2:2). But whatever task they did, they were to do it without complaining and arguing. The Greek word here suggests the continuous murmuring, whispering, and muttering of those who complain (cf. Matt. 20:11; John 6:41, 43; Acts 6:1). Such an attitude causes strife, arguments, debates, and disputes that result in planting doubts that hinder rather than enhance the harmony and unity of believers (Phil. 2:14; cf. Luke 9:46; 24:38; Rom. 14:1). Therefore, Paul invited the Philippians not to complain about the way God was leading them and not to doubt God's methods.

If the Philippians would lead lives worthy of the gospel of Christ (i.e., following the exhortations Paul gave them [1:27—2:18]; "striving together" for the "faith of the gospel" [1:27]; being unafraid of their opponents [1:28–30]; "being like-minded" with the "same love" [2:1–2]; and following Christ's example in humility [2:3–11]), they would be blameless, pure, and harmless children of God without fault (2:15). As a result of that way of life, they would shine as phōstēres ("lights," "stars") through the darkness of a corrupt generation (v. 15).

Paul was exhorting the Philippians to cling to the word of life (v. 16), that is, the gospel that he preached and that they accepted (cf. Acts 16:11–34; Phil. 1:27). If they would follow his instructions, Paul indicated that he would rejoice at the Second Coming of Christ because he would know that he had not labored in vain (v. 16). The topic of joy surfaces again, but this time it was to be experienced in "the day" of Christ, a typical expression in the NT (1:6, 10; cf. Acts 17:31; 2 Cor. 1:14; 2 Tim. 1:12; Heb. 10:25) to refer to the coming of Jesus. The verb "run" (v. 16) introduces an athletic metaphor (1 Cor. 9:24–27; Gal. 2:2) to refer to Paul's missionary work. His hard work involved resistance and determination while awaiting the final reward. The expression "in vain" (v. 16) implies the idea of running and working without purpose (cf. 2 Cor. 6:1; Gal. 2:2; 1 Thess. 3:5).

Paul used another metaphor drawn from the sanctuary services in v. 17. The metaphor of a sacrifice (an offering brought to the Lord) was applied to the active faith of the Philippians, and the ministry of Paul was like a drink offering poured over the sacrifice to complete it. Together, they would be bringing an offering of love to the Lord, which would result in mutual joy.

2:19–30

Timothy and Epaphroditus

The mention of Timothy appears at first to be casual, but that is not the case. Paul spoke of him to show his sincere concern for the Philippians and to further illustrate the values of working together in harmony. Paul was interested in knowing how the Philippians were doing and was planning to send Timothy to visit them sometime in the near future (2:19). Verse 20 has been rendered in at least two different ways: According to some translators, Paul was simply saying that there was no one like Timothy; no one else could care for them like he could. According to others, Paul said he and Timothy worked closely together because they were similar in their thinking and that Timothy would therefore care for them in the same way Paul cared for them. Some people are interested in their own things and not in the things that are of Christ Jesus (v. 21), but not so with Timothy; he had been an effective servant whose work had benefited the church.

To provide a more immediate source of encouragement while the Philippians awaited Timothy's visit, Paul would send Epaphroditus to them, a coworker and soldier (v. 25). The church in Philippi sent Epaphroditus to Paul to assist him while he was in prison, and during this time, Epaphroditus became seriously sick (v. 27). Although he had recently been ill, he was more concerned about the Philippians than about his own condition. This is an illustration of true Christian love, about which Paul was writing to them. Fortunately, Epaphroditus was healed and Paul praised the Lord and rejoiced because he was delivered from the grief of losing a beloved coworker (v. 27). Now Paul was sending him back in the hopes that the church would rejoice to see how well he was doing. Paul exhorted the Philippians to receive him with joy and gladness and to consider him as very valuable because of his willingness to serve even at the risk of dying (vv. 29–30). Epaphroditus's presence was an extension of the Philippians' service to him.

3:1–16

Warning: False Teachers

The letter next turns to Paul's concern about false teachers. This section begins with the word loipon, translated by some as "finally," "to conclude," as if bringing the letter to an end. However, others render this as "and now," "further," or "what's more." This is followed by the theme of the letter: "rejoice in the Lord" (3:1; cf. 1:18; 2:17–18; 4:4, 10). Paul believed that if the Philippians were to take his appeal to "rejoice in the Lord" (3:1) seriously, they would be free from murmurings, disputing, conceitedness, and divisions and would also be safeguarded as they faced the false teachers. The danger of false doctrines perverting the gospel truth was real, and in v. 2 Paul emphasizes this by using the imperative blepete ("be on your guard against," "take care with," "pay attention to," "learn your lesson from"), repeated three times in the Greek. Paul referred to these troublemakers as "dogs"

(v. 2). The term is probably used here to clearly identify the heretics as dangerous people, since at that time dogs were seen as unclean animals that attacked whatever was defenseless. Paul also identified them as evil ergatas ("workers"; v. 2), perhaps because of their dependence on works as illustrated in the promotion of circumcision, or alternatively as "evildoers"—those regularly engaged in evil. Paul also calls them katatomēn, "the cutters," "those who mutilate the body," that is, the "false circumcision" (v. 2), instead of the peritomē, the "circumcision" (v. 3), which he reserved for believers who had experienced the true circumcision of the heart.

Paul develops his argument through a series of participial phrases, all having to do with how he referred to Philippian believers as "the circumcision" (v. 3). First, the appropriation refers to worshiping and serving God in or by the Spirit, which likely implies that they had received the Spirit and were guided by Him during worship. Second, "the circumcision" indicated that they were to kauchaomai ("boast," "glory," "rejoice") in Christ Jesus, only glorying or taking pride in what God had already done for them in Christ rather than in their own good works. Third, Paul's allocation was based on their having no confidence in the flesh. We Christians today, instead of depending on ourselves, trustingly subject ourselves to God's promise and accept the free gift of salvation in Jesus Christ. We have become "Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:29).

Using his own experience, Paul listed the reasons used by the false teachers to have confidence in the flesh (3:4–11). The apostle described himself in Jewish terms to show that he had the same status as the best of them—indeed, he had even more reason than they did to have such confidence (v. 4). Yet, despite his reasons to trust in himself, he would not do it. Such a negative statement does not stem from the fact that he was inferior to another Jew. Unhesitatingly, he went on to mention his personal advantages in Judaism, establishing himself as the ideal or ultimate Jew.

He was circumcised, a practice Jews take pride in, on the eighth day, in perfect compliance with the law (Gen. 17:11–12; Lev. 12:3; cf. Luke 1:59; 2:21). He could consider himself a true, naturally born Jew since he belonged to the nation of Israel, and he therefore had all the Jewish rights and privileges by birth. Moreover, he was from the tribe of Benjamin (Rom. 11:1), a small (Ps. 68:27) but highly respected tribe that was influential in the community. Saul's election as Israel's first king gave the tribe a certain prestige (1 Sam. 9:1–2). In addition, it was the only tribe that remained faithful to Judah during the division of the kingdom (1 Kin. 12:21). Hence, settled in the heart of the Israelite territory, the tribe had a far-reaching influence.

Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, which perhaps meant that he spoke Hebrew and was ethnically from the elected people of God (see Deut. 7:6; 14:2; 26:18–19). He was also a Pharisee in regard to the law. In his speech before the Jewish authorities in Acts 23, Paul declared that he was the son of a Pharisee (Acts 23:6) and had consequently been brought up and trained among the Jews in Jerusalem as an experienced Pharisee in the law (Acts 26:4–5). As Gamaliel's disciple (Acts 5:34; 22:3), Paul had been more zealous in the traditions than his ancestors had (Gal. 1:14). "Pharisee," therefore, was not for him a disparaging term, but rather an honorable title. Through the designation, he was recognized as someone who obeyed, in the highest sense, all the duties prescribed by the law. His Jewish and Pharisaic zeal was demonstrated in his persecution of the church (Phil. 3:6; 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13; cf. Acts 8:1, 3; 26:9–11). He was also "blameless" or "faultless" in regard to the righteousness based on the law (Phil. 3:6), his use of "righteousness" meaning compliance to the rules required by God in order to be considered righteous. In his own opinion and in that of his religious colleagues, he was blameless.

Paul's encounter with Christ changed his value system, and what he had considered to be a gain he now counted as a loss (3:7). He had been analyzing things from the perspective of the flesh, that is, from a human perspective, and not from God's perspective. The arrival of God's promised Messiah, the Christ, had globalized the Jewish faith, but many Jews had not yet realized it. The impact Christ had on Paul was so strong that it brought about an almost complete upheaval of his life, but Paul considered the loss he experienced to be a gain. His human self-perception was set aside because of the inestimable value of knowing Christ Jesus his Lord (v. 8). This is not only knowledge about Jesus but also knowledge through a personal and experiential communion with the crucified and exalted Lord. Paul's life revolved around Christ, and everything else for him was skybala ("excrement," "dung," or "rubbish," "garbage"), because what he deeply wanted was to gain Christ. The values of his life were determined by Jesus.

Finally, Paul states three reasons for counting all those things a "loss": (1) That he might gain Christ (v. 8). The verb kerdainō ("gain"), when understood in the light of Paul's image of profit and loss, his proverbial account and balance sheet, suggests that Christ was for him the real profit and a superior advantage more than anything else was (cf. 1:21, 23).

(2) That he might be found in Christ (v. 9). Jesus was the sphere of life for Paul, and he wanted to be in that sphere of life on the judgment day. He feared to be before God, the Judge, in the flesh, on his own and in the sphere of his self-attained righteousness from the law. When standing before the Judge, he wanted that which is attained through faith in Christ, the righteousness that comes from God via faith (cf. 3:4–11). This is the key statement in this section. Paul's testimony was a rebuttal to his opponents, who insisted that salvation could be attained only through strict obedience to the requirements of the Mosaic Law, starting with circumcision (3:2–3). They taught that before becoming Christians, the Gentiles had to first become Jewish proselytes by submitting to the ritual of circumcision (cf. Acts 15:1, 5). However, according to Paul, the righteousness that entitles anyone to be in the presence of God comes exclusively through faith in Christ. Moses had already declared to the Israelites that their relationship with the Lord was not based on their self-righteousness (Deut. 9:4–6), and that concept became Paul's foundational principle in his teaching of righteousness by faith (Rom. 1:16–17; 3:21–28; Gal. 2:16).

(3) That he might know Christ (Phil. 3:10). To know Christ is to know "the power" of His resurrection, that is to say, to have been risen with Christ into a new life (cf. Rom. 6:4) and to anticipate this power in the future resurrection of the dead. To know Christ and share in His sufferings likely means that Paul had "died with Christ" (Rom. 6:8) and that his sufferings for Christ were a way of strengthening his communion with the suffering Lord.

Paul was well aware that his knowledge and understanding of Christ was partial, and he awaited the day when the partial will give way to a perfect knowledge and understanding of Christ. Conscious that there was still a lot more to know and understand about Christ, Paul pressed on toward a fuller understanding of Christ. His goal was to know Christ fully with his mind and heart in order to take hold of Him in true faith (3:13–14). However, taking hold of Christ had been preceded by Christ first taking hold of him.

After carefully and repeatedly weighing all the evidence (v. 13), Paul reaffirmed his conclusion that he had not perfectly comprehended the meaning of Christ. Therefore, he pressed toward the goal (3:14) of knowing Him and better understanding Him. He underlined this supreme aim by stating that he would do one thing: he would not allow the past to determine his future but would rather move forward, pursuing without distraction his goal of knowing Christ Jesus and receiving, according to God's heavenly call, the final reward of his career—being found in Him (3:9)—meaning to be reliant on Him for salvation and united with Him in that salvation.

Paul called on those who thought of themselves as "mature" to forget the past and go continually forward with the same goal. However, if anyone thought this aim was not crucial, God would reveal to that person the importance and relevance of keeping Christ as his or her life's goal (3:15). In spite of the different levels of comprehension among the Philippians, Paul pointed out to them the importance of cooperation and harmonious action and urged them to be aligned with him (3:9, 12–14).

3:17—4:1

Warning: Materialism

Truth is more visible and easier to comprehend when it is modeled by true believers. Hence, Paul offered his life and those of others as a pattern or model for the Philippians to follow (e.g., Timothy and Epaphroditus). He established Jesus as the supreme example (2:5–11) in his life by counting everything a loss for the sake of knowing (3:7–8) and proclaiming Christ (1 Cor. 4:9–13) and not seeking self-righteousness but the righteousness that comes from God by faith in Christ (3:9–11; cf. 4:9). Paul, with deep sorrow and crying, reminded his readers of something he had told them previously: many people live (lit. "walk") as "enemies of the cross of Christ" (3:18). The conjunction "for" at the beginning of the verse explains the reason Paul urged the Philippians to imitate and follow the steps of other leaders like him. In contrast to those who were leading the people in accordance with the pattern set by the apostle, there were others who behaved differently. These individuals were the enemies of the cross of Christ. The "cross of Christ" sums up the essential content of the gospel (v. 18; cf. 1 Cor. 15:3): the Messiah had to die for the forgiveness of sins, which was a "scandal" to the Jews (ioudaiois men skandalon: "stumbling block," "a cause of falling or sinning"; 1 Cor. 1:23), because what God did on the cross was the opposite of what they expected Him to do.

These individuals were on a trajectory toward final destruction (cf. Rom. 6:21; 9:22; Gal. 6:8), the total opposite of salvation (cf. Phil. 1:28; 3:20). Their god was their stomach, they were proud of what they should have been ashamed of, and their minds were set on earthly things (v. 19). Some interpreters have suggested that koilia ("stomach," "belly") is used here to identify those giving in to their sensual desires and living in self-complacency (cf. Rom. 1:21–32; 8:12–13; 16:17–18; 1 Cor. 6:9–10, 13; Gal. 5:13–26; Eph. 5:12; 2 Pet. 2:12–13, 19) rather than living for "the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31). They boasted of their freedom yet became a source of shame. In Romans 16:17–18, Paul used this term to describe self-interested persons who were causing divisions and teaching doctrines contrary to what they had learned (cf. Phil. 4:1, 8–9; 1 Cor. 1:10–17; Gal. 1:6–10). They were not serving the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. 16:18; cf. Phil. 3:18c) but their own stomachs. Paul urged the Christians in Rome to not get caught up in controversies, discussions, and contentions as such people do, but to avoid them (Rom. 16:17; cf. 1 Cor. 5:8; 2 Thess. 3:6). The use of koilia in the context of Philippians 3:18–19 probably refers to false teachers who were spreading their fallacies, motivated by personal gain. They were focused on earthly things.

Christians do not set their minds on earthly things, because they have something better: the blessed hope of their heavenly citizenship. In 3:20–21, a cornerstone of Paul's teachings, the apostle provides the definitive answer in his debate with the Jews, whose minds were set only on earthly things related to the pride of ethnic identity (cf. 3:5–6). They were to see themselves as citizens of the heavenly city, the place from which they were awaiting the coming Savior, "the Lord Jesus Christ" (3:20). At His coming, He will transform the bodies of our current humble condition into the likeness of His own glorious body (v. 21). The Savior will make effective His work of salvation on our lowly bodies, that is to say, our fallen, weak, corruptible, and mortal nature. They will be changed at His return (cf. 1 Cor. 15:42–58) and be made into the likeness of His own body of glory. In doing so, Christ will use the same power that brings all things into subjection to Himself. Since the Philippians were heavenly citizens (3:20–21), Paul urged them to remain unmoved in the Lord (4:1) as warriors faithfully fighting "for the defense of the gospel" (1:16 [NIV]/17 [NKJV]) and as athletes who unhesitatingly run toward the end goal (3:13–14).

A Call for Unity, Joy, and Peace

Leaving behind theological and controversial issues, Philippians continues with Paul's personal and practical exhortations in which the imperative mode predominates, addressing the case of two church leaders involved in a dispute. Paul exhorted two women, Euodia and Syntyche, to reach an agreement in the Lord, that is, to "be of the same mind in the Lord" (v. 2; cf. 1:27; 2:1–5; 3:15, 19; 4:7). He urged the church to which the letter was addressed to help these women, both of whom worked with Paul. The verb used here, synathleō, means "to contend with" or "alongside." They were not false teachers, but their disagreement had to be dealt with in order for them to have an effective ministry. These two women were Paul's coworkers in the proclamation of the gospel. He was indeed proud of them, because they fought side by side with him, Clement, and the rest of his spiritual coworkers. The Philippians knew Clement so well that Paul did not need to identify him further. Paul noted that the names of his fellow workers, including the names of the two female workers, are in the Book of Life (cf. Ex. 32:32–33; Ps. 69:28; Dan. 7:9–14; 12:1; Rev. 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:12; 21:27). They are citizens of the heavenly city, and their names are recorded in the registry of that city. The labor of these individuals on behalf of the gospel will never be forgotten.

Paul did not want controversies that rob the church of its vitality, and he enjoined believers to always rejoice in the Lord (Phil. 4:4). We should not let small matters damage our joy in Christ but should resolve them and rejoice in all circumstances in life. This joy expresses itself in epieikes ("gentleness," "reasonableness," "graciousness"), a quality Paul indicates should be noticeable to everyone (v. 5), including the community of believers (cf. John 13:35). The life of joy and gentleness is lived under the conviction that the Lord is coming soon (Phil. 1:6, 9–11; 2:16; 2 Thess. 1:7–8; Heb. 10:24–25; James 5:8; Rev. 1:7; 22:20). This hope does not detach us from the present life, but it should fill our hearts with joy and kindness toward our fellow human beings.

Paul further exhorted the Philippians to not be anxious about anything, or, to put it another way, to stop worrying (Phil. 4:6). By using three parallel synonyms, proseuchē ("prayer"), deēsei ("petition," "supplication"), and aitēmata ("requests"; cf. 1:4, 9; Eph. 6:18; 1 Tim. 2:1; 5:5), the apostle admonished the Philippians to be free from cares by living a life of constant prayer. God is greater than the greatest problem, and He rewards those who diligently and earnestly seek Him (Heb. 11:6; cf. 1 Pet. 5:6–7). The emphatic conjunction "and" in v. 7 suggests that "the peace of God" is the result of perseverance in prayer. Such a peace surpasses anything we can ever imagine and protects our inner life—emotional as well as rational—from the various kinds of damage caused by anxiety. By using the word loipon (usually translated as "finally") here, Paul meant that he was introducing the last imperatives, which help us understand how to stand firmly in the Lord (4:1): logizesthe ("think," "consider," "meditate on") these things (v. 8) and do them as well (v. 9). The list includes a sample of the things that should occupy our minds as we wait for the Lord. Paul clarified that people have different understandings of what is true, noble, pure, and so forth, and he consequently added that anything excellent, virtuous, and praiseworthy should be dwelled on (v. 8). The criterion to be used in evaluating the options that might fit within this broad definition was the instruction given to believers by the apostle. They had the promise that "the God of peace" would be with them (v. 9) and would provide peace for those who place their trust in Him (cf. 1:2; 4:6–7; Rom. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:11; 1 Thess. 5:23).

4:10–20

Expression of Gratitude

The church in Philippi had sent Paul, through Epaphroditus (4:18), financial assistance, which had been a source of joy for the apostle and a blessing to the Philippians, who had been practicing true stewardship (4:15–19). Paul was moved to express his gratitude for their love for him. Their selflessness greatly increased Paul's joy in the Lord. The ultimate cause of Paul's joy was the Lord, but the Philippians' care and concern for him was acknowledged in this case as his greatest reason for rejoicing (v. 10). Paul did not complain about his needs, because he had learned to be autarkēs ("independent," "self-sufficient," "strong," "jubilant," usually translated "content") in whatever situation he might find himself (v. 11), an attitude that obviously contributed to his joy in life. He knew about having little and having much, about being hungry and being full, about living in abundance and living in poverty (v. 12). Paul's secret was a simple one: he could do everything through Christ, the One giving him strength (v. 13). That is, he knew he could face anything, because he knew that the Lord would carry him through; His grace was sufficient for him. This was the secret of Paul's self-sufficiency. The driving force behind Paul's independence when facing life was his dependence on Someone above him. His self-sufficiency was the result of His vital union with an all-sufficient source of power: the One who generated power in him and enabled him, the Lord Jesus Christ. The same language is used elsewhere in Paul's writings (Eph. 6:10; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 2:1; 4:17; cf. Phil. 3:7–10).

Of course, Paul did not undermine the loving gift of the Philippians; he told them that their donations had been a blessing both for him during his time of difficulty (v. 14) and for the donors (v. 17). This was not the first time that the Philippians ministered to Paul's needs; they had done it before when no one else provided any help to the apostle (v. 15). Therefore, the apostle not only thanked them for the donations at this time but also for the services previously received. He was aware that their donations in the present were just an outflow of many past ones. Willingness to give was part of the Philippians' Christian experience and should be in the heart of every believer.

The generosity of the Philippians was shown not only after Paul left Macedonia but also before when he was in Thessalonica (v. 16), the very place from which he avoided receiving help (1 Thess. 2:9; 2 Thess. 3:8) in order to prevent giving the new believers the impression that he was a peddler. Paul was not requesting financial support from the Philippians, because he eagerly desired that the results of their generosity be credited to their heavenly account (cf. Heb. 6:10–12; 10:34). Paul then declared that he had received everything he needed and had even more than he needed—an abundance (Phil. 4:18). Having received from Epaphroditus (v. 18; cf. 2:25, 30) the gift of love and grace sent by the Philippians, Paul could say that his needs had been met (4:19).

Using the OT sacrificial language (Ex. 29:18, 25; Lev. 1:9, 13; cf. 2 Cor. 2:15; Eph. 5:2), Paul describes the things sent as a grateful fragrance, a most precious offering (Phil. 4:18). Using the same OT language (cf. Lev. 1:2–17; 2:1–13), he acknowledged that the gift was a costly one for them (2 Cor. 8:1–2) and therefore was an acceptable sacrifice that pleased God (cf. Rom. 12:1; Heb. 13:16). The possessive adjective "my God" indicates that his God would provide the Philippians—who had so generously helped him—with everything they would need, and that this would flow from the ploutos ("fortune," "treasure," "abundance") of His glory in Christ Jesus (v. 19). The Bible tells us that, as Creator, God is unendingly and infinitely rich (Pss. 24:1; 104:1–9, 24; Hag. 2:8; 1 Cor. 10:26); but He is not only rich, He is also good, and He provides for the temporal needs of humankind out of His goodness. He is equally rich in grace and mercy (Eph. 2:4, 7), and according to the richness of His grace, He also provides for the spiritual needs of His people. All of this is possible through Christ Jesus.

The reference to Christ is placed at the end of the sentence for emphasis and should be interpreted in connection with the verb "shall supply"/"will meet" (v. 19). God's fullness is boundless through Jesus Christ our Mediator. Because of what God has done in supplying for our needs, Paul breaks out in a doxology addressed to "our God and Father" (v. 20). To give glory to Him is to be grateful to Him and to align our lives to His will. Our gratitude to God for what He has provided for us through Christ will last forever and ever (lit. "unto the ages of the ages"; see Gal. 1:5; 1 Tim. 1:17; Heb. 13:21; 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:6; 4:9; 7:12; 11:15; 15:7; 19:3; 22:5). To this Paul adds "Amen," a spontaneous and joyful confirmation of all that has been said (v. 20; cf. Rom. 9:5; 11:36; 1 Cor. 14:16; Gal. 1:5; Eph. 3:21; 1 Tim. 1:17; 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:6, 7). It is the yes of the church praising God and accepting His promises in Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 1:20; cf. Rev. 5:14; 7:12).

4:21–23
Greetings and Blessings

There are three different groups that Paul mentions in bringing his epistle to a close (4:21–22). He greets every believer "in Christ Jesus" (v. 21). In the epistle, Christ Jesus is both the source and the reality of the life that Paul and the Philippian church enjoyed together. Paul shared the greetings from the brethren in Rome (v. 21), who were Paul's closest associates—individuals such as Timothy, Aristarchus, and Epaphroditus. He also sent the greetings of all of God's people, especially those who were a part of Caesar's household (v. 22). The reference here is not to the emperor's family but to individuals—most likely slaves and freemen—tasked with carrying out the domestic and administrative responsibilities connected to the emperor and his property. The context indicates that Paul was speaking specifically about those who assisted the apostle in his imprisonment and who had been converted through his ministry.

Paul closes his letter with a mention of God's supreme gift of grace (v. 23; cf. 1:2). With few exceptions (Eph. 6:23; Col. 4:18; 1 Tim. 6:21; 2 Tim. 4:22; Titus 3:15), Paul always mentions the grace of Jesus Christ in the final benediction of his letters (Rom. 16:24; 1 Cor. 16:23; 2 Cor. 13:14; Gal. 6:18; 1 Thess. 5:28; 2 Thess. 3:18; Philem. 25). Although at the beginning of this letter, grace is offered from both God and the Lord Jesus Christ, in the final benediction, Paul highlights the "Lord Jesus Christ" as the One who bestows that grace (v. 23). This was possibly done to emphasize the means through which God's love and favor were made known among the Philippians (Phil. 1:6–11, 27–28; 2:12–13, 27; 3:12–15; 4:6–7, 19–20) and to remind them that Jesus is the source of all joy and hope (1:21, 23; 2:5–11; 3:1, 3, 8–11; 4:1, 13). Some manuscripts read "your spirit" in v. 23 (cf. Gal. 6:18; 2 Tim. 4:22) and do not have the final "Amen." Other manuscripts read "you all" and include the "Amen." The most probable reading seems to be, "[May] the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen."

At the close of the letter, the reader is left with a description of a powerful God who cares for the needs of human beings and who uses them to help others. He modeled such an attitude through His Son, who, being divine, became human, humbled Himself, and gave His life on the cross. His resurrection and exaltation anticipate an event of cosmic dimensions, when all intelligent creatures in the universe will proclaim Christ as Lord. This event belongs at the heart of the Christian hope.

COLOSSIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Written as a personal letter to the Christians in Colossae, Paul's original letter did not have a title. The simple title "To the Colossians" was added to the letter sometime after its composition, probably when scribes first began to collect and copy Paul's letters. Later scribes expanded the title, identifying it more formally as The Epistle of Paul to the Colossians.

Though the letter begins by identifying Paul, who was with Timothy at the time, as the author (1:1), a growing number of critical scholars now question the letter's authenticity. They claim that the letter's vocabulary, writing style, distinct theological emphases (e.g., a more highly developed Christology and a realized eschatology experienced in the present instead of a future salvation when Christ returns), and the inability to correlate the false teachings the letter confronts with known first-century groups from Paul's time all indicate that a later author wrote the letter but used Paul's name to address realities that emerged after the apostle's death.

Other scholars, however, do not find these arguments convincing. While the vocabulary and style are not identical to Paul's other letters, they are easily explained as being the result of his need to use different vocabulary to address the specific heresy troubling the Colossians. Moreover, there is much that is similar, and what is different may be accounted for in part by his likely use of an amanuensis, a literary assistant who took dictation (cf. Col. 4:18; Rom. 16:22).

Although Colossians does have distinct Christological and eschatological emphases, it is not inconsistent with what Paul teaches elsewhere. He speaks of the supremacy of Christ in his other letters (cf. Rom. 8:38–39; 1 Cor. 2:6–8; Phil. 2:10) and of how Christ's resurrection can empower the way one lives life in the present (Rom. 6:7, 11; Phil. 3:20–21). Thus, Paul was merely expanding and applying the gospel to the problems in Colossae. For this reason, Colossians is best understood as having been composed by the Apostle Paul, a view that was unquestioned during the first nineteen centuries of Christian history.

Date. The most concrete fact we learn from Colossians about the location and date of its composition is that Paul was in prison (Col. 4:3; cf. 1:24). Therefore, Colossians is one of the letters known as the Prison Epistles (referring to those written during Paul's first imprisonment in Rome), joining Ephesians, Philippians, and Philemon in clearly identifying Paul as a prisoner at that time. Paul was also a prisoner at a later date when he wrote 2 Timothy, one of the Pastoral Epistles, referring to letters written to mentees. Among these Prison Epistles, Colossians shares much with both Ephesians and Philemon, the latter being addressed to a Christian slave master in Colossae.

But where was Paul imprisoned? Two of his incarcerations are the most likely candidates: (1) Ephesus (see 1 Cor. 15:32) and (2) Rome (Acts 28:11–31). If Paul was imprisoned at some time during his lengthy stay in Ephesus (Acts 19:1—20:1), he may have composed the Prison Epistles there. This idea is supported by the mention of frequent journeys between the churches in Asia Minor and the place of imprisonment in these letters. As for Rome, at the end of Acts, Luke describes Paul's initial imprisonment in the city (Acts 28:11–31) as being a "house arrest," during which time he was able to live by himself, though a soldier guarded him (Acts 28:16), and he occupied his own rented house for "two whole years" (Acts 28:30), a degree of freedom that seems to be reflected in the Prison Epistles (Col. 4:3–4, 7–14; Eph. 6:19–20; Philem. 23–24). Careful study of the Pauline companions who are mentioned in Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon also suggests Rome is the best choice (see commentary on Col. 4:7–18). Since the early church fathers supported

Rome and since no strong argument against it has emerged, it is best to identify Colossians as being written by Paul during his initial imprisonment in Rome (Acts 28:30) in the early A.D. 60s.

Backgrounds. The founding of the church in Colossae is not mentioned in Acts. Rather, we learn about its beginnings from three passages that mention Epaphras: Colossians 1:6–8; 4:12–13; and Philemon 23.

From Colossians 1:6–8, we learn that Epaphras was most likely the first to preach the gospel in Colossae, was Paul's "dear fellow servant" and still "a faithful minister of Christ" (v. 7) through prayer, and was the source of the joyful report concerning the believers in Colossae. In Colossians 4:12, Paul describes Epaphras as "one of you," likely indicating that he was a native of Colossae (cf. Col. 4:9), and as a doulos (variously translated "bondservant," "servant," "slave"). We know that Paul was with Epaphras since he was conveying his greetings and that the former joined the latter in earnestly praying for the addressees (cf. 1:3–12; Luke 18:1). Paul employs a verb, agōnizomai, that was typically used to describe athletic contests (1 Cor. 9:25) or battles (John 18:36) to depict Epaphras's sustained and extreme efforts in the ministry. (Luke 22:44 uses the related noun agōnia in describing the prayers of Jesus in Gethsemane.) Paul also says that Epaphras worked zealously for the believers in Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, the latter two of which were a short distance from Colossae (Laodicea was 10 mi. [16 km] to the west; Hierapolis, 12 mi. [19 km] to the northwest). Philemon 23 adds that Epaphras sent greetings to Philemon and mentions Paul's description of Epaphras as "my fellow prisoner in Christ Jesus" (cf. Col. 4:10), probably meaning that Epaphras was imprisoned with Paul or had been at an earlier time.

In light of these descriptions, it seems probable that Epaphras became acquainted with Paul during the apostle's extended ministry in Ephesus (Acts 19:1—20:1), since Colossae was 110 miles (177 km) to the east of Ephesus. While in the city, Epaphras accepted Christ and began to share his newfound faith. Later, he returned to the Lycus River Valley and preached the gospel in Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis. Having won converts, he remained as a shepherd to the new believers. Motivated by the presence of erroneous teachers in Colossae, Epaphras visited Paul and informed him of their teachings (cf. Col. 1:4, 7–8). The Epistle to the Colossians is Paul's response to this news.

In the letter, Paul strongly affirms Epaphras to prepare for his return. If believers would follow the evangelist's lead, they would not be duped by erroneous ideas but would be called back to the faith he had first preached to them (1:5–8, 23; 2:6). Thanks to Paul's descriptions, we learn something about the history of the church at Colossae and about Epaphras, who offered a model of spreading the gospel and ministering through focused, heartfelt prayer.

Theology and Purpose. The theology that Paul offers in Colossians presents rich seams of truth. Paul was concerned about issues of Christian identity, keen for believers to understand both the privileges that they possess in the present (1:3–14) and the powerful motivation offered by the hope of Christ's return (see 1:5, 23, 27; 3:4; cf. 3:6, 25; for a discussion of how Paul developed the theme of a future, Christ-centered hope, see commentary on Col. 3:1–17). This epistle demonstrates Paul's additional concern that the Colossians' behavior should reflect their commitment to Jesus Christ as Lord (3:1—4:6).

These themes are not random but are presented in relation to the purpose of the letter: to offer sustained argument against the erroneous teachings circulating among the Christian congregations in Colossae—teachings that tended to diminish the status and power of Christ by placing Him in competition with other powers. As a result, the letter offers some of the most important statements in the NT about Jesus.

1. The Nature of the Heresy. While much of the letter seems to be written in relation to the erroneous teachings, it is difficult to know which of Paul's ideas reflect them directly. Paul's core arguments against the heresy are contained in Colossians 2:8–23, which suggests that the following features are prominent: (1) worshipful attention to spiritual powers such as angels, thrones, powers, and principalities/authorities (2:9–10, 15, 18–19; cf. 1:13–23; 2:6); (2) submission to worldly elements (2:8, 20), which are likely astral powers or deities; (3) misplaced attention to "sabbaths" or "Sabbath days" (2:16); (4) asceticism focused on overly stringent regulations on diet (2:14, 16–17, 20–23); and (5) an interest in special, secretive knowledge and religious experience obtained through visions (2:22; cf. 1:9–10, 28; 2:2–4).

Identifying the erroneous teachers at Colossae is one of the most vexing challenges of NT studies; one dated catalog suggests more than forty differing opinions. Were they Pharisees, speculative and ascetic Judeo-pagan syncretists, or Gnostic Ebionites? Or were they disciples of Apollos, syncretistic ascetics influenced by philosophy, myths, and the mysteries, or . . .? One of the more commonly accepted explanations is to correlate the opponents with synagogue Judaism that reflected views very similar to the errors being discussed in the Epistle to the Galatians. However, there are significant differences between the two contexts, the first being a very different tone. In Galatians, Paul reacts very strongly to a threat that had already swept through the church, whereas in Colossians, his reaction is more benign, apparently addressing a set of errors that was threatening but had not yet influenced the church. Second, the word "law" (nomos), which occurs thirty times in Galatians, does not appear in Colossians. Third, circumcision, which was central to the crisis in Galatia, is only mentioned as a conciliation in Colossians and the use points toward Christian baptism as a way to reconcile Judaism and Christianity (2:11–12). In addition, some features of the heretical teaching, particularly ascetic elements (e.g., regulations regarding drink, v. 16; the rules about not tasting, touching, or handling, v. 21) do not easily fit into the context of synagogue Judaism.

As a result, it is now common to identify the false teaching at Colossae as syncretistic, borrowing from multiple streams of religious and philosophical thought. If this is true, did such a permeable set of beliefs have a pagan cast to them while borrowing elements from Judaism, or do they lie within Hellenistic Judaism, which could itself borrow quite broadly? Or, did they represent a less normative "folk Judaism" at the edges of the religion, an explanation that has recently become popular?

Given the variety of opinions regarding the erroneous teachers discussed in Colossians and the ambiguity of the evidence in the epistle, we should avoid placing confidence in any one view and using that view to interpret Colossians. Rather, we should attend carefully to the content of the letter itself, being content with the descriptions Paul offers and focusing on the inspiring theology he provides in countering the heresy. (For more on the concepts advocated by the false teachers in Colossae, see commentary on Col. 2:8–23. For a discussion of how the "sabbaths" or "Sabbath days" [2:16] figured into the controversy, see "Meaning of 'Sabbath' in Colossians 2:16," p. 1751).

2. Centrality of Jesus. In contrast to the false teachers' interest in a variety of powers, Paul sets forth Jesus Christ as the risen, ascended, and coronated Lord of all to whom every power owes allegiance. Paul argues that true Christian faith must be judged by its relationship to Jesus: Is He all that He should be? Is He regarded as both Creator and Redeemer (1:15–20)? Additionally, given all His cosmic significance, Christians are not to worship Jesus from afar. Instead, they are invited to personally participate in Christ and to acknowledge their identity as being bound up with His, as can be seen in how frequently the phrase "in Christ" is used in the letter. While this confidence in Christ is exhibited everywhere in the letter, Paul specifically addresses Christ and His importance to believers in 1:13–23, 2:6–23, and 3:1–4.

Literary Features. Colossians exhibits a close literary relationship with the Epistle to the Ephesians in that both letters seem to follow a similar pattern, which results in many parallel sections—though Ephesians includes unique sections devoted to the theme of the church. They share a description of Tychicus as the bearer of the letter (Col. 4:7; Eph. 6:21), a relationship best explained by understanding that both letters were composed by Paul around the same time and that he customized the content of each to address the realities at hand. As a result of this literary relationship, it is a helpful strategy to look to parallel sections in Ephesians as a way of enhancing our understanding.

COMMENTARY

1:1–2
Introduction

The letter begins by naming the authors and the recipients and offering a word of greeting. Paul identifies himself as an apostle of Jesus "by the will of God" (Col. 1:1), a description that points to his authority as a spokesperson for Christ and his direct commission from the risen Christ (Acts 9:1–9; 22:1–10; 26:12–18).

The letter came from both Paul and Timothy, the latter of whom was an early convert who was considered the most durable and valuable of Paul's coworkers (see Phil. 2:19–22) and who may have served as secretary for the letter. Timothy also acted as coauthor with Paul in several other letters. While this letter begins with the first-person plural "we" (Col. 1:3, 9; cf. 4:3), major sections of the letter (1:24—2:5; 4:2–18) are written in the first-person singular "I" or "my," suggesting that Paul is largely responsible for the content.

Paul's way of identifying the believers in Colossae was to call them holy and faithful (1:2). His use of charis ("grace") is probably related to the usual Greek word for "greetings" (chairein), which he joined to the standard Jewish greeting shalom ("peace"). These terms, which were Paul's characteristic way of beginning a letter, are not simply formalized greetings but are representative of the profound outcome of God's work through Christ.

1:3—2:5

God's Salvation Offered to the Believers at Colossae

In the first of two major segments of Colossians, Paul proclaims central concepts of Christian faith. Initially, these proclamations take the form of a "prayer report" in which he recalls how the believers in Colossae first heard the gospel (1:3-12). Paul builds to one of the most inspiring statements about Jesus, the beloved Son of God, and how the cosmic scope of His work of redemption impacted the believers in Colossae (1:13-23). While Paul did not found the church in Colossae and therefore did not know his addressees personally, he describes in some detail his concern and labors for them (1:24—2:5). All of this was in the interest of reconfirming their earlier acceptance of the gospel as a way of inoculating them against the false teachings he addresses in 2:8-23 (a motive made explicit in 1:23; 2:6).

1:3-12. Paul's Thanksgiving and Prayers for the Colossians. Colossians 1:3-12 is a treasure. It is an entry from Paul's prayer journal, a "prayer report" or "thanksgiving" in which he told believers in Colossae that he was praying for them. Inspired by news of them, he offered joyful prayer full of thanksgiving (vv. 3-8) as well as petitionary prayer for them (vv. 9-12).

Paul usually begins his letters with a "thanksgiving," and the one he offers here is lengthy and complex. These thanksgivings are not just tacked on but are closely connected to the issues he addresses later in the letter. In the thanksgiving in Colossians, Paul accomplishes two tasks as he establishes the argument of the letter: in consideration of the heresy that was threatening the church, he calls to mind the addressees' conversion experience and the power and purity of the gospel message in which they believed while also assuring them that the hope harbored in that gospel message was reliable. They could depend on it; it needed no correction.

In the first half of his thanksgiving or prayer report (vv. 3-8), Paul traces the Colossians' Christian experience back to the moment they first heard the gospel from Epaphras:

- Paul prayed for them (v. 3).
- Paul received a report of their faith and love (v. 4; cf. v. 8).
- Having been converted, the believers in Colossae possessed a secure, Christian hope (v. 5a; noting here in vv. 4-5 the frequent use of the triad faith, hope, and love; cf. 1 Cor. 13:13; Gal. 5:5-6; 1 Thess. 1:3; 5:8).
- Paul gave an extended description of the day (Col. 1:6) they heard and accepted the truth (vv. 5b-8; with a joyous excursus regarding the progress of the gospel throughout the world, v. 6; cf. v. 23).

In view of the threatening heresy, Paul called the believers back to the moment of their conversion, when their hearts were first touched by the love of Christ (cf. 1:23; 2:6; 1 Cor. 6:9-11; 15:1-2; Gal. 1:6-9; 2 Thess. 2:13-15). Paul seems to suggest that there was much to learn from the early days when they "first believed" in childlike simplicity (Rom. 13:11).

Paul begins the section with a thanksgiving to God (Col. 1:3). While it is clear that Paul was petitioning God on behalf of the believers in Colossae (vv. 9-12), he was praying in a tone of thanksgiving, collecting the blessings of God and thanking the Giver. He prayed for people by thanking God for His activity in their lives.

In writing that he and Timothy were always praying for the Colossians (v. 3), Paul probably did not mean that they were literally praying all the time, but that they were praying regularly at the appointed hours of prayer in the morning, at noon, and in the evening (see Ps. 55:17; Dan. 6:10, 13). It is tempting to think of Paul as a busy tentmaker and missionary who fit prayer in whenever possible, but Paul was dedicated to the work of prayer and observed set times for it. He did not see it as an expendable add-on. Prayer was at the heart of his work in spreading the gospel.

In the midst of Paul's prayer is a phrase that deserves close attention regarding the hope that is in heaven for believers (Col. 1:5; cf. v. 12, "the inheritance"). The phrase summarizes the supreme value of the gospel to both the Colossian believers and to all who await Christ's return. We have an assured, God-established hope, not simply a fleeting human wish or unrealistic dream. As a way of accenting the security of this Christian hope, Paul uses the verb apokeimai, which means "to put away for safekeeping" (as in Luke 19:20) or "to be reserved in readiness" (as in 2 Tim. 4:8). To further underline the confidence we may have in this hope, Paul notes that it is laid up "in heaven" (cf. Matt. 6:19-21). This priceless treasure—everlasting life offered through Jesus Christ—is not subject to risk or loss; it is secure. The certainty of this hope helps steady us and fill us with joy as we await "the blessed hope" of Christ's glorious coming (Titus 2:13; see commentary on Col. 3:1-17).

The phrase about love in the Spirit (Col. 1:8) is the only mention of the Holy Spirit in Colossians (in some translations, the adjective "spiritual" is used in 1:9 and 3:16, which likely alludes to the Spirit). This is especially curious given the emphasis placed on the Spirit in the closely related letter to the Ephesians (Eph. 1:13-14; 2:18, 22; 3:5, 16; 4:3-4, 30; 5:18; 6:17-18). Paul focuses his attention in the shorter letter to the Colossians on the major issue in question: the importance of Jesus Christ. However, this mention of the Spirit reminds us that His work was essential to Paul and that the Spirit was known to the believers in Colossae as the One who inspired love within the Christian community.

Having worked his way back in time to the moment the Christians at Colossae first believed, Paul reverses the narrative flow of time in Colossians 1:9-12. When Paul heard of their conversion, it triggered a pattern of prayer that he and Epaphras had practiced ever since (cf. v. 3; 4:12-13). (Epaphras is mentioned in 1:7-8, 4:12-13, and Philemon 23. See Colossians: Introduction for a discussion of the inspiration we gain from his good example.)

Continuing his prayer, Paul traces his spiritual goals for these new believers—goals that are not unrelated to the threatening heresy. Paul hoped and prayed that the following goals would be realized in the lives of the believers in Colossae who believed that his report was inspired by God:

1. They Would Have Insight into God's Will (Col. 19b). Paul wished them to be filled with the knowledge of God's will, which likely relates to the false teachings circulating in Colossae. Paul twice affirms that all fullness dwells in Christ (1:19; 2:9), and it is in Christ that "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" are to be found (2:3). Paul prays that his addressees would be filled with this Christ-centered wisdom rather than a secret, speculative knowledge touted by the false teachers.

2. They Would Live within God's Will (Col. 1:10a). Paul admonishes the Colossians to live a life (lit. "walk") worthy of the Lord. He uses here a common OT expression that portrays life as a journey on foot (cf. Eph. 4:1; 1 Thess. 2:12). (On pleasing God, see Rom. 8:8; 1 Thess. 2:4; 4:1.)

3. They Would Grow in Christian Experience (Col. 1:10b; cf. v. 6). In using the language of being fruitful and increasing, Paul seems to be reflecting God's command in the Creation story to "be fruitful" (Gen. 1:22, 28), a theme that is carried down through the OT story (e.g., Gen. 8:17; 17:20; Ex. 1:7; Jer. 3:16). The ultimate fulfillment of the command embedded in the Creation story is to be found in the re-creation of humankind through Christ (see commentary on Col. 3:1-17).

4. They Would Be Steadfast in Their Christian Commitment (Col. 1:11). Paul exudes confidence in God's ability to provide all the power believers need. He envisioned the Colossians being strengthened with mighty power on the grand scale of God's own glorious power (cf. Eph. 1:18-20).

5. They Would Have a Strong Prayer Life (Col. 1:12). They were not to take credit for any of these positive qualities but were to join Paul in thanking God, since He had enabled them to share the inheritance of His people. Paul begins to use language drawn from Exodus as he transitions to the next section of his argument (Col. 1:13-23), where such language is more pronounced. In the OT, these terms describe the territories allotted to the tribes in the land of Israel (e.g., Josh. 12:7; 18:6). Paul spiritualizes this theme (cf. Deut. 32:9), applying it to the privilege of being part of the people of God who live in "light" (Col. 1:12) in the new promised land of God's grace.

As we review Paul's impressive prayer for the believers in Colossae, do not miss its buoyant tone. He believed that these grand blessings were readily available through God's grace that is expressed in Jesus Christ. In His name, we have the right to lay claim to them today.

1:13-23. God's Action in Christ to Redeem the Colossians. Colossians 1:13-23 could be described as the theological heart of the epistle. The poem in vv. 15-20 serves as a high point, if not the summit, of Paul's teachings about Christ. It is in these treasured words, focused on the person and work of Christ, that we find some of the most inspiring themes in the entire Bible.

In vv. 13-14, Paul speaks geographically of what happens when someone accepts Christ. The person is transferred by God from one kingdom to another—from darkness to "the kingdom of the Son" (v. 13), where believers enjoy redemption and forgiveness (v. 14). Redemption (apolytrōsis) is a term borrowed from the slave market and indicates the freedom from slavery gained through having been purchased by a benefactor. Paul's vivid language draws on the Exodus story (esp. Ex. 6:6; cf. Hos. 13:14; Mic. 4:10) and the history of Egypt as a place of slavery and darkness (Ex. 10:21–29). For Christians today, Colossians 1:13–14 result in both searching questions (e.g., "Does my life exhibit the dramatic shift Christ has won for me?") and heartfelt praise.

Verses 15–20 display poetic features, such as the repeated use of the term "firstborn" (vv. 15, 18), a variety of phrases that refer to Christ (e.g., "He is," "through Him") and the phrase "all things." Because of these poetic features, the passage is often thought to have been an early Christian hymn that Paul used and perhaps edited to address the issues at hand. However, it may simply be Paul's own creative composition.

A variety of structures have been proposed for the poem. It seems best to view it as two stanzas (vv. 15–16; 18–20), with vv. 17–18a serving as a transition in which the former summarizes the first stanza and the latter introduces the second. The first stanza (vv. 15–16) celebrates Christ's work as Creator of all things (cf. John 1:3, 10; 1 Cor. 8:6; Heb. 1:2–3, 10), and the second (Col. 1:18–20) celebrates Christ's work in reconciling all things through His blood on the cross (v. 20). The two halves of the poem are drawn together by a consistent focus on Christ, first as Creator and then as Reconciler, and by the presence of "all things" as the object of both creation and reconciliation. The acts of creation and redemption are unified in the person and power of Christ.

It is worth reflecting carefully on the meaning of each important phrase of the poem. The first stanza (vv. 15–17) opens with the assertion that Jesus is "the image of the invisible God." The Greek word Paul uses for image is eikōn, which means "image," "likeness," or even "idol." Paul continues to draw on the Creation story, which asserts that God created humankind in His own image (Gr. eikōn; Gen. 1:27). Hebrews 1:2–3 and 2 Corinthians 4:6 both describe this concept further. Paul argues that if we wish to have access to God (i.e., to see the invisible God and to know Him), we must look to Jesus. The believers in Colossae, who were being tempted to look elsewhere for the definitive revelation of God, needed this reminder, and so do we.

Next, Jesus is described as "the firstborn over all creation" (Col. 1:15), a phrase that the second stanza of the poem echoes (vv. 18–20) in describing Christ as "the firstborn" from among the dead (v. 18). In the NT, the Greek term for firstborn, prōtotokos, is often used to describe the first son to come from the womb (Heb. 11:28), but it is used more frequently in a figurative sense as a title for or description of Jesus (see Rom. 8:29; Heb. 1:6; Rev. 1:5; cf. Ex. 4:22; Ps. 89:27). Used in this way, it describes Jesus as the One who is supreme in position, who is supreme over or has priority over time, or who existed before others. These meanings are confirmed by Paul's description of Christ as the One through whom "all things were created" in heaven and on earth (Col. 1:16) and by his expansion on Christ as "the firstborn from" (or "firstborn from among") the dead who has preeminent supremacy over everything (v. 18). Logically, the idea that Christ created all things excludes Him from creation and distinguishes Him from created beings (a point that the New World Translation of the Jehovah's Witnesses seeks to deny by inserting the word "other" several times in vv. 15–20; for example, "By means of him all other things were created" [v. 16]). In using the term "firstborn," Paul accents Jesus's importance and supreme position over all creation.

In v. 16, Paul provides the basis for these bold assertions concerning the descriptions of Jesus as the image of God and the Creator of all things (vv. 15–16), drawing on the language of both Genesis 1 and the Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20:8–11) to proclaim Christ as the One who has created everything (see "Christ and the Creation of All Things," p. 1745). Christ's creative power moves through the boundaries of cosmic geography (i.e., in heaven; on earth). It is not limited to the spectral bandwidth of human sight, since it includes both the "visible" and the "invisible" (v. 16).

However, Paul's special interest was in asserting that there are no invisible, powerful, or spiritual beings who do not owe their existence to Jesus. It is not important to differentiate the meanings of the terms Paul uses for these spiritual beings, which may have been expressions used by the false teachers in Colossae (cf. 2:10, 15; Rom. 8:38–39; 1 Cor. 15:24; Eph. 1:21; 3:10; 6:12). All these terms designate spiritual powers and may include both good and evil beings. Paul's purpose was to argue that all spiritual beings were created by Jesus, and because this is true, all owe Him their worship and allegiance by implication.

Next, Paul restates and extends Christ's role in creation, noting that everything was created both through and for Him (Col. 1:16b). Christ is not only the Agent but also the Goal of creation. He is not only the Origin of all things but their Destiny as well. Cosmogony (how the world began) is joined with eschatology (how the world will end) in accordance with Ephesians 1:10, which looks toward the time when all will be fulfilled as God brings together everything in heaven and on earth.

The next phrase (Col. 1:17a) conveys the thought that Christ is "before all things," an idea that has already been expressed in the poem (cf. "the firstborn over all creation"; v. 15), and extends it by stating that in Him, all things synestēken. In this context, the Greek word means to "cohere," "hold together," or "exist." The significance of Jesus in creation is not limited to His work as the Creator at the beginning (vv. 15–17a) or to His role as the One unifier of all things at the end (1:16b; Eph. 1:10). The current existence of all creation (i.e., "all things") depends on the powerful command, authoritative rule, and unifying power of Christ. To the Colossian believers, Paul was declaring that "the hand that sustains the worlds in space, and holds in their orderly arrangements and tireless activity all things throughout the universe of God, is the hand that was nailed to the cross for them" (AA 471; cf. Col. 1:20).

While the first half of the poem (vv. 15–17) focuses on the role of Christ as Creator, it also has in view His cosmic significance both in the

Christ and the Creation of All Things

In Colossians 1:15–20, Paul is very interested in establishing that God, through Christ, created everything in the realms of heaven and earth. To make this point, he draws on two OT passages that describe God's creation of the world: the story of creation in Genesis 1–2 and the Sabbath commandment as expressed in Exodus 20:8–11.

Genesis 1:1 (LXX, "In [the] beginning God made the heaven and the earth") and Exodus 20:11 (LXX, "[The] Lord made the heaven and the earth and the sea and all the things [ta panta] in them") hold particular significance in this epistle, as is seen in Colossians 1:16: "all things" in heaven and on earth.

The phrase ta panta ("all things") in 1:15–20 has often been thought to come from various schools of ancient thought (esp. Stoicism or Gnosticism). It is best to acknowledge that it is a biblical phrase. Paul borrowed it from the language of the Sabbath commandment and uses it to underline the boundless dominion of Christ: there is nothing that lies outside of His authority, since He is both Creator and Reconciler of "all things" (vv. 15–17, 20). This point was very important to Paul, as is evidenced by the number of times he evokes the phrase "all things" in these few short verses. In his initial description of Christ, he uses the phrase "all creation" (v. 15) before providing the full description: "all things" on heaven and earth (v. 16). To refer back to this fuller description, he uses the phrase "all things" several times (vv. 16–20) before returning at the end of the passage to a fuller version, "things on earth or things in heaven" (v. 20). Additionally, much of the rest of the language of the poetic passage, especially the description of the various powers (v. 16), is an explanation, expansion, or application of this phrase. If it is correct to see in the use of "all things" in Colossians 1:15–20 an allusion to the fourth commandment, it is a much-repeated point that is central to the structure of the passage.

There is no tension here between the worship of Christ and keeping the Sabbath commandment. Paul does not "spiritualize" the Sabbath by suggesting that it was completed, done away with, or replaced by Christ. On the contrary, Christ is placed at the center of the narratives of Creation and redemption as the Creator who is inherently to be worshiped on the Sabbath. To truly keep the Sabbath, one must acknowledge the limitless lordship of Jesus Christ who created "all things" (see "Meaning of 'Sabbath' in Colossians 2:16," p. 1751). For Christians, it is Christ who is to be worshiped on the Sabbath as the Creator of "all things . . . visible and invisible" (v. 16), and it is Christ through whom God reconciles everything to Himself, "whether things on earth or things in heaven" (v. 20). The Sabbath is not to be worshiped; Christ is to be worshiped on the Sabbath. present and at the end of time. It sings of the wonder and significance of Jesus Christ not only "yesterday" but also "today" and "forever" (Heb. 13:8).

Having celebrated Christ's work as Creator in the first half of the poem (Col. 1:15–17), Paul next praises Christ as Redeemer in the second half (vv. 18–20). While all things coexist or cohere in Christ, He has a special relationship to His church. For a poetic description of that relationship, Paul turns to the body metaphor (v. 18), which he employs in Romans 12:4–5 and 1 Corinthians 12:12–31. In these earlier uses, the head is one body part among many others and is not assigned any special importance (1 Cor. 12:21; cf. 1 Cor. 11:3). When Paul uses the metaphor in Ephesians and Colossians, he designates Christ as the head of the church, which is His body (Col. 1:18; 2:19; Eph. 1:22; 4:15; 5:23; cf. Col. 2:10; see commentary on Col. 2:8–23).

Borrowing another important term from the Creation story (Gen. 1:1), Paul describes Jesus as "the beginning" (Col. 1:18). He makes it clear that he is highlighting Christ's role as the initiator of salvation, the new creation, by referring to the "firstborn from" (or "firstborn from among") the dead as a way of describing Christ's resurrection (Acts 26:23; 1 Cor. 15:20; on "firstborn," see commentary on Col. 1:13–23). Christ's resurrection results in His possessing universal supremacy (Col. 1:18b; cf. Rev. 1:5).

Colossians 1:19–20 reveals why Christ possesses supremacy in all things: because of His divinity (v. 19) and because, as the divine Son, He reconciles all things through His blood on the cross (v. 20). While in later Gnostic heresies plērōma ("fullness"; v. 19) refers to a series of emanations or aeons from God who are spiritual beings, here in 2:9 it refers to God Himself or the presence of God dwelling in the human body of Christ. The presence of God, thought of in the OT as residing in the temple, dwells in Christ (see Ps. 68:16, which in the Greek OT shares the vocabulary of Col. 1:19). The idea that all the fullness of God dwells in Christ emphasizes His divinity and authority.

A second reason for the supremacy of Christ in all things (v. 18) is His work as the agent of reconciliation (v. 20). The Father has reconciled all things to Himself through Christ's death on the cross. Paul accents the extent of Christ's reconciling, peacemaking work, which impacts all things in heaven and on earth (borrowing the language of Ex. 20:11; see "Christ and the Creation of All Things," p. 1745), and the means by which that work is accomplished: through the blood of Christ shed on the cross (cf. Eph. 2:13–16). The theme of reconciliation offered in Christ is a central one for Paul (see Col. 1:21–22; Rom. 5:9–11; 11:15; 2 Cor. 5:18–21; Eph. 2:16). It is not the guilty party but the offended God who took the initiative, through the death of His beloved Son, to reconcile or make peace with sinners. Once enemies, believers are now reunited with God (Col. 1:21–22) as His treasured sons and daughters. Ultimately, Christ's reconciling work includes the pacification of His enemies (see 2:15) and will be fulfilled when "the great controversy is ended" and when "all things, animate and inanimate, in their unshadowed beauty and perfect joy, declare that God is love" (GC 678).

Paul's poem (vv. 15–20) provides fresh inspiration for our personal and shared worship. We learn here of the cosmic significance of the One who died for us. The "image of the invisible God" (v. 15), who possesses all the fullness of God (v. 19), He is the Creator and Sustainer of "all things" (vv. 15–17). Fully God, His reconciling, peacemaking work changes everything (v. 20). His authority knows no boundaries of time or space, and He is our Lord.

Having sung the praises of Christ in cosmic scope, Paul returns the focus to the believers in Colossae (vv. 21–23). How were they linked to the metanarrative of God's creation and reconciliation of "all things" through Christ? Paul offers brief but vivid before-and-after descriptions: Before they accepted Christ, they were alienated from Him in their thinking because of their wickedness (v. 21). After, through accepting the death of Jesus on their behalf, they had become reconciled, holy, blameless, and free from accusation in His sight (v. 22).

Here, Paul signals a note of great concern related to the heretical teachings offered by some by continuing with the word "if." Their new reconciled, holy, and blameless status would hold only if they remained true to the gospel they had first heard from Epaphras (v. 23; cf. vv. 3–8). Paul seems to practice hyperbole in v. 23 by claiming that the gospel had been preached to "every creature under heaven." However, perhaps the statement should be read less as a mission report than as a theological conviction: given the role of Jesus as the agent of both creating and reconciling "all things" (vv. 15–20), it follows that the gospel would have penetrated throughout the entire creation.

Paul's renewed interest in believers (vv. 21–23) invites us to reflect on the theme of Christ as Creator (vv. 15–17) from a personal point of view.

We are aided in this reflection by the thoughts of the psalmist in Psalm 139:13–16: since Christ created all things, He made us, knitting us together in our mothers' wombs. As a result, we owe Him our allegiance and worship. This revelation in Colossians is not just a story about how the cosmos came to be or the origin of spiritual powers; it is about us and our origin and how we fit into the grand story of redemption.

1:24—2:5. Paul's Work on the Behalf of the Colossians. Thus far, Paul's focus has been on God the Father (1:3–12) and God the Son (1:13–23). Here, he turns to a discussion of his own ministry as a servant of Christ in two sections: (1) 1:24–29, which details his sufferings and ministry for the church as a whole; and (2) 2:1–5, which describes his struggle on behalf of believers in Colossae and Laodicea. At the heart of each section is a statement celebrating Christ as the revealed mystery of God (1:26–27; 2:2–3).

In 1:24—2:5, Paul talks a lot about himself, praising his own preaching and hard work (cf. Rom. 15:14–21; 2 Cor. 11:16—12:11). Itinerant teachers of the time were expected to share their own qualifications, just as we might do if asked to submit a résumé, and to offer themselves as examples to their disciples. Paul was simply following the conventions of his day, and it is imperative that we hear these words with that in mind.

In Colossians 1:24, Paul describes his sufferings on behalf of the body of Christ, the church (cf. v. 29). His declaration that the sufferings in his flesh were filling up what was lacking regarding the afflictions of Christ is difficult to understand. The apostle seems to claim that Christ's death did not accomplish everything that was necessary and that he therefore must make up the difference through his own suffering. However, Paul is very clear that through Christ's death on the cross, God provides all that is needed for our salvation (e.g., Rom. 3:21–26; Phil. 3:8–10). Elsewhere in Colossians, Paul eloquently defends the sufficiency of Christ and the salvation He offers (1:13–14, 18–22; 2:9–15). Therefore, he must have meant something different by his reference to Christ's afflictions. In fact, he does not use the term "afflictions" (thlipsis) anywhere else to refer to Christ's suffering on our behalf.

While it is fairly easy to determine what Paul did not mean by this statement about his sufferings—that the death of Christ on our behalf was somehow insufficient—it is more difficult to determine what he did mean. There are at least two potential explanations: Paul could be referring to his (as well as other Christians') suffering as involving Christ's own suffering. On the road to Damascus, Paul learned that Jesus identifies with His people in their suffering when he was asked why he was persecuting Him (Acts 9:4; 22:7; 26:14). A second explanation was revealed when the Lord told Ananias that He would show Saul how much he would suffer for the sake of Christ's name (Acts 9:16). Therefore, the sufferings of Paul and others, experienced as they witnessed about Christ, may be called the afflictions of Christ. In Paul's mind, a certain quantity of these sufferings must be experienced before Christ returns (cf. Dan. 7:21–27; 12:1; Mark 13:20; Rev. 6:9–11; 7:14; 12:13–17). The thought that his own sufferings could hasten the return of Christ and spare other believers similar sufferings increased his joy.

Another common explanation sees Paul drawing on Jewish and early Christian apocalyptic thought with the concept that God has assigned a certain amount of suffering, "the woes of the Messiah," that must be endured before the end of time (building on the biblical understanding of an apocalyptic time of suffering for believers; see Dan. 7:21–27; 12:1; Mark 13:20; Rev. 6:9–11; 7:14; 12:13–17). In this view, Paul saw himself as helping complete those assigned sufferings and hasten Christ's return by enduring afflictions as the "apostle to the Gentiles" (cf. Rom. 11:13). The first explanation is preferable.

In Colossians 1:25, Paul describes himself as a "minister" (or "servant"; Gr. diakonos) of the body of Christ, the church. While this language is developed further in Ephesians (1:22–23; 4:1–16), members of the church are described as a body several times in Colossians (1:18; 2:19; 3:15; regarding earlier uses in Paul's writings, see commentary on Col. 1:13–23). Paul was given a stewardship or commission by God to fulfill His word. This "word of God" (1:25) may be the prophecy God disclosed at the time of Paul's conversion and call. He was to be God's chosen instrument to present God's name to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15; cf. Acts 22:21; 26:15–18; Gal. 1:15–16). This conforms with the view taken of Paul's suffering in Colossians 1:24.

The central affirmations of 1:24–29 are not about Paul but Christ. The mystery, long hidden, was entrusted to Paul, who participated in revealing it to God's people (v. 26). As in the parallel passage in Ephesians 3:1–13, "the mystery" here refers especially to the dawning understanding that the Gentiles should also be heirs, together as one body, sharing in His "promise in Christ" (Eph. 3:6). So "this mystery" is "Christ in you," meaning Gentile believers, "the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). The Messiah (Gr. Christos) was, amazingly, indwelling Gentiles. Because Jewish-Gentile divisions are quite distant for many of us, it is difficult to partake in Paul's excitement over this gospel mystery. Rereading Colossians 1:24–29 and Ephesians 3:1–13 helps us do so. There is nothing so rewarding and energizing as participating in the unfolding plan of salvation and sharing the open secret of Christ.

In the phrase "the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27), Paul points to the grandest moment in the plan of salvation: "The blessed hope" and the appearing of Jesus Christ, "our great God and Savior" (Titus 2:13). Paul, empowered by God, was working toward that day (Col. 1:29) when He would present each person as perfect or fully mature in Christ (v. 28; cf. 4:12; 1 Cor. 11:2).

In Colossians 2:1, how is it that Paul was engaged in an agōn ("conflict," "struggle," "fight") on behalf of the Christians in Colossae and Laodicea, since they had not met him personally? (On Laodicea, see commentary on Col. 4:7–18.) Paul likely alludes to being in prison as a result of his commission as apostle to the Gentiles (4:3, 10, 18; cf. 1:24). He may also refer to his worries (cf. 2 Cor. 11:28) and prayers for them (Col. 1:3, 9), which would align with his praise for Epaphras, who earnestly strove for them in his prayers (4:12; cf. 1:28–29). Paul uses the same root word in those references with the word agōnizomai ("to struggle," "to fight"), hoping that an understanding of his struggle as part of God's plan (cf. 1:24) and as an expression of his deep commitment to them would have three positive results: encouragement, an enhancement of their unity and love for each other, and a deeper understanding of Christ as the mystery of God (2:2; cf. 1:9–12).

Manuscripts differ in regard to the ending of 2:2. Some refer to the mystery of God and of Christ as being separate, but the best manuscripts support the idea of Christ Himself being the mystery, and this is Paul's main point as well: Christ, as in 1:27, is the mystery, now revealed to believers. Paul describes Christ as the One in "whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (2:3) and adds a note of warning motivated by his concerns regarding false ideas at Colossae (v. 4), which in their deceptive emptiness (v. 8) were offering "an appearance of wisdom" (v. 23). Some may have imagined esoteric insights being available through reverence to other powers. Paul wished the believers to know that all true wisdom and knowledge is to be found in Christ, a foundational thought for Christian life and education.

In discussing wisdom, Paul may have been drawing on the rich OT and Jewish tradition of the personified wisdom being present with God at the Creation of the world (see esp. Prov. 8:22–31), a line of thinking that may influence the content of Colossians 1:15–20 as well. The term "wisdom" (Gr. sophia) is used six times in Colossians. It is a quality to be displayed by believers as a gift from God (1:9; 3:16; 4:5), and it characterizes Paul's teaching ministry (1:28). Erroneous practices are described as having "an appearance of wisdom" (2:23). The most profound and theologically weighty use of the word is found here in v. 3, where "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" are described as being hidden in Christ (cf. Is. 45:3), which reminds us that Christ is the source of wisdom. In Colossians, wisdom is in Christ and is bequeathed by Him to His followers.

We often use Paul's words regarding being absent in body but present in spirit (Col. 2:5) to express our solidarity with friends who are geographically distant from us, and the apostle meant something similar here. Through his letter, which Paul crafted to be read aloud to the congregation, he imagined himself participating with them and applauding their orderliness or discipline and the firm steadfastness of their faith in Christ. It would be good to dwell on the thoughts that Christ in us is the hope of glory (1:27) and that He is the treasure house for all wisdom and knowledge (2:2–3).

2:6—4:6

Counsel for the Believers

The body of Paul's letters usually contain two major sections. The first focuses on doctrinal issues (e.g., 1:3—2:5), while the second offers direct counsel relating to the situation of the believers (e.g., 2:6—4:6). In 2:6, Paul begins to draw on what he had said about the conversion experience of his addressees (1:3–12), God's actions to redeem them in Christ (vv. 13–23), and how he was viewing his own ministry (1:24—2:5) to encourage and counsel the believers on how they should live. After an opening exhortation (2:6–7), Paul provides warnings against false teachings and teachers (2:8–23), an exhortation regarding the old self and the new self (3:1–17), rules for the Christian household (3:18—4:1), and a variety of concluding urgings (4:2–6). Paul also offers answers to a most important question: if we take Jesus Christ as Creator and Reconciler (1:15–20) seriously, how do we live? It is a privilege to receive his counsel, which remains important for those who await Christ's return.

2:6–7. Importance of Living One's Beliefs. In a short introduction to the second major section of the letter, Paul begins his direct counsel to believers in Colossae by recalling his praise for their early Christian experience (1:3–8). He exhorted them to become what they were, meaning steadfast disciples of Jesus (v. 6) whose lives are marked by thanks to God (v. 7; cf. 1:12). Given the strong emphasis on Christ in the letter (esp. 1:13–23, 27; 2:2–3) and the attention given later in the epistle to Christ in contrast to rulers, officials (2:15; cf. 2:10), and angels (2:18), we should notice the full title he uses for Jesus: Christ Jesus the Lord (cf. "the Lord Jesus Christ," "our Lord Jesus Christ"; 1:2–3). Jesus is both the Christ, that is, the promised Messiah, and the Lord. To confess Jesus as Lord is to offer one's undiluted allegiance to Him in acknowledgment of His resurrection and exaltation, which would have been considered blasphemy by Jews (Acts 7:54–60; concerning the idea of living or walking in Christ, see Col. 1:10). These two verses, and especially Jesus's full title, provide an apt summary of the epistle and also highlight its purpose. The letter reflects Paul's interest not in mere intellectual assent regarding the importance of Christ but in transformation of the life through the wholehearted confession of Christ Jesus as the Lord.

2:8–23. Warning Concerning False Teachings and Teachers. Colossians 2:8–23 is a challenging passage and is sometimes described as the most difficult passage in the NT, because, while Paul refers to the erroneous thinking at Colossae in various ways, reading it is like listening to one side of an intense telephone conversation. Paul and his audience (thanks to the communication fostered by Epaphras; 1:7–8; 4:12–13), were sharing an understanding of what was happening at Colossae. They were hearing both sides of the exchange. We hear only one and therefore must play a guessing game to piece the whole story together.

Fortunately, while it is difficult for us to understand the details, the big picture is clear. Paul was concerned that believers were being tempted to think less of Jesus and more of authorities, principalities, powers, spirits of the universe, and angels than they ought. Paul's central word of counsel is to invite believers to reflect carefully on what they think of Jesus. Do they really understand who He is? Do they grasp how important He is to the past, present, and future of the universe (1:15–20)?

Paul had praised the decision of Christians in Colossae to believe in "our Lord Jesus Christ" (1:3–8); prayed for that faith to be strengthened (1:9–12); portrayed the cosmic importance of Christ as the Creator, Redeemer, and Sustainer of all things (1:13–23); and described his own work as a servant of Christ (1:24—2:5), who is the mystery that had been hidden (1:26), "the hope of glory" (1:27), and the One "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (2:3) before describing the erroneous thinking more directly in 2:8–23. All of this is summarized in the exhortation of 2:6–7, which adds Paul's fresh call to believe in and live for "Christ Jesus."

Within the framework of 2:8–23, the big picture—the call to worship and live for Jesus Christ as Lord and to turn from any competing allegiance—is equally clear. Paul opens the section by pitting deceptive, vacuous philosophy and worldly forces or principles—whatever the exact identity of these items—against Christ (v. 8). This opening cues a new lengthy description of Jesus and His importance for Christian identity (vv. 9–15). All the fullness of God is located in Him. Being filled or completed is experienced in Christ alone, who is the head over all powers (vv. 9–10). Identifying with Christ's death and resurrection through baptism and discipleship is at the heart of Christian identity (vv. 11–13). Christ wiped out the handwriting of requirements or indebtedness (v. 14; see "What Was Nailed to the Cross?," p. 1750) and, through the cross, conquered the "powers" (v. 15). The practices described in v. 16 are shadowy practices in contrast to the substantive reality of Christ (v. 17). False practices and attitudes toward worship (v. 18) are critiqued for not remaining firmly connected to the head, which is Christ (v. 19). Human-generated rules, which are created and followed in obeisance to worldly forces or principles, are wrong because believers have died with Christ to these very elements (vv. 20–23).

Lack of precision in our ability to identify the heretical thinking does not cloud the big picture and is not especially important for our application of Paul's counsel to our lives today. The identity of Jesus's competitors changes with time and place, but Paul's central point is always applicable: Can we confess Jesus Christ with a full heart (2:6)? Is our allegiance to Him untrammeled by undue loyalty to any lesser power? Does Jesus mean all to us that He should? This is the great interrogation of Christian faith, and Paul was pressing it eloquently and repeatedly on the Christians at Colossae. It echoes down to us with strength and clarity. This is the big picture, the clear framework within which we wrestle with the obscure details of 2:8–23.

In v. 8, Paul offers a pointed warning as he opens his refutation of the erroneous views circulating in Colossae. It is possible that he may have been warning against a certain one whom he did not wish to name (cf. 2:4; Gal. 1:7; 5:10). Paul was warning the church against those who would sylagōgeō ("cheat," "spoil," "take captive," employing a military metaphor; cf. Matt. 12:29; Mark 3:27; Luke 11:21–22). Note that Colossians 2:8–15 begins and ends with military language, reminding believers that they are combatants in a spiritual struggle: the Great Controversy.

The phrase in vv. 8, ta stoicheia tou kosmou (cf. v. 20), may refer to "elementary teachings," meaning false and juvenile concepts offered by the heresy (cf. use of ta stoicheia in Heb. 5:12), or to the elemental spiritual forces of the world, thought of in the context of the astral religion of the day as celestial powers requiring loyalty and worship (cf. 1:13, 16; 2:10, 15, 18; cf. Gal. 4:9).

The mention of Christ at the end of Colossians 2:8 cues a fresh description of Him as the fullness of God (see 1:19) who completes or fills believers and is head above all powers (v. 10; cf. 1:16, 18). It also begins a lengthy section exploring how identification with Christ in His death and resurrection shapes Christian discipleship. Paul describes baptism as being buried with Christ (vv. 11–12a; cf. Rom. 6:4) and the new, Christian life as being raised with Him (v. 12b) or being made alive with Him (v. 13; cf. Rom. 6:4; Eph. 2:1–10). Paul closes the section by describing two acts of God in salvation history that enable this death to sin and the experience of new life in Christ: the forgiveness of sins through removing what was against us (Col. 2:13–14; see below, "What Was Nailed to the Cross?") and the conquest of the authorities or principalities and powers through the cross (v. 15).

In vv. 11–13, Paul uses circumcision figuratively to refer to conversion, baptism, and the Christian life in contrast to the uncircumcision of the pre-Christian life of sin. False teachers in Galatia had advocated enforcing the practice of circumcision for Gentile believers, something Paul strongly opposed (Gal. 5:2–6, 11; 6:12–15), and the topic was taken up by the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:1–29), which definitively decided that circumcision is not required. Was this controversy alive at Colossae, or was Paul simply drawing on this language as a now-standard way of discussing Christian identity and baptism (cf. on circumcision; Acts 15:13; Eph. 2:11)? The irenic tone suggests it to be the latter.

What Was Nailed to the Cross?

Having described the participation of believers in Christ's resurrection, Paul celebrates the forgiveness offered in Him (v. 13). God made that forgiveness available by erasing a handwritten document (cheirographon) that contained dogma (ordinances or rules; cf. 2:20; Eph. 2:15) and opposed us. Paul elaborates that the handwritten document was taken away and nailed to the cross (Col. 2:14).

Some regard this as a picturesque way of portraying the cancellation of God's moral law, the Ten Commandments. However, in Colossians, Paul alludes to several of the Ten Commandments remaining valid for Christians (3:5–9, 18–21; cf. Eph. 6:1–2, which quotes the fifth commandment), and, as we have seen, he drew on the language of the fourth commandment to describe Christ as Creator and Reconciler of "all things" (see commentary on Col. 1:13–23). Therefore, the imagery may be understood as describing the annulment of the ceremonial or ritual laws of the OT, which were augmented in the interest of barring Gentiles from being known as people of God. These ritual laws, which had become burdensome (Luke 11:46; Acts 15:10), were fulfilled by Christ, and believers are no longer required to practice them (see PP 365).

An alternative view, reflected in a number of translations, understands the cheirographon to be a written certificate of debt composed by the sinner as an acknowledgment of guilt and used by the worldly powers (cf. Col. 2:15) to taunt the sinner and justify condemnation. In this view, Paul visualizes the forgiveness God offers in a dramatic way (v. 13), indicating that God canceled our legal indebtedness to the Law, which condemned us. It is not God's Moral Law that is annulled but the incriminating records of the sinner's guilt.

In Colossians 2:15, Paul concludes this section by celebrating Christ's victory on the cross over the authorities or principalities and powers. When Christ's disciples witnessed His crucifixion, they experienced it as a crushing defeat; however, His resurrection precipitated a great reversal in understanding regarding what happened at Calvary. Paul uses the language of the Roman victory parade, the Triumph, to describe what God accomplished in Christ on the cross. Through the cross, God conquered the powers who had been created by Christ (1:16) and who were in rebellion against Him. He rendered them harmless when He defeated and disarmed them. Then He included them in Christ's victory parade as bound captives, making them the recipients of open cosmic shame.

Paul's description of the defeat of these powers was powerful rhetoric in the first century and it remains so today. Paul was asking those ancient believers why they would consider offering worship and allegiance to the powers who had already been defeated and humiliated by Christ. They did not deserve worship. The Lord Jesus Christ is the only One worthy of it (2:6–7).

In vv. 16–19, Paul offers two parallel commands: First, to let no one judge and to reject such judgment in a number of areas specified in a list (vv. 16–17; see below, "Meaning of 'Sabbath' in Colossians 2:16"), because these practices are "a shadow" of what is to come whereas the substance or reality (sōma, "body") belongs to Christ (v. 17). To adopt such practices in obeisance to the powers would be to grasp at a shadow, to miss the fact that Christ both created (1:15–20) and conquered them (2:15). Christ is no shadow; rather, He is the head of all powers (2:10), the reality. How we eat and worship should correspond with the joyous news that Christ, who personifies all that is substantive and real, has come.

Meaning of "Sabbath" in Colossians 2:16

What are we to make of the mention of "sabbath" in Colossians 2:16? Opponents of the seventh-day Sabbath often regard this as the pivotal passage that speaks against the Sabbath, so it is vital that we consider the issue carefully.

The issue begins with a number of important initial questions, the first of which is whether the word "sabbath" is plural as in some translations ("sabbaths") or singular, "a Sabbath" or "a Sabbath day," as in other translations. Though the Greek form appears to be plural (sabbatōn), it is used elsewhere in the NT with a singular connotation (Matt. 28:1; Luke 4:16; Acts 13:14; 16:13) and, in the company of the singular terms "festival" and "new moon," should be regarded as singular here as well. However, that does not answer the more central question of whether the "sabbath" in question is the weekly Sabbath or a yearly ceremonial one.

Another initial question has to do with the situation Paul had in mind when he counseled that we let no one judge us (Col. 2:16). Were the judgmental people to whom Paul alludes criticizing the believers in Colossae for engaging in these practices, for not engaging in them, or for participating in them incorrectly according to their perception? Whatever judgment they were presenting, Paul opposed it. The precise nature of the critique in question is less clear.

A common view among Christians is that this is a negative mention of the weekly seventh-day Sabbath and that Paul was advocating that Christians should no longer observe it. This view is an unlikely option for a number of important reasons, including the following two.

First, it would be the only negative mention of the seventh-day Sabbath in the NT, which consistently portrays both Jesus (Luke 4:16) and Paul (Acts 17:2) as regular Sabbath-keepers. Sabbath-keeping was important to Paul's mission strategy and to the congregations he was founding (Acts 13:14, 27, 42, 44; 16:13; 18:4; 24:14; 28:17), and when early Christians worshiped, they sometimes did so in the language of the Sabbath commandment (Acts 4:23–24). If this were to change, one would expect an extended and stormy controversy to erupt (as happened with circumcision; see Acts 15:1–29 and the Epistle to the Galatians). However, we find only oblique and ambiguous references to holy days (Rom. 14:5; Gal. 4:10) and this "sabbath." It seems unlikely that this would be the only direct evidence suggesting that early Christians had moved away from worshiping on the seventh-day Sabbath.

Second, the seventh-day Sabbath did not emerge at the time of the giving of the law on Mount Sinai (Ex. 19–31). It is a Creation ordinance that has universal applicability (Gen. 2:1–3). Paul was aware of this as he composed Colossians, as can be seen in how he treated Colossians 1:15–20 and how he alluded to the Creation story in drawing on the language of the Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20:8–11) to describe Christ as the Creator of "all things" in heaven and on earth (Col. 1:16). Having linked Christ to the seventh-day Sabbath and placed Him at the heart of the drama of Creation, it would have been strange for him to then have argued for the abolishment of the weekly Sabbath.

If this is not a negative mention of the seventh-day Sabbath where Paul argues for its past abolishment, what is it? Three views, which are in harmony with the commitment of Paul and other early Christians to worship Christ on the seventh-day Sabbath, are worthy of consideration.

A long-standing view is that the "sabbath" mentioned here is a reference to the ceremonial sabbaths of the Jewish calendar (Lev. 23:4–44). With the arrival of Christ, Christians no longer needed to observe these "sabbaths" or "sabbath days," which were "a shadow" of what was to come (Col. 2:17). In this view, Paul was writing against the incorrect advocacy for observing Jewish ceremonial "sabbaths," such as Passover and the Day of Atonement. A major criticism of this view is that it discounts Paul's list of yearly (festival), monthly (new moon), and weekly (sabbaths) observances (1:16), which is frequently reflected in the OT (see 1 Chr. 23:29–31; 2 Chr. 2:4; 8:12–13; 31:3; Neh. 10:33; Is. 1:13–14; Ezek. 45:13–17; 46:1–15; Hos. 2:11). However, this understanding of the OT background of the three terms simplifies the OT evidence, which often does not present a very exact parallel. Hosea 2:11, where the annual sabbaths rather than the seventh-day Sabbath may be under discussion, may offer the closest parallel to Colossians 2:16. It should be noted that this view, in which the "sabbaths" of 2:16 have been understood as annually held ceremonial ones rather than the weekly seventh-day Sabbath, was the common view of the passage among Christians in the United States during the nineteenth century and has been the traditional position advocated by Seventh-day Adventists.

A second view identifies the "sabbath" of the passage not as the festivals themselves but as the sacrifices to be offered during the festivals. The weekly seventh-day Sabbath is indeed mentioned, but Paul narrowly refers to the ritual sacrifices that were to be offered on it. This view is plausible, because OT passages closely associate the yearly, monthly, and weekly observances with the sacrifices offered on them (see the passages listed earlier as well as Num. 28–29, esp. 28:1–2, 9–10; 29:39). The mention of food and drink (v. 16) aligns with this perspective, since these terms refer more naturally to the food and drink offerings mentioned in the OT (Num. 28–29; Neh. 10:33; Ezek. 45:17) than to any OT dietary laws. In addition, the phrase translated "with regard to" or "regarding" is more accurately translated "in part of," suggesting that Paul is referring to only a part of a feast, or new moon, or sabbath. That "part" is best identified as the ritual sacrifices. Paul, then, was speaking against continuing to practice the sacrificial system, which is no longer to be observed by Christians, as it was a shadow of what should come that has since given way to Christ, the reality (Col. 2:17; cf. Heb. 10:1–10, which may be seen as expanding the thought of Col. 2:16–17).

A third view holds that Paul, in the passage, is reflecting the OT sequence of yearly, monthly, and weekly observances and that "sabbaths" or "a Sabbath (day)" is a mention of the seventh-day Sabbath. However, Paul mentions sabbath in light of the controversy at hand, in which he was opposing a heresy honoring the philosophies of the world (v. 8) instead of Christ, who is "the head" of all power (v. 10)—spiritual forces that have been totally conquered by Christ (v. 15). The word that begins v. 16 points back to this context. Having mentioned sabbath, he again argues against the "worship of angels" (Col. 2:18), obeisance to the philosophies of the world (v. 20), and not staying connected to Christ (v. 19). Paul was not opposed to keeping Sabbath, but to keeping it as an occasion to honor powers who have already been defeated by Christ and are not worthy of reverence. It is not the use of festivals, new moon celebrations, or Sabbath that he decries, but their misuse. Following Jesus's example (e.g., Matt. 12:1–8; Luke 13:10–17; cf. Mark 7:1–13), Paul weighed in against the perversion of God-given laws, which in their sullied form reflect human philosophy, which can be deceptive (Col. 2:8, 22). When celebrated in honor of the powers, these observances become "a shadow" of what is yet to come instead of a celebration of Christ, as should be the case (v. 17). (In this view, Paul was not addressing rituals attached to the temple that had been fulfilled in Christ, a topic that is discussed elsewhere in the NT; see Matt. 26:26–28; John 4:19–26; Heb. 8:1–5; 10:1–10.) If Paul was drawing on the language of the Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20:8–11) in Colossians 1:15–20 to place Christ as Creator and Redeemer at the heart of the seventh-day Sabbath, he had already offered a corrective to the erroneous use of the Sabbath he addresses here.

In the context of a complex passage that presents challenging questions and where only tentative conclusions seem prudent, this last option may be the most defensible because it reflects the core dispute most clearly, which concerns the worship of Christ in contrast to the powers. It is difficult to see the direct connection of "sabbath," understood as the annual ceremonial sabbaths or as Sabbath sacrifices, to this central controversy that Paul was so keen to address (for discussion of the Colossian heresy, see Colossians: Introduction; see commentary on Col. 2:8–23).

Whichever view is adopted, the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath as a day to look back to God's Creation of the world and to celebrate Christ's work both as Creator and Redeemer should be affirmed: for through Him "all things were created . . . visible and invisible" (1:16). The seventh-day Sabbath is now a memorial of both Creation and salvation and should be kept, not with any attempt to earn our salvation, but with thanksgiving for all that God has done for us through Christ Jesus, Creator and Redeemer.

Paul's second command in 2:16–19 continues the tone set by the first: he admonishes the Colossians to let no one cheat or disqualify them from their reward (v. 18). Believers are to beware of the person who advocates for humility, which is usually a positive term (e.g., 3:12; Eph. 4:2; Phil. 2:3), but here likely means asceticism or harsh treatment of one's body (cf. Col. 2:23); practices the "worship of angels," which probably means "worship offered to angels" but could also mean "worship performed by angels" (i.e., heavenly worship); and boasts of visions or false claims about what is unseen. (Manuscripts differ here; some refer to those who enter into "things which he has not seen," while others refer to those who enter into "that which is seen." In either case, the claims are false and show that the humility being advocated is false as well, as the visions or false claims result in false teachers being "puffed up.") Visions are not inherently evil, as evidenced by how Paul himself experienced them as an important source of divine guidance (Acts 9:12; 16:9–10; 18:9–10; 23:11; 27:23–24; 2 Cor. 12:1–7). However, the visions to which Paul refers seem to have been related to worshiping angels rather than honoring Christ and resulted in pride on the part of the visionary. All of these—humility, worship of angels, and visions—were practiced in a way that detracted from the undiluted loyalty to Christ that should be the hallmark of discipleship. Those who practiced them were at fault, losing their connection with Christ, the Head, who Paul describes as the One who nourishes, unifies, and grows the church, His body (v. 19; cf. Eph. 4:1–16).

In Colossians 2:20–23, Paul assumes that Christians have died with Christ to the things of the world (cf. vv. 11–12a). He notes the disjuncture between this fact and human-crafted taboos, which had apparently been adopted in honor of the elemental spirits of the universe (see commentary on Col. 2:8–23) and have a surface appearance of spirituality in that they exhibit "self-imposed" religion and worship, "false humility," and mistreatment of the body (v. 23). It is a thin veneer, since keeping such taboos proves to be of no value against the indulgence of the flesh (v. 23), abstaining from which is one of the marks of genuine Christian discipleship (3:5). Paul did not protest to establishing rules for behavior; he sometimes uses language very similar to the taboos he opposed. For example, in 2 Corinthians 6:17, he tells believers not to touch anything unclean, and in Colossians 3:1—4:6, he offers quite a number of rules or guidelines. However, these do not reflect loyalty to the powers but commitment to putting on the new self, fashioned in the Creator's image (3:10).

3:1–17. The Old Self and the New Self. Having criticized the false teachers for failing to stay connected to Christ (2:8–19), Paul moves on to define a genuinely Christ-centered life. In this rich vein of exhortation regarding Christian identity, Paul expresses three fundamental facets of life in Christ: how Christian existence is rooted in the risen, exalted Christ (vv. 1–4); the need to take off old, destructive patterns of life (vv. 5–11); and the need to put on new, Christlike patterns of building a grace-filled, Christ-shaped community in the church (vv. 12–17). In this passage, each mention of Christ demonstrates the way Paul continues to pursue his theme: the importance and centrality of Jesus.

In vv. 1–4, Paul first describes how believers' past solidarity with Jesus in His death, resurrection, and exaltation transformed the present (vv. 1–3) before recounting how believers' present solidarity with Jesus transforms the future (v. 4). Having just reminded the Colossian believers that they had "died with Christ" (2:20; cf. 2:11–12; 3:3), Paul next reminded them of their resurrection and exaltation with Him (v. 1; cf. 2:12–13; Eph. 2:4–7), thus urging them to focus on what is above rather than on the things on earth (Col. 3:2; on the exaltation of Christ "at the right hand of God" [v. 1], see Ps. 110:1; Acts 2:33–36; Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:19–21). Paul is not asking believers to disconnect from the realities of life. Rather, he is asserting that intentionally focusing on the reality of Christ and His status as the victorious, exalted Lord (1:15–20; 2:15; Phil. 2:10–11) is a vital aspect of living life as a Christian.

Because believers are "in Christ," they can anticipate a hope-filled future centered on Christ's Second Coming, which is often described as His appearance (v. 4) in the NT (e.g., 2 Thess. 2:8; Titus 2:13; 1 Pet. 5:4; 1 John 2:28). The current solidarity between believers and Jesus will be mirrored in that grand event when we join Him in His glorious appearance (cf. 1 Thess. 4:17; 1 John 3:2). In Colossians, Paul ties the theme of future hope directly to the person of Jesus. Hope is reserved for us in heaven (1:5), because that is where Christ is, sitting "at the right hand of God" (3:1). Christ Himself is "the hope of glory" (1:27), the content of the hope that can be found in the gospel (1:23). The gospel reward is not disconnected from Christ but is personified in Him. While our Christ-centered hope is currently stored in heaven (1:5) and is therefore hidden from sight, that will change when believers appear with Him "in glory" (3:4). Jesus is our hope!

With an identity rooted in the exalted Christ (vv. 1–4), believers are to "put to death" (v. 5; cf. vv. 8–9) or set aside their old pattern of life, which is marked by sexual sins (vv. 5–7) and the misuse of speech (vv. 8–9), and "put on" a new Christlike pattern of living in which usual divisions are dissolved (vv. 10–11).

All of the terms for vices in v. 5 (and those for desire in 1 Thess. 4:5 and covetousness in Eph. 4:19; 5:5) likely indicate sexual sins. The word used here means "greediness," the uncontrollable desire for sex, or what we might call a sexual addiction today. In Jewish literature, it was common to trace such sexual sins to the basic sin of idolatry. In modern times, when addictions to pornography are so prevalent, it is not difficult to see the connection between idolatry, which can be the worship of pornographic images, and a life consumed by sexual sins.

Does our passage offer any hope to escape such self-destructive patterns of behavior? Paul sharply criticizes the rules and practices of the false teachers as not being valuable in controlling indulgences (Col. 2:23) and proclaims that the remedy for such a lifestyle comes in grasping and actualizing one's identity in Christ. In baptism, believers identify with Christ in His death and experience the power of His resurrection, giving them the ability to live a new life (2:11–13, 20). This does not mean that baptized believers are perfect; they must still combat sin by activating and actualizing the new life in Christ by putting to death (3:5) whatever remnants of their old life remain.

If the old life is marked by sexual sin (vv. 5–7), it is also scarred by the use of speech to destroy relationships and poison communities in outbursts of emotions such as anger, malice, and bitterness (v. 8; the word here sometimes translated as "blasphemy" probably refers to slander against another person rather than speaking directly against God, though it may include that as well; see Eph. 4:31; 1 Tim. 6:4.) Filthy language and lying are signs of the old life (Col. 3:8–9), and as with sexual sin, the remedy for the believer is to embrace one's identity in Christ and combat these sins by embracing the new life, which is renewed according to the image of the Creator (v. 10). Christ as "the image of the invisible God" (Col. 1:15) is the pattern for the re-creation of believers (cf. Rom. 8:29; 1 Cor. 15:49; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:4), just as God was the pattern for the creation of humanity (Gen. 1:26). Paul relies on the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:1–17; Deut. 5:6–21) in detailing the vices of Colossians 3:5, 8–9, with a number of the commands reflected here. This demonstrates Paul's continued appreciation for the Ten Commandments as a standard for Christian behavior.

Turning away from sexual sins and the misuse of speech by adopting a Christlike pattern of life offers a new kind of community (vv. 10–11). The Greco-Roman world was marked by divisions between Jews and Gentiles and between the slaves and the free. It was also a world in which prejudices were rife, especially against the "barbarian," who lived on the fringes of the Roman Empire and did not speak Greek, and the ultimate outsider, the Scythian (v. 11), who had a reputation as the most savage of the barbarians. For Paul, the power of God, demonstrated in Christ Jesus, is powerful enough to transform the most uncouth, uncivilized, and violent person and draw him or her into the church as the theater of God's grace. Paul dared to imagine the church exhibiting a new type of community in which the most intransigent divisions and deep-seated prejudices are swallowed up in Christian identity—a community in which Christ pervades all and is all (v. 11; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:28).

In vv. 12–17, Paul makes it clear that the type of church fellowship he was thinking of offers more than the absence of the usual divisiveness; it offers a profound, Christ-shaped fellowship marked by virtues such as kindness and humility (v. 12; cf. Gal. 5:22–23) as well as the practices of bearing with and forgiving each another, in accordance with Christ's own actions toward believers (Col. 3:13). These practices are crowned by the virtue of love, which binds everything together in a perfectly harmonious way (v. 14). Paul encourages the addition of thankfulness and peace from God (v. 15) to this already impressive list of virtues to be practiced in Christian congregations.

Paul imagined these winsome qualities of Christ-shaped community affecting the worship life of the house church or churches in Colossae (v. 16). He imagined believers teaching and admonishing one another, especially through psalms and hymns, praising God in an attitude of grace or thankfulness.

In this section (vv. 12–17), Paul once again emphasizes the importance of having a proper reverence for Christ while also discussing the related subject of Christ-shaped community. The forgiveness believers are to practice is Christ's own (v. 13), the peace that is to reign is Christ's (v. 15), and the word that is to ring out in their midst is Christ's message (v. 16), so Paul's charge in v. 17 seems entirely appropriate in its call for believers to live their lives "in the name of the Lord Jesus," with thanks being passed to God the Father through Christ.

The largest questions raised by 3:1–17 are not interpretive ones. The clear language of this eloquent passage leaves us hungry for the Christian life and thirsty for the Christian community that Paul envisioned. The largest questions are these: How do we, as believers, live out this new life in Christ? And how do we, as congregations, experience this grace-filled, Christ-shaped community? Part of the answer surely comes in bringing these important questions back to this passage again and again and asking the Holy Spirit to help us hear and live the answers. In these verses, Paul announces the indications of God's grace in Christ: we have been raised with Christ and possess a new identity in Him, and our congregations are the body of Christ, nourished and renewed through Him. Paul also declares the imperative of becoming what we are in Christ: experiencing life in Christ requires us to set our minds on Him, and experiencing Christ-shaped community requires us to "put on" the tender mercies of Christ and forgive one another as He has forgiven us. We must rejoice in the indications of God's grace and strive to respond to the imperative—His claim on us. The structure of Paul's argument suggests that it is in pursuing these two central Christian callings that we will come to know and experience answers, which will always be personified in Christ Jesus our Lord.

3:18—4:1. Rules for the Christian Household. In 3:1–7, Paul explores how the values of the gospel, such as grace, forgiveness, love, and peace, should transform the congregation's relationships and worship. Here, by providing a household code or list of rules, he describes how the values of the gospel should infuse the Christian household. Paul did not invent the household code, which is reflected in Jewish literature and in the wider Greco-Roman world. Our passage and the closely related and more extensive one in Ephesians 5:21—6:9 are the two clearest examples of this code in the NT (cf. Titus 2:2–10; 1 Pet. 2:13—3:7). Paul addresses three sets of relationships: wives-husbands (Col. 3:18–19), children-fathers (3:20–21), and slaves-masters (3:22—4:1).

Paul's counsel regarding these relationships may seem antiquated and time-bound, but comparing it with other ancient counsel concerning these relationships helps highlight its distinctive qualities. Sirach, a collection of Jewish writings from the second century B.C., offers the following counsel: Regarding wives, "Woman is the origin of sin, and it is through her that we all die. Do not leave a leaky cistern to drip or allow a bad wife to say what she likes. If she does not accept your control, divorce her and send her away." Regarding children, "He who loves his son will whip him often. . . . Pamper a child, and he will terrorize you; play with him, and he will grieve you." Regarding slaves, "Fodder and a stick and burdens for a donkey; bread and discipline and work for a slave. . . . Yoke and thong will bow the neck. . . ." Against the backdrop of such counsel circulating in Paul's day, his advice stands out as quite distinct. Whereas most ancient counsel was directed only to the husband, father, and slave master, Paul addresses wives, children, and slaves as well. Whereas most ancient counsel was preoccupied with maintaining the honor and power of the husband, father, and slave master, Paul brought the values of the gospel to bear on these relationships, emphasizing mutuality and community between all parties. Paul expresses his interest in the good name of Christian faith (4:5; cf. 1 Pet. 2:12) and in appropriate order and decorum in Christian households. However, he also manifests his deep commitment to the transforming values of the gospel and the dramatic impact they should have (Col. 3:11), mentioning the Lord as the arbiter of all relationships seven times in the Greek (the mention of "the Lord Christ" in v. 24 suggests that it is Christ who is in view in all of these expressions). Both of these motivations are evident as he gives his counsel.

Paul offers his brief words of guidance to wives and husbands in vv. 18–19. As in each set of relationships, he addresses the less powerful partner in the relationship first, counseling wives to submit to their husbands. That word of counsel is constrained by his added phrase that they should do so only "as is fitting in the Lord" (v. 18). As important as the relationship is between a husband and a wife, the Christian wife, through her belief and baptism, has established a still more important relationship with Jesus Christ as Lord. Tender, Christian love (agapaō; cf. 3:12; related to the noun agapē; cf. 2:2; 3:14), rather than bitterness or harshness, should characterize the Christian husband's relationship to his wife.

In his advice to children and fathers in vv. 20–21, Paul asks children in Christian households to always obey their parents (drawing on the Ten Commandments; Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; cf. Eph. 6:1). However, he again points to the still more important relationship with the Lord and states how this obedience pleases Him. Fathers are encouraged not to exercise unbounded authority over their children but to avoid provoking and discouraging them.

While his counsel to husbands and wives and parents and children is very brief, his advice to Christian bond servants or slaves is more extensive (Col. 3:22–25). We know the name of one Christian slave, Onesimus, and one Christian slave master from Colossae, Philemon (see commentary on Col. 4:7–18; the Epistle to Philemon). Paul again counsels complete obedience, but he carefully nuances the appropriate motivation (sincerity) and productivity (working diligently) as directed ultimately not toward the slave master but to the Lord. The Christian slave, as a possessor of the Christian hope (see commentary on Col. 3:1–17), may look to the Lord for a reward for the work done, which will consist not of mere wages but of an inheritance (v. 24).

Verse 25 contains a final note that is likely directed to both slaves and slave masters, reminding both that there is no favoritism with the Lord (cf. Eph. 6:9). Paul's direct counsel to masters instructs on fair treatment of slaves, reminding masters that as Christian disciples, they "also have a Master in heaven" (Col. 4:1).

The inclusion of slavery, which is an inherently immoral social structure, in the NT household codes (3:22—4:1; Eph. 6:5–9; Titus 2:9–10; 1 Pet. 2:18–25) suggests that the lasting significance of these passages is not to enforce any specific pattern of marriage or parenting (e.g., hierarchical vs. egalitarian) but to underline the need for Christians of any era to allow the values of the gospel to inform and transform relationships between husbands and wives and between parents and children.

4:2–6. Concluding Exhortations. Before providing closing greetings and instructions (4:7–18), Paul offers concluding exhortations that deal with how the Colossian believers could support his mission through prayer (vv. 2–4) and how they should live among nonbelievers

(vv. 5–6). A single theme moves through the segment: the need to prayerfully take advantage of time and opportunities to share "the mystery of Christ" (v. 3).

At the beginning of the letter, Paul recounted at some length his own prayer life on behalf of the believers in Colossae (1:3–14), so it is appropriate that he should return to this theme at the letter's end, both here in vv. 2–4 and in his praise of Epaphras in v. 12. The times demanded earnestness and vigilance in prayer, and Paul was laying special claim to their intercession on behalf of his mission to spread the gospel, a task to which he was dedicated in spite of being in prison (vv. 3–4; cf. Eph. 6:18–20, which shares thematic and verbal parallels). This is the final reference to thankfulness in the letter (Col. 4:2), which Paul mentioned repeatedly when he took up the topic of prayer (1:3, 12; 2:7; 3:17). For Paul, thanksgiving did not seem to be only a helpful feature or characteristic of Christian prayer but the very essence of it. To pray is to thank God for what He has done for us in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Still concerned about the progress of the gospel, Paul exhorted the addressees to be wise in interactions with nonbelievers and to speak to them with grace and care (4:5–6). By being wise in their relationships with outsiders, the believers could participate in "redeeming the time," making the "best use of the time," or making "the most of every opportunity," as the phrase has been variously interpreted (v. 5). Paul uses a marketplace term, exagorazō, which has to do with "snapping up bargains" while they are on offer, to visualize making the most of the time before Christ's return (cf. Eph. 5:16). That speech should be "seasoned with salt" may reflect similar uses in Greco-Roman literature. Paul would then have been imagining Christians fellowshiping with non-Christians in the marketplace and at the meal table and attracting them to their faith through their winsome speech and grace-filled answers to questions about their beliefs. Alternatively, Paul's words here may draw on the OT laws for offering sacrifices accompanied by salt (Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:24). We would do well to think of our speech in the presence of nonbelievers as an offering to God and therefore invite Him to purify and bless it.

4:7–18

Closing Greetings and Instructions

We come now to the end of this significant letter with its vigorous testimony regarding Jesus. It might be tempting to see this final section as a string of unimportant notes about minor characters; however, it mentions several interesting people, fine examples of a community of coworkers who, with Paul, were invested in the proclamation of Jesus as Lord. This section serves as a bracing reminder that belief in Christ is not simply a mental exercise but is to be lived out in worship and service.

In concluding the letter, Paul first introduces Tychicus and Onesimus (vv. 7–9). We presume that they are the letter bearers, and it is likely that Tychicus is the one who read the letter to the believers in Colossae, perhaps blushing as he articulated these laudatory words (see v. 16). Tychicus, from Asia Minor, accompanied Paul as a delegate from the Gentile churches in the region when, prior to Paul's arrest, they delivered the collection to the believers in Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). As Paul's trusted confidant and faithful coworker, he sometimes served as a surrogate for or messenger from Paul (2 Tim. 4:12; Titus 3:12). That Paul calls Tychicus his fellow servant (Col. 4:7) is particularly striking since Tychicus was to accompany Onesimus from Colossae. Onesimus was the slave of Philemon, to whom Paul composed a letter requesting his freedom.

Several facts suggest that the Epistles to Colossae, Ephesus, Philemon, and Laodicea (v. 16) were written at about the same time and were carried by Tychicus and Onesimus on the same journey: in the Greek text, vv. 7–8 are nearly identical to Ephesians 6:21–22, five of Paul's associates who are mentioned here in vv. 7–18 (Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke) are also named in Philemon 23–24, and in each of the existing letters, Paul shares the news that he was a prisoner at the time.

Paul next offers the Colossians greetings from three men he labeled as his coworkers: Aristarchus, Mark, and Jesus "who is called Justus" (Col. 4:10–11), the only Jews who were with him at that time (vv. 10–11). In a touching note, he adds that these three had proved to be "a comfort" to him (v. 11). Paul calls Aristarchus "my fellow prisoner" (v. 10), a term which means "fellow prisoner of war." A native of Thessalonica, Aristarchus worked with Paul in Asia Minor and was with him during the riot in Ephesus, bearing the brunt of the crowd's anger (Acts 19:29). He traveled with Paul from Troas to Asia Minor (Acts 20:4, 6) and also to Rome (Acts 27:2; Philem. 24).

Mark, also known as John Mark, had deserted both his cousin Barnabas and Paul on their first missionary journey (Acts 13:13), and Paul's subsequent refusal to take him on the succeeding trip resulted in Paul and Barnabas parting ways (Acts 15:36–41). However, given the positive mention here and Paul's request to Timothy to bring Mark with him because of his previous helpfulness to Paul (2 Tim. 4:11), the relationship had obviously been mended and Mark had once again become a trusted coworker and friend (for more on Mark, see Mark: Introduction). Since he is mentioned only here, we know nothing further about the Jesus who was also called Justus. (For discussion of Epaphras and the fine example he offers us [Col. 4:12–13], see Colossians: Introduction.)

Colossians 4:14 is the only place in the NT where Luke, Paul's traveling companion, is called a physician, and it is also from this passage that we learn he was a Gentile, since Paul did not include him in the list of Jewish coworkers (for more on Luke, see Acts 16:10–17; 20:5—21:18; 27–28; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11; see Luke: Introduction). Demas was a Gentile coworker of Paul's who apparently later deserted him (2 Tim. 4:10).

In Colossians 4:15–16, Paul asks the Colossians to convey his greetings to brothers and sisters in Laodicea, a city about eleven miles (18 km) west of Colossae (Laodicea or Laodiceans are mentioned several times in vv. 13–16 and in 2:1). Laodicea is the final of the seven churches of Revelation (Rev. 3:14–22). By Paul's time, Laodicea had become a wealthy, thriving city that overshadowed the smaller Colossae.

Two puzzles present themselves in these verses: Some translations mention Nymphas and the church that was in his house (Col. 4:15), clearly understanding the name to be masculine. However, based on a different understanding of the manuscript evidence, most other translations read, "Nympha and the church in her house." In this view, Nympha would be the patroness or leader of a house church meeting in Laodicea (cf. Phoebe in Rom. 16:1–2; Priscilla in Rom. 16:3–5; 1 Cor. 16:19; and perhaps Mary the mother of John Mark in Acts 12:12). The other puzzle comes in wondering what became of the letter Paul wrote to the Laodiceans (Col. 4:16). Marcion the Heretic (died c. A.D. 160) calls the Epistle to the Ephesians by that name, but in all likelihood the letter was simply lost (see Ephesians: Introduction). That Paul encouraged the exchange of letters between Colossae and Laodicea suggests that even during his lifetime Paul's letters began to be collected and shared, pointing to their eventual inclusion in the NT (cf. 2 Pet. 3:15–16).

Paul instructed the Colossian believers to speak a word to Archippus on his behalf. The message is somewhat ambiguous; was it a word of encouragement or of warning? His inclusion in the opening greeting of Philemon (Philem. 2) suggests that he may have been a member of Philemon's household, perhaps his son. Since Paul labels him there "our fellow soldier," they must have ministered together at some earlier time (see Philemon: Introduction; see commentary on Philem. 1–3).

Paul concludes with an authenticating signature (cf. 1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; 2 Thess. 3:17; Philem. 19), a call to remember his chains, which may be a renewed request to pray for him (cf. Col. 4:2–4) or to provide financial help, and a brief benediction that reads, "Grace be with you" (to which some manuscripts add the Greek word amēn, reflected in some translations).

To review this final section is to be impressed with the number of Paul's coworkers and their importance to him, especially in relation to a church he had not visited. In both Acts and the Pauline Epistles, some one hundred different people are associated with Paul, nearly forty of whom are designated in some way as his co-workers. Paul clearly understood the importance of recruiting and training others to join the effort of spreading the gospel. He treasured those who worked alongside him and valued their partnership, modeling the Christ-shaped community about which he wrote so passionately (3:12–17). One can only wonder at Paul's joy when, at the moment of the realization of the Christian hope, the hope of glory (1:27), he will meet them again.

1 THESSALONIANS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. This letter does not have a formal title attached to it. However, the introduction to the letter indicates that it was written "to the church of the Thessalonians" (1:1).

Three individuals were involved in its production: Paul, Silas (or Silvanus), and Timothy. While they adopt a common voice throughout (e.g., 1:2, 6), Paul addresses the Thessalonians directly three times (2:18; 3:5; 5:27). This indicates that he was the primary author. Silas was a multilingual prophet and leader entrusted by the Jerusalem Council to accompany Paul on his missionary journeys. This was to ensure the enforcement of their decision on circumcision (Acts 15:22–32). Like Paul, Silas was a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37–38). Timothy, whose mother was a believing Jewess and his father a Greek, was chosen by Paul to complement his team (Acts 16:1–3; 2 Tim. 1:5).

Date. The letter was written in Corinth (Acts 18:1–17). Luke, another coworker of Paul, identifies the proconsul in office during Paul's stay in Corinth as Gallio (Acts 18:12). Inscriptional evidence indicates that Gallio held office from A.D. 51 to 52. This makes this letter one of our earliest Christian texts and, depending on how one dates Galatians, maybe even the earliest (see Galatians: Introduction). Thus, this letter was probably written in late A.D. 50 or sometime in A.D. 51.

Backgrounds. According to Acts 17, Paul arrived in Thessalonica during his second missionary journey (ca. A.D. 49–52). Wanting to share the gospel with the local Jews, he addressed the synagogue over three Sabbaths, demonstrating from the OT that it was necessary for the Messiah to suffer and to rise from the dead (Acts 17:3). A number of Jews—God-fearers and some leading women—responded positively. Consequently, the remaining Jews became jealous and rose up in opposition against Paul. After inciting a mob that failed to find and assault Paul, the unbelieving Jews lodged a formal accusation against Paul before the magistrates, charging that his message about Jesus was a direct challenge to Caesar's rule (Acts 17:1–9). The authorities banned Paul from their city, forcing him to leave the new congregation of believers unexpectedly (1 Thess. 2:17–18). Paul and his coworkers fled to Berea (Acts 17:10–13). From there, Paul proceeded alone to Athens (Acts 17:14, 16–34) and then to Corinth (Acts 18:1–4). This sequence of events, dependent on the record in Acts, largely agrees with what is indicated in this letter to the Thessalonians. A seeming difference between the two accounts is that Paul states in 1 Thessalonians that Silas (or Silvanus) and Timothy were present with him in Athens. It is possible that the two could have joined him in Athens later. Worried about the spiritual well-being of the Thessalonian believers, Paul sent Timothy back to Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:1–2). When Timothy returned with an encouraging report, Paul had already moved on to Corinth (cf. 3:6; Acts 18:5). Thus, it was from the city of Corinth that Paul wrote 1 Thessalonians.

First Thessalonians reflects the standard form of a Greco-Roman letter. We find an "A to B, greetings" (1 Thess. 1:1); introductory prayers (1:2–10; 2:13–16); a closing greeting (5:26); and a blessing (5:28). The central sections of Paul's letters do not conform to any one particular structure but rather reflect the specific situations he faced.

Theology and Purpose. The primary purpose of the letter is to maintain hope amid the people of God as they await their future salvation. This is done by addressing several important theological topics.

1. The Identity of God's People. Paul seeks to affirm the identity of the Thessalonians as the people of God by applying the story of Israel to this fledgling Christian community. Israel was chosen by God to be a holy nation over which He would rule (Deut. 7:6–7). They were to manifest His holiness and to serve Him rather than other gods (Ex. 20:3; Lev. 11:44–45; 19:2; Josh. 24:15). The practicalities of holiness and service were spelled out in various covenants. God's response to Israel when they were faithful was to sanctify them and deem them blameless (cf. Gen. 17:1; Lev. 21:8; 22:32). However, due to Israel's persistent unfaithfulness, they were sent into exile. Postexilic Jews anticipated a great "day of the Lord" when God would save them from foreign oppression through an outpouring of His wrath on the ungodly (Is. 13:6–10; 59:15–20).

Paul applied elements from this storyline to the Thessalonians. They had been called by God to be His people (1 Thess. 1:4; 2:12; 5:24). They were to serve Him and had turned away from other gods (1:9). God would make them holy so that they might be counted blameless as His people on the Day of the Lord, when through His saving wrath, He would deliver them from persecution (1:10; 3:13; 5:9, 23). Paul wanted the Thessalonians to understand that they were firstly children of God and only secondly citizens of a particular city.

2. Nurture and Hope. Paul expressed his immediate concern that the Thessalonians remain faithful to their calling, be holy in love, and maintain their hope in the Day of the Lord. He used the three virtues of faith, love, and hope, introduced in 1:3, to convey this purpose. Paul was concerned that the Thessalonians had abandoned their calling due to persecution and so sent Timothy to ascertain the condition of their faith (3:2, 5). Timothy returned and reported that the Thessalonians were continuing in faith and love (3:6). Conspicuously absent from his report, however, was any reference to hope (3:6; cf. 4:13). This is because the Thessalonians were in danger of experiencing a crisis of hope related to the future regarding those who had died (4:15b). The dead in Christ would not lose out, and the Thessalonians were not to grieve as those who had no hope (4:13). This divine revelation enabled them to put on the breastplate of faith and love, and the helmet of the hope of salvation (5:8). The three virtues of faith, love, and hope might once more be experienced in all their fullness.

3. Divine Instruction. Paul portrayed both himself and God as caring and considerate teachers tailoring their teaching to the situation facing the Thessalonians. Good teachers taught through two means in the Greco-Roman world. Firstly, they communicated their values and ideas through their words. This required their students to actively listen and understand. Secondly, they provided a living paradigm to imitate through their deeds. Good teachers tried to ensure that their deeds matched their words. Paul portrays himself as a good teacher in this context. He defended, in 2:1–12, the contents of his earlier preaching. From a distance, he continued to speak words of encouragement through Timothy, his emissary, and through his letter to the Thessalonians (3:1–2; 5:27). He reinforced his message by holding up his life as a model to imitate (1:6; 2:1–12).

The Thessalonians had also been "taught by God" (4:9), fulfilling the OT expectations of how God would relate to His people (Is. 54:13; Jer. 31:34). Through Paul, God had communicated His invitation to join His people (1 Thess. 1:4–5). Through Paul, God had taught them how to love (4:9) and, through the Lord's revelatory word (4:15), had spoken tenderly to the Thessalonians in their grief. This tenderness flowed from the presence of the Spirit in Paul's heart and moved him to write to them as brothers and close friends in the faith. In addition to accepting the various words spoken by God, the Thessalonians were to imitate His deeds through the paradigm He had provided. This paradigm is Jesus, described as the one who "died and rose again" (4:14; see also 1:6; 5:10). Paul assured the Thessalonians that even if they died, they would imitate the resurrection of Jesus by being resurrected themselves upon His return (4:14–18; 5:9–10).

COMMENTARY

1:1—2:16

Greetings and Thanksgiving

The opening of the letter includes four elements typical of Greco-Roman letters: the senders are named (Paul, Silas [Silvanus], and Timothy; 1:1), the addressees are identified ("to the church of the Thessalonians"; 1:1), a greeting is given (of grace and peace; 1:1), and a prayer is invoked—or, in this case, two thanksgiving sections (1:2–10; 2:13–16). It is highly likely that Paul was schooled in letter writing. This would have involved the use of manuals that contained samples of different letter types. In the first chapters of 1 Thessalonians, we find many themes associated with the "friendly" type of letter. These themes include the recalling of shared memories (1:2–3; 2:1), an acknowledgment of the suffering caused by the physical separation of writer from addressee (2:17—3:1), expressions of concern for each other (2:9; 3:2, 5), and an affirmation of reciprocal feelings (3:6). The inclusion of such themes would have signaled to the Thessalonians that one of the primary purposes of the letter was to maintain friendship. The focus on friendship in the first two chapters of the letter was to establish sufficient rapport between Paul and his audience so as to enable the acceptance of his pastoral exhortations and eschatological revelation in chapters 3 to 5.

1:1. Greetings. The letter begins with a salutation from its senders to its addressees (v. 1). In this letter—one of the earliest written by Paul—there is little stress on his apostolic role and identity. He is introduced in a manner equivalent to that of his coauthors—simply by name. This contrasts with his later letters, in which he consistently introduced himself as an apostle (e.g., Rom. 1:1–6; Col. 1:1), often in distinction from his coauthors not identified with the status of apostle (see 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1). It most probably reflects the fact that there is no indication in the letter that his identity as an apostle was disputed by the Thessalonians.

The recipients of the letter are described as the "church [ekklēsia] of the Thessalonians" (1 Thess. 1:1). In technical usage, the Greek term ekklēsia refers to a democratic assembly of full citizens. In more general usage, it referred to a gathering or a community of people with shared beliefs. Paul's usage of this term parallels the way in which the people of Israel are described in the Greek translation of the Hebrew OT, commonly referred to as the Septuagint (LXX). They are described as the "assembly of Israel" (ekklēsia; Deut. 31:30; 1 Kin. 8:14, LXX), and "the assembly" of the people of God (Judg. 20:2; cf. 1 Sam. 17:47, LXX). The designation "assembly of Israel" refers to a specific ethnic group—those later referred to as Jews. The Roman authorities sought to classify and control both existing and emerging communities in order to maintain imperial peace and safety (1 Thess. 5:3). In Paul's day, the Jews were accorded special privileges as an ethnic group by the Roman authorities. One of these privileges included a degree of self-governance over both the Holy Land and diaspora communities. In comparison to Jews, the followers of Jesus appeared Jewish in terms of their practices and beliefs, while at the same time being very ethnically diverse. Talk of a new ekklēsia would have posed a problem for the Roman authorities; they would have needed to decide if followers of Jesus qualified for privileged Jewish status.

When Paul uses the term ekklēsia, he is not referring to a whitewashed edifice with an imposing steeple. He is talking about a community. Scholars have suggested a number of parallels between communities established by Paul and the Greco-Roman household, religious associations, the synagogue, and philosophical or rhetorical schools. The Thessalonian community does not fit neatly into any of these categories. Rather, they represent the people (or "kingdom"; 2:12) of God, who assembled in houses and operated as a family (Acts 17:5–7; 1 Thess. 2:7, 11), were organized like an association (1 Thess. 5:12–13), worshiped and prayed like those who met in a synagogue (5:17–18), and taught like a philosophical school (4:2). In this fluid social context, Paul affirmed the foundational reality that their key identifying characteristic was neither a particular social or organizational structure nor a geographical location, but was found in their identity as the ekklēsia in God the Father and in Jesus (1:1). What made them unique as a community was the God they proclaimed as Father and the confession that Jesus is both Lord and Messiah.

1:2–10. Thanksgiving. Greco-Roman letters would normally include a prayer to the gods on behalf of the addressees in their opening section. Paul adapted this tradition by starting his letter with the first of two thanksgiving prayers. Scholars have attempted to categorize the contents of his thanksgiving sections by identifying a number of common elements. These include: (1) thanks; (2) God; (3) always; (4) for you; (5) because . . .; and (6) "as a result," "therefore," "so that." These elements are also found in both 1 Corinthians 1:4–9 and 2 Thessalonians 1:3–4 (see also Rom. 1:8–15). Further, both thanksgiving sections of 1 Thessalonians 1:2–10 and 2:13–16 include the majority of these elements. These opening prayers introduce the main themes of the letter—a function highlighted through the use of extended sentences. In the Greek text, 1:2–5 comprises one extended sentence that evokes one subject after another (cf. 1 Cor. 1:4–8; Eph. 1:3–6; Phil. 1:3–7).

The prayer starts with a reference to thanksgiving. The use of eucharistoumen ("we thank"; 1 Thess. 1:2) in the present tense indicates a constant and repeated activity reinforced through the adverb "always." This ongoing thanksgiving would indicate that Paul was not merely making a rhetorical or epistolary remark. He was alluding to actual practice—thrilled at what God had achieved among the Thessalonians. Three participle clauses indicate the means of Paul's giving of thanks: first, by mentioning the Thessalonians in prayer (v. 2b); second, by remembering their faith, hope, and love (v. 3); and third, by knowledge of their calling by God (v. 4). These three clauses form the contents of the thanksgiving. Paul alludes in the first clause to an ongoing presentation in prayer of shared memories before God (v. 3). As noted above, the reference to shared memories was a common motif found within the "friendly" type of Hellenistic letters. Paul thus indicates his keenness to maintain his bond of friendship with the Thessalonians.

The idea of the first clause is reinforced and expanded in the second clause, which refers to Paul's remembrance of the Thessalonians' faith, love, and hope (v. 3). In many of his letters, Paul uses these three virtues—characteristic of the people of God in the OT (cf. Gen. 15:6; Ex. 20:6; Lev. 19:18; Pss. 33:18, 22; 42:11)—to appraise the spiritual condition of his audience. This threesome thematically dominates the rest of the letter. The order in which the virtues are listed varies from letter to letter (cf. Gal. 5:5–6; Eph. 1:15–18). Often the virtue listed last is of primary importance. Paul urged the divided believers in Corinth to pursue faith, hope, and love (1 Cor. 13:13). The listing of love as the final virtue of three indicates that, for the Corinthians, it was a higher priority than faith and hope. The reference to the three virtues of faith, love, and hope in 1 Thessalonians 1:3 indicates that Paul had used these virtues to assess the spiritual state of the Thessalonians. Though a community less than a year old, they nevertheless received a positive appraisal. Paul remembered their faithful work, loving labor, and enduring hope (v. 3). Faith, somewhat surprisingly, involves work. Love is expressed practically through the kind of effort associated with hard physical labor, and hope needs patience. Each virtue demands effort and cannot be reduced to merely an emotion.

The positive sentiments of the first two participle clauses are further developed in the third clause in 1:4–5 and the accompanying material of 1:6–10. These verses are dominated by first-century educational language. In the Greco-Roman world, imitation supplemented oral discourse as the primary methods of teaching. The disciple learned through hearing his teacher's words and imitating his deeds (see Luke 24:19). Using these two didactic elements—the teacher speaking and the disciple hearing, and the teacher acting and the disciple imitating—Paul affirmed the Thessalonians because they had become imitators of their teachers and of the Lord (1 Thess. 1:6) by proclaiming the word of the Lord (v. 8) that they had both heard and accepted. He implicitly affirmed their status as good disciples—without needing to use the term "disciple"—because they had both heard and acted upon the word of God.

First, let us consider the educational theme of speaking and hearing. As with Israel in the OT, the Thessalonians had been called by God to be His people. They were followers of Jesus as a result of the deliberate actions of God. The use of the noun eklogē ("election," "calling"; 1:4) refers to God's choice or selection, realized in the act of calling—a prominent motif found throughout the letter (2:12; 4:7; 5:24). This calling was communicated through Paul's preaching of the gospel, not in word only but also with power, the Holy Spirit, and full confidence. Paul drew attention to God's transformation of his words into something much greater than the sum of human effort. The Thessalonians had not just heard the words of an itinerant entertainer or philosopher, but had heard the voice of God Himself. Much theological ink has been spilt on the issue of calling and election (see commentary on 2 Tim. 2:8–13). Our sources simply indicate that Paul preached without fear to many in Thessalonica (Acts 17:1–4). Luke says that some were persuaded (Acts 17:4). For them, the preaching of the gospel was a calling by God—an act that conveyed to the small and insignificant group of new converts a value and status equivalent to that of the people of God in the OT, the elect of Israel (Deut. 7:6–7; Is. 43:20; 45:4).

According to 1 Thessalonians 1:9–10, the gospel message was a call for the Gentile Thessalonians to turn from idols "to serve the living and true God" (v. 9) and to await His Son from heaven (v. 10). For many of us who grew up in Christian communities and who have a knowledge of God's will, the experience of conversion is often characterized by an act of repentance. We know that we are sinners and we receive forgiveness for our sins through faith in Jesus. However, for the pagan Thessalonians, who knew neither God nor His will, conversion was not primarily an act of repentance but rather the positive acceptance of God's call to turn away from other gods and to serve Him and become part of His family. This call to reject idolatry was not unique to Paul. Many Greeks who followed Judaism—known as God-fearers (Acts 10:22; 13:26)—were attracted to the moral clarity of Jewish monotheism. Unique to Paul's gospel, however, was his call to wait for the return of Jesus on judgment day (1 Thess. 1:10). This was Paul's radical alternative to the solutions for society's woes offered by the philosophers and mystery religions of his day. Others, who heard the same words, were not persuaded (Acts 17:4–5; cf. Matt. 13:3–9, 18–23).

At the end of this thanksgiving section, Paul affirmed the Thessalonians as successful disciples. They had heard and accepted the call of God expressed through Paul and now deserved to be heard by others. In 1 Thessalonians 1:8, Paul mentioned how the word or message of the Lord was strongly proclaimed from and through the Thessalonians to those in Macedonia, Achaia, and, indeed, throughout the whole known region. He had heard a report of their faithfulness, the welcome they extended to Paul, their turning from idols to the living God, and their desire to await the return of His Son from heaven (vv. 9–10). The new believers simply could not wait to tell others about their new-found faith. Their report was accurate and full and as such did not need to be supplemented by Paul (v. 8). They had become an authoritative source and deserved to be heard.

We next return to the complementary educational themes of deeds and imitation. As good disciples, the Thessalonians had also become supporters of Paul and his associates, as well as the Lord (v. 6). The term used for them is mimētēs, a reference to the act of imitation. Further along in the letter are Paul's statements concerning how they were to imitate Jesus (see commentary on 1 Thess. 5:1–11). The order of first imitating Paul and then the Lord may seem somewhat surprising. This is, however, the historical order in which the Thessalonians encountered Paul and Jesus. First, Paul introduced himself to them. Second, he introduced them to Jesus. The gospel was mediated through human agency. Paul did not hesitate to put himself forward as an example to imitate in contrast to the hesitancy of contemporary philosophers (see also 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1). The purpose of following Paul's example was to follow that of God (Eph. 5:1). The call to imitate both Jesus and the human agency through whom He is mediated challenges those cultures that exalt a form of spiritual freedom through isolation and the construction of a highly individualized spiritual "self." "Me and my Lord" is replaced by the Thessalonian experience of "Us, Paul, and our Lord." The result of successfully imitating Paul and the Lord was that the Thessalonians had become a typos or pattern for those in Macedonia and Achaia (1 Thess. 1:7). The imitators were themselves imitated. Paul's affirmation of their status as a valid pattern for others confirms that they had positively imitated him. Later, in 2:14, Paul would compliment them further for becoming "imitators" through Jesus of God's churches in Judea. By defining their development as members of the people of God through the familiar pedagogical concepts of hearing and imitation, Paul was able to compliment and encourage the Thessalonians in terms they readily understood.

2:1–12. Defense of Paul's Visit. In this passage, Paul offers a sustained defense of his ministry. He refutes possible criticisms—appealing to both God and the Thessalonians as his witnesses (v. 10). In Greek, a "martyr" or "witness" was not simply a passive observer of events but rather someone willing to testify in public concerning what had been seen or heard. The Thessalonians had already acted as Paul's witnesses by sharing their account of his visit with those in Macedonia and Achaia. Paul maintained their role as witnesses throughout 2:1–12 by repeatedly affirming the nature and extent of their knowledge ("you know"; vv. 1, 2, 5, 11; "you remember"; v. 9).

Why did Paul need to mount such a defense? There is no indication in the letter that the Thessalonians were hostile toward Paul. They received his message with joy despite the persecution that followed (1:6). Indeed, they and God were his key witnesses (2:10). Neither does Paul's defense address the specific accusation of the Jews as recorded in Acts. In Acts 17:6–7, the Jews of Thessalonica charged Paul and his companions with disturbing the world (oikoumenē; "inhabited area"; i.e., the Roman Empire) and challenging the authority of Caesar by proclaiming another ruler: Jesus. A more preferable suggestion is that Paul was attempting to counter any false conceptions that might have been associated with his ministry due to his sudden departure from Thessalonica. The ancient world was full of wandering charlatans who bounced from one city to another peddling their wares in an attempt to win fame and fortune from anyone gullible enough to believe them. To avoid being associated with such riff-raff, Paul defended his ministry as one not based on error, impure motives, trickery, or greed. His message and ministry was one approved by God (1 Thess. 2:4). For this reason, Paul put himself forward as an example of good leadership to imitate. In doing so, Paul used many of the terms employed by contemporary philosophers to defend their honor. He was willing to match, and indeed to surpass, society's expectations of good and noble behavior.

Paul's defense may be divided into two sections: 2:1-8 and 2:9-12. The first section includes three denials that follow the same grammatical pattern. Each denial is introduced in Greek with a conjunction often translated "for" (vv. 1, 3, 5); the denial itself is stated; and then supporting evidence is presented, signaled in Greek by the use of a conjunction of opposites, often translated "but" (vv. 2, 4, 7). The second section includes a positive description of Paul's gospel and example (i.e., his words and deeds).

Paul's first denial was that his visit had no results (vv. 1-2). His leadership was successful due to the clarity of his message and the manner of his delivery. He referred first to his and his colleagues' boldness despite significant opposition (v. 2). Like a Greek philosopher, he spoke with the sought-after quality of boldness or frankness. To speak frankly is to speak candidly about someone's condition. Having diagnosed the problem, the philosopher would then prescribe the remedy, which, unsurprisingly, would be his own brand of philosophy. This often resulted in conflict. Stoic and Cynic philosophers thus described themselves as athletes in a competition or in conflict with immoral men and women to help them turn from lives of vice to lives of virtue. Paul's preaching of the gospel likewise resulted in conflict. This conflict was not a one-off occurrence, as demonstrated by the suffering and insults he experienced in Philippi. He, like the good philosopher, was willing to put his life on the line to save others. In contrast to the philosophers, however, Paul's boldness resulted from being helped by his God and his prescription for society's ills was the gospel from God (v. 2).

Paul's second denial was that his exhortation or appeal was driven by negative motives (vv. 3-4). In v. 3 he rejects three possible motives for delivering his gospel. He was not motivated by error, uncleanness, or deceit. Paul rejected these and instead argued that his sole motive was to please God, a motif associated with the people of God in the OT (Ps. 69:30-31; Is. 59:15). He had been tested by God and, as a result, entrusted with the preaching of the gospel (1 Thess. 2:4). This testing was also not a one-off event. It was an ongoing process by which Paul sought God's continual approval of his motives. Paul modeled personal accountability to God. Note the repeated references to God throughout this section (2:2, 4, 8). Paul was conscious of living in the presence of the very God he proclaimed to the formerly pagan Thessalonians (1:9).

Paul's third denial was that his ministry was self-serving and that he sought to enhance his own glory with flattering words (2:5-8). Paul's defense was to appeal to the example he had provided them: he and his colleagues shared the gospel of God as well as their own lives (v. 8). The words of the gospel they had heard were validated by the lived example he had provided for them to imitate (1 John 3:18; cf. Matt. 23:3; Rom. 2:1, 21-23; James 2:14-18). Philosophers similarly promoted this widely accepted test of genuineness: that one's deeds should match one's speech. Paul also used imagery associated with good pastoral care that would have been familiar to the Thessalonians. Philosophers argued that new converts to philosophy were like babes in need of motherly care. Paul argued that he had laid aside his rights as an apostle and instead approached the Thessalonians in gentleness, as a nursing mother cares for her own children (1 Thess. 2:7). His actions confirmed and demonstrated the motives he professed.

In vv. 9-12, Paul appealed directly to both the Thessalonians and God as witnesses of the message he preached and the example he provided. This appeal includes themes already encountered in the letter. In chapter 1, Paul described the Thessalonians' experience in terms of two elements: hearing and imitation—the two primary methods of teaching employed in first-century education. In chapter two, he defended the training he provided in the same terms. With respect to speaking and hearing, Paul had preached the gospel of God (vv. 2, 4, 8, 9) and encouraged, comforted, and admonished (vv. 11-12) the Thessalonians. In terms of deeds and imitation, Paul and his companions were pleased to impart to the Thessalonians not only the gospel of God but also their own lives (v. 8). He had confidence concerning how he had behaved among the Thessalonians (v. 10). Paul desired that the Thessalonians would follow his example and ensure that their behavior was worthy of their calling from God, who called them into His kingdom and glory (v. 12).

At the heart of this section is the question of how we may know whether someone's ministry is genuine or not. Paul's defense required both God and the Thessalonians to judge the nature of his message, his motives for preaching, and the supporting example of his life. Too often the last two elements—motive and lived example—are neglected in preference for a detailed scrutiny of the message. Paul's account of his own ministry amounts to more than an appeal to his own authority. He could have appealed to his own education at the feet of the great rabbi Gamaliel—grandson or son of Hillel, founder of the famous Pharisaic school of interpretation, the "House of Hillel" (Acts 5:34-40; 22:3). Paul had the equivalent of a Harvard, Oxford, or Cambridge education. Alternatively, he could have appealed to the various visions he had had of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 12:7; Gal. 1:12; 2:2). Instead, Paul opened himself up to the judgment and scrutiny of his witnesses, God and the Thessalonians (1 Thess. 2:4, 5, 10), to have them decide whether his deeds matched his words. This willingness to be held externally accountable ensured his genuineness and provided a model for the church leaders in Thessalonica and beyond to imitate. The implication for those of us who would model Paul's approach is that we must share our own lives with those who listen to our gospel. Through our deeds, the new or non-believer is able to test the truth of our words. Our deeds are as important as our words.

2:13-16. Thanksgiving. In 1 Thessalonians 2:13-16, we encounter a second thanksgiving section. It includes many words and themes common to the first thanksgiving prayer (1:2-10). For example, in both sections we have references to constant thanksgiving (1:2; 2:13), the reception of the word of God (1:5; 2:13), imitation of others (1:6; 2:14), works of faith (1:3; 2:13), suffering (1:6; 2:14), and wrath (1:10; 2:16). More parallels may indeed be observed. These parallels reinforce the sentiments of the previous thanksgiving section in confirming the Thessalonians as members of the people of God and reaffirming their friendship with Paul. As good disciples, they had received Paul's word not as merely human words but as the word of God (2:13). They were an audience able to discern truth. As good disciples, they had imitated Paul and the Lord (1:6) and had also become imitators (mimētai) of God's churches in Judea (2:14). However, unlike their imitation of Paul and Jesus, this imitation was not intentional. This imitation arose as a result of their shared experience of persecution (vv. 14-15).

Paul applied the motif of the persecution of the prophets to the Jewish treatment of Jesus and the church in Judea. This motif was common within Judaism and early Christianity (Jer. 2:30; Matt. 5:12; Luke 11:49; Acts 7:52). The result of this persecution was that the Judean Jewish leaders had displeased God, hindered the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, and so filled up their sins to the limit (1 Thess. 2:16). In the OT, the concept of "filling up sins" refers to periods of historical transition (e.g., Gen. 15:16). Just as the opening thanksgiving concluded with a reference to impending wrath (1 Thess. 1:10), so Paul also ended this thanksgiving section with a reference to God's wrath. This wrath had come upon his own countrymen in Judea as a result of them hindering the salvation of the Gentiles (2:16). The God who is normally gracious (Ex. 34:6) had decided that He could endure their sins no more and must intervene in His wrath. Paul did not go into specific detail as to the manner in which God's wrath was manifested. He may have been referring to any one of several events that occurred around the time he was writing: the famine that struck Judea in A.D. 45-47, the massacre during the Passover in Jerusalem in A.D. 49, or the expulsion of Jews from Rome by decree of the Roman Emperor Claudius in A.D. 49 (Acts 18:2). Paul's terminology may also point to a future judgment so certain it is spoken of as having already arrived. In any case, this allows his audience to infer a similar divine response to those persecuting them.

2:17—3:5

Timothy's Visit

This section of the letter addresses the means by which Paul maintained his apostolic parousia ("presence") amongst the Thessalonians (see also 2 Cor. 10:10; Phil. 1:26; 2:12). Paul usually asserted his presence by three means: his physical presence, emissaries, and letters. The need to maintain his presence both as the one proclaiming the gospel (1 Thess. 1:5; 2:2, 4, 9) and as an example to imitate (1:6; 2:8, 14) was vital for the spiritual growth of the new Thessalonian believers. Paul tied their development to his ministry. The theme of friendship dominates this section and serves to reaffirm his relationship to them prior to his exhortations later in the letter.

2:17-20. Previous Attempts to Visit. In this section, Paul explains his inability to visit the Thessalonians in a manner intended to reaffirm his friendship. In many of his letters he expresses his intention to visit those to whom he writes and his frustrations at any perceived delays that might have occurred (Rom. 15:14-33; 1 Cor. 4:14-21; Phil. 2:19-24). He had not, after all, been avoiding or neglecting them. Such sentiments, found in 1 Thessalonians 2:17–18, were common in friendship letters and would communicate Paul's desire for continued and intimate involvement in the lives of the Thessalonians. Another friendship theme was the pain of separation. Paul describes his separation from them as being taken away or orphaned (v. 17). This intense pain of separation resulted in a strong desire to visit in person. Paul was unable to fulfill this desire, however, because Satan had hindered or blocked his visit (v. 18).

Paul clearly believed in a personal evil power that opposed God (Rom. 16:20), tempted believers (1 Cor. 7:5), and caused him physical discomfort (2 Cor. 12:7). How might Satan have hindered Paul from visiting the Thessalonians? One suggestion is that Paul experienced a physical illness—a "thorn"—while in Corinth (2 Cor. 12:7). There is little support, however, for this suggestion in the letter. He was more likely referring to the actions taken by the Jewish leaders against him while he was in Thessalonica. They were jealous because Paul had reduced their influence by converting many Greeks and significant women, some of whom would likely have been wealthy patrons of their synagogues (Acts 17:4). They stirred up a rabble and searched for Paul. Unable to find him, they dragged Jason and a number of other believers before the five or six magistrates who governed the city, presenting the charge that the believers had extended hospitality to those (i.e., Paul) who were a threat to Imperial Rome (Acts 17:6–7). The Jewish leaders aligned their interests with Rome, as previously in the trial of Jesus.

Jason was held responsible for Paul as his host and had been given the somewhat lenient punishment of being required to give money on his behalf for his release (Acts 17:9). This verdict would stand as long as the magistrates who made this decision held office. Paul had not faced trial, yet he had been found guilty in his absence. He had been unable to present his defense and was banned from returning to Thessalonica. Expulsion from cities was a common means by which ancient authorities dealt with those thought to be socially disruptive. Despite these "satanic" setbacks, Paul was able to maintain his presence through his letters and his emissary Timothy. God turned setback into unanticipated blessing in that Paul's apostolic "presence" now extends through every age to all believers who have access to his letters.

In 1 Thessalonians 2:19–20, Paul further affirmed his friendship by declaring the high status in which he held the believers. They represented the basis of his boasting before the Lord Jesus at His coming (parousia; v. 19; cf. 3:13; 4:15; 5:23). While the word parousia can simply refer to the arrival or presence of someone (e.g., 1 Cor. 16:17; 2 Cor. 7:6), it was commonly used in a more technical sense to refer to an official visit from a royal dignitary, or even the Roman emperor himself. The formerly pagan Thessalonians would have understood parousia as referring to a visit by an imperial ruler. These sorts of royal visits were always accompanied with the pomp and circumstance and splendor worthy of a king. Cities would be cleaned, roads would be repaired, and commemorative coins would be minted in preparation for the event. The ruler would receive celebratory gifts and honors upon arrival and would then reward those who had been faithful while executing judgment on enemies. Paul and other NT authors built on this imagery to illustrate how majestic the day will be when the Lord Jesus returns (see commentary on 1 Thess. 4:13–18). On that day, He too will both receive all honor and execute judgment (1 Cor. 15:23–24; Phil. 2:10; 2 Pet. 1:16). The faithfulness of the Thessalonians to the gospel was Paul's gift to his returning King (see Phil. 2:16). The Thessalonians were his hope, joy, victory crown, and glory, which like the two faithful servants who presented the fruits of their service to their returning master (Matt. 25:14–30), he would present to his Lord as evidence of his devotion and service.

3:1–5. Timothy's Substitute Visit. Paul's response to being unable to visit the Thessalonians was to send Timothy in his place. He twice communicated this decision: in vv. 1–2 and in v. 5. In both passages he used identical vocabulary: stegō ("to stand," "to endure"; vv. 1, 5), pempō ("to send"; vv. 2, 5), and pistis ("trust," "belief," "faith"; vv. 2, 5). In vv. 1–2, the emphasis is on Paul and his coworkers making the decision together. In v. 5, the emphasis is on Paul as the sole decision maker. In both passages, the purpose of Timothy's visit is stated: to strengthen, establish, and encourage the Thessalonians in their faith (v. 2) and to know whether this faith was remaining (v. 5). This repetition emphasizes the unity of purpose of Paul with his coworkers. It establishes Timothy's visit as the equivalent of a visit by Paul himself. These statements bracket vv. 3–4, in which Paul stated the reason for his concern for their faith. He was worried that they may have been shaken by afflictions.

The purpose of Timothy's visit was to ensure that the faith of the Thessalonians was not shaken by persecutions (vv. 3–4). Many today believe that when they become followers of Jesus, the economic and social quality of their lives should automatically improve. Life should get easier. The danger of this attitude is that it reduces Christianity to just one more self-help religion. The experience of the Thessalonians was that their acceptance of Paul's call to worship the one true God resulted in a strange mixture of both joy and suffering (1:6). They received the gospel of Jesus Christ and as a result experienced persecution (3:3). Such persecution should not have taken the Thessalonians by surprise, however. Paul had warned them about the certainty of trouble ahead (v. 4). For Paul, however, affliction held an additional eschatological significance. In the Bible, the people of God are portrayed as enduring a time of suffering prior to their deliverance at the coming of the Son of Man (Dan. 7:13; 12:1; Matt. 24:21, 30; Mark 13:19). Paul believed, in line with these convictions, that the Thessalonians might take their suffering as evidence of their status as the eschatological people of God.

Timothy was uniquely suited to be Paul's emissary or "presence." His Jewish mother was a believer, and his father was a Greek (Acts 16:1). Some scholars suggest that Timothy's parents are our only certain case of intermarriage between Jew and Greek from the Greco-Roman world. In general, Jews strongly opposed interracial marriage. Timothy's unique ethnic background enhanced his ability to minister to a mixed church of Jews and Gentiles along with Paul (Acts 17:1–4). His ethnic identity is not, however, identified as determining his suitability to be Paul's emissary. Instead, he is identified as a brother, making him of equal social status to Paul and Silas, and as a minister or fellow worker of God and of the gospel of Christ (1 Thess. 3:2). His mission was to encourage the believers (v. 2). This description reflects the earlier descriptions of Paul and his coworkers as the ones who worked (2:9), shared the gospel of Christ (1:5; 2:2, 4, 8, 9), and encouraged the believers (2:12). In receiving Timothy, the Thessalonians were, in fact, receiving Paul. Timothy was willing to continue in this supporting role (1 Cor. 4:17). Paul could trust Timothy to share his gospel and model his ways to others.

3:6—5:11

Paul's Response to their Crisis of Hope

This section of the letter includes Timothy's report of his visit and Paul's response. The material is mostly paraenetic in character. Paraenesis is the Greek term for advice or moral exhortation on matters related to practical living. Such exhortation was not new to the Thessalonians. Paul had encouraged or exhorted them during his time in Thessalonica (2:12) and had also sent Timothy to encourage them (3:2). This section includes his instructing and urging them (4:1, 10) in the hope that they would imitate him and comfort or encourage each other (4:18; see also 5:11). He wished them to extend to one another the pastoral care that he had modeled to them. They needed to treat each other in the same manner that he had treated them.

Much of the first two chapters of the epistle focuses on recalling past events. In 3:6–10, Paul shifted to the present through the use of two Greek adverbs meaning "now" (vv. 6, 8). These common adverbs are not used anywhere else in the letter. This shift would have had the effect of reinforcing Paul's "presence" when the letter was read to the Thessalonians. This shift from the past to the present anticipates a further shift in 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 to the future hope-giving coming or parousia of Jesus.

3:6–10. Affirmation of their Faith. This section includes Timothy's report of his visit, its emotional impact on Paul, and his response of thanksgiving to God. Paul recounted Timothy's report of his visit to the Thessalonians in v. 6. The three virtues of faith, love, and hope introduced in 1:3 play a key role. Paul had been concerned about the continued faithfulness of the Thessalonians (3:2, 5). Timothy delivered a glowing report about their faith and love—two virtues out of the original three of faith, love, and hope (v. 6). Two virtues remain, but one is absent, namely, hope. This situation shaped the contents of subsequent portions of the letter (faith [3:7–10]; love [3:12—4:12]; and absent hope [4:13–18]). By the end of the letter, the Christian virtues of faith, love, and hope appear, restored as an integrated whole in the experience of the Thessalonians (5:8).

Paul left incomplete the account starting in 3:6 of Timothy's visit. Instead he spoke to the impact the news of the Thessalonians' faith (vv. 7, 10) had had on him. Paul had been greatly comforted or encouraged (parakaleō; v. 7) by Timothy's report, which he described as good news (v. 6). This led him to give thanks to and rejoice before God (v. 9). He prayed more than ever—night and day—to see them (v. 10). This section is dominated by friendship language by which Paul sought to highlight factors in common between him and his audience. He genuinely addressed them as brothers and sisters (v. 7). He said that they had good memories of him (v. 6), just as he had positive memories of them (1:2). Paul had previously expressed his desire to see them face-to-face (2:17–18). Now, Timothy's report had confirmed their desire to see him (3:6). Paul sent Timothy to encourage them in their suffering (vv. 2–3). Timothy's report encouraged Paul in his affliction and distress (v. 7). These reciprocal factors indicate that the Thessalonians had ministered to Paul as he had to them. It also communicated that their situation was similar to his—the implication being that they should continue to imitate Paul by remaining faithful amid suffering.

3:11–13. Prayer. Paul followed his reference to praying night and day (3:10) with an actual prayer for himself and the Thessalonians. There are three parts to the prayer—each part summarizing different sections of the letter as a whole. First, Paul prayed that God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ might facilitate the means by which he could fulfill his desire to visit the Thessalonians (2:17–20; 3:10). The second element of the prayer was a request that the Lord would cause them to have abundant and overflowing love for each other, as well as others—just as Paul and his coworkers loved them (v. 12). This relates to Paul's exhortation to imitate him in love in 4:1–12. Finally, he prayed that God would establish their hearts as blameless and holy before God the Father at the coming of Christ (v. 13). This reflects the hope-giving emphasis on the return of Jesus in 4:13—5:11. Paul lifted up the contents of his letter to God in prayer. The impact of this letter would be dependent not only on the reader responding positively. Paul knew that God Himself and the Lord Jesus Christ needed to respond to his prayer and to the letter's petitions for it to be more than a pious expression of friendship between the evangelist and his isolated followers. This prayer is also of great historical importance as one of our earliest documented Christian prayers. It indicates that traditional Jewish ways of addressing God were developed to incorporate references to Jesus. For example, in Sirach, an early second century B.C. Jewish text, God is addressed in prayer as "Lord, Father and Master" (Sir. 23:1) and "Lord, Father and God" (23:4). In 1 Thessalonians 3:11–13, Paul twice applied the terms "Father" to God and "Lord" to Jesus. In this way, he addressed Jesus using terms normally reserved in Jewish prayers for God. For a Jew like Paul, this was a stunning development based on divine revelation.

4:1–12. Exhortation to Love. In this paraenetic section of the letter, Paul gently encouraged the Thessalonians to do more of what they were already doing. In this way, he sought their progress without adopting a critical tone. He modeled how to share moral instruction (see Eph. 5:21—6:9; Col. 3:18—4:1; 2 Thess. 3:6–13). In Greco-Roman letters, paraenetic material typically included advice on friends, family, money, sex, and food. It was general in nature and usually reflected accepted virtues and behaviors. It was presented as material so familiar that the audience did not really need any reminder. This helped to avoid sounding critical and aided the acceptance of the advice, which although general in nature, was selected with an eye toward the situation of the addressees. In this vein, Paul affirmed that the Thessalonians had already been taught by both himself and God (1 Thess. 4:1, 9). Once more we return to the theme of education. They already knew the commands and instructions given by Paul and his associates and supported by Christ's authority (v. 2); they had no need for him to write to them concerning certain issues (v. 9; see also 5:1). Paul knew that extreme tact is required to successfully influence moral behavior.

Paul started by urging the Thessalonians to continue following the teachings he had shared with them during his visit (4:1). The purpose of these teachings was to instruct them how to live (lit. "walk") and to please God (v. 1; cf. Gen. 17:1; 24:40; 48:15; Deut. 8:6). While affirming that the Thessalonians were already successfully doing as they were instructed, Paul nevertheless encouraged them that not only were they to maintain this lifestyle, but they were also to seek to continually improve (1 Thess. 4:1). This reinforced his earlier prayer that God would cause their love to continually increase (3:12). Paul's vision was of a dynamic and ever-developing Christian experience.

He exhorted the Thessalonians to holiness in both sexual (4:3–8) and brotherly love (vv. 9–12). His moral exhortation did not merely reflect societal norms. Instead, it was shaped by the OT Levitical holiness regulations—the people were to be holy as God is holy (Lev. 20:26). Paul's exhortations on sexual and brotherly love follow the same sequence as Leviticus 18–19, which first prohibits sexual immorality (18:1–30), then promotes familial and neighbourly love (19:17–18). Paul urged the Thessalonians, as the people of God, to please Him through following His will, which is their sanctification (hagiasmos; 1 Thess. 4:3). They were to walk, or rather live, in holiness (hagiasmos; v. 7).
